Esslingen upon the Neckar, a great Arithmetician, and pastor to some Evangelical Churches: 'Cujus libri Arithmetici, addi he, reconditiorum numerorum scientia referti in magno, uti debent, pretio inter doctos habentur (10). -- Whose arithmetical books are filled with a deeper knowledge of numbers, and on that account are deservedly in great esteem with the learned.' Thuanus makes use of the same words, speaking of the death of Stiffelius in the year 1567: a Pro-mann, as he observes, who had been a long time Professor in Saxony and Prussia, and who died at Iena in Thuringia, when he was four-score years of age (11). According to Vossius he died there at the age of fifty-eight (12); but I am more inclined to believe Bredenbach, who says that he died in that place on the 19th of April 1567, in the 81st year of his age, after having been minister to several churches in Saxony and Prussia (13). I do indeed believe that he was not a Professor, as Thuanus pretends; but a parson. However that be, his arithmetical works are called very exact by the same Bucholc. You will find in Vossius (14), 1, That Posselin has observed that Stiffelius's Arithmetic printed at Nuremberg, with a Preface by Melancthon, has the approbation of great men. 2, That in the opinion of Joseph Blancanus (15) the method in which Stiffelius has treated Algebra, and all the parts of Arithmetic, is an excellent one. Vossius places the edition of his complete Arithmetic in the year 1544, and observes that Stiffelius published a system of Arithmetic according to the Italian practice, a treatise of Algebra, and likewise an ecclesiastical computation in the German tongue.

You will observe that Wendelinus, Spondanus, &c. agree that the Stiffelius who foretold the end of the world was an excellent Arithmetician.

Apply here the reflexion which I made (16) upon the long life of Comenius.

[E] Bredenbach tells us that one Campanus did the same thing in the country of Juliers. He insinuates as if an artful fellow had encouraged this man in his whimsical notions, in order that he might purchase at a cheaper rate the lands of the credulous country people. I shall give the story compleat, and observe that it is taken from Lindanus, who is not a very authentic writer. 'Perluaserat Joannes Campanus miseris rusticis, non longe à fluvio Rura degentibus, quod vel hodie res ipsa loquitur, & testantur vicini, ne amplius austeri sese frangerent agriculturæ laboribus: non sese frustra duris vexarent, diutius fatigarent, enecarent, sodiendi, arandi, metendi sudoribus; instare diem judicii; brevi omnia inundationibus aquarum delenda: indulgentem genio igitur: molliter sese tractarent, suavius viverent, quod mihi fellæ supererat vitæ rusticæ, omnia prope diem certo certius peritura. Illi stolidi stolido ac deliro Prophetæ creduli suos vendunt agellos: qui illos emit sensus non frustrâ sese illum aluisse Prophetam (17). -- John Campanus had persuaded the poor peasants near the river Rura, as the thing itself appears at this day, and as their neighbours testify, that they should no longer consume their strength by the rough labours of husbandry, nor harass, fatigue, and kill themselves to no purpose, by the heavy toils of digging, ploughing, and reaping; for that the day of judgment was at hand, and every thing was in a short time to be destroyed by a deluge of water. For this reason he exhorted them to make much of themselves, and to spend the poor remains of their country life in ease and pleasure, nothing being more certain than that all things were soon to perish. Those poor creatures giving credit to a simple and delirious prophet sold their lands: you may guess that the person who bought them did not keep that prophet for nothing.' He quotes afterwards an epigram of Martial upon a man, who had spent a very great estate in less than a year, because an Astrologer had foretold him that he was to die soon.

Dixerat astrologus peritum te cito, Munna,

Nec, puto, mentitus dixerat ille tibi.

Nam tu dum metuis, ne quid post fata relinquis,

Hausisti patrias luxuriosius opes.

Bisquæ tuum decies non toto tabuit anno:

Dic mihi, non hoc est, Munna, perire cito (18)? (18) Martial. Epigr. lxxvii, lib. ix.

Munna, th' Astrologer conjur'd well

Who did that you should perish soon foretell:

Since while you hasten'd to prevent your fate,

In luxury you spent your whole estate,

And were in less than one short twelve-month found

To have consum'd two hundred thousand pound.

Now, Munna, tell me, since the case is so,

Is this to perish very soon or no.

Compare with this the consequences of the great promises of Comenius (19), and these words of Camerarius: 'Nifeus, tyrant of Syracuse, did as much (20) a great while ago; for being told by a Soothsayer that the end of his life drew near, he spent all that he had upon feasts, loose women, and other debauches of the like nature. The same thing is said to have happened in our days to a rich man at Lyons, who having caused a calculation of his nativity to be made, and fancying that his death was certainly foretold, very rashly distributed all his wealth, as if he had had one foot already in the grave, so that he left himself nothing. But being deceived by the Astrologer, he was forced to beg charity for his subsistence, having lived to a great age, and much longer than he expected (21).'

(19) See the remarks [K], of the article COMENIUS.

(20) That is to say, as much as the peasants, of whom he had been just speaking, as we have seen in the remark [B].

(21) Camerarius, ubi supra, pag. 203.

STILPO, a native of Megara, was one of the most famous ancient Philosophers. He was either disciple of Euclid himself, or of some of Euclid's disciples; and acquired such a reputation by his eloquence, and the acuteness of his wit, that people left the other schools in crowds to go to Megara, in order to improve by his lectures (a). In a journey he made to Athens, trades-people left their shops to see him (b). Being jested upon by reason of that curiosity, he had an answer ready [A]. Some say he

(a) Diogen. Laertius, lib. ii, num. 113.

(b) Id. ibid. num. 119.

[A] Being jested upon by reason of that curiosity, he had an answer ready. Every body is eager to see you, said one to him, they admire you as a wild beast; such an eagerness is like that which people express to see a bear or an elephant. You are mistaken, answered he, they admire me as a true man. Θανμάσι σε ὡς ἀνθρώπου ἀληθινού. Admirantur te veluti belluam. Minime, inquit ille, sed velut hominem verum (1). This thought was not unlike that of Diogenes the Cynic, who, with a lantern in his hand, looked for a man in such places where he saw most people. The men he saw having not a human reality and perfection, seemed to him counterfeit men; they had nothing of the man but the name. In this sense Stilpo, a true and real man, should have been accounted by the Athenians kept a mistress besides his lawful wife; but this is not certain [B]. He was naturally very much given to wine and women; and yet it did not appear that he made himself drunk, or that he lived a leud life: he had corrected the bad inclinations of his temper by the study of Philosophy [C]. The fear of the gods did not work that effect in him; for he is reckoned among Atheists, or among those Philosophers, who had little religion [D]. Some alledge, as a proof of his impiety, a thing which happened nians a more scarce and admirable animal, for which trades-people should leave their work, than the most extraordinary beasts of the Indies.

(1) Diogenes Laertius, lib. vi, num. 119.

[B] Some say that he kept a mistress. . . but this is not certain. Diogenes Laërtius says so only upon the credit of an inconsiderable author. Καὶ γυναῖκα ἡγάγετο, καὶ ἑταῖρην συνῆν Νικαρέτην, ὡς φησὶ περὶ αὐτοῦ Ὀνήτωρ. Ac præter uxorem quam duxerat, Nicarete etiam pellice utebatur, ut Oñetor ait (2). . . . Onetor says, that, besides a wife he had married, he likewise kept Nicarete, a concubine. Had there been any ground for this slander, Atheneus would not have forgot to mention it, since he makes it his business to cry down every body upon that account, especially the Poets, the Wits, and the Philosophers. But he only says that Nicarete, a courtesan, illustrious for her birth and learning, heard Stilpo's lectures. Would he not have added, that she was his concubine, if he had believed what Onetor says of it? Νικαρέτη δὲ ἡ Μεγαρίτις (3) ἐκ ἀγαθῆς ἡν ἑταίρα, ἀλλὰ καὶ γυναικὶ καὶ κατὰ παιδείαν ἐπὶ τῷ ἥν. ἡγεῖτο δὲ Στίλπονι τῷ φιλοσόφῳ. Megarensi quoque Nicarete non obfcura & ignobilis meretrix fuit, sed & natalium splendore, & doctrinâ perquam amabilis. Philosopho namque Stilponi operam dedit (4). See in the following remark the glorious testimony that was given to our Philosopher's perfect chastity.

[C] He had corrected the bad inclinations of his temper by the study of Philosophy. This we find in a passage of Cicero. 'Stilponem Megaricum philosophum, acutum sanè hominem, & probatum temporibus illis acceperimus. Hunc scribunt ipsius familiares & ebriolum, & mulierolum fuisse: neque hoc scribunt vituperantes, sed potiùs ad laudem: vitiosum enim naturam ab eo sic edomitam, & compressam esse doctrinâ, ut nemo unquam vinolentum illum, nemo in eo libidinis vestigium viderit (5). . . . We are told that Stilpo, of Megara, the Philosopher, was truly a man of parts, and had a very good character in those times. His acquaintances relate that he had a strong inclination for wine and women; nor do they write this in a censorious way, but rather as commending him: for he so curbed and subdued the vitious tendency of his nature, by the help of Philosophy, that no body ever saw him drunk, nor perceived in him the least symptom of leudness.' We shall see below the noble encomiums bestowed upon his virtue by Plutarch (6), and Athenæus (7).

[D] He is reckoned among Atheists, or among those Philosophers who had little religion. He spoke his thoughts too freely; so that he was banished, notwithstanding the subtleties wherewith he endeavoured to rectify his expressions in the Areopagus. I shall use La Mothe le Vayer's words, and at the same time correct them when there is occasion for it. Stilpo was more cautious; for being asked, at an improper time, by Crates, whether our prayers and worship are acceptable to the gods, he smartly answered, that such a question should not be asked in the street, but in private, and in a closet: which is the same answer that Dion (8) made to another, who asked him, whether or no there were any gods. The great Pontiff Cotta gave also the same answer to Velleius, who supposed that it was a very difficult thing to deny the existence of the gods. Credo, says he, si in concione quaeratur, sed in ejusmodi sermone & confessu facillimum. But Stilpo found himself much perplexed upon another occasion, being summoned to appear before the Areopagites for saying that the Minerva of Phidias was not a god: nevertheless he came off cunningly enough, by saying that she was a goddess, and not a god, making a distinction between male and female. Which made Theodorus ask him, as he was going from the court, whether he had seen Pallas under her petticoats, since he spoke so pertinently of her sex. Nevertheless he was banished for this freedom of speech (9). To satisfy every body, I shall relate the thing in the words of the original. Κράτην αὐτὸν ἐρωτήσαντες, εἰ οἱ θεοὶ χαίρουσι ταῖς προσκυνήσεσι καὶ θυγατρὶς φασὶν εἶναι,

Περὶ τούτων μὴ ἑρώτα, ἀνέστη, ἐν ᾧ δὲ, ἀλλὰ μόνον τὸ δ' αὐτὸ καὶ βίωνα ἐρωτήθη[α] εἰ θεοὶ εἰσιν, εἰπαί,

Ὅσον ἀπ' ἐμῆ σκαδάσει δ' ἄλλον ταλαπείρειν πρὸς βου.

Quum rogasset illam Crates an Dii precatibus ac divinis honoribus gaudeant, Noli me inquit, fatue, in via de hisce rogare, sed solum ac seorsum. Hoc ipsum & Bionem interrogatum, an sint Dii, dixisse tradunt, Tunc senex turbam à nobis propellere curas (10)?

Being asked by Crates, &c. . . . It is said that Bion, when the question was put to him, whether there was any gods, made the same answer;

Old man, why do you not remove the crowd,
That standeth near me?

Diogenes Laërtius means, without doubt, Bion the Borysthenite, one of the boldest Atheists mentioned by the Antients. The conformity of his thought, with that of Stilpo, is very disadvantageous to the latter. Cotta in Cicero was little more orthodox, since he found it no difficult thing to deny the existence of the gods, but when there was ground to be afraid of informers, and of the fury of the people. 'Queritur primum in ea quaestione quæ est de natura Deorum, sintne Dii, necne sint? Difficile est negare credo, si in concione quaeratur: sed in hujusmodi sermone & confessu facillimum (11). . . . In the question concerning the nature of the gods, the first thing to be asked is, Whether there are any gods or not? If such a question were put to one in a public assembly, I grant that it would be difficult to chuse the negative; but in a conversation and meeting like this there is nothing more easy.' Those men would have made a great alteration in the maxim mentioned by Balzac; De divinis etiam vera dicere periculosum est (12). . . . In religious matters it is even dangerous to speak the truth: they would have put in præcipue, above all, instead of etiam, even. They had been right in a certain sense; for the Pagans would not allow that the ideas of the unity and perfect simplicity of God should take place of their pernicious and ridiculous opinions concerning the Divine Nature (13).

Here follows an instance of the blindness of the Heathens. Can any thing be more strange than the opinion of the Athenians, otherwise an ingenious and learned nation, concerning the statues of their gods? Did they not fancy that the work of a sculptor became a God, as soon as it was consecrated to a deity? Did they not believe that Phidias's Minerva was the very goddess that sprang out of Jupiter's head? Doubtless they had such a foolish conceit, otherwise there had been no necessity for Stilpo to use such a distinction as he made to vindicate himself. His crime was this: he asked one day, whether Minerva, the daughter of Jupiter, was a god: he was answered, that she was. But, replied he, that Minerva is Phidias's work, and not Jupiter's daughter; and therefore she is not a god. Whereupon he was cited before the Areopagites, and did not deny what he had said: he pretended that he had expressed himself exactly; Minerva, said he, is not a god, but a goddess, for the gods are males. Ἐφ' ὃ καὶ εἰς Ἀρεῖον πάγον προσκλήθη[α], μὴ ἀνίστασθαι, πρόσκειν δ' ὁρῶν διακρίχθαι. μὴ γὰρ εἶναι αὐτὴν θεόν, ἀλλὰ θεῶν: θεοὶ δὲ εἶναι τὸς ἀρρενας. Qua ex re quum in Arium pagum pertrahus fuisset, nihil inficiatum servavit, imo recte se loquutum asseruisse: non enim deum esse, sed deam: deos quippe males esse (14). It is plain, that if the Pagans had made a real distinction between the statues and the gods to whom they were consecrated, there had been no necessity for Stilpo to alledge the difference between a god male and a god female, in order to justify himself.

This

(2) Id. ibid. num. 114.

(3) He had been speaking of another Nicarete, a courtesan, p. 593.

(4) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 596.

(5) Cicero de Fato, cap. v.

(6) See the remark [H], at the end.

(7) See the remark [E].

(8) It should be Bion.

(9) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialogue de la diversité des Religions, pag. m. 358, 359. It is the last of the five Dialogues of Orestes Tiberi.

(10) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, num. 117, pag. 148.

(11) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxvii.

(12) Balzac, Lettre III à Chapelain, liv. i, pag. m. 21.

(13) See, above, the words of Josephus, citation (116), of the article P Y-THAGORAS.

A STRANGE opinion of the Heathens concerning the statues of their gods.

trans substance

(14) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, num. 116, pag. 148.

innovations of his Logic cannot be approved; he rejected the universals [H]: and tho' it that though Tibullus procured her a husband when she was but fifteen years of age, having doubtless observed that she was in haste, yet he could not prevent her anticipating her marriage; and after she was married, she carried on her love intrigues so openly, that her husband, who was an honest gentleman, died of grief for it.

(26) Nouv. de la Rép. des Lettres, for June 1686, pag. n. 722.

She married another, and grew worse and worse (26). The author from whom I have these words, had been saying, That the scholars, who did what they pleased with her, called it commenting upon Cujas's works, and that some of them, out of respect to her father's memory, abstained from such an infamous commerce. It is said, That a colleague of Cujas was not so discreet, and that he caressed his daughter, even during her father's life. Paul Manutius was in the same case. He put his daughter into a convent, hoping by that means to free himself from the troublesome care of looking after her; but even after she had made her vows, she writ several letters to him one after another to let him know, that if he did not take her out of that confinement, she would steal away. That poor man made several journeys, and used so many solicitations, that he obtained from the Court of Rome the dispensation his daughter desired. She quickly got a husband, and though he was a very honest man, she gave up herself to all manner of dissoluteness. Her father did not sink under his grief, nor under the inconveniences occasioned from time to time by the remains of a venereal disease; but it made him very uneasy. Saceris in claustris jampridem concessa filia, ex dementia, ac furoris abrupta est impetu, ut inde se clam egressuram minaretur misero patri, nisi omni studio ipsam extrahere niteretur. Quod factum, ut is plurimum itinerum vexatione, morosaque apud Romanos judices prebensatione, æger animo, adfictusque corpore, tandem hujusmodi poculum, licet peramarum, tamen juxta necessitate questum exorbere sit coactus, inusitato exemplo virginem pluribus annis Deo dicatam, mundanis iterum angustiiis devovendi, quæ cum postea honesto conjugii nupta, prava se libidinis fœdatis indole, infelicitate pergerit, intestino in mœore corruptus, reliquum vitæ sollicita cogitatione traduxit. Quum vero etiam ei accesserint vetusta luis gallicæ inquinamenta, quibus alternatim vel temporum, vel locorum, vel vitæ labeatur mutatio, determinat propter vitæ conditionem fortius videri potuit, nisi comoderato semper, infractoque animo, eam se perferre singulis ostendisset (27). Some learned men have had a leud wife and a leud daughter at the same time. Barnabas Briffonius was one of them, if we believe Scalliger (28). Some others have been so deeply engaged in one half of that misfortune, that no mention is made of their daughters. Such was Paulus Perufinus, that learned man, so highly praised by Boccacio, and so well beloved by Robert, King of Naples. His wife made him a cuckold; and when he died, his finest writings were treacherously destroyed by his wife (29). I could give a list, whereto one might see great names, besides the learned of a low rank, 'quos fama obscura recondit. . . . who are lost in obscurity,' but I leave it to those who will undertake to carry on the subject which Pierius Valerianus began (30). It will not be amiss to put in one class, by themselves, all the learned, who have been unhappy by their marriage. All those men wanted our Stilpo's indifference.

(27) Joannes Imperialis, in Museo Historico, pag. 108.

(28) In Scaligeranis, Voc. Mirron.

(29) Quem librum maximo hujus operis incommodum Biellæ impudice conjugis crimine, eo defuncto, cum pluribus aliis ex libris ejusdem, perditum compertum. Boccaccio, de Genealogia Deor. lib. xvi, cap. vi, apud Vossium, de Hist. Lat. pag. 526.

(30) He wrote a book intitled, De Infelicitate Literatorum.

(31) Διότι δὲ τὸν πρῶτον λέγει, τὸν δεύτερον καὶ τὸν τρίτον. Quum esset disputator acerrimus, species quoque tollebat. Diogen. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 119.

(32) Apud Diogenem Laërt. lib. i.

V O L . V .

and therefore it is not what I shew you. Such a cavil would be groundless now-a-days; for the answer to Stilpo's question would be, It is a cabbage, and not it is cabbage. Is it not then likely that this Philosopher had no other design than to divert himself with cavils, grounded upon the turn of the expression? I believe he had another thought, and that he was altogether against universal terms, and what they call Predicables in the Aristotelian schools. There was something real in his objection; it was more than playing upon words. I think he meant that the species is not affirmed of individuals, and that therefore the species are a meer chimera. Man is not more this man than that man, and it does not signify John rather than Peter; and therefore it signifies no body. His meaning appears more clearly in Plutarch than in Diogenes Laërtius. We read in Plutarch that Colotes violently exclaimed against Stilpo, and accused him of overturning human life; for how could we live, said Colotes, if we were not allowed to call a man good, or a captain; and if we should say man is man, and then by itself good is good. Τραγωδία δὲ ἐπ' αὐτῷ τῷ Στίλπονι, καὶ τὸν βίον ἀναιρεῖσθαι οὖσι οὐκ αὐτῷ, λέγοντι ἕτερον εἶπερ μὴ καὶ ἡγορεῖσθαι. πῶς γὰρ βιωσόμεθα, μὴ λέγοντες ἀνδρῶν ἀγαθόν, μὴδὲ ἀνδρῶν πονηρὸν ἀλλὰ ἀνδρῶν ἀνδρῶν, καὶ χυρὶς ἀγὰθόν ἀγὰθόν, καὶ πονηρὸν πονηρὸν. Tragœdiam adversus Stilponem excitat, atque ab eo vitam tolli, quod dixisset, Alterum de altero non predicari. Quomodo enim, inquit, vivemus, si non dicamus hominem bonum, hominem imperatorem, sed hominem hominem scorsum, bonum bonum, dicem duces (33). It appears from this objection of Colotes, that Stilpo would not allow that a thing should be affirmed of another, but that every thing should be affirmed of itself, and that the attribute of a proposition should not reach farther than the subject. Here is the ground he went upon. That two things may be affirmed one of another, they ought to have the same nature; for in every affirmative and true proposition, the attribute and the subject are really the same. But man and good are not of the same nature; the definition of the one differs from the definition of the other; and therefore good and man cannot be joined together, one of them cannot be affirmed of the other. In like manner running cannot be attributed to a horse; it is an action, the definition whereof is not the same with that of a horse. Besides, should you affirm of a man that he is good, and of a horse that he runs, that is, should you affirm that good and man are the same thing, and that a horse and running are the same thing, how could you affirm that aliments and medicaments are good, and that lions and dogs run? Εἰ μὲν γὰρ ταυτὸν εἰσι τὸ ἀνθρώπου τὸ ἀγαθόν, καὶ τὸ ἵππου τὸ τρέχειν, πῶς καὶ σίτη καὶ φάρμακον τὸ ἀγαθόν; καὶ τὸ διὰ πάλιν λίοντος καὶ κυνὸς τὸ τρέχειν, καὶ ἡγορούμενον δ' ἕτερον, ἐκ ἐπ' αὐτῶν ἀνδρῶν ἀγαθόν καὶ ἵππων τρέχειν λέγομεν. Nam si idem sunt homo & bonum, & equus ac currere, quod pacto bonum etiam de cibo & medicamento dicitur? rursumque currere de homine & cane? Ergo non recte dicemus de homine predicari bonum, de equo currere, cum diversa sint (34). These are logical subtilties, whereby all languages would be confounded, and all men would be obliged to be silent or to speak ridiculously; and yet a Sophist trained up in the art of disputing, and used to cavils about abstractions, would give a great deal of trouble to his adversaries, if he undertook to maintain Stilpo's opinion to the utmost. He would not be immediately silenced by the distinction of the attributes in concreto and in abstracto, and by the secundum id quod importat in obliquo, or in recto; it would be requisite to dispute a long time about this question, utrum universale maneat in actuali predicatione. These trifles, though contemptible in themselves, and such as cannot perplex a man of a solid judgment, might nevertheless carry a wrong-headed man into Spinozism: 'Hæ nugæ seria ducunt in mala. . . . These trifles bring on substantial evils.' For those who deny universal attributes, cannot admit any individual's that resemble one another. They must say, that two beings, of which the attribute of substance should be truly affirmed, would be one and the same substance; which is to say in equivalent terms, that there

(33) Plutarch. adversus Colotes, p. 1119, C.

(34) Plutarch. ibid, p. 1120, A.

it were supposed that he did it only to ridicule the Sophists, he should be blamed for his ill taste and his wrong subtilities.

Instead of improving one's judgment, they were only fit to spoil it. A courtesan rallied him about it [I], in answer to what he said to her by way of censure or rally. I must not forget a dream of his, which seems to signify that he was a priest, and which shews, that even in his sleep, he knew how to philosophize [K].

there is but one substance in the whole universe. Common sense agrees, in this point, with the most evident notions of Philosophy. A peasant does clearly conceive, without being mistaken, that the whole essence of man belongs to each man, and ought to be affirmed of each man, and yet that each man is distinct from all others. And therefore he clearly conceives that the same essence, which is affirmed of Peter is not affirmed of Paul; but that the essence, which is affirmed of the one, is like the essence which is affirmed of the other. The Sophists are pitifully mistaken in this point, with their Universale formale à parte rei. The most perplexing subtilities will never prevail over these notions in a man of solid parts; and whoever cannot resolve them, may justly laugh at them. I remember that in a public disputation, one of the opponents endeavoured to prove that there are no universals; he went about it thus: If there were universals, Genus's would have two species under them; but it is impossible: for a species cannot differ from another: I prove it. The difference of a species is altogether like the difference of another; therefore there are not two species. The consequence is right, and I am going to shew the truth of the antecedent by an example. Rationality, the specific difference of a man, does not at all differ from irrationality, the specific difference of a beast. Rationality does not really differ from the human soul; therefore it is a substance: Irrationality (35) does not really differ from a beast; therefore it is a substance. Thus rationality, as it is a substance, does not differ from irrationality. How then does it differ from it? Are there some entities of realities in it that are not in irrationality? But are those entities accidents or substances? If they are substances, they make no difference between rationality and irrationality. If they are accidents, they have the essence of being; but irrationality has it likewise, and therefore it perfectly resembles them; they cannot therefore make it differ from rationality. If it be said, that they differ from being, since they have the attribute of inherence, which being has not; I reply that inherence, is a being, and therefore cannot make an accident differ from being. And if you answer that inherence implies something else besides being, I repeat my instance: that other thing does necessarily contain the essence of being; it is therefore like being; and you will always have that objection in your way, though you should suppose in infinitum that the constitutive character of inherence contains something that has something besides being. This objection proves that being has not under it substance and accident, and that substance has not under it body and spirit, and consequently that there are no universals. Quod erat probandum. The respondent did not apprehend the difficulty; nor did the president apprehend it much better. The assembly did not apprehend it neither, and the opponent was like to be hissed. Doubtless it was the best way to silence him: His argument was altogether wrong; for it would prove that there is no difference between white and black, pain and pleasure.

If you consult Aristotle's Metaphysics, in that part of his work wherein he examines what concerns the unity of Being, you will see that the question about universals was surrounded with a thousand perplexing difficulties. He does not forget this objection: If being and unity are something, how can there be several beings besides that thing? How can there be more than one being? For what differs from being is nothing; and therefore we must conclude, as Parmenides did, that all beings are but one; because, if there were many, they would be different from being, that is, they would be nothing at all. Εἰ δ' ἐστὶ τὸ αὐτὸ ἐν καὶ αὐτὸ ὄν, ἀναγκαῖον ἑστάναι αὐτὸν εἶναι τὸ ὄν καὶ τὸ ἄν. ἢ γὰρ ἑτέρον τι καθόλου καθήγορεῖται, ἀλλὰ ταῦτα αὐτὰ. ἀλλὰ μὴν εἰ γ' ἔσται τὸ αὐτὸ ὄν καὶ αὐτὸ ἐν, πολλὴ ἀπορία πῶς ἔσται τι παρὰ ταῦτα ἑτέρον. λέγω δὲ πῶς ἔσται πλείον ἐνὸς τὰ ὄντα. τὸ γὰρ ἑτέρον τὸ ὄντ' ὅτι ἔστιν. ἔστω κατὰ τὸν Παρμενίδου συμβαίνειν ἀνάγκη λέγον ἐν ἀπαντα εἶναι τὰ ὄντα, καὶ τὸτο εἶναι το ὄν. Quod si quid est ipsum unum, et ipsum ens, necesse est, eorum substantiam esse unum, et ens: non enim aliquid aliud universaliter predicatur, sed eadem ipsa. At vero si quid erit ipsum ens, et ipsum unum, magna dubitatio est, quomodo modo aliquid aliud præter hæc erit. Dico autem quomodo entia erunt plura uno. Quod enim aliud ab ens est, non est. Quare secundum Parmenidis rationem, necesse est accidere omnia entia esse unum, et hoc esse ens (36). It does not appear that Aristotle was able to resolve that difficulty.

But to return to Stilpo. Colotes is blamed for two things: one is, that he exclaimed against the subtilities of that Philosopher, without resolving them categorically; the other is, that he pitched on a doctrine, in order to criticize upon it, which Stilpo advanced merely out of a witty conceit (37). and to ridicule the Sophists of that time, by giving them a bone to pick. Plutarch was the more exasperated at this choice of Colotes, because a great many fine things might have been said of Stilpo, of which Colotes did not speak one word. It will appear from the following passage of Plutarch, that Stilpo was a very honest man.

Μετὰ δὲ Σωκράτην καὶ Πλάτωνα προσμαχέσας Στίλπονι, καὶ τὰ μὲν ἀληθινὰ δόγματα καὶ τὰς λόγους τὰ ἀνδρῶς, οἷς αὐτὸν τε καὶ ἐκδοσμι καὶ πατρίδα καὶ φίλους, καὶ τὸν βασιλεῖον τὰς περὶ αὐτὸν σπουδάζοντας, ὅτε γίγναται, ἐδὲ ὅσον ἂν ὀρήνημα τῇ ψυχῇ μετὰ πρᾶσιν καὶ μετρίᾳ παθίας. ὡν δὲ καὶ τὸν καὶ χρωμένον πρὸς τὰς σοφιστὰς λογαρίων πρέσβας γέλωτι αὐτοῖς, ἐνὸς μνησθεῖς, καὶ μὴδὲν εἰπὼν πρὸς τὸτο, μὴδὲ λίσσας τὴν πεισανοτήτα, τραγῳδίας ἐτάγει τῇ Στίλπονι. Post Socratem & Platonem Stilpo oppugnatur. Hujus quidem vera decreta, & sermones, quibus seipsum, patriam, amicos regeisque ipsi operam navantes exornavit, tum animi elationem mansuetudini & affectuum mediocritati conjunctam, Colotes non retulit. Quas mediocritati conjunctam, Colotes non retulit. Quas vero jocans ille sophistis ridensque objicit sententias, harum unam allegans, cum neque refellisset neque solvisset ipse probabilitatem, tragediam adversus Stilponem excitat (38). --- Next to Socrates and Plato, he falls upon Stilpo. As for the solid opinions of that Philosopher, and his discourses, by which he has done honour to himself, to his country, to his friends, and to the kings who favoured him, Colotes takes no notice at all of these, nor of his other good qualities, such as his magnanimity, his gentleness, and his moderation. But from among the little objections which he makes to the Sophists by way of rally he calls out one, and without saying any thing that can shew the improbability of it, he abuses Stilpo in a tragical manner.

[I] A courtesan rallied him about it. Athenæus says, That Stilpo sitting at table with Glycera, upbraided her with corrupting young men. To which she answered, You are charged with the same fault, for people complain that you spoil their judgment with your needles and sophistical subtilities; and they add, that it signifies but little which way they are spoiled, whether it be by a Philosopher or a courtesan. Μὴδ' ἐν διαφύρειν ἐπιστρίβομενοι καὶ κακῶς παύσασιν ἢ μετὰ φιλοσόφου ἢ ἐν ἐλαίᾳ. Nihilque referre iis qui sic in miseriis incidunt ac perunt, an apud philosophum degant, an apud scortum (39). Athenæus had been saying that Courtezans took great pride in their learning, whereby they got the art of quick repartees and witty sayings; but Glycera's answer alleged by him, is no proper instance to shew the justness of their raileries. That courtesan defended herself by advancing a falsity; for there never was so great a corruption in ancient Greece, that people should have been as unwilling to see young men learn nothing but vain subtilities of a Philosopher, as to see them engaged in lewd practices with women.

[K] A dream of his... which shews that even in his sleep he knew how to philosophize. Plutarch will afford me the commentary I went upon these words. 'It is reported of Stilpo the Philosopher, that he thought he saw Neptune in his sleep, and that he seemed very much displeased with him, because he had not, as

(36) Aristot. Metaphys. lib. iii. cap. iv. pag. m. 663. C.

(37) Plutarch is perhaps mistaken in supposing this.

(38) Plut. de Stoicis pag. 1119. C.

(39) Athen. lib. xiii. pag. 54.

* was usual with his priests, sacrificed an ox in honour of him; not in the least daunted at the apparition, he thus boldly accented it. Neptune! What is this business you here complain of? You come hither like a child, and are angry with me, because I did not borrow money and run in debt to please you, and fill the city with the smell of roast meat, but privately sacrificed to you in my own house, such ordinary victims as I could get. At this confident reply, Neptune smiled, and (as the story goes) reached him his hand, as an assurance of his good will to him, and told him, That for his sake he would send the Megarensians about dance of sea Loaches: that season (40).

(40) Plut. de profectu virtutis sentiendo, pag. 83.

STOFLE RUS (JOHN) a famous Mathematician and Astrologer, was born at Justingen, in Suabia, on the tenth of December 1452. Notwithstanding the meanness of his birth, he made so great a progress in his studies, that he was admired for it. He particularly minded those things, for which he was naturally best qualified; for being sensible that he had a genius for Mathematics, he applied himself to that science much more than to any other. He taught it at Tübingen with so good success, that he got a wonderful reputation. The books he published [A], kept up and increased the glory he had acquired by his lectures (a); but he did not succeed in the prognostications he had the boldness to publish. He foretold that there would be a great deluge in the year 1524, and struck a great terror all over Europe [B]: but he was confounded by

(a) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vita Philosophorum, pag. 73, 74.

(1) At Oppenheim.

[A] The books he published. His Kalendarium Romanum Magnum, dedicated to the Emperor Maximilian, was printed (1) in 1518. He published his Astro-nomical Tables at Tübingen, the year before. He also published Rationem compositionis Astrolabiorum; Cosmographicas aliquot descriptiones, de Sphaera Cosmographica, hoc est, de globi terrestri artificiosa structura; de duplici terrae projectione in planum, hoc est, quae ratione commodius chartae Cosmographicae, quas Mappa mundi vocant, designari queant. A Latin commentary upon Proclus's sphere, and a German tract about the dimension by the astrolabe and the quadrant, and the calculation of conjunctions and oppositions, with a censure upon the ancient cycles, and the prediction of eclipses (2). Vossius says his Ephemerides begin with the year 1432, and end with the year 1525 (3); but according to Melchior Adam, they begin with the year 1532, and reach to the twenty years following. Vossius is more credible than Melchior Adam. Doubtless the latter took for the whole work what was only a continuation of it.

(2) Taken from Melchior Adam in Vita Philosophorum, p. 74.

(3) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 136.

[B] Foretold there would be a great deluge in the year 1524, and struck a great terror all over Europe. Augustin Niphus perceiving the great amazement of the people after that prediction, published a book to shew that there was no reason to fear such a deluge. Cum statim à publicata Joan. Stoefferi Ephemeride diluvii istius praenuncia, Augustinus Niphus ut homines à gravi timore liberaret, quem ipsa omnibus incutebat, libellum Juam de falsa diluvii prognosticatione Caroli V. obtulisset, non defuit, &c. (4). Princes, and even learned men, were afraid of that calamity as well as the people; which was doubtless occasioned, in some measure, by the agreement of several Astrologers, in publishing such a prediction, among whom there were some of the best Astronomers. Cirvellus, professor of Divinity at Alcalá, put out a book in the vulgar tongue, wherein, without blaming in general the precautions that were used against the deluge, he was contented to blame those who made foolish expences upon that account: he proposed some expedients to preserve one's self from the inundation at a reasonable rate. Those, who had their houses near the sea, or near some rivers, left them, and sold their land and household-goods at a great loss. Simile falsi hujusmodi, & extremae dementiae prognosticii, fuisse illud mihi persuades, quo non vulgarij Ephemeridum confarinatores dumtaxat, sed ex Astronomis peritiores multi, supremam ex imaginaria quadam eluvione, cunctis mortalibus perniciem impendere contendebant; adeoque rumoribus istis, vulgarij hominum animos perterraverant, ut metus etiam ad superiores pervenerit. Nam Petrus Cirvellus Hispanorum omnium sui temporis doctissimus, cum Theologiae, in almo Complutensi Gymnasio, Lectoris munere fungeretur, & verò multos, ut ipsemet inquit, fluvii, vel mari finitimos populos, jam stupido metu perculsos, domicilia ac sedes mutare vidisset, ac praedia, suppellectilem, bonaque omnia, contra justum valorem sub actione distrahere, ac alia loca vel altitudine, vel siccitate magis secura requirere, sui officii esse putavit, in publica illa confectione, quam de nihilo excitare persuasum non habebat, Consilium vernaculo ac materno idiomate conscribere, ut passim ab omnibus legeretur, quo singulis mandaret, impendentes ejusmodi calamitatis praecavende: atque adeo ita rebus suis consulendi, ut minimum ab illa damnum reciperent (5). The great

(4) Naderus, in judicio de Augustino Nipho, pag. 48.

Chancellor of the Emperor Charles V, consulted Peter Martyr about that confection, who told him that the calamity would not be so dreadful as people fancied; but that those conjunctions of the planets would certainly occasion a great disorder. The Duke of Urbino stood in need of a good Philosopher, who proved to him, in a printed book, that the fear of such a flood was ill-grounded. Quod rumor ille non per Hispanias modo, sed longe lateque per Europam diffeminatus fuerit, testem sistere possum Petrum Martyrem, qui de illo à Caroli V. magno Cancellario percontatus, ipse hunc in modum ex Vallesio respondet Epistola 20. libri 34. Quid ego sentiam de pluviis, in initio anni quarti & vigesimi praedictis ab Astronomis interrogas, veras fore conjunctiones illas omnium Planetarum, & iidem locis scio, in materiis praecipue dispositis, & particularibus regionibus aliquid magni parituras arbitror; sed neque auium eorum sententias approbare, qui ore aperto absolute fore alluviem ita generalem vociferantur, ut neque mari, aut ulli terrarum parti, sit ignoscendum, quin horrenda sint incommoda perpeffurae, &c. Neque verò tantum Cancellarius ille sed ex eorum numero esse ostendit, quos vanissimus diluvii metus percellerat, sed Urbini Dux non prius ab eodem liberari potuit, quam Paulus de Middeburgo Forosempronienfis Episcopus, variis rationibus Mathematicis, & Philosophicis, quas postea typis commisit, ei liquido demonstrasset, inanem esse praesentem metum omnem, quem de futuro diluvio conceperat (6). Guido Rangone, General of the army at Florence, being afraid that the reasons alledged by Augustin Niphus, would remove the fear of Charles V, and make him neglect the necessary precautions, engaged a famous Physician to write against that book of Niphus, in order to oblige his Imperial Majesty to provide for his safety, and to appoint inspectors, who should view the ground in the provinces, and mark out the places where men and beasts would be less exposed to the waters of the flood. Non defuit Thomas quidam Philologus patria Rovennas, & celeberrima fama Medicus, qui è vestigio libellum alium de vera diluvii prognosticatione, ad eundem Imperatorem misit, cum praefatione, quam isthuc maxima parte referre, non alienum à proposito duxerim. Ne ex illo conventu tot fyderum in piscibus, disfortunium quoddam patereris, Guido Rangonus Rei Florentinae armorum generalis gubernator, me monuit, & excitavit, ut de futuro diluvio anni M D XXIII, exactam ad te compositionem dirigerimus; Quatenus amoto Suefani Philosophi, jam impresso errore, locis huic maximo diluvio subditis, & ab hoc ipso alienis, diligentius circumspicis, & annotatis, humanum genus & cetera viventia, vel tu ipse ad minus (nam ubi Imperatoris periculum, hic pro viribus & manu, & corpore, & ingenio utendum) ab eo disfortunato & horribili aspectu liberareris (-). Some other writers imitated that Physician. Quemadmodum contingit ali-

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 47, 48.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 48.

the event. I shall mention several particulars relating to this, whereby it will appear that rum in Piscibus MDXXIV diluvium futurum. Hunc enim veluti conceptis verbis, operi suo titulum fecit (8). . . . As it sometimes happens, that the blind lead the blind, there were others that imitated this blundering Philologer, among whom was Nicolas Perranzonus, who published at Ancona a prophecy concerning the true prognostication of the flood, together with the history of twenty inundations. I have likewise seen a small book of Michael de Petra Sancta, of the Order of Observators, Regent in the convent of Minerva; Doctor of Divinity, and Professor of Metaphysics in the college at Rome, written in defence of those Astrologers, who concluded, from the conjunction of the planets in the sign Pisces, in the year 1524, that there would be a flood. For this is almost, in express words, the title which he gives to his book. There was so great a terror in France, that many people were like to grow distracted upon that account. In Gallia parum absuit quin ad infaniam homines non paucos, periculi metu (diluvium) aegerit, quemadmodum apud Joannem Bozellum scriptorem Annalium Aquitanie; Claudium Duretium, cap. 27. libri de fluxu & refluxu maris; Spiritum Roterium ordinis sancti Dominici, & sacre apud Tolosates fidei quæsitorem; in refutatione doctrinæ ejusdem Astrologi; Augerium Ferrerium in libro quem scripsit adversus Rempubli- cam Bodini; Albertum Pigbium in Astrologiæ de- fensione ad Augustinum Niphum? Eustorgium à Bello loco Poetam vernaculum in Rythmis suis, mul- toque alios videre est (9). . . . In France, not a few were almost distracted with this fear, as may be seen in John Bozell, who writ the Annals of Aquitain; Claudius Duret, in the 27th chapter of his book on the ebbing and flowing of the sea; Spiritus Rotter, a Dominican Friar, and Inquisitor at Toulouse, in his confutation of the doctrine of a certain Astrologer; Augerius Ferrer, in a book which he writ against the Republic of Bodin; Albertus Pigbium, in his defence of Astrology to Augustinus Niphus, Eustorge de Beaulieu, a French Poet, in his rhymes; and many others. Read these words of Bodin (10). 'God has promised that there shall be no deluge for the time to come, and has performed his promise. For tho' the great con- junction of Saturn, Mars, and Jupiter, happened in the sign Pisces, in the year 1524, when all the Astro- logers of Europe, Asia, and Africa, foretold an uni- versal deluge, and many unbelievers built up arches to save themselves, and even President Auriol at Tou- louse, tho' they were told of God's promise and oath, that he would no more destroy men by a flood; that year was indeed attended with storms and great floods in many countries, but there hap- pened no deluge.' A writer, who animadverted upon Bodin, denied the fact as to Auriol; but the following reply was made to him, 'I think I have omitted nothing but what is frivolous and inconsi- derable, and deserves no answer. And, amongst others, what you say, pag. 47, that Auriol did not make a boat to avoid being destroyed by the deluge, which the Astrologers foretold, was to happen in the year 1524, but to go a fishing; and yet you tell us, that the boat stands upon four pillars: it is not usual to put boats upon pillars. But I have read a book written against Astrologers, by a Dominican, called Spiritus Roterus, an Inquisitor of the Faith, when he was at Toulouse, which was lent me by Raymund l'Estonat of Pamiers, who has settled in these parts, and told me how that Monk undertook to write that book against an Astrologer who was then at Toulouse, and pretended to tell one's fortune by the stars. That author says in that book, that Au- riol caused an arch to be built at Toulouse, in or- der to avoid the deluge; which he could know bet- ter than you, since you lived neither in the same place, nor at the same time with Auriol. As for what you say in the same page, that Bodin is very much to blame for saying that Auriol was a president, since he was only a doctor of the Canon-law, whom you call a bold, rich, and learned man; I confess that Bodin was mistaken in that point (11). The northern nations were not free from those alarms, as it appears from this passage. Mali istius impenden- tis metum ad extremum usque Septentrionem per- vasisse, testatur manifestè Cornelius Scæpperus Neoportuenfis, cùm inter causas quibus fuit compulsus, ut librum adversus Astrologos de significationibus conjunctionum superiorum Planetarum anni MDXXIV conscriberet, eas potissimum enumerat. Adde me neque in Astrologiam scribere, sed in eos tantum, qui falsa prædicatione totum in se orbem converterant. Neque enim solum vulgo eam rem persuaserunt, sed summis etiam Regibus, & Principibus. Occurrunt quæ hæc de re me percunctatus est serenissimus Princeps D. Chri- stianus Danicæ, Suediæ, Norvegiæque Rex, occurrunt & crebra vulgi suspitiones, tandem mala sibi ominantis: quem autem hominum non impellerent hæc lacrymæ? quem non permoveret impostura, incitaret iniquitas (12)? (12) Naudæ, quem non permoveret impostura, incitaret iniquitas, ubi supra, p. 30. . . . Cornelius Scæpperus Neoportuensis plainly affirms, that the dread of this impending calamity had reached as far as the extremities of the North; since among the reasons which moved him to write a book against the Astrologers concerning what was signified by the con- junction of the planets in the year 1524, he chiefly insists upon the following. Add, says he, that I do not write against Astrology, but against those who had alarmed the whole world by their false prediction; for they not only persuaded the common people of it, but also kings and princes. I reflect upon the questions that were put to me on this head, by the most serene Prince, Christian King of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. I reflect upon the frequent sighs of the vulgar, so long kept in a fearful expectation of evils that were to come upon them. What man would not be roused by these tears? or who could be unmoved at the sight of so much fraud and in- equity?

We have seen what Bodin says, that rains and floods made a great devastation in several places, in the year of that pretended deluge; but some authors, who are more to be credited than he, affirm, that the month of February 1524, was, contrary to custom, very dry and clear. Now this was the time of the conjunction pointed out by the Astrologers for a deluge; so that one would think the extraor- dinary dryness of that month happened on purpose to confound those men. Cardan and Origanus were vexed that Stoflerus had brought such a disgrace upon their trade by a prognostication so contrary to the event. Read these words of the learned Gasendus.

Memorable certe est, quod in historiis, & ac om- nibus penè superioris sæculi libris legitur; cum Astrologi ob plures Conjunctiones magnas, & non- nullas mediocres in Aqueis Signis celebrandas, præ- dixissent mense Februario anni MDXXIV fore Dilu- vium generale, ac stragem tantam, quanta fuisset ante id tempus inaudita; adeo ut non paucis con- sternatis per Galliam, Hispaniam, Italiam, Germa- niamque animis, apparassent navigia, aut compor- tatis farinis, aliisque rebus necessariis, petissent loca editiora; contigisse tamen, ut totus Februarius se- renissimus, pulcherrimisque existeret; planè, ut si operata data comparatus fuisset vaticiniis Astrologo- rum refellendis (cùm sit alioquin insolitum, abire Februarium impluvium) quod ne ipsis quidem Car- dano †, & Origano ‡ dissimulare licuit; dolentibus † Lib. 7. cap. 34. ‡ Dissimulare licuit; illud de futuro Diluvio judicium fuisse non sine Astro- logiæ infamia à Stoflero prolatum (13). . . . It is certainly a memorable thing, which we read in every history, and almost in every book, of the last century; that whereas the Astrologers, on account of several great and some smaller conjunctions that were to happen in the watery signs, had foretold, that in the month of Fe- bruary 1524, there would be a general flood, and such a devastation as had been never heard of before that time; which so frightened numbers of people in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, that some provided ships, others took with them a stock of meal, and other neces- saries, and fled to the mountains; nevertheless it so fell out that the whole month of February was ex- tremely clear and fine. One would think . . . &c. Take notice, that Bodin, a credulous man, and infatuated with Astrology, vindicates Stoflerus as well as he can; for, on one hand, he gives us to understand, that if there was not a second deluge in the year 1524, it was because God prevented it to perform his pro- mise; and, on the other hand, he enlarges upon the calamities wherewith Christendom was afflicted after the conjunction of the planets: and the better to mend

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 49.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Bodin, de la République, book 10, pag. m. 550.

(11) Renatus Herpin, Apologie pour la République de Jean Bodin, in the left page.

† Bozell in Annal. Aquit. Bodin. 4. de Rep. 2. Duret. de fluxu & refluxu mar. c. 27, &c.

‡ Lib. 7. cap. 34. ‡ Pat. in troch. 3.

(13) Gasendus, in Physicæ lib. 4. cap. 1. Opus. Tom. 1. pag. 179. col. 1.

that it is no easy matter to discredit Astrologers [C]; for notwithstanding this false prediction, they found afterwards a vast number of cullies. Some say he foretold that the end of the world would be in the year 1586. I believe they are mistaken [D]; and I cannot

(14) Bodin, de la République, liv. iv, pag. 553. speaks (14) of the war of the Boors in Germany, and of the league against the King of France, who was taken, and of the conquest of Rhodes by the Turks. That island had been subdued in the year 1522. I shall have occasion by and by to mention another fraud of that writer.

[C] I shall mention . . . several particulars, whereby it will appear that in it is no easy thing to discredit Astrologers.] I have mentioned, in the foregoing remark, several facts concerning the chimerical prediction of that pretended deluge; to which I add what follows: In the said year 1523, reckoning as they do in Aquitain, where the year begins in March upon Lady-day, and ends on the same day, all the provinces of France were extremely afraid of an universal deluge, because the Astronomers had foretold, that in the month of February of the said year, and in the beginning of the year 1524, according to their computation, (for they begin with the first day of January) there would be twenty conjunctions, great and small together, sixteen of which would possess watery signs, portending to the greatest part of the world, to climates, kingdoms, provinces, states, and dignities, and to all land and sea creatures, a certain change and alteration, such as our forefathers never saw, nor read in histories. Whereupon men and women were in great fear. Many removed from their low habitations, went into high places, provided themselves with meal, and other necessities, and made public processions and prayers, that God would take pity on his people; and yet there happened no such thing: on the contrary, the said month of February proved as fine as ever it was, and the months following finer than they had been ten years before. Whereby God made it appear that Astronomy is not a certain science; and whatever the planets may foretel, God is above it (15). The author from whom I have this passage, does not forget the chicaneries which the Astrologers alledged to cover their shame. 'However, says he (16), some Astrologers alledged in their vindication, that those conjunctions had produced their effect the year before, because there had been many great floods in several places, which had drowned houses and lands. Others said, that such conjunctions would not have their effect till ten years after, during which many great, dreadful, and detrimental, things would happen; which proved true, as will appear hereafter. For, that very same year 1523, in November, there was a little frost, which froze up the greatest part of the wheat, and most cabbages, and short-shanked apple-trees; and a good number of small treasurers, who consumed the public finances of France, were put out of their places; whereupon this distich was made in a bantering way.

L'an mil cinq cens vingt & quatre moins ung
Le Choux d'yver & Tresoriers tout ung.

The fifteen hundredth year and twenty three,
For Cabbages and Treasurers shall be.

How comes this author to reckon among the public calamities the turning out of the treasurers, who wasted the finances and devoured the people? He should rather have accounted it a happiness. As for what concerns the frost in the month of November, which he calls a small one, tho' he ascribes great effects to it, the same doubts arise in my mind, which I have proposed in the article BERQUIN (17). It is a remarkable thing that Beza should mention such a frost upon the year 1528, as a curse, which the execution of an innocent man brought upon the whole kingdom. Cunæus, Professor at Leyden, made an oration about climacterical years in 1638, when he left the Rectorship, wherein he mentioned the prediction of a new deluge in the year 1524 (18), and laughed at it. He added, that according to the testimony of Ludovicus Vives, that year proved as clear, happy, and plentiful, as ever was seen (19). Vives does not precisely say all this; nevertheless his words are still more proper than Cunæus's to shew the falsity of the prediction. 'Illud quoque Noë diluvium non siderum commotionibus assignatur, sed ultioni numinis. Verum isti (astrologi) solita temeritate sub certum horoscopus reducunt eluvium illam orbis, & similem horoscopus contigisse ferunt anno vigesimo quarto, qui annus orbem fere totum infans istorum predictionibus terruit, quum nullus annus memoria eorum qui viverent aut mitior aut serenior fuerit, aut suis omnibus partibus tempestivior? Primum in tanta varietate, tamque incertis iis qui annales scribunt, quem annum possunt ipsi annotare quo diluvium contigerit? Ita non dicunt hoc evenisse, quia hic erat astrorum coitus: sed quia id contigerit, talem affirmant fuisse. Hoc verò non est ab experimentis scientiam colligere, sed ad tuendam temeritatem assertionis confingere sibi experimenta. Verum irriti istos natura, qui quo tempore natatoria in aquis omnia erant minati, serenissimi ut si quando antea fulserunt soles, & ver fuit omnium amenissimum (20). -- Noab's flood is not ascribed to the conjunction of the Planets, but to the vengeance of the Deity. Nevertheless those Astrologers with their usual impertinence account for that inundation of the world by a certain constellation, and pretend that the like constellation fell out in the year 1524, when they terrified the whole world with their mad predictions; whereas no year, as far as those that were then alive could remember, had been more mild, more serene, and more seasonable in all its parts. And first in so great a variety and doubtfulness of the Historians, to what year can they fix the deluge? Thus they do not say that this happened because the conjunction of the Planets was such, but they affirm that such was the conjunction of the Planets because this happened; which is not gathering knowledge from experiments, but feigning experiments to support an impertinent assertion. Nature sufficiently ridiculed them, because at the very time when their threatened inundation was to take place over all, the sun shone forth exceedingly bright, and there never was a more pleasant spring.' A learned German, who published some notes upon Cunæus's orations, quotes this passage of Ludovicus Vives, and says, that Cardan maintained that Stofflerus was mistaken for want of a sufficient skill in Physics. Cardan endeavours to shew, that the same position of the Planets which was to produce an inundation, according to Stofflerus, was really to produce fair weather (21); but this pretended justification of Astrology, by censuring those who do not well understand it, does not deserve to be minded upon this occasion.

[D] Some say he foretold that the end of the world would be in the year 1586. I believe they are mistaken.] I have here in view Mr Petit, Intendant of the Fortifications, who uses these words. 'Did not Stofflerus foretel, that, in the year 1524, there would be so great inundations, that if the world was not to be destroyed by fire, there would be then an universal deluge, by reason of the great conjunctions of the Planets in watery signs? Which frightened all Europe to that degree, that many people repaired to the mountains with all manner of provisions. Others provided barks and ships to avoid being drowned; and yet the month of February, in which all these things were to happen, proved extremely dry, to the shame of Astrologers. Did not he say likewise that in the year 1586, after an eclipse of the sun in May, and the conjunction of all the Planets, the world would be at end by the fury of winds and storms, which proved ridiculous (22). I believe one might boldly deny what he says in his second question, and affirm, that Stofflerus foretold no such thing for the year 1586. In the first place, his Ephemerides do not reach so far. In the second place, that year is not characterized by an eclipse of the sun in May, nor by the conjunction of all the Planets. I think I have found out what led that author into this mistake: he had read in Gassendus, next to what concerns the prediction of a deluge, an account of a prediction concerning the year 1186. Some time after, trusting too

(15) Jean Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitain, fol. m. 215, Nau-dreus and Gassendus call him wrong Boetellus in the passages above quoted, citations (9) and (13).

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Remark [4].

(18) The Printers put 1504. That fault has been corrected in the Leipzig edition 1693.

(19) Proditum memorie Ludovicus Vives, auctor certissimus, reliquit, nullum annum aequè serenum, nullum aequè fastum, & ubertate notabilem fuisse. Cunæus, Orat. IV, pag. 78, Edit. Lipp. 1693.

else private

(20) Lud. Vives, de Veritate Fidei Christiane, lib. i, cap. x. Astrologers with their usual impertinence account for that inundation of the world by a certain constellation, and pretend that the like constellation fell out in the year 1524.

(21) Cardan. Aethor. Astrol. Regemans vii, Astror. xxxiv, apud Aug. Buchnerum in Orat. Cuneus, pag. 375.

(22) Petit, Dissertation sur la nature des Comètes, pag. 137.

(b) Melch. Adam, ibid. pag. 74.

(c) Omnibus libris instrumentis Stofleri incendio fortuito Tubingæ combustis, nihil illarum lucubra-

I cannot tell whether those are to be credited, who give out, that he made some predictions upon the year 1588 [E]. Authors are not agreed about the circumstances of his death: some say (b) he died of the plague at Blaubeurs, on the sixteenth of February 1531. Others will have it that he died of a wound in his head, which he received by the fall of a board in his closet: they add, that he foresaw that danger [F]. He had a great affection for Munster, his scholar; which proved very beneficial to the commonwealth of learning: for had he not suffered him to transcribe his writings, they had been lost for ever, when the originals were burnt (c). It is to be observed, that he tionem evadit; nisi multa Mansternus descripta advenisset. Melch. Adam, ubi supra.

was

(23) Not in May, as Mr Petit says, but the 21st of April, Mr Petit, for want of attention, did not mind the word Kal. in Gassendus.

* Prefat. in Manil.

(24) Gassendus, ubi supra.

(25) Naudæus, ubi supra, pag. 45. Consult Cal-vinius, ad ann. 1186, who observes that the Arabians in Spain gave notice of that conjunction.

Hinc prædixerunt: Tandem, inquit, erit ventus, ut pulvere repletur sit arboris & turres.

Inde sequitur hæc miracula: Veniet vir sapiens, Doctus veritatis. Deinde orietur quidam ex Elam, qui magnas strages faciet. Sed nihil annatum est, quod evenit.

--- Hence they foretold that there should be a violent storm of wind, which would fill the trees and towers with dust; after which these miracles should follow, viz. a wise man and the teacher of truth should come; and afterwards another man should arise out of Elam, and commit great havoc. . . .

But nothing of all that was foretold came to pass. He quotes Richardus: it is likely he meant Rigordus.

(26) Bodin, ubi supra, pag. 557.

(27) Probably it is an error of the transcriber; for all authors place that eclipse on the 21st of April.

much to his memory, he thought that Gassendus upbraids Stofflerus with a second oversight; and on this supposition he set down 1586, instead of 1186. What will confirm my conjecture is, that the year 1186 has the two characters abovementioned, viz. an eclipse of the sun (23), and a conjunction of all the Planets, as it appears from these words of Gassendus. 'Simile vaticinium fuit, quod ex Rigordo Scaliger' refert, 'scribente Astrologos tantum portendisse exitum, à ventorum, tempestatumque vehementia, ob Planetas tam inferiores, quam superiores coituros mense Septembris anni MCLXXXVI: præeunte Solis defectione x1 Kal. Maii, ut rerum finem imminere à nemine dubitaretur; cum eventus tamen postea coaruerit ejusce Oraculi vanitatem (24). --- Like to this was the prophecy of which Scaliger gives an account taken from Rigordus. That author says, the Astrologers had foretold so great a destruction by the fury of winds and tempests, upon the conjunction of the higher and lower Planets, which was to happen in the month of September 1186, after an eclipse of the sun on the 21st of April, that no body doubted but the end of the world was at hand. Nevertheless the event showed how groundless the prediction was.' Naudæus observes that the weather proved very fine, instead of the dreadful storms foretold by the Astrologers. 'Vide fides apud Rigordum, quid anno Christi MCLXXXVI acciderit. Orientales Astrologi omnes, literis per totum orbem missis, tam securè quam si Regio diplomate res ipsa facta fuisset, edixerant, anno septimo post, qui fuit MCLXXXVI, Planetas omnes tam inferiores, quam superiores, in unum coituros ineunte Septembri, scilicet post Eclipsim factam x1 Kalend. Mai. Indequè tantum ex ventorum, & tempestatum violentia periculi securum, ut fermè rebus humanis, extremum finem imminere assererent. Quid igitur postea factum est, nisi ut mortales innumeros, qui per totum illud septennium, vitam sibi præ metu, & periculorum expectatione acerbam putaverant, ineunte termino ab Astrologis illis præstituto, molles potius Favonii, quam Aquilones, & blanda sedataque Autumni temperies, quam nubila vel perturbata exciperet (25)? --- Consult Rigordus touching what happened in the year 1179. The eastern Astrologers having sent letters all over the world, with as much confidence as if the royal signal had been annexed to them, proclaimed that in the seventh year after that, viz. the year 1186, there was to be a conjunction of all the upper and lower Planets towards the beginning of September, after an eclipse of the sun on the 21st of April. They affirmed that this would occasion such storms and winds, that the end of all things was very near at hand. What followed upon this? Nought else but that vast numbers of people, who had led an uneasy life for seven years through fear and the expectation of danger, when the term fixed by the Astrologers was come, were agreeably surprized with gentle Zephyrs, instead of north-winds, and with a mild and peaceable autumn, instead of clouds and tempestuous weather.' Bodin has been a prevaricator upon this occasion: he supposes the Astrologers did not foretell great winds, but great revolutions of state. He had a mind to save their honour by such a subterfuge; for take the history of the world where you will, you will find some revolutions within the space of fifteen or twenty years. We read also, says he (26), 'that in the year MCLXXXVI in September, the lower and upper Planets were in conjunction, when the eastern Astrologers by letters sent into all parts, as the Chronicles of Saint Denys has it, threatened all nations with a change of government, which proved true. But it must be confessed that the Historian is mistaken in saying that there was an eclipse of the sun the eleventh of April (27), and the fifth of that month an eclipse of the moon: which is naturally impossible.'

[E] I cannot tell whether those are to be credited who give out that he made some predictions upon the year 1588. A year which all Judicial Astrologers called a wonderful one, because they foresaw so many strange accidents, and so much confusion in natural causes, that they affirmed, that if the world was not then at an end, there would happen at least an universal change (28). The author of the Mercurius Gallo-Belgicus says, that Stofflerus found as many calamities in the prognostications for the year 1588, as Regiomontanus: which is as much as can be said. Joannes Regiomontanus, Mathematicus summus, aliquantò antequàm Romæ anno à partu Virginis 1475, ætatis suæ 42 in vivis esse defuit, prognosticum seu vaticinium in hanc ferè sententiam edidit:

Post mille expletos à partu virginis annos,

Et post quingentos rursus ab axe datos,

Octuagesimus octavus mirabilis annus

Ingruet, & secum tristitia fata trahet.

Si non hoc anno totus malè concidit orbis,

Si non in nihilum terra fretumque ruet;

Cuncta tamen mundi sursum ibunt atque deorsum

Imperia, & luctus undique grandis erit.

Eadem Joannes Stofflerus, insignis Astrologus, &

nostro seculo generosissimus Heros Henricus Rantzvius, in suo de annis climactericis & imperiorum pe-riodis libello, vaticinatus est (29). --- John Regio-montanus, a great Mathematician, some time before his death, which happened at Rome in the year of Christ

1475, and in the 42d of his age, published a progn-

stic or prophecy almost to this purpose.

The year of Christ five hundred eighty eight

Shall bring, when added to a thousand more

Evils of an intolerable weight

Such as were never felt before.

For in that year if sea and earth and all

Do not into their antient nothing fall,

At least it will disturb the course of things,

And batch the fate of Empires and of Kings.

Strong fear shall ev'ry mortal heart confound,

And sorrow shall in ev'ry place abound.

John Stofflerus, a famous Astrologer, and in our days, that illustrious hero Henry Rantzovius, in his treatise on climacterical years and the periods of empires, foretold the same things. That author imitates Bodin, lest du 12.

for he falsifies History to save the honour of those d'Avic 1644.

Astrologers: he places (30) the execution of the Queen of Scotland in the year 1588 (31). For the diversion of the reader I shall set down a flight of Mr Petit, says tendant of the Fortifications. Do not you think, says he (32), after having quoted the four last verses of Regiomontanus's prophecy, that it was word for word

the same Pragmatic with that of the Sieur Andreas (33), only Regiomontanus is not so positive as to the year, and does not so much contradict himself. That foolish fellow

(Andreas) says positively, that the world will be at an end in two years time at farthest: and immediately after he affirms, that all the powers will be destroyed, and fall into the hands of the Turks; that is, after the end of the world, and when there will be neither men nor beasts. Would to GOD he might be the last beast, and the last Astrological fool.

[F] Of a wound in his head, which he received by the fall. . . . They add, that he foresaw that danger.

This I find in Seth Calvisius. 'Johan. Stofflerus, says he (34). Justingenis, Mathematicus insignis, certo die sibi periculum ruinæ imminere præviderat,

& quia ædes suas satis firmas noverat, convocat in

1531, pag. 215.

Museum suum viros creditos, quorum consuetudine

& fer-

(28) Persius, Hist. de Henri le Grand, pag. 94.

(29) Justenius Documenta Fritius, in Mercurio Gallo-Belgico, ad 1588, ad 1589, quod Wolstein, Lect. memorabil. Tom. II, pag. 1018. See above what [E] of the arch BRUSCHIUS.

(30) Ibid. apud eundem, Wd. f. 101.

(31) She was beheaded the eighth of February 1587, old style.

(32) Dicoen fu l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

l'Eclipe de So-

was one of those who went about the reformation of the calendar [G]; but this undertaking was not finished until a long time after his death.

(35) De morte eius sic non nemo, penes quem fides esto. . . . In this manner does somebody speak of his death. Let him answer for the truth of it. Vossius, in Addit. Libri de Scient. Mathem. pag. 450.

(36) He was Bishop of Poltornone in Italy.

(37) Henricus Wolphius, ubi infra, pag. 121.

(38) Henricus Wolphius, in Tractatu de Tempore & ejus mutationibus, pag. 129.

* & sermonibus recrearetur: orta inter sobria pocula disputatio: ad controversiam explicandam è superiori loco librum depromit: sed laxato clavo asser, in quo stabant libri, in caput ejus decidit, & insigne vulnus infelici feni infligit, ex quo mortuus est die 16 Febr. Tubingæ. . . . John Stoflerus, of Tübingen, a famous Mathematician, foresaw that such a day he should be in great danger of having something fall upon his head; for which reason, as he knew that his own house was pretty firm, he got some learned men to bear him company in his study. While they were sitting over a moderate glass of wine, a small dispute arose, and he to decide the controversy took down a book from a higher place. But as the nail was loosened, the shelf on which the books stood fell upon his head, and gave the poor old man a grievous wound, of which he died at Tübingen on the 16th of February. Vossius did not know that this particular is to be found in Calvius; for he mentions it only upon the credit of a somebody (35).

[G] He was one of those, who went about the reformation of the calendar. After the necessity of that reformation had been proposed in the council of Constance, some Astronomers considered how it might be effected. I need not name here those who began: I shall only say, that under the Pontificate of Leo X, two writers published their thoughts about it: one of them was Paul of Middleburg (36); and the other our John Stoflerus, who inscribed his propositions to the council of Lateran (37). I say nothing of Joannes Maria de Tholosanis, a Dominican, whose book de emendatione Calendarii Romani was dedicated to the council of Trent. That Monk says, that Stoflerus proposed three expedients, one whereof was to leave out ten days, and this was pitched upon to put an end to that affair. Frater Joan. Maria de Tholosanis ordinis prædicatorum de emendatione Calendarii Romani cap. 3. ad Concilium Tridentinum sic scribit: Circa hujus æquinoctii reformationem reperiuntur variae formulæ: quarum tres ponit Joan. Stoflerus in suo Calendario propositione 39. Prima earum inter alias potissima est & facillima, secunda difficilis est, & gignens perturbationem magnam, & diffidum in ecclesiæ Dei per orbem diffusa. Ultima absque difficultate servari potest. Hæc ille. Secundam autem formulam vocat, qua nostri temporis correctores uti sunt, 10 dies eximentes ex uno mense (38). . . . Friar John Maria de Tholosanis, a Dominican Friar, in his treatise on the Correction of the Roman Calendar, writes thus: Several expedients have been offered for the reformation of this equinox; three of which John Stoflerus lays down in the 39th proposition of his Calendar. The first of these, which is the principal one, is very easy, the second hard, and fit to breed great disturbance and disension in the Church of God throughout the world. The last may be observed without any difficulty. Thus he. Now what he calls the second expedient is the same which the correctors of our time made use of, by leaving ten days out of one month.

STOUPPA, or STOU P, (JOHN NICOLAS) in Latin Stupanus, professor of Physic at Basil, was born in the country of the Grisons on the eleventh of December 1542. He was sent to Basil at fifteen years of age, and there obtained at the age of twenty seven the degree of Doctor in Physic. He succeeded Hospinianus as professor of Logic in the year 1575, and Theodore Zwingerus, as professor of Physic, in the year 1580. He died at Basil in the year 1621, aged seventy-nine years (a). It is of him, if I am not mistaken, that Francis Hotman speaks in a letter, which deserves to be quoted [A]. Among other works of his [B] we have a Latin translation of the

(a) Taken from the Theatrum of Paul Freherus, pag. 1344.

Neapolitan

[A] It is of him . . . that Francis Hotman speaks in a letter, which deserves to be quoted. It appears by that letter that a Professor of Basil, named Stupanus, had been Rector of the university in the year 1578, and that he maintained he did not know whether the Maf was a blasphemy, and that the like questions were of small importance to him. Idem ille bonus Typographus Perna, qui toties à Magistratu ob impios & execranda libellos à se impressos in carceres detrusus fuit, detestanda opera omnia Machiavelli ab eodem illo Stupano Latine conversa hic imprimit. Scis illa opera propter tam apertas in Mosem & Christum blasphemias ne in Italia quidem aut vendi licere. . . . Hæc tamen blasphemias & verborum portenta Basilæ cum Magnifico D. Rectoris privilegio & auctoritate promulgantur, latine conversa ab eo qui biennio ante illam Magnificam Rectoris personam gessit, diu mendiculus, pane pauperum & Senatus elemosyna educatus, nunc nuper opulentæ uxoris secundæ maritus: Qui mihi biennio ante Rectoratu fungens coram D. Wrtisio dicere ausus est, se nescire an Missa Papistica esset blasphemias: neque talia ad se pertinere (1). . . . That same honest Printer Perna, who has been so many times imprisoned by the magistrates on account of the wicked and execrable books put forth by him, is nevertheless printing here all the detestable works of Machiavel, turned into Latin by that same Stupanus. You know that these works, by reason of their open blasphemias against Moses & Jesus Christ, are not even allowed in Italy to be sold. . . . Nevertheless these blasphemias & strange words are printed at Basil with the privilege and authority of the most noble Rector, being turned into Latin by the person who filled that honourable post two years before. This man was originally a beggar, and had been brought up as a poor scholar by the charity of the Senate, but had lately married a rich second wife. While he was Rector two years before, he had the impudence to say before Wrtisius that he did not know whether the Popish Mass was blas-phemias, and it was not his business to enquire about it.

In this manner does Francis Hotman speak of him in a letter to Rodolphus Gualtherus minister of Zurich, dated from Basil the 25th of December 1580. He had mentioned that dispute to him in a former letter of the 27th of September preceding, where he observes that his adversary did highly praise the conduct of the Elector Palatine for having driven a great number of Calvinist ministers out of his dominions. They were so many conspirators, as Stupanus said. He had prefixed a preface to a book that was corrected; nevertheless it was sold without any alteration to the Papists. Hotman communicated it to Gualtherus, to the end that he might be the better informed of Stupanus's religion. Decertaveram aliquoties cum Stupano tunc (2) Rectore qui negabat se fidei, an Missa Papistica esset blasphemias. Contendebat res à Palatino factum, quod tot conspiratores (ut appellabat) ex ditione sua expulisset. Tandem cujusmodi fuerit meus Antagonista, ex inclusa ejus præfatione cognosce. Mutatum tandem fuit solum. Sed istud apud Papistas divenditur (3). Hotman relates that as soon as he had heard these words of Stupanus, where he speaks with such indifference of the Mass, he went to three Professors, to consult with them how he might be soundly reprimanded before the Academical Senate. They answered him in such a manner as left him no room to hope, which grieved him very much. He committed the vengeance of such enormous profanity to God, and deplored the state of the university where the interest of religion was neglected in this manner. Quo audito accessi ad Zulcerum, Amerbachium, Zwingerum (4), sperans fore ut mihi daretur locus, illum (Stupanus) apud Collegium objurgandi. Nihil addo, quid responsi habuerim. Ego demisso vultu, Basileensem Religionem admirans & ad hæc nova prope obstupescens, tacitus domum redii, & tantæ profanitatis (ne quid acerbius dicam) ultionem Deo commisi. Nam quod se non ignorare arbitror, similis est aliis omnibus in rebus ad Religionem pertinentibus Academia istius ratio: Ad quam

(1) Francis Hotmanus, Epistola xcix, pag. 139. Edit. Amstel. 1700.

(2) It should be thus, and not as it is in the printed copy now; for it appears by the xcixth letter, that Stupanus had been rector two years before 1580.

(3) Hotman. Epist. xcviij pag. 135, 136.

(4) It should be read thus, and not Zwingerum, as in the printed copy.

Neapolitan History writ in Italian by Pandolphus Collenuccio. His son EMANUEL STOUPPA, Doctor of Physic, spoke the funeral Oration of Gasper Bauhinus, and published the Lexicon Medicum Castellii with additions, and the Aphorisms of Hippocrates ranged and illustrated in a new method, as also some other books (b). He was born in the year 1587, and died in 1664 (c). I believe that ANTONY STOUPPA, who writ some books, was of the same family [C].

(b) Vide Lindemann renovatum, pag. 259.

(c) König, pag. 783.

(5) Hotoman. Eminent, referre solet. Ego apud familiares meos Zwingium & Amerbachium non cesso tantam istam profanitatem execrari, sed responsum nihil aliud refero nisi quod ista negotia non ad se, sed ad Theologos pertinent (5). He had, not long after, some ground of consolation administered to him; because at the solicitation of the deputies of Zurich, they proceeded some length at Basle against Professor Stouppa (6). I do not know what the consequences of it were.

(6) Heri primum audiui Stouppam nostrum esse ce-latum, rogatus ut mihi quidam confirmarent Legatorum verborum. Id. ibid. pag. 138.

(7) Written in Italian by John Peter Contarino. The Latin translation was printed at Basle in the year 1573; in 4to.

[B] Among other works of his. These other works are Oratio de Caeli secundi Curiosis Vita atque obitu, are Oratio de Caeli secundi Curiosis Vita atque obitu, printed at Basle in the year 1576 in 4to; a Latin translation of the dialogues of Francis Patricius de ratione philosophiae legendae Historiae; another of some philosophical treatises of Alexander Piccolomini: and another of the war between Selim II and the Venetians (7). He also writ de Holometri fabrica & usu instrumenti Geometrico olim ab Abele Fullonio invento, nunc

verò ipsius Stoupani opera, Sermone Latino ita explicato, ut ad omnis generis dimensiones investigandas, & regiones describendas utilissimum simul, facillimumque esse queat. Accessit etiam Federi Delphini jucundissima Disputatio de Accessu maris & motu orbis Sphaerae, folio Basileae per Petrum Pernam 1577 (8), and a Medicina Theorica printed at Basle in the year 1614 in 8vo, and bine Epistola Medicae printed at Nuremberg in the year 1625 in 4to, with the Cista Medica of John Hornungus (9).

[C] Antony STOUPPA, who wrote some books, was of the same family. He was born in the country of the Grisons, was a Physician, and died of the plague at Basle in the year 1551 (10). He made additions to Dispensatorium medicamentorum Nicolai Myrephi, printed at Lyons in the year 1543. He translated into better Latin Allobanzen Heli filii Ahenragel libri octo de judiciis astrorum. That was printed at Basle in the year 1551 in folio (11).

(8) Taken from the Epitome of Biblioteka Gf. neri, pag. m. 477, col. 2.

(9) Lindemann renovatus, p. 631.

(10) Epitome Bibliot. Gf. neri, pag. m. 477, col. 2.

(11) Ibid.

STRIGELIUS (VICTORINUS) was born at Kaufbeir (a) the twenty-sixth of December 1524. He lost his father (b) in 1527, and was sent to Friburg in Brisgau, in the year 1538, to continue his studies. There he went through a course of Philosophy under John Zinckius, and left that place in 1542, to go to the university of Wittemberg, where he made it his business to inform himself of the opinion of the Protestants. He went to Luther's lectures, but more frequently to those of Philip Melanchthon. After he had taken his degree of Master of Philosophy in 1544, he betook himself to read private lectures, which procured him a great reputation, and he proved very useful to his scholars. He went on with this exercise till the war forced him to leave Wittemberg, and to go to Magdeburg, and then to Erford. The war being ended he went to Iena in 1548, where he married the year following; and being a widower two years after, he married again in 1553. He assisted at the conference of Eifenac in 1556 [A], and had a friendly dispute with Menius, upon a question concerning the necessity of good works, about which the divines were divided. He reduced that controversy to seven propositions, on which the whole dispute run. The conclusion was, that Menius engaged before the Elector of Saxony, and the whole assembly, not to depart from the doctrine contained in the seven propositions, which he acknowledged to be very consonant to the word of God. Afterwards Strigelius, pursuant to the prince's order, drew up a form of confession, to which all the divines subscribed. The year following he was attacked by Illyricus, and had a verbal dispute with him at Weimar [B]. The acts of the conference were published, but not faithfully, so that he complained that something had been left out (c). He was imprisoned [C] with two others in 1559, because they had disapproved some Theological Doctrines, and the piece which those of Weimar had published against those of Wittemberg. He was set at liberty three years after, and betook himself again to read lectures; but because

(a) It is an imperial city in Suabia, near the Alps. Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theolog. German. pag. 423.

(b) He was a native of Memmingen, and Physician to the Lords of Fröbenberg, Id. ibid.

(c) See the remark [E].

(1) Micraelius, Synt. Histor. Eccles. p. m. 766.

(2) Id. ib. p. 865.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Thuan. lib. xlvii, pag. 941.

(6) It was held towards the latter end of 1568, and in the beginning of 1569.

(7) See the letters written to Goldastus, and published in 1688.

(8) Henr. Alting. Theol. Hist. pag. 298.

(9) Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theolog. German. pag. 420.

(10) Alting. ibid.

[A] He assisted at the conference of Eifenac in 1556. George Major, a Divine of Wittemberg, openly declared for the interim (1), and for the phrase inserted in it concerning the necessity of good works (2). Ambold ran into another extreme, for he maintained, that good works were pernicious to salvation (3). This was the fourth schism of the Lutherans (4). Such was the subject of the conference of Eifenac, in which our Strigelius acted the most considerable part. Thuanus (5) confounds the time and the place when he says that Strigelius assisted at the conference of Altemburg (6) in the year MDLXVIII, and MDLXIX. Boethadius (7) showed long ago that it is a mistake. [B] He was attacked by Illyricus, and had a verbal dispute with him at Weimar. They were both Professors in the university newly founded at Iena (8). Their dispute ran upon two points (9): first, Whether God creates a new substance, when he regenerates a sinner: secondly, Whether the Grace of the Holy Ghost leaves any liberty to man. Strigelius denied the first point, and affirmed the second. (10) Note, that Flacius Illyricus was a rigid assertor of Luther's doctrine of servo arbitrio. On the contrary, Strigelius approved the moderate expressions of Melanchthon:

and therefore he was looked upon as one of the leaders of the Synergists, that is, of those who acknowledge that man's will co-operates with Grace. This was the fifth schism of the Lutherans (11). According to Quenstedt, Strigelius was the incendiary and trumpeter of that war, Belli synergistici, corporis & tuba (12). I have mentioned in another place [13] the conference of Weimar: many authors place it not in the year 1557, as Melchior Adam and Hoornbeeck (14) do, nor in the year 1561, as Spondanus (15), but in the year 1560. And they are in the right; for I have now lying before me the Acts of that Conference printed in the year 1562, with this title: Disputatio de originali peccato & libero arbitrio, inter Matthiam Flacium Illyricum & Victorinum Strigelium publice Vinariae per integram hebdomadam, praesentibus Illustriss. Saxoniae Principibus, Anno 1560 initio mensis Augusti habita. It is a book of 394 pages in 4to. [C] He was imprisoned. Falling sick during his imprisonment he had leave to get himself carried to his wife, but upon condition that he should be at home as a prisoner. Several princes, and even the Emperor Maximilian, interceded for him, and obtained that he might be visited by his friends (16).

(11) Micraelius, Synt. pag. 865.

(12) Quenstedt, de Patris Vici. illustr. pag. 134.

(13) In the remark [C] of the article L. YRICUS.

(14) In Summa Controversiarum, pag. 127.

(15) Spondanus, ad. ann. 1560, tom. 3, pag. 602.

(16) Taken from Melchior Adam, ibid. pag. 421.

[D] He

he quickly perceived that the post he was in was not a safe one [D], he left Iēna, and did not regard the remonstrances which the university of that name writ to him to persuade him to return. He went to Leipzig, where he published notes upon the Pfalter. He obtained from the Elector the liberty of teaching in the university of Wittenberg, or in that of Leipzig, and chose to live in this last city. He began his lectures there on the first of March, 1563, and explained not only Divinity, but also Logic and Morals. He had carried his common-places as far as the article of the Eucharist, which he was to begin in February 1567; but the school door was shut against him, and they sent him word to leave off reading lectures. He applied himself to the Elector of Saxony for redress, and not obtaining the justice he expected, he yielded to the Odium Theologicum (d), - - The Hatred of Divines, and retired into the Palatinate. He hoped the Elector would take care of him, and he was not mistaken, for he was called to Heidelberg to be professor of Morality, and for some other employments. He worthily discharged the duties of those places till he died, which happened on the twenty-sixth of June 1569, after a very short sickness, according to his wishes (e). He was a good Philosopher and a good Divine, and he had an admirable talent of teaching youth. His life was attended with a thousand vexations; he was accused of heresy; he was defamed to the highest degree, anathematized, and exposed to penal laws [E]. This was the reason why

(d) Cessit impotentia Theologorum. Melch. Adam, ibid. pag. 423.

(e) Consecutus est quod sepe in votis habuit, videlicet ne difficult & productio morbi genere spiritum edere cogere. Id. ibid. pag. 425.

[D] He perceived . . . that the post he was in was not a safe one.] He thought he could not continue in it without endangering his conscience, his reputation, and his life. He perceived that the peace, such as it was, which the Divines of Iēna had concluded between him and his enemies, was ill observed: besides, he was warned by many credible persons, that he should use all possible diligence to avoid the snares, or rather the open violence, designed against him. His fear was not groundless, for he knew that Solomon advises us not to trust to an enemy, and to keep off from him; and he remembered Menander's saying, That reconciliations produce a wolf's friendship (17). When he answered the letter of the university of Iēna, he declared, That if his going away was not free from blame, it was rather to be ascribed to the inconveniences of the time and place, and the snares of false brethren, than to himself (18), and, in a word, that he had rather retire into the most dreadful solitude, than return to Iēna. (19) Paucis ut dicamus: summa propositi: ipse hæc fuit: nolle se redire Iēnam: sed potius ita: rum quocunque Deus vocarit: etiam in ea loca mi- grandum esset:

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 421, 422.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 422.

(19) Id. ibid.

. . . Pigris ubi nulla campis Arbor æstiva recreatur aura:
Quod latus mundi nebulæ, malusque
Jupiter urget (20).

(20) These verses are to be found in Horace, Od. XXII, lib. i.

--- To say all in a few words; the sum of his resolution was, that he would not return to Iēna; but would rather go wheresoever GOD should call him; although it were into those places,

. . . Where no sun appears,
Or wrapt in clouds or drown'd in tears;
Where woods with whirling tempests tost;
Where no relieving summer's breeze
Does murmur thro' the trees,
But all lies bound and fix'd in frost.

CREECH.

If we consider all those things, we shall be less surprised to see that the disputes of Divines are now a-days so scandalous. They were more scandalous still at that time. Take notice that Strigelius was dismissed by the Elector for not keeping his word, and raising unnecessary contentions (21). He answered that he had promised to be modest only upon condition of doing nothing contrary to truth and his conscience. Strigelio contra affirmante se modestiam quidem promississe, sed duabus adjectis conditionibus salva veritate, & salva conscientia. Those two conditions do certainly deserve to be understood, or expressly mentioned in all treaties: but they open a way for reviving old quarrels; and with those two pretences, one may break the bonds of any engagement.

(21) Quod violasset promissa, ac certamina movisset non necessaria. Id. ibid. pag. 424.

[E] His life was attended with a thousand vexations; he was accused of Heresy, he was defamed to the highest degree, anathematized, and exposed to the penal laws: Melancthon having considered Strigelius's nativity, said, That the stars threatened him with all manner of assaults. 'De schemate ejus genethliaco, Melancthon, ubi id considerasset, ita ex siderum positu ratiocinatus fuit; fore, ut artibus innumeris oppugnaretur; non aliter, Quam lapis æquoreis undique pulsus aquis (22).

(22) Id. ibid. pag. 417.

--- Melancthon, having considered his nativity, concluded from the position of the stars, that he should suffer an infinite number of assaults; no otherwise than

A rock that's buffeted on every side
By the rude billows . . .

Perhaps the man born under such malignant constellations, explained that prediction by these verses of Horace, when he found himself exposed to slanders, and school disputes:

. . . Instat fatum mihi triste, Sabella
Quod puerò cecinit, divinà motà anus urnā:
Hunc neque dira venena, nec hosticus auferet ens;
Nec laterum dolor, aut tussis, nec tarda podagra,
Garrulus hunc quando consumet cunque: loquaces,
Si sapiat, vitet, simulatque adoleverit ætas (23).

(23) Horatius, Sat. IX, lib. i, ver. 29.

For now the fatal hour, the time is come,
The midwife told me, when she read my doom;
She turn'd the sieve, and said, Nor sword, nor cough,
Nor poison, plague, nor charms, shall take him off:
Nor the catarrh; nor flux, nor pax destroy,
But an eternal tongue shall kill the boy,
And therefore would he have his life be long,
When grown a man avoid a talking tongue.

CREECH.

However it be, let us see how he describes his anguish (24): 'De meis rebus quid multa attinet scribere, cum non solum in veteri luto adhuc hæream; sed etiam ad reliquas molestias accedat truncea & mutilata editio disputationis inter me & hominem barbarum (25) agitata, & aliorum scriptorum: quibus fama mea atrocissime, apud eos, qui vitam & mores meos non penitus perpexerunt, læditur ac deformatur. Nam inter reliquas criminationes ipsa morte acerbiores tribuitur mihi impia & extrema levitas, vanitas, inconstantia, perfidia in negotio religionis, & pertinax odium veritatis. Ad hæc convicia, quorum molem vix una navis vehat, accedit fulmen injustæ condemnationis, quam Paulus vocat Anathema Maranatha. --- To what purpose should I write a great deal touching my own affairs; since I am not only still entangled in the old mire, but likewise to my other vexations I have a fresh misfortune added, viz. a lame and curtailed edition of the dispute between me and the Barbarian, and of my other books: by which means my reputation suffers grievously with those who are not thoroughly acquainted with my life and conversation. For, among other accusations more insupportable than death itself, I am charged with an

(24) Strigelius, Epist. ad Wolfgangum à Kotteritz, apud Melchior. Adamum, ubi supra, pag. 420. That letter was written in 1562.

(25) That is Flaccius Illyricus.

R. r. r.

(f) Taken from Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. German. pag. 417, & seq.

why, like Melanchthon in a like case, he often begged of God that he would take him out of this world (f) [F]. I shall not give a catalogue of his works; it may be seen in Mr Teiffier (g). I must observe as a remarkable thing, that he made no scruple to use the thoughts and expressions of other writers [G]. It has been said, that he retracted

(g) Teiffier, Ab. dit. sur Elzevir, Tom. i, p. 324.

impious and unbounded levity, pride, fickleness, treachery in the point of religion, and an obstinate hatred to truth. Add to these reproaches, which would be more than a sufficient cargo for any one ship, the thunder-bolt of unjust condemnation, which St Paul calls Anathema Maranatha. He adds, that though the testimony of a good conscience serves him for a shield against the darts of calumny, yet he could not forbear being touched with the falsities published against him. His greatest grief was to have his hands tied, that is, to be forced by the circumstances of time and place to say nothing, though his silence made him suspected by several persons. Such is the fate of those, who are persecuted by enemies whose faction is uppermost, and supported by the secular power. Those enemies publish whatever they please, and lie impudently to conceal their shameful artifices, and their iniquity from the public. Those, who are calumniated by them, could not make a good defence without saying some things that would exasperate their common master, and expose them to new miseries. They are therefore silent; but such a conduct produces an ill effect: the enemy triumphs at it, and many people, hasty in their judgments, put a sinister interpretation upon it. There is nothing more advantageous, according to the notions of the world, than to be always for the strongest faction; and, on the contrary, nothing can be more disadvantageous, with respect to one's temporal interest, than to be for the party that is in the right, if it be inferior in credit and power. Multis etiam, they are Strigelius's words, meum silentium, quo has calumnias dissimulare cogor, suspectum est, perinde quasi mihi honesta oratio desit ad has labe & maculas deterendas. Sed boni viri, quibus conditio mea, tristis sane & luctuosa, notior est, non ignorant, quibus vinculis constrictus impediatur, quo minus vel causam ipsam explicare, vel innocentiam meam à moribus venenatissimis hominum vindicare possim (26). -- The silence in which I am obliged to pass by these reproaches is suspected by many; as if I wanted a solid defence against such foul imputations. But good men, that are acquainted with my sad and mournful condition, are not ignorant by what fetters I am bound up and hindered from justifying my cause, and clearing my innocence from the venomous attacks of men. All that I can do, says he, is to implore God's justice, and to cry out, as the prophet David did, O Lord God the avenger, O God the avenger; show thyself clearly. Exalt thyself, O Judge of the world, and render a reward to the proud (27). When he gave the reasons why he had left Leipzig, the chief he alleged was the injury done, not so much to himself, as to truth, by forbidding him to mention a doctrine that was dearer to him than his life (28). His second reason was, That no body offered to assist him, when his innocence was suppressed. The third, That he had received a threatening answer from the court; and lastly, That he was oppressed by the threatnings of the Divines, and the anathema's of the Preachers (29). But the better to know the unhappiness of his fate, and how unfortunate he was in being exposed to the injustice of a violent faction, and more still, in being too sensible of the injuries he received from them; it is sufficient to observe that he grew old before his time. He was worn out, and decrepit in body and mind at forty-four years of age. He complained of it some few months before he died, as it appears from these words, Cum ante annos decem & corpore & animo vigerem: nunc tot calamitatibus tum victus tum fractus, vix ægra membra traho, & animi alacritatem senescere comperio. Quare me omni cura & cogitatione præparo ad iter, quod ducit ex hujus vitæ miseriis ad æternam tranquillitatem (30). -- Whereas ten years ago I was vigorous both in mind and body, I am now so far subdued and broken with such a number of calamities, that I can scarce drag along my weary members, and I perceive a sensible decay in the cheerfulness of my mind. For which reason I am preparing myself with the utmost diligence and thought, for that journey which leadeth out of the miseries of this life to eternal tranquillity. A verse of Virgil with a small alteration in it might have been applied to him (31).

[F] Like Melanchthon, in a like case, he often begged of GOD that he would take him out of this world. I desire to die, said Melanchthon (32); first, that I may enjoy the beatific vision; secondly, that I may be no longer exposed to the implacable hatred of Divines. Strigelius had the same thoughts: read these words of Melchior Adam. A Flacio Illyrico, & ejus manicularibus, objectum ei est crimen hæreses: quod gravissimè tulit: nominatim accusatus est; quod non rectè sentiret & doceret de ea parte doctrine; quæ appellatur, de libero arbitrio. Ab aliis verò aliorum infirmulatus est errorum: ut vita ejus perpetua fuerit pugna & dimicatio. Itaque ut Melanchthon ante mortem dixit: cupio ex hac vita migrare propter duas causas: primum ut fruar desiderato conspectu Filii DEI & cœlestis ecclesiæ: deinde ut liberer ab immanibus & implacabilibus odiis Theologorum: ita ipse easdem causas sæpe inter precandum usurpare solitus fuit: cum videret se hoc fato natum: ut omnis bus eorum telis, qui essent arguti cives sine virtute, vita & fama sua propostita esset (33). -- The crime of Heresy was objected to him by Flaccius Illyricus and his followers, which grieved him very much. He was chiefly accused by them of thinking and teaching amiss concerning what is called the doctrine of free-will. Others charged him with different errors, in such a manner that his life was a continued fight and struggle. Wherefore as Melanchthon said before his death, I wish to die for two reasons, &c. -- Strigelius frequently made use of the same reasons in his prayers, perceiving that he was born to this fate, that his life and reputation should be exposed as a mark to the darts of such men as had a great deal of wit but no virtue. If his father and mother had been witnesses of his great trouble, their grief for it would have proceeded from a cause very different from that which made Isaac and Rebecca uneasy. The latter were troubled to see how well their son agreed with strangers; but the former would have been afflicted at the war kindled between their son and his brethren, a war which grieved him no less than the alliance of strangers grieved Esau's mother. See the margin (34). It is to be observed that the Church, who is a good mother, bears her grief a little better than Rebecca: she is troubled to see her children at war, and is so used to it, that one would think it is become familiar to her. She bears prudently, and shews a greater or smaller degree of patience, according as people have more or less dexterity in huffing her. But what is most admirable is the patience of the people; it may be said that as in some countries they patiently bear all manner of taxes, they are every where no less tame with respect to controversies.

[G] He made no scruple to use the thoughts and expressions of other writers. In this respect he seemed to be for a community of goods; he did not think that in doing so he was a plagiarist, and he was very willing that other authors should deal with him as he dealt with them. If you find any thing in my books, said he, that fits you, you may freely use it; every thing is at your service. Cum Victorinus noster diu multumque versatus esset in lectione eorum Augustini, qui libros Aristotelis quasi in suum succum convertissent, illorum potius vestigia voluit, ubi & quantum posset, confectari, quam novam per omnia cudere versionem. Ac quidem ille vir & factus erat, & natus, ut si qua ei de re dicendum esset aut scribendum, & ipsi, quæ de eadem illa ipsa re alii etiam recentiores, & qui viverent adhuc, rectè tradidissent, in mentem venirent, non pueret hinc illum verba ab iis & sententias mutuari. Non enim hoc dicebat plagium esse literarium, sed ingenuam atque candidam doctis atque bonis viris dignam xοινωσιαν. Et faciat, inquit, aliquis idem; si se cum fructu hoc posse sperat, de meis quoque (35). -- As our Victorinus was extremely well versed in those authors who had thoroughly studied and digested the books of Aristotle, he rather chose to follow their footsteps, as much as possible, than to coin a translation that should be new.

(26) Strigel. apud Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. German. pag. 421.

(27) Psalm xlv, ver. 1.

(28) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 424.

(29) Ad hæc omnia accesserunt minæ Theologorum & fulmina anathematum adversus ipsum in concionibus edita. Id. ibid.

(30) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 425.

(31) The 11th of the 11th book of the Æneid. Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

And here beyond the strength of age, except age itself.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

Let us say of Strigelius, Invalidus vires ultra lætæque senectæ.

retracted at his death; but I take it to be a meer story [H].

* new in every part. And indeed that man was so framed by nature, that when he was about to speak or write upon any subject, if any thing occurred to him which other modern writers, some of whom were then alive, had handsomely expressed, he was not ashamed to borrow words, and even sentences from them: for he did not think, &c. . . .

[H] It has been said that he retracted at his death, but I take it to be a meer story.] We are told that a gentleman, who studied at Heidelberg, met one day Strigelius in the street, and told him, Sir, some years ago you did not believe or teach the Calvinistical doctrines you teach now. I was your scholar at Jena, where you gave other instructions to your disciples. Strigelius made no answer, and went home, and finding himself very ill, most humbly intreated the Elector (36) to be so kind as to come to him, giving him to understand that he would impart to him some things relating to salvation. The Prince went to him, being accompanied by Count George de Hundsracken. What I have taught hitherto at Heidelberg in favour of the Calvinists, said Strigelius to him, does not well agree with the word of God; but the doctrines, which the Lutherans have professed till now, are very true. The Elector having heard those words, went away in anger. Strigelius quickly expired with a groan (37). This story is taken from the relation of a journey to Constantinople, made by Gerlach, to whom Andreas Carolus (38), Abbot of St George, refers the reader, after having mentioned what you have just now read. He doubts whether one should say that Strigelius had an unconstant soul, rather than call it an unhappy one (39). He had called him before a weather-cock in point of religion, and a favourer of the Synergists and Zuinglians (40).

(37) Mox autem egrotans Victorinus animam (incontinentem dicam, an infelicem?) gemebundus exhalavit. Andr. Carolus, memorab. Ecclesiast. seculi xviij, pag. 49.

(38) Andr. Carolus, ibid.

(39) It seems in this place that he means a damned soul.

(40) Homo varius & versipellis tum Synergistis, tum Zuinglianis addictus. Id. ibid. pag. 34.

(36) It was Frederick III.

STROZZI (PHILIP) of an ancient and rich family of Florence (a), was one of those, who, after the death of Clement VII, most earnestly endeavoured to recover the liberty of their country, by expelling Alexander de Medicis. When he saw that their solicitations at the court of the Emperor Charles V [A] were insignificant, he took a shorter and more criminal method; which was to cause the pretended usurper to be assassinated [B]. He engaged a man in this plot who put it in execution; but the success of that enterprize was more fatal to the liberty of the Florentines, than the discovery

(a) See the remark [A], near the end.

[A] Their solicitations at the court of the Emperor Charles V.] There is something about this in Rabelais's letters. The Cardinals Salvati and Rodolphus went to Naples with our Strozzi in the year 1536, to engage the Emperor to set up again a republican government in Florence: they did not succeed in it. I hear their affairs have not had the success they hoped for, and that the Emperor told them peremptorily that he had, at theirs and the late Pope Clement's request, appointed Alexander de Medicis, Duke of the territories of Florence and Pisa, which he never thought of, and had never done, had it not been for them; that if he should depose him, it were acting the part of a juggler, doing and undoing; and that therefore they should resolve to acknowledge him for their Duke and Lord, and to obey him as vassals and subjects ought to do. As for the complaints they made against the Duke; he told them he should take cognizance of them upon the place (1). I shall add the following words out of the first letter (2). 'I hear that it is (3) about the affair of Florence, and the difference between Duke Alexander de Medicis and Philip Strozzi; whose estate the Duke designed to confiscate. It is no small estate, for next to the Fourques of Aulburg, he is accounted the richest merchant in Christendom. The Duke had appointed some men in that town to poison or kill him. Being informed of it he obtained the Pope's leave to bear arms, and he was commonly attended by thirty soldiers well armed. The Duke of Florence being informed that Strozzi and those Cardinals were gone to the Emperor, and that he offered him four hundred thousand ducats; if he would appoint some persons to inquire into the Duke's tyranny and wickedness, set out from Florence, appointed Cardinal Cibo governor in his absence, and arrived in that city (4) the day after Christmas.' In the thirteenth letter Rabelais says (5). 'That those Cardinals, and Strozzi, with his money, could not prevail with the Emperor, though they offered, in the name of all those that were banished from Florence, to give him a million of gold ready money, to finish La Rocqua, that was begun in Florence, and to keep a good garrison in it in the Emperor's name, and to pay him a hundred thousand ducats every year, provided he would get their estates and former liberty restored to them'. Afterwards the author mentions the honours that were done to the Duke of Florence by Charles V, and then he adds: (6) From that time the said Cardinals, the Bishop of Xaintes, and Strozzi have continued their solicitations; the Emperor has at last referred the thing till he comes to Florence And the Duke has proceeded so cunningly in his tyranny, that the Florentines have protested to the Emperor nominis communitatis, that they desire to have no other Lord but him. It is certain he has severely punished the exiles.

Take notice that the author of the notes upon Rabelais's epistles, will not believe that Philip Strozzi was a merchant (7). But it is hardly conceivable how at that time a family of Florence could have got so much wealth without trading. However, if he was not a famous Banker, he deserved to be accounted one. The baron de Forquevaux gives him that title. 'Philip Strozzi, says he (8), and Bartholomew Valori, better Bankers than Captains, were forced at Montemurlo. He adds (9), 'That he was prodigiously rich for a citizen. Peter Strozzi, notwithstanding his losses and expences, had still four hundred thousand crowns in the banks of Venice and Lyons, that remained out of his father Philip's inheritance (10)'. He went to Francis I, at the camp of Marolles, with a troop of two hundred Arquebuziers on horseback, which had cost him above fifty thousand crowns (11). This I find in Brantome, who adds (12): 'He was vastly rich, and faved a great deal of money at Venice, where he kept for some time with Mr Strozzi, his son (13). That brave lord spent that vast estate in the service of our kings; for, as I have it from his son, and his antient servants, whereas he was worth above five hundred thousand crowns, when he came into the service of our kings, he did not leave twenty thousand crowns to his son when he died: that is spending to some purpose.' Here is another passage of Brantome, which fully confirms what I have quoted out of him. 'The king gave to Mr Strozzi, son of the Marechal of France, fifty thousand crowns as a reward for the office of Colonel-General of the infantry, with which he bought Breslaire in Poitou; and this is all that he and his father left of so great an estate as he brought into France: for I have heard many people say, That when he came thither, he had a million of gold in bank, or in goods and jewels, or in money, or books (14)'.

[B] Which was to cause the pretended usurper to be assassinated.] I should be very much to blame, should I think that I can comment upon this text more elegantly, by using my own words than by using Balzac's expressions; and therefore I shall make no alteration in the proof he affords me (15). 'Philip Strozzi, the husband of Clarice de Medicis, sister (16) to Pope Leo, not being able to bear the reign of Duke Alexander de Medicis, exhorted Laurence de Medicis, his cousin, to conspire against the life of his Duke Alexander, and to restore the liberty of his country,

(7) Observat. sur les Epitres de Rabelais, pag. 61.

(8) Francois de Pavie, Baron de Forquevaux, Vies de plusieurs grands Capitaines, pag. 379.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 382.

(10) Ibid. pag. 383.

(11) Brantome, Capitaines Etrangers, Tom. II, pag. 287.

(12) Brantome, ibid. pag. 288.

(13) Philip Strozzi, Colonel-General of the French infantry, See Moreri, and Father Anselm, whom he transcribes. See also the following article.

(14) Idem, Brantome Memoir. des Capit. Francois, Tom. IV, pag. m. 311, 312.

(15) Balzac, Entretien, xxxiv, ch. vi, pag. m. 330.

(16) Balzac should have said niece.

(1) Rabelais, Letter viii, pag. 29.

(2) Idem, pag. 3, & seq.

(3) That is, that the Cardinals Salvati and Rodolphus were gone to the court of Charles V, at Naples.

(4) That is, at Rome.

(5) Rabelais, ibid. pag. 55.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 56.

(b) He quotes there Baron Forquevaux: he should have said Baron Forquevaux.

discovery of the whole conspiracy would have been. The death of Alexander de Medicis made room for a successor better qualified than he was, to settle a new sovereignty. He beat the Malecontents: Strozzi was made a prisoner, and found no better expedient than to kill himself [C]. He had married Clarice de Medicis, nearly related to Leo X, by whom he had several children, and among others PETER STROZZI, Marechal of France, mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary (b). It is not true that the Nun, who wrote some Latin hymns, was that Marechal's sister [D].

(17) When Balzac writ this, Robert must have been dead a long time before.

(18) Balzac, ibid. p. 331, 332.

country. Laurence appeared willing to undertake such a dangerous enterprise; but he was afraid that his two daughters would run the hazard of losing their honour, because his estate would be confiscated. Philip told him that such a fear should not hinder him, and assured him that whatever the success of his enterprise might be, he would marry two of his sons to his two daughters. Which he did, for Laurence having made his escape after Duke Alexander's murder, without reaping any advantage from it, Philip religiously performed his promise, and gave Laodamia de Medicis to Peter Strozzi, who was since Marechal of France, and Magdalen to Robert Strozzi, who lately died at Rome (17).

[C] He found no other expedient than to kill himself. I shall still use Balzac's words (18). 'The same Philip, after the death of Duke Alexander opposed Cofmo, his successor, first great Duke of Tuscany. But having lost the battle of Marone, near Florence, he was made prisoner; and believing that his enemy would poison him or put him to an ignominious death, resolved to kill himself. Before he executed that strange resolution, he made his will, the original whereof I have seen at Rome, among the papers of the late Signor Pompey Frangipane, in which among other things, that man, whom the antients would have adored, orders and entreats his children to dig up his bones out of the place where they shall lie in Florence, and to get them transported to Venice; to the end, says he, that since he could not be so happy as to die in a free city, he may enjoy that blessing after his death, and his ashes may rest in peace out of the conqueror's domination. Afterwards he engraved upon the mantelpiece of the chimney with the very same point of the dagger wherewith he killed himself, this verse of Virgil, Exoriare aliquis nostris ex ossibus ultor.

Rise some avenger of our Libyan blood.

DRYDEN.

Which was faithfully executed by his children, who came into France to serve the king against the Emperor Charles V, who had founded the domination of the Medicis at Florence. I must not forget that the same Philip Strozzi, at the beginning of his will, expresses a great confidence in God's mercy, hoping he will forgive him for killing himself, since he did it like a man of honour to maintain his liberty; being of opinion that when a free man has lost it he may lawfully die. But the Gospel is contrary to such an opinion, and New Rome calls defpair what Old Rome called greatness of soul. She communicates now those whom she would have formerly deified.

Note, That one of the reasons that moved Strozzi to kill himself was the fear of exposing his friends to great dangers by what he might confess against his will upon the rack (19), which appears from a paper that was found in his chamber, wherein he (20) upbraided Cardinal Libo (21), a friend and trusty counsellor to the Duke, with his great cruelty, and exhorted him to fill himself with the blood he had so much thirsted after. As for me, added he, since I have not been able to help my friends in my lifetime, I will do them no prejudice after my death. A remarkable instance of human misery, says the Baron de Forquevaux, and of the uncertainty of the things of this world! Philip Strozzi, who a few months before was as much esteemed and honoured as any man in Italy, not only for his riches, that were prodigious for a citizen, and for the antiquity of his family, which had continued in honour for several hundred years, but also for his agreeable conversation, magnificence, and liberality, for his learning, and his great knowledge and experience of the world, finds himself a captive in that very town whose liberty he designed to preserve, and is obliged to kill himself with his own hands to avoid the cruelty of his ungrateful fellow-citizens. It is allowed that he was a man of learning. 'Fortes non sunt, qui alicujus desiderii potiundi spe privati, aut calamitate oppressi, manus sibi intulerunt, qualis paucis annis ante Philippus Strozzius, opibus florens, literis non ineruditus, cætera felix, si sua forte contentus, partibus adversis non favisset (22). ---- Such are not truly brave who, upon some disappointment or calamity that oppresses them, take away their own life; as Philip Strozzi did a few years ago; a man of great riches, not unlearned, and happy in all other respects, if he had been contented with his own lot, and not favoured the opposite faction.'

[D] It is not true that the Nun, who wrote some Latin hymns, was that Marechal's sister. Brantome, who says so, is mistaken. He had a sister, says he (23), who is a Nun, and an Abbess in Italy, a very honest lady, and very well skilled in divine and human learning, especially in Latin Poetry. She wrote several fine hymns and spiritual canticles in Latin verse, which have been sung in the churches of Italy with great admiration and devotion: nay, I have heard say that they are sung still in some churches. Colomies knew not this mistake of Brantome: he quotes him (24) to confirm what he had cited out of Thuanus in praise of Laurentia Strozzi, a Dominican Nun, who died in 1591, aged seventy-seven years, and whose hymns were printed at Paris ten years after (25). That Nun was not sister to Peter Strozzi, Marechal of France, as Colomies thought upon Brantome's credit: she was sister to Cyriacus Strozzi (26), professor of Philosophy and of the Greek tongue at Florence, and then professor at Bologna, and at last at Pisa, son of Zachary Strozzi, descended from the same ancestors with our Philip. There is more reason to say that Signor Flaminio's wife (27) was sister to Peter Strozzi, Marechal of France. Brantome speaks of her thus: 'She had also another sister, Signora Magdalen Strozzi, whom I saw at Rome in my younger years. She had married Signor Flaminio, Count of Anguilara, who commanded some galleys with the Prior of Capua, his brother-in-law. That Count was the son of that brave Count de Anguilara, who was killed in the service of King Francis I.' This Magdalen might very well be the same that is mentioned in the Prejugés légitimes contre le Pape, on occasion of the steel-box, containing among other relics our Saviour's prepuce. A devout lady, called Magdalen Strotia d'Astaba, (28) was commissioned to look over those precious treasures, and put them in order. When she came to the little bag wherein the prepuce was, she went about to untie the string of the bag; but her fingers grew stiff and without motion at three several times: Upon this they cried out a miracle, a miracle; and another person was appointed to open the bag, viz. Clarice, daughter of Madam Strotia, who was a virgin, and young enough to be sure of her virginity. For none but a virgin's fingers could touch that prepuce (29). Read the sequel of this passage in the original; it is a sharp satire and a pleasant ridicule upon many other things, besides the imprudence of those who write so many chimerical things about relics.

(19) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(20) Id. p. 382.

(21) It should be Libo.

(22) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(23) Id. p. 382.

(24) It should be Libo.

(25) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(26) Id. p. 382.

(27) It should be Libo.

(28) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(29) Id. p. 382.

(30) It should be Libo.

(31) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(32) Id. p. 382.

(33) It should be Libo.

(34) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(35) Id. p. 382.

(36) It should be Libo.

(37) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(38) Id. p. 382.

(39) It should be Libo.

(40) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(41) Id. p. 382.

(42) It should be Libo.

(43) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(44) Id. p. 382.

(45) It should be Libo.

(46) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(47) Id. p. 382.

(48) It should be Libo.

(49) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(50) Id. p. 382.

(51) It should be Libo.

(52) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(53) Id. p. 382.

(54) It should be Libo.

(55) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(56) Id. p. 382.

(57) It should be Libo.

(58) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(59) Id. p. 382.

(60) It should be Libo.

(61) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(62) Id. p. 382.

(63) It should be Libo.

(64) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(65) Id. p. 382.

(66) It should be Libo.

(67) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(68) Id. p. 382.

(69) It should be Libo.

(70) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(71) Id. p. 382.

(72) It should be Libo.

(73) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(74) Id. p. 382.

(75) It should be Libo.

(76) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(77) Id. p. 382.

(78) It should be Libo.

(79) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(80) Id. p. 382.

(81) It should be Libo.

(82) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(83) Id. p. 382.

(84) It should be Libo.

(85) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(86) Id. p. 382.

(87) It should be Libo.

(88) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(89) Id. p. 382.

(90) It should be Libo.

(91) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(92) Id. p. 382.

(93) It should be Libo.

(94) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(95) Id. p. 382.

(96) It should be Libo.

(97) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(98) Id. p. 382.

(99) It should be Libo.

(100) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(101) Id. p. 382.

(102) It should be Libo.

(103) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(104) Id. p. 382.

(105) It should be Libo.

(106) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(107) Id. p. 382.

(108) It should be Libo.

(109) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(110) Id. p. 382.

(111) It should be Libo.

(112) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(113) Id. p. 382.

(114) It should be Libo.

(115) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(116) Id. p. 382.

(117) It should be Libo.

(118) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(119) Id. p. 382.

(120) It should be Libo.

(121) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(122) Id. p. 382.

(123) It should be Libo.

(124) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(125) Id. p. 382.

(126) It should be Libo.

(127) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(128) Id. p. 382.

(129) It should be Libo.

(130) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(131) Id. p. 382.

(132) It should be Libo.

(133) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(134) Id. p. 382.

(135) It should be Libo.

(136) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(137) Id. p. 382.

(138) It should be Libo.

(139) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(140) Id. p. 382.

(141) It should be Libo.

(142) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(143) Id. p. 382.

(144) It should be Libo.

(145) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(146) Id. p. 382.

(147) It should be Libo.

(148) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(149) Id. p. 382.

(150) It should be Libo.

(151) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(152) Id. p. 382.

(153) It should be Libo.

(154) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(155) Id. p. 382.

(156) It should be Libo.

(157) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(158) Id. p. 382.

(159) It should be Libo.

(160) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(161) Id. p. 382.

(162) It should be Libo.

(163) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(164) Id. p. 382.

(165) It should be Libo.

(166) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(167) Id. p. 382.

(168) It should be Libo.

(169) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(170) Id. p. 382.

(171) It should be Libo.

(172) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(173) Id. p. 382.

(174) It should be Libo.

(175) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(176) Id. p. 382.

(177) It should be Libo.

(178) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(179) Id. p. 382.

(180) It should be Libo.

(181) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(182) Id. p. 382.

(183) It should be Libo.

(184) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(185) Id. p. 382.

(186) It should be Libo.

(187) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(188) Id. p. 382.

(189) It should be Libo.

(190) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(191) Id. p. 382.

(192) It should be Libo.

(193) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(194) Id. p. 382.

(195) It should be Libo.

(196) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(197) Id. p. 382.

(198) It should be Libo.

(199) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(200) Id. p. 382.

(201) It should be Libo.

(202) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(203) Id. p. 382.

(204) It should be Libo.

(205) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(206) Id. p. 382.

(207) It should be Libo.

(208) See the Baron de Forquevaux, p. 381.

(209) Id. p. 382.

(210) It should be Libo.

(211) See the Baron de Forquevaux,

(a) He was the son of Peter Strozz, Marshal of France.

STROZZI (PHILIP) grandson (a) of the foregoing. You will find in Moreri that he was born at Venice in 1541, and that he was brought into France at seven years of age. He was bred up with King Francis II, who was then Dauphin, and began to bear arms in Piedmont, under Marschal de Briffac (b). A fall of youth moved him to go into Piedmont, without telling his father of it. We shall see, below, the particulars of that mad prank [A], and I shall mention likewise the care that was taken of his studies [B]. He was a very brave man, and testified upon many occasions the utmost intrepidity (c). He was made Colonel-General of the French Infantry, after the decease of Mr Dandelot, in the year 1569 (d). It was he who did so well arm the Infantry, and brought in the use of large bored arquebuses (e). He resigned that office when they gave him the command of the army that was sent to the Tercera illes, to attempt the re-establishment of Don Antonio, King of Portugal [C]. That expedition proved very unfortunate; he lost his life in it [D] the twenty-sixth of July 1582, and was used by the enemies as an infamous pirate: several

(b) Anfelme, Hist. des grant Officiers, pag. 386.

(c) See Brantome in the Encomium upon Strozz, in the fourth volume of his Memoirs.

(d) Anfelme, ibid. See also Brantome, ibid. pag. 270.

(e) Brantome, ibid. pag. 239.

[A] We shall see . . . the particulars of that mad prank. 'Being but a boy, and bred up with the young King Francis II, who was then Dauphin, and hearing of the noble war that was made in Piedmont, he stole away only with two horses, and a Milan arquebuse at his saddle-bow, and went thither, having for his guide that special rogue John de Est, a German, who was lately hanged at Blois, having been made some years before Knight of the order of St Michael . . . That fellow advised him to steal some silver basons, cups, and ewers from his mother, in order to make his journey. When the Marschal, his father, came to know this, and what reason had moved him to it, he said, 'That if it had been for any thing else, and not for such a glorious design as that of going to the war, he would have hanged him; but that he forgave him, and would do so for the time to come, if he took more from him, provided it were upon such a noble account. Mr Strozz told me so himself. Afterwards when he saw him, though he was naturally very severe, he laughed at it before his mother, who desired he should be punished for it: however he gave him a severe reprimand (1).'

(1) Brantome, Mémoires des Capitaines Français, Tom. iv, pag. m. 303.

[B] I shall mention . . . the care that was taken of his studies. 'His father took care of his education, and particularly that he should be instructed in good learning; he himself had made a great proficiency in it: his son could not come near it; however he had learning enough. I have heard him say that one day his father asked him what he had done that morning. He told him that he had rid, plaid at tennis, and then breakfasted. Ah! unhappy young man, said his father, must you feed the body before you feed the soul? Do so no more; first of all fill your mind with good reading and study, and then deal with your body as you think fit. Such were the wise precepts which that father gave to his son, who made a good use of them; for he had as much knowledge as valour, tho' I believe that ever since he left his books to betake himself to the war, he did not bestow half an hour upon reading (2).'

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 304.

[C] He resigned that office, when they gave him the command of the army . . . to attempt the re-establishment of Don Antonio, King of Portugal. Varillas is mistaken as to the circumstances of this fact. I shall make it appear when I have set down Brantome's words. 'Not long before he undertook that voyage by the queen's order, he was desired and pressed to lay down his office of Colonel, being told that he could not be General of that Army, and Colonel in France. Such a proposal was unacceptable to him, and he was unwilling to comply with it. However, because the king had a mind to raise Mr d'Epemon, and to gratify him with that post, of which he was more ambitious than of any other, Mr Strozz was forced to resign it, to his great grief; for I know what he told me then: he added, that if he did not die in the enterprize, he would be preferred to a greater post than that was, and that none should ever dare to deprive him of it. The king gave him fifty thousand crowns as a reward, wherewith he purchased Breffuire in Poitou (3). It appears from the last words of this passage, that Varillas should not have said that Philip Strozz, going to the Tercera illes, had nothing to lose in France, since he was so far from having made any purchase in it, that he had spent the three millions his grandfather had left (4). That Historian is the more inexcusable, because he quotes

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 311.

(4) Varillas, Hist. de Henri III, liv. vi, pag. m. 234.

Brantome's encomium upon Philip Strozz. Let us see his other mistakes. 'The court had lately done Strozz the greatest injury he could receive, for King Henry III had deprived him without a cause, and even without a pretence, of his office of Colonel of the French infantry, to bestow it upon the Duke d'Epemon; and because all those that are out of favour grow contemptible, tho' their merit be never so great, it was not to be thought that the French, on board the Queen-Mother's fleet, would have a sufficient esteem for the General she had given them, since they knew that the court made so little account of him, that they had taken from him the most important post in the army, without making him any amends; which had never been practised in the foregoing reigns, nor in that of Henry III, before the prodigious fortune of the Duke d'Epemon (5). There are two things in this passage, the falsity whereof appears from the words of Brantome, above quoted. It is not true that Strozz was deprived of his office of Colonel without any pretence, and without making him any amends. I am contented with this criticism, tho' I might proceed farther in my observations against Varillas; for the history of the French monarchy may doubtless afford some examples of what he affirms to have never been practised.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 155.

[D] That expedition proved unfortunate; he lost his life in it. The Marquis de Sainte Croix, who commanded the Spanish fleet, obtained a complete victory over the French; but he cast a blot upon his victory, by his cruel usage of the vanquished. A particular account of his cruelty may be seen in a book of Varillas (6), out of which I shall only take what concerns our Strozz. He was forced to surrender, after he had made a brave defence (7): ' (8) Binvile, a gentleman of Picardy, who wrote fifty years after three volumes des Vêrités Françaises (9) in Cardinal de Richelieu's vindication, with more eloquence and heat than any other apologist of that prime minister, relates from the deposition of the French, who made their escape from the expedition on the Tercera illes, that Strozz was wounded above his knee with the shot of an arquebuse, so that he could not stand; and that he was carried in that condition to the Marquis de Sainte Croix, who turned his head another way with disdain, that he might not see him; that being told he was the General of the French fleet, he ordered him to be removed, because he did but foul and poison his ship; that a Spanish soldier, in obedience to the marquis, made an end of Strozz, by giving him two stabs, and then they threw him into the sea. Other relations do not agree about these particulars; and tho' they own that Strozz had been wounded in the fight, so that he could not have recovered, and yet that the Marquis de Sainte Croix ordered they should make an end of him; they add, that he kept his corpse to have it hanged with the other prisoners, on whom he designed to inflict that punishment, under pretence that they were men whom no body would own, who came to make war with Spain in the Tercera illes, tho' that monarchy was at peace with that of France. Varillas should not have quoted Binvile, for that author says nothing in particular about Strozz: he only says (10), that the Marquis de Sainte Croix used him barbarously; and of all the facts he relates thereupon, there is none he grounds upon the testimony of the French, who returned from the Tercera illes. Varillas should have quoted Brantome, who expresses himself thus (11): When

(6) The History of Henry III.

(7) Varillas, ibid. pag. 145.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 146.

(9) Moreri under the word Bartolomé (Charles) mentions the author of that book; he styles him Sieur de Binvile.

(10) Vêrités Françaises, Part. II, pag. 403. Edit. of Paris 1643, in 4to.

(11) Brant. ult. supra, 307.

St f

Mr Strozz

(f) Varillas, Hist. de Henri III, book vi, pag. m. 142.

(g) Brantome, ubi supra, pag. 305.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 310.

several gentlemen, who had followed him, were delivered up to the executioner, like so many robbers on the sea, who had no commission for what they did [E]. He was extremely severe; which appeared when he ordered eight hundred women of pleasure, who followed the camp, to be thrown into the river Loire (f). His free discourse about religion occasioned a belief that he was little persuaded of the truth of Christianity; but Brantome affirms he was wronged in that respect, and that he was otherwise a very honest man (g) [F]. This testimony proceeding from a man, who acknowledges on the other hand (b) that Strozzio plaid him a trick of a most ungrateful friend, and that he had the reputation of being neither a bad enemy nor a good friend, is of great weight: for men offended upon such a nice account, do not use to conceal the other faults that are known to them, and do not say that this was the only one (i). It is affirmed that he gave great credit to Judicial Astrology, and that it proved very prejudicial to him in his last expedition [G].

Mr Strozzio 'saw the fleet, commanded by the Marquis de Sainte Croix, making towards him, he was so desirous of preventing him, that his ship being heavy, and a bad sailer, for it was a large Flanders hulk, he removed into a lighter ship, on which was Mr de Beaumont, lieutenant to Mr de Brissac, whose governor he had been, and without any farther delay came up to the admiral, and they fought a long while hand to hand; but being wounded in the thigh, near the knee, with a musket-shot, his men being discouraged, left off fighting: whereupon the Spaniards easily boarded him, and carried him to the Marquis de Sainte Croix, who seeing what a miserable condition he was in, said, he would only be a troublesome and offensive nuisance on board the ship; and ordered they should make an end of him; which was done by giving him two stabs, and then they threw him into the sea.' See the margin (12).

(12) You will find in d'Aubigné Hist. Univ. Tom. ii, book v, ch. xxi, pag. 1160, an account very different from this.

(13) Varillas should have said to the public place of Villa Franca: Villa Franca is a town, and not the name of the public place of a town.

(14) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 247.

(15) Thuanus, lib. lxxv, pag. m. 422, 423.

[E] He was used as an infamous pirate: several gentlemen, who had followed him, were delivered up to the executioner as robbers on the sea, who had no commission for what they did. As soon as the Marquis de Sainte Croix landed in the island of St Michael, he caused about three-hundred French prisoners, among whom there were fifty-two gentlemen, to be brought into the public place, called Villa Franca (13). They were exposed, by his order, upon scaffolds to the public view, or rather to be laughed at by the people; and then they were sentenced to be hanged; as the interrupters of commerce, the enemies of the public peace, and favourers of rebels and pirates, who made bold to come from France in a body, to serve Don Antonio against Philip II, King of Spain, lawful heir of Portugal, notwithstanding the peace between the Spaniards and the French (14). Thuanus's words are more energetic. 'Tum per tubicinem capitivis fisti iussu, ex numero procerum xxviii numerati sunt, ex nobilitate circiter L, ex omni numero ccc, quos omnes ad mortem damnavit (Santacrucius) publico elogio, quod pacem inter Christianissimum & Catholicum reges juratam violassent; Antonio Crati Priori ad classem Indicam interceptam insidias struenti operam navassent; infulas R. Catholici, uti iam ad S. Michaelis insulam fecerant, prædaturi venissent; conferta pugna Catholici classem oppugnassent. Proinde tanquam publicæ tranquillitatis ac commercii perturbatores erga majestatem Catholicam perduelles ac piratæ infames utriusque Regis bono, sic Santacrucii sententia ferebat, criminalium causarum judici capite plectendi traduntur (15). . . . Then the prisoners being produced at a signal given by a trumpeter, were found to make in all three-hundred; among whom there were twenty-eight noblemen, and about fifty gentlemen. All these the Marquis de Sainte Croix condemned to death, having first caused a public declaration to be made, that they had broken the peace concluded between their Christian and Catholic Majesties; that they had assisted the Prior Antony Crates in his scheme for intercepting the West-India fleet; that they had come to plunder the islands of his Catholic Majesty, as they had already done to the island of St Michael; and that they had openly attacked his fleet. For which reasons, as enemies to the public peace and trade, as traitors to his Catholic Majesty, and as infamous pirates, they were delivered over, as the sentence run, for the good of both kingdoms, to the Judge of criminal causes, in order that they should be punished with death.' It is affirmed in some relations, that the Marquis having caused Strozzio to be put to death, kept his corpse, to have it hanged with the other prisoners, on whom he intended to inflict such a punishment (16).

Henry III required no satisfaction for that bloody affront, which ought to be reckoned one of the most shameful passages of his reign. The Historian Contestaglio . . . tho' he was a pensioner of Spain . . . owns that Strozzio acted in Henry the third's name, and had a patent for being General of that army (17). The author, from whom I have these words, adds, that the nobility and the soldiers who followed Strozzio, had engaged in that voyage by the most Christian King's special command; and that his majesty had declared to Pope Gregory XIII, by his ambassador, and Philip II, by Mr de Saint Goart, afterwards Marquis de Pisany, that he avowed that naval expedition, as being obliged, by ancient treaties, to protect the kingdom of Portugal. It was therefore an inexcusable baseness to express no repentment for such a breach of the laws of war, and such an ignominious punishment inflicted upon the French prisoners, as if they had been pirates and men whom no body would own. Those who blame the prince for giving too great a power to his favourites, do him no injustice; but they should blame him much more for being so weak as to approve all the fancies of his mother, an ambitious woman, who pretended to the crown of Portugal out of an intolerable vanity. She was one of those, who laid a claim to that kingdom (18), and made no scruple to produce ridiculous and chimerical pretensions, that the world might think her ancestors had been more illustrious than it was reported. Having made such a step out of meek vanity, she proceeded to warlike preparations in order to conquer Portugal; she sent a fleet into the Tercera islands, which had the ill success I have mentioned; she had the confusion to see that those who acted in her name, and by her son's authority, were used like pirates, and France was obliged to leave such an ignominious affront unpunished. That queen, who pretended to be so great a Politician, had a wrong notion of things, and will never serve for a proof that women are capable of governing. Could any thing be more imprudent and impertinent than to engage in such a war, when the kingdom was full of factions, and laboured under great distempers, the curing of which should have been the principal care of the court.

[F] His free discourse about religion occasioned a belief that he was little persuaded . . . but Brantome affirms, he was wronged in that respect, and that he was otherwise a very honest man. These last words are Brantome's: here follows what he adds. 'Most people looked upon him as a man who had little religion; they might think so if they pleased, but they never founded the bottom of his soul. It was true, he was no biggot, no hypocrite, and no devourer of crucifixes, and that he little minded masses and sermons; but then he believed the main things which ought to be believed; and besides, he would not have wronged any body for any thing in the world. Indeed when he was in a merry mood, he would sometimes laugh at Purgatory and Hell; but no strokes should have been laid upon it, for he did certainly believe Hell-torments, tho' he laughed at the great dragon represented by Painters. To conclude, he said many things, which he might as well have let alone; but that was more out of mirth than out of any ill design. I have been familiarly conversant with him about thirty years, and I may say he was no impious man (19). It is in vain for Brantome to palliate the thing; what he says is sufficient to shew that Strozzio had infinitely more morality than religion.

[G] It is affirmed that he gave great credit to Judicial Astrology, and that it proved very prejudicial to him in his last expedition. Read these words of Varillas (20). 'The French plundered and burnt

(1) As honest a man as ever came from Florence: He had but one fault; he was the coldest friend that ever was seen. Id. ibid. pag. 311.

(16) Varillas, ibid. pag. 146. See also Thuanus, ibid. pag. 423.

(17) Vêitex, de la France, ii, pag. 405.

REFLECTION upon the conduct of Catherine de Médicis.

(18) See Mézerai in the fifth volume of his Abbrégé Chronologique, pag. m. 238.

free thinker

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 146, f. 305.

(20) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 137.

the town of Aguna, and caused such a consternation through the whole isle of St Michael, that they would have made themselves masters of it on the same day, if they had pursued their victory; but it was Strozzi's fault as well as the Queen-mother's, his near relation, to be too much addicted to Judicial Astrology. He was persuaded that there were fortunate and unfortunate days for him, and he had made a kind of calendar, which he observed with all possible exactness. The day on which he had been fighting was marked in it with a black spot; which made a greater impression upon his mind than the victory he had obtained. He fancied that if he pursued it, he should fall into the precipice his fate had prepared for him; and that his ill fortune began to favour him, the better to bring him to it. This was sufficient to stop him, tho' the circumstances were so favourable, that the citizens of the two chief towns of the isle of St Michael, had deserted them, and fled to the mountains, where they hoped to be more safe. There is no body, whom it more concerns to be free from such superstitions, than the General of an army. See above (21) what I have said concerning Pericles and Nicias.

(21) Remark [B], of the following article.

STURMIUS (JAMES) was born at Straßburg in the year 1489 [A], of one of the most noble families of that place, and made himself illustrious by the services he did to his country. He exercised the most considerable offices with great capacity and probity, and gloriously performed several deputations both in the diets of the empire, and at the courts of Vienna and England. He very much contributed to the alteration that was made in religion at Straßburg in the year 1528, and to the erection of the college that was opened ten years after (a), and to Sleidan's History [B]. He died at Straßburg on the thirtieth of October 1553 (b). He had been some years without receiving the sacrament, being offended at the disputes of Divines about the sense of these words, this is my body. See the remark [D] in the following article.

(a) See remark [B], of the following article.

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Jurific. pag. 97, & seq.

- [A] He was born at Straßburg in the year 1489.] Melchior Adam places his birth in the year 1490 (1); but he mentions his epitaph (2) wherein it is placed in the year 1489. I rather chuse to follow the epitaph, then the narrative of that writer. It is said in Moreri's Dictionary, that our James Sturmius was born at Sleida, near Cologne, according to Verheiden. This is taken from Mr Teissier (3); but it is certain Verheiden does not say so, for he speaks of John Sturmius, and not of James. What Mr Teissier adds, That Sturmius, after he had begun his studies at Liege, went on with them at Paris, and that he had the direction of the university of Straßburg, in the quality of Rector, is a consequence of his first mistake, viz. of his falsely supposing that Verheiden speaks of James Sturmius. What follows is not better. He died, not eighty years old, as Verheiden says, but in his climacterical year (4). Verheiden does not deserve such a censure; he only says that John Sturmius died being above eighty years old (5), which is true. Thuanus is mistaken when he says that James Sturmius died in his climacterical year (6). His epitaph (7) imports, that he died in his sixty-fourth year. Note, that Pantaleon (8), who quotes Sleidan, tells us, that James Sturmius departed this life in his climacterical year sixty-three. Sleidan does not say so; on the contrary he observes that Sturmius lived above sixty-three years. I shall set down the whole passage, because it contains a just encomium upon the person, who makes the subject of this article. 'Octobris die penultimo, Jacobus Sturmius, vir longæ & prudentissimus & integerrimus, ac planè decus nobilitatis Germanicæ, propter eximias animi dotes & doctrinam insignem, à vita decedit Argentorati, cum ex febris quartana per tempus bimestre decubisset. Ætatis annum excefferat tertium & sexagesimum (9). --- On the thirtieth of October, James Sturmius, a man of the greatest prudence and integrity, and who was truly an honour to the German Nobility, by reason of his exquisite parts & uncommon learning, died at Straßburg; after having been confined to his bed for two months by a Quartan Ague. He was past his sixty-third year.' See how dangerous it is to trust to quotations, that have not been compared with the original.

[B] He very much contributed . . . to Sleidan's history.] That Historian acknowledges it. 'Historiam nihil magis decet quam veritas atque candor. Ego certè, ne quid in ea parte posset in me desiderari, diligenter incubui: nec enim ex vano quicquam hausi, vel auditione levi, sed scribendi materiam mihi suppeditarunt acta, quæ studiosè collegi, de quorum fide nemo dubitare possit: Interventit etiam verè nobilis & præclari viri, Jacobi Sturmii, subfidium & opera, qui per annos amplius triginta verè satus in publicis & arduis negociis, maxima cum laude, quum sua me non dedignaretur amicitia, quæ fuit ipsius humanitas, dubitantem & hærentem aliquid quando in vadis atque scopulis, peritus ipse gubernator, subinde reduxit in viam æquabilem minimeque salebrosam, & majorem operis partem, ante mortem, quo sublatus interit, meo rogatu perlegit, & quorum oportuit, diligenter admonuit (10). --- Nothing is more becoming history than truth and candour. I for my part have been at all possible pains not to fail in this point; for I have taken nothing at random, nor upon slight hear-say, but have carefully collected my materials out of records, the authority of which cannot be doubted. I have likewise been greatly assisted by that noble and eminent person James Sturmius, who was himself employed for above thirty years in public and arduous affairs, and acquitted himself with great reputation. As he was pleased to honour me with his friendship, so when he found me sometimes wavering and entangled amidst rocks and shallows, like a skillful pilot he conducted me into an even and secure track. Before the sickness of which he died, he perused at my entreaty the greatest part of the work, and took pains to give me all necessary hints and admonitions.'

(10) Jo. Sleidanus, Epist. Dedicat. Histon. folio m. a. v.

STURMIUS (JOHN) was born at Sleida in Eifel (a) near Cologne (b) the first of October 1507. He studied first in his native country, with the sons of Count Manderscheid, whose receiver his father was. Afterwards he studied at Liege in St Jerom's college, and then he went to Louvain in 1524, where he spent five years, three in being instructed and two in instructing others; and his school-fellows were John Sleidan, Gonthier Andernac, Christopher Montius, Bartholomew Latomus, Andrew Vefalius, James Omphalius, and some others, who became famous, and had a great affection for him. He set up a Printing-house with Rudger Refcius, Greek-professor, and printed some Greek authors, beginning with Homer, and soon after he carried those editions to Paris in 1529 (c). What Melchior Adam says, is not true, that he was familiarly acquainted with Conrad Goclenius at Louvain [A]. He was very much esteemed

(a) See his Epistle Dedicatory in the second volume of Cicero's Orations.

(b) Melch. Adams in Vitis Philophor. pag. 343.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] It is not true that he was familiarly acquainted with Conrad Goclenius.] Melchior Adam expresses himself thus: 'Ibidem (Lovanii) cum familiariter versatur cum Rudgero Refcio, & Conrado Goclenio, hominibus

(d) See the Catalogue of them in Telfier, Additions aux Eloges, Tom. II, pag. 117, 118, Edit. 1696.

(e) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vita Philosophor. pag. 342, & seq.

poor for them [C]. He published several books (d), and lived till the third of March 1589, that is, eighty-one years, five months, and two days. Tho' he had lost his sight, he minded the public good (e). He was married three times (f), and left no children behind him. He had many troubles in his life-time, the greatest whereof was his being exposed to the persecutions of the Lutheran ministers. When he came to Straßburg he found a moderate Lutheranism, which he liked well enough, tho' he was of Zuinglius's opinion. The Lutheran ministers grew angry by degrees with those, who did not believe the Real Presence: he was displeased with their violent sermons, and it is said he abstained several years from the public exercises of religion [D]. He was pressed hard,

(f) See the remark [D].

(11) Micrael.
Hist. Eccl. pag.
570, Edit. 1699.

a Senator and a Syndic, founded the college, and that John, who taught the scholars, was made Rector of it for life. Anno 1568, Argentinenſis ſchola, quam jam ante XXX annos Jacobus Sturmius, ſenator primarius & ſyndicus, adornari curaverat, privilegia à Maximiliano II accepit, & Johannes Sturmius, qui rationem inſtituendæ juventutis monſtraverat, perpetuus Rector eſt creatus. Noſtra demum ætate, A. 1621, juſ univerſitatis à Ferdinando II accepit (11).

[C] He ran in debt, and grew poor for them.] Read theſe words of Melchior Adam. 'Cum domus illius optimo cuique dies ac noctes pateret, eſſetque velut commune quoddam exulum aſylum, peregrinorum ac pauperum hoſpitiū, quos omnes fovendo, alendo, foris domique juvando, facultates haud exiguas abſumſit: maxime Gallorum Evangelicorum ſalutem tuendo, in quam omnes ſuas divitias impendit, ipſeque cum ſuis egere maluit, quam communem cauſam deferere: animo laudabili & perpetua gratitudine digno' (12). ----- His houſe was open day and night to every honeſt man, being as it were a common ſanctuary for baniſhed people, and a place of entertainment for the poor and ſtrangers. He laid out very conſiderable ſums of money in ſupporting, cheriſhing, and aſſiſting thoſe at home and abroad; particularly in providing for the welfare of the French Proteſtants; for upon this he ſpent his whole eſtate, chuſing rather to be in want with his family than to deſert the common cauſe: of ſuch a commendable diſpoſition was he, and ſo worthy of a perpetual gratitude.' Sturmius being called veſpertilio, a bat, by Oſiander, answered, that perhaps it was an alluſion to the veſpertilio in the proverb, to ſignify that he was very much in debt (13). He does not deny that he was, but he maintains that he never abſconded to cheat his creditors, and that his debts, contracted upon a glorious account, were pre-judicial to no body (14); that he was the only ſufferer, and that for above ſixteen years (15) that he groaned under that yoke, and exhausted himſelf, by paying large intereſts, and contracting new debts to pay the old ones, not one creditor could be produced who had loſt one farthing by him. Heus bone vir: quando ego unquam, fraudationis cauſa latitavi? vel potiùs, quando ego unquam latitavi? vel creditorem nomina, vel indicem produci: qui me fraudationis cauſa latitaſſe dicat, aut qui dicat, me latitaſſe, & quando latitarim: & quo tempore: & propter quem creditorem. Creditorem unum nomina: qui annos jam ſedecim uno nummo in hoc ære alieno fraudatum ſe à me verè poſſit dicere. Sedecim enim annos & eo amplius in hac miſeria verſor; unum creditorem produci, qui unius teruncii, mea cauſa, & meo nomine jaſturam ſeciſſe jure conqueratur, tametiſi graviſſimis uſuris & verſuris, tot jam annos exbauſtari (16). Afterwards he declares that he has run in debt to maintain his Proteſtant brethren. Cur non iſtud potiùs cogitavit innocentia & caritas, & ſimplicitas tua? Hic homo horum hominum Eccleſias defendit, propter quas eſt ære alieno oppreſſus, & propter quas omne æs ſuum, jam alienum eſt: & qui propter æs alienum, in extremam eſtatem deſectus eſt (17). I do not think Oſiander alluded to that proverb. I believe he uſed the word veſpertilio only to reflect upon Sturmius for being neither a profeſſed Lutheran nor a profeſſed Calviniſt. Sturmius was ſenſible that it might be Oſiander's meaning, and vindicated himſelf in that reſpect (18).

(12) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 345.

(13) Sturmius, in IV Anti-Pappi, Part. III, pag. 148.

(14) Propter æs alienum nemini noxiū vexor. ob æs alienum honeſtiſſima de cauſa conſtat. Id. ibid.

(15) He ſpoke to in the year 1580.

(16) Sturmius, ubi ſupra, pag. 149.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Id. ibid. and pag. 150.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 165.

(20) Id. ibid. pag. 166.

and kept off a long time from the ſermons and diſputes of your miniſters, I was preſent at the laſt public diſputation of Pappus; and becauſe I ſaid ſomething, which might have removed the perplexity the opponent had reduced him to, I raiſed a ſtorm againſt me, by which I have been almoſt overwhelmed: how then can you object to me that I have been twenty years without going to your ſermons? Et mihi obijciſis viginti annorum neglectas conciones; cum una diſputatiuncula, cui vix interſui, me prope perdidit? He mentions to him thoſe, who in the primitive Church, put off receiving baptiſm till the laſt moment of their lives; which ſhews that they were a long time without communicating. He alledges, James Sturmius, who had been ſeveral years without receiving the communion, and abſtained from it, by reaſon of the diſpute the miniſters had raiſed about the Eucharift. 'Quis Jacobo Sturmio fuit diligentior, in noſtræ urbis religione, & Senatus autoritate defendenda? Quàm multos annos ille vir ad menſam Domini non acceſſit? Quam quæſio ob cauſam aliam, quàm propter hoc Theologorum diſſidium? Idcircone aut Eccleſiam, aut Senatus autoritatem contemnit' (21). ----- What man in this city was more active in ſupporting our religion, and the authority of the ſenate, than James Sturmius? Nevertheleſs he abſtained many years from the holy communion, becauſe of the difference of Divines upon this point. But did he for that deſpiſe either the Church, or the authority of the ſenate? His other answers give ground to believe that Oſiander accuſed him of hindering his wife, his ſervants, and his boarders, from going to church. He calls it a falſity, and deſies his adverſary to produce a witneſs of his accuſation. I married, ſays he, my third wife ſeven years ago; I lived twenty years with the firſt (22), and as many years with the ſecond (23). No body can ſay that they have not conſtantly heard ſermons, and received the communion, and been very careful to give alms. I ſhall ſet down in Latin what concerns his ſervants. 'Tot jam annos, tot ſcribas & famulos, tot ancillas, tantam familiam habui: ex his unum aliquem bonum compares, qui dicat, ſe meo juſſu, aut me autore à concionibus, & à ſacra menſa abſuiſſe' (24). ----- I have had for ſo many years ſuch a numerous family of tranſcribers, ſootmen, and ſervant-maids. Now find one honeſt perſon among all theſe, who can ſay that he had my commands or authority, for not bearing ſermons and receiving the ſacrament. He names ſome of his boarders, and, among others, two grand-ſons of a ſiſter of Martin Luther, who, ſays he, will witneſs that I never re-proved them for hearing ſermons. Hitherto he has ſaid nothing that contains a formal denial of what was objected to him, that he had been twenty years without hearing any ſermon; but afterwards he calls it a lie, as you may ſee in theſe words: 'At viginti jam annos nullas conciones audiviſti: at ſi tu iſtud viginti annos affirmes, totos viginti annos mentieris, quod pace tua dictum velim. Quamobrem, inquis, non venis? tot jam annis. An non reſpondi? ſi John Sapidus, tu tot annos conciones tales haberes, cujuſmodi tu & Pappus ſæpe habetis: tot ego te etiam deinceps, audire nequeam, & cauſam quæris, quam tibi jam expoſui' (25). ----- But you ſay that I have heard no ſermons for twenty years. If you inſiſt upon its being twenty years, I muſt beg leave to tell you that it is a groſs falſhood. You aſk why I have not come to church for ſo many years? Have I not already answered you? If you were to preach for ſo many years in the manner that you and Pappus do, juſt ſo long would I reſuſe to bear you, and yet you aſk the reaſon, which I have already told you. To make this part of his answer coherent, we muſt ſuppoſe that he did not avoid all ſorts of ſermons in general; but only thoſe of ſuch rigid Lutherans as Pappus was.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Joana Ponderis. Id. ib. pag. 167. Melchior Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 343, & 345, calls her Jobanna Piſonia, which doubtleſs made Mr Baillet, article lxxv, of the Anti call her Joanne le Poi. Melchior Adam, pag. 345, ſays ſhe was a native of Paris, and that ſhe died ſew years after her huſband had ſettled at Straßburg. Which cannot be, ſince he lived twenty years with him.

(23) Margarita Wigandia: ſhe was the daughter of the wife of John Sapidus, colleague of Sturmius: the only ſon ſhe had by him died a child. Melch. Adam, ibid.

(24) Sturmius ubi ſupra, pag. 167.

(25) Id. ibid.

and forced to declare himself, and was not the fit his place [E]. I have mentioned in another pl

Nevertheless it is certain that a Divine of the Confession of Augsburgh, has asserted that John Sturm was above twenty years without going to church and receiving the sacrament, and that he used to play at cards in sermon-time. Venerabile Ministerium Argentoratense non ignorat, Sturmium ultra 20 annos nec templum frequentasse, nec sacra cœna usum. Retulit mihi M. Frideric. Rbodius, olim Superintendens Arnstadiensis in Thuringia, gravis Theologus, quique multos per annos Sturmii fuerat domesticus convictor, se illum vidisse nunquam in templo, sed plerumque ludo scæborum diebus Dominicus sub concionis tempore trivisse (26). Mr Cre-

(26) Conradus Schlussemburg, in extrema, constante, christiana Responsione & Explicatione ad calumniosum Script. Christoph. Pelargi, apud Crenium, Animadvers. Philol. & Historic. Part. vi, pag. 142.

(27) Jo. Pappus, Defens. III, contra Sturmium, par. 118, apud Crenium, ubi supra, pag. 140.

(28) Id. ibid. apud Crenium, ibid. pag. 141.

(29) Sturmium, in Part. iii, Anti-Pappi IV, pag. 150.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 169.

(31) Id. ibid.

(32) He speaks to Andreas Osiander a Divine of Tubingen.

nus, who affords me this curious passage, mentions another, which shews what John Pappus answered, being accused of never praying for the Reformed Churches of France. How could John Sturm, says he, hear me pray for them? I have served these ten years the church and university of Strasburgh, and he has never heard my lectures nor my sermons. Tu vero audieris? Ecquam igitur scholam meam, aut concionem toto hoc decennio, quò in schola & Ecclesia jam ministro audivisti (27)? Afterwards Pappus tells him what he begs of God, not only for the Protestants of France, but also for all persecuted Churches. 1. That the errors which their ministers teach them, be not imputed to them. 2. That God would be pleased to discover to them the truths they are ignorant of. 3. To strengthen them in their afflictions, and enable them to suffer them patiently, and not to relapse into Popish Idolatry. 4. To convert or restrain their persecutors. Atqui ego quotidie, & in Ecclesia, & domi Deum precor, non modo pro Gallicanis, sed pro omnibus afflictis & persecutionem patientibus Ecclesiis: & ne nescias, hæc ipsis precor. 1. Ne Dominus ipsis errores, quibus inscientes imbuuntur à suis Doctoribus imputet, &c (28).

I must not forget that Sturm was accused of flattering the Roman Catholics. If this accusation was grounded on his writing against them in a civil, and not in a passionate and injurious manner, it was very unjust. His moderation was very acceptable to his Popish adversaries; and Cardinal Sadolet, and John Cochlaeus writ very civilly against him (29). He asked (30) whether they would alledge as a proof, a piece of poetry, wherein he had lately congratulated the Bishop of Strasburgh upon his coming to town, and his agreement with the magistrates; and he maintained that it would be a very wrong reason, seeing the friendship established between that prelate and the magistrates, was a very proper subject for a congratulation; and he adds a particular reason, grounded upon the family of that prelate. He was Count of Manderfcheidt, related to those with whom our Sturm had learned the Latin tongue. He confessed that many illustrious persons of the Church of Rome had been his friends and his patrons, and he declared, that tho' we are displeased with the conduct of great men and princes in some respects, yet we ought to esteem their virtues and fine qualities. (31) 'In magnis autem viris & in Principibus, etiam si aliqua displiceant, tamen virtutes magnæ sunt confiderandæ, ut in Sadoletto, Bembo, Julio Phlegio, aliisque doctissimis viris. In Carolo V pater tuus (32), si meministi, quid improbarit, nosti: tamen quæ nobis non placebant in hoc Imperatore, ita non placebant, ut illi in ratione militari gloriam, & in victoriis æquitatem, & fortunam non adimeremus. --- Great men and princes, tho' they may displease us in some things, are nevertheless to be esteemed for their eminent virtues and good qualities; for example, Sadoletus, Bembo, Julius Phlegius, and other learned men. You remember, I suppose, what your father found fault with in Charles V: nevertheless those things which did not please us in that emperor, displeased us in such a manner, that we did not seek to strip him of his glory in war, of his moderation in victory, and of his good fortune.' To this example of Charles V he adds that of the Guises, pretending that the French Protestants did not scruple to acknowledge their valour, their parts, &c. It must be confessed that those maxims are very reasonable; but they are little practised by men transported with zeal, or of a fiery temper.

Calvin's Institution [F]. I shall take notice of some faults in Moreri [G].

- makes use of this turn, that Heaven declared him emeritus in the year 1583. 'Ufque ad annum Christi 1583 quo Deo placuit eundem rude donare (43) . . . Existimo autem D. Sturmium nostrum, rude, quo divinitus donatus est, contentum &c (44). . . . Till the year 1583, when it pleased G O D to discharge him as one that had served his time . . . Now I fancy that Sturmius was very well contented with this discharge, &c.' I take this from a letter, which contains a handsome parallel between Theophrastus and Sturmius. Here follows a passage that wants to be rectified. 'John Sturmius . . . having continued in his office till he was eighty years old and above, found himself no longer able to discharge the duties of it, and obtained from the magistrates of Straßburg, that his place should be filled up by Melchior Junius, his scholar (45).' It is not true that he exercised his office till he was eighty years of age and above; he lost it in 1583, which was the seventy-sixth year of his age. He desired no successor, because he was no longer able to continue in it; it was taken from him.

[F] I have mentioned, in another place (46), the encomium he bestowed upon Calvin's Institutions. And I said that this encomium concerns the edition of the year 1543, which is the third. I went upon two reasons: one is, that it is certain the second edition is that of the year 1539 (47); the other is that these words of Sturmius, 'Institutio Christianæ Religionis quam primo inchoatam, deinde locupletatam, hoc vero anno absolutam edidit; . . . The Institution of the Christian religion, which he first began, and afterwards enlarged; but the complete edition of it he published this year,' suit only with the third edition. But to conceal nothing, I ought to mention here what I have read in the second Anti-Pappus, viz. that Calvin being minister at Straßburg, enlarged his Institution, and published it in the same city, apud Wendelinum Rihelium, and that Sturmius prefixed to that book the judgment he made of it. Ego meam sententiam in fronte ejus libri de Calvinis affixi (48). Which does not agree with the third edition, viz. that of the year 1543, for Calvin was not at Straßburg that year; he returned to Geneva in September 1541. My conjecture is thus: Sturmius knowing that the book was reprinting at Straßburg in 1543, inserted some words, in his judgment, which shewed that it was a third edition. And therefore it is true that the words of Sturmius, which I have quoted in the article of CALVIN, (cit. 27.) concern the third edition, and consequently I have said nothing but what is true; but I think I should have observed that Sturmius had prefixed the same encomium (49) to the second edition, 1539. Let those who have this second edition, judge whether my conjecture be right or not.

[G] Some faults in Moreri. I. It is not true that Verheiden says that James Sturmius was born at Sleida near Cologne. See the remark [A] in the foregoing article. II. It is not true that this Sturmius began his studies at Liege, and went on with them at Paris. III. And that he persuaded John Sleidan to write the history that made him so famous. See in the remark [B] of the foregoing article, how far he contributed to that history. IV. It is not true that John Sturmius persuaded him to undertake the establishment of an university at Straßburg: the only thing they had in view then was a school, or what they call in Holland and Germany an illustrious school (50), which is different from an university: however it be, John Sturmius did not advise such an establishment; for he was sent for from Paris for no other reason, but because they had already formed the project of that school, that is, they had resolved to introduce into the school that was already at Straßburg, and of which James Sturmius was one of the Curators, the best regulations, and the most proper method to promote study; and they thought, with great reason, that John Sturmius was a man well qualified both to teach and to have the direction of the school. V. Moreri should not have said, that the design of founding an university was happily executed; for, I repeat it again, nothing but a school was designed at that time. VI. He should therefore have said, not that John Sturmius had the foundation of that university confirmed by the emperor, but that he obtained from that prince, that the school should be erected into an university. VII. When Moreri says, that after the year 1566, John Sturmius performed . . . several embassies . . . and assisted at several conferences; he intimates that Sturmius had no such employment before that time, which is a mistake; for not to mention the other deputations that preceded the year 1566, it is certain that in 1540, he was sent to the conferences of Worms with Calvin, Capito, and Bucer (51). VIII. He did not lose his sight after he had taught at Straßburg for the space of fifty-one years. He began to teach there in 1538, and was deprived of his place in 1583, and therefore he taught but forty-five years. IX. If he had taught for the space of fifty-one years, and then if he had lost his sight, Moreri should not have distinguished between the time when he died, and the time when he lost his eyes: for the year 1589, in which he died, according to Moreri, and according to the truth, falls in with the fifty-first year since he began to teach in that city. X. Moreri should not have said that he died at eighty years of age; for he had said that Sturmius was born in the year 1507, and died in 1589. Judge whether Moreri had got the art of writing; how carelessly does he make use of Melchior Adam? I omit his calling James and John Sturmius's deputations, by the names of embassies. He should have known that an imperial city has, indeed, agents, residents, envoys, and deputies, but not ambassadors. He knew not that the Latin word legatio has a larger sense than the words embassy and deputation.

(43) Jo. Jacobus Grynaeus, Epist. IX, lib. i, pag. 151.
(44) Ibid. pag. 153.
(45) Thuanus, apud Teiffier, Addit. aux Élog. Tom. II, p. 116.
(46) In the article CALVIN, remark [F].
(47) This appears by a short Epistle of Calvin to the reader, dated at Straßburg, August 1, 1539.
(48) Sturmius, in Anti-Pappo secundo, p. 111.
(49) Except the words, which signify that it is the third edition.
(50) Note, that in the illustrious schools, they do not teach Grammar and Rhetoric; but they were taught in the school of Straßburg.
(51) See the second Anti-Pappus of Sturmius, pag. 114.

SÜETONIUS PAULINUS (CAIUS) Governor of Numidia, in the - year of Rome 794, overcame the Mauri as far as mount Atlas (a); and was the first Roman captain, who went beyond that famous mountain (b). He writ a relation of that war (c). He was one of the best warriors in his time, and people did not scruple to say, that he contended with Corbulo for military glory (d). He performed very noble exploits in Britain (e) [A], where he commanded in the year 814, and 815; but having overcome the rebels, he punished them too severely for the devastations and slaughter they had [A] He performed noble exploits in Britain. Emulation was no small help to him; for he endeavoured to equal the glory Corbulo had got by recovering Armenia. Sed tum Paullinus Suetonius obtinebat Britannus, scientia militiæ, & rumore populi, qui nemini sine æmulo fuit, Corbulonis concertator, receptæque Armeniæ decus æquare domitis perduellibus cupiens (1). Having observed that the isle of Mona (2) served the rebels for a shelter, he resolved to take it, and succeeded in his design with no great difficulty, though the multitude of the islanders, who expected him on the shore, and their wives dressed like furies, and their Druids lifting up their hands to heaven, and uttering imprecations, surprized the Roman soldiers by the novelty of the spectacle. He caused their sacred groves to be cut down, in which the inhabitants sacrificed human victims (3), and settled garrisons; but whilst he was taken up with those things, he was informed that the Britons, under the conduct of the widow of Prasutagus, King of the Iceni, had risen up in arms, and committed great disorders. Whereupon he went over, and took such effectual measures to prevent the progress of those rebels, that he obtained over them a victory as remarkable as those of former times (4). It is said that about eighty thousand Britons were killed in that battle, and that the Romans sacrificed their prisoners, and to consult the gods by looking into the entrails of men. Id. ibid. cap. xxx. (4) Clara & antiquis victoriis par ea die laus potior.

(1) Tacit. Ann. lib. xiv, cap. xxx, ad ann. 814.

(2) It is thought to be that now called Anglesey.

(d) See the remark [A], at the beginning.

(e) That is to say England, according to the style now-a-days.

(3) Exciit luci, fœvis superstitionibus sacri; nam cruce captivo ad dolere aras, & hominum fibris confutere deos fas habebant. . . . He cut down the groves that were consecrated to their barbarous superstitions; for they held it lawful to

(f) See the remark [A].

(g) Tacit. Hist. lib. i. cap. lxxxvii.

(5) Lib. xiv, cap. xxix, & seq.

(6) In Epitome Dionis in Nerone, pag. m. 173, & seq.

(7) Tacitus, in Vita Agricola, cap. xvi.

(8) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xiv, cap. xxxviii.

(9) Mirabantur (hostes) quod dux & exercitus tanti belli confector servitii obdierent. . . . The enemies wondered to see a general and an army, who had finished such a glorious war, paying homage to a freedman. Id. ibid. cap. xxxix.

(10) Id. ibid. cap. xxxi.

(11) Id. ibid.

had made, and therefore he was succeeded by a he was consul in the year of Rome 819 [B], the troops of the Emperor Otho (g), and did not had got. The soldiers openly murmured at his maxims, which consisted in venturing nothing, mans did not lose four hundred men, which was not quite so many as their wounded. Suetonius's courage and firmness, and his prudence and experience, appeared gloriously on that occasion. You will find a curious account of this in Tacitus's Annals (5), and in Xiphilinus (6). The vanquished were severely treated, which was the reason why many rebels remained in arms, fearing the consequences of their submission. 'Tenentibus arma plerisque, quos conscientia defectionis, & proprius ex Legato timor agitabat. Hic cum egregius cetera, arroganter in deditos, & ut suæ quoque injuriæ ultor, durius consuleret; missus Petronius Turpilianus tantumquam exorabilior, & delictis hostium novus, eoque poenitentiae mitior (7). . . . Most of them remained in arms, being terrified with the consciousness of their revolt, and particularly afraid of the General. In other respects he was a man of great worth; but as he treated arrogantly those who surrendered themselves, or rather, like a person who revenged his own quarrels, severely; Petronius Turpilianus was sent in his room, a man of a milder temper, and who, being a stranger to the faults of the enemies, was for that reason the better disposed to accept of their submissions.' These words of Tacitus want a supplement; we must add to them the account he gives in the fourteenth book of his Annals. There we find what happened before Turpilian succeeded Suetonius, viz. that Julius Claudivianus, who was Intendant in Britain after Suetonius's victory, fell out with that General, and cried him down as much as he could. He ascribed to him the ill successes, and imputed the good ones to the fortune of the Romans. He gave out that a General would quickly come, who would use clemency towards the vanquished, and he writ to the court, that the war would never be ended, unless Suetonius was recalled. Julius Claudivianus successor Cato missus, & Suetonio discors, bonum publicum privatis similitudinibus impendebat: dispereratque novum Legatum opperendum esse, sine hostili ira & superbia victoris clementer deditis consulturum. Simul in Urbem mandabat, nulum praelio finem expectarent, nisi succederetur Suetonio: cujus adversa pravitate ipsius, prospera ad fortunam Reipub. referebat (8). Nero hearing of this, sent Polyclethus, one of his freedmen, into Britain, looking upon him as a fit man to reconcile the governor and intendant of the province, and to make the rebels accept of a peace. This freedman appeared with great pomp, and Suetonius was obliged to make his court to him (9); however he kept his post, till it was thought proper to bestow it upon Turpilian. If any one, in order to excuse Suetonius's severity, should alledge the horrid barbarities the Britons exercised upon the Romans, it might be answered that the Britons did not do it till after they had suffered prodigious violences and extortions, and that therefore the Roman General should not have been so implacable towards the vanquished; for there is a vast difference between those, who rise up against a new master, whose yoke is pretty easy, and those who shake off a new domination the most tyrannical in the world. In the first case an insurrection attended with cruelty deserves a severe punishment; but in the second case, clemency ought quickly to succeed severity. Tacitus says (10), that after the death of a British King, who had made the Roman Emperor joint heir with his two daughters, his house and his estates were plundered, his widow was whipped, his two daughters were ravished, the chief persons of the country were turned out of their estates, and the King's relations reduced to the condition of slaves. The Roman colony at Camalodunum, made up of Veteran soldiers, seized every body's goods, and turned people out of the houses, being countenanced by the Roman soldier who hoped to have some time or other the same liberty of plundering the islanders. In coloniam Camalodunum recens deducti, pellebant domibus, exturbabant agris, captivos, servos appellando: foventibus impotiam veteranorum militibus, similitudine vitæ, & ejusdem licentiæ (11). These proceedings inspired t circumspection, prevented his improving favourable opportunities [C], and afforded the enemies a sufficient time to take care of their affairs. The worst was that he ran away on the day of the general and decisive battle, and that he boasted to Vitellius that he had betrayed Otho [D], which probably was not true; but he was believed upon his word, and that saved his life. It has been said that the hopes he had of being made Emperor, moved him to advise that the war should be kept up between Otho and Vitellius; but Tacitus thinks he was too wise a man to have such thoughts the other authors I have consulted, say, that our Suetonius Paulinus was Telestinus's colleague. You will find the same opinion in Vossius, and a fault in Chronology; for Vossius supposes that this consulship belongs to the year of Rome 811 (25). Father Hardouin (26) places it in the last year of Nero's life, and quotes the sixth book of Tacitus's Annals. He should have quoted the sixteenth, and remembered that Nero died the second year after the consulship of Suetonius and Telestinus. For the rest, Mr de Tillemont (27) supposes, as a thing undeniable, that Suetonius had been consul before he was sent into Britain; and the reason he goes upon, is, that all those who were sent thither had been consuls. I cannot tell whether he is in the right as to this last point, and the proof he takes from these words, ututissimus consularium, does not appear to me a convincing one; for perhaps the meaning of them is, that Suetonius was older than all those who had been consuls, tho' some of them had exercised the consulship before him; and therefore I do not absolutely condemn the common opinion, nor his neither. There may be some reasons on both sides: it were somewhat strange that Tacitus should never mention the consular quality of Suetonius, if it had belonged to him, when he commanded in Britain.

[C] His maxims, which consisted in venturing nothing . . . prevented his improving favourable opportunities.] Cæcina, General of Vitellius's troops, made use of a stratagem, which did not succeed, and was like to be fatal to him, because the Generals of Otho having discovered it, avoided the snare, and laid another which the enemy did not perceive. By this means they obtained a considerable advantage, but not such as it might have been, if Suetonius had been bolder and less cautious. Tacitus gives the following character of him. 'Signum pugnae non statim a Suetonio Paulino peditum. Cunctator natura, & cui cauta potius confilia cum ratione, quam prope ex casu placerent; compleri festas, aperiri campum, pendi aciem jubebat, satis cito incipi victoriam ratus, ubi provisum foret ne vincerentur. Ea cunctatione, spatium Vitellianis datum, in vineas nexu traducum impeditas refugendi: & modica silva adhærebat; unde rursus ausi promptissimos prætorianorum equitum interficere (28). . . . Paulinus did not presently give the signal of battle to the infantry. He was naturally slow, and preferred wary counsels grounded upon reason to such as proved successful by chance. He ordered the trenches to be filled up, the ground to be cleared, and the army to be drawn out. By that delay the troops of Vitellius had time given them to make a retreat into vineyards, which the knitting of the branches made difficult of access. There was likewise a small wood adjoining, from which they sallied out and slew the boldest of the Prætorian horse.' He rather chose to give his opinion according to the rules of prudence, than to obtain an advantage by meer chance. Had he not founded the retreat on that day, the whole army of Vitellius had been cut in pieces; at least it was the opinion of both parties: the reasons he gave of his conduct were not approved; and I think warriors would readily change the proverb, Too much precaution is craft, into this, Too much precaution is an oversight. Let us still hear Tacitus. 'Cæterum ea ubique formido fuit, apud fugientes, occurrantes, in acie, pro vallo, ut deleri cum universo exercitu Cæcinam potuisset, ni Suetonius Paulinus recepti cecinisset, utrisque in partibus perirebunt. Timuisse se Paulinus ferebat, tantum insuper laboris atque itineris; ne Vitellianus miles recens & castris festos aggrediretur, & percussis nullum retro subsidium foret. Apud paucos ea ducis ratio probata, in vulgus adverso rumore fuit (29). . . . There was so great a consternation among those who fled, & who they met one another in the field, or before the trenches, that, as it was generally believed by both parties, Cæcina might have been cut off with his whole army, if Suetonius Paulinus had not founded a retreat. He gave out that he dreaded the great fatigue and journey which still remained to go through, and that he was apprehensive lest the troops of Vitellius should have sallied fresh out of their camp, and set upon his men when they were weary, who, if they had met with any repulse, were wholly destitute of all resource. This reason of Paulinus was approved by some few, but was not at all acceptable to the vulgar. But if on the one side Suetonius's circumspection proved sometimes prejudicial to Otho, it might on the other have prevented his ruin occasioned by the rashness of the other Generals. Suetonius was for protracting the war, and his opinion grounded upon very solid maxims (30), was also that of Marius Celsus, and Annius Gallus, his colleagues (31). But Titian, Otho's brother, and Proculus, Præfect of the Prætorium, who had the greatest interest with that emperor (32), advised the quite contrary, and brought things into the greatest danger. The following passage is to Suetonius's honour. 'Otho consultavit, trahi bellum, an fortunam experiri placeret. Tum Suetonius Paulinus, dignum fama sua ratus, quia nemo illa tempestate militaris rei callidior habebatur, de toto genere belli censere; festinationem hostibus, moram ipsis, utilem differuit (33). . . . Otho pronus ad decertandum; frater ejus Titianus, & præfectus prætorii Proculus, imperitia properantes, fortunam trahi bellum, an fortunam experiri placeret. Tum Suetonius Paulinus, dignum fama sua ratus, quia nemo illa tempestate militaris rei callidior habebatur, de toto genere belli censere; festinationem hostibus, moram ipsis, utilem differuit (33). . . . Otho pronus ad decertandum; frater ejus Titianus, & præfectus prætorii Proculus, imperitia properantes, fortunam & deos & numen Ottonis adesse confilii, affore conatibus testabantur, neu quis obviam ire sententiam auderet, in adulationem concefferant (34). . . . Otho held a consultation whether it was better to spin out the war, or to try his fortune at once. Suetonius Paulinus thinking it worthy of his reputation in the military art, which no man in his days was thought to understand better, to give his opinion of the war in general, argued, that dispatch was for the interest of the enemy, delay for theirs. . . . Otho was inclined to a battle; his brother Titian, and Proculus, Præfect of the Prætorium, hurried on by ignorance, affirmed that good fortune, the gods, and the deity of Otho, favoured their counsels, and would prosper their undertakings; and lest any one should contradict their opinion, they gave into a strain of flattery. A battle being resolved upon, it was debated whether Otho should be there or not, and it passed in the negative; Suetonius and Celsus not daring to oppose it, lest they should be accused of exposing the prince to danger (35). They sent him therefore with very good troops into a safe place: which weakened the army, and discouraged the soldiers (36), and after that retreat Suetonius and Celsus had only the name of Generals (37); their counsels were not followed, every thing depended upon Proculus's fancy. It is therefore no great wonder if the battle was lost, and if Suetonius ran away and durst not return into the camp. But he cannot be excused for what I am going to relate; it is a downright infamy.

[D] He boasted to Vitellius that he had betrayed Otho.] The commanders of the victorious army, and those who had been vanquished, went to Vitellius at Lyons. He caused several captains of Otho's party to be put to death, and left Suetonius and Proculus in the uncertainty of the event. At last they were heard, and obtained their pardon, because they made him believe they had betrayed Otho, and gave an account of the measures they had taken to destroy him. Suetonius Paulinus, & Licinius Proculus, trifled with a squalid life: till they were heard, necessary magis defensionibus, quam bonis uterentur. Prædicationem ultro imputabant: spatium longi ante prælium itineris, fatigationem Othonianorum, permixtum vehiculis agmen, ac pleraque fortuita, fraudi suæ assignantes, & Vitellius credidit de perfidia, & fidem absoluit (38). Can any thing be more unworthy of the Roman name?

(25) Vossius, de Hist. Latin. lib. i, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 133.

(26) Hardouin, ubi supra.

(27) Tillemont, ubi supra.

(28) Tacitus, Histor. lib. ii, cap. xlv, ad ann. 812.

(29) Id. ibid. cap. xlvii.

(30) They may be seen in Tacitus, ibid. cap. xxxii.

(31) Ibid. cap. xxxvi.

(32) Id. ibid. lib. i, cap. lxxvii.

(33) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxxvi.

(34) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii.

(35) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxxviii.

(36) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxxix.

(37) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xl.

(38) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xli.

[E] Tacitus

(f) In the remark [E] of the following article. thoughts [E]. We shall see below (i) that it father of Suetonius the Historian, and to say that

[E] Tacitus thinks he was too wise a man to have such thoughts.] He had read in some authors, that the armies of Otho and Vitellius, whether they were afraid of the war, or were disgusted at both emperors, whose infamy discovered itself daily, thought of coming to an agreement, and electing a new master, or intrusting the senate with that election, and that this was the reason why the commanders of Otho's troops, especially Paulinus, were for prolonging the war (39). Tacitus is willing to believe that some few men wished in their hearts the public peace and a good prince; but he cannot persuade himself that Suetonius, who was so prudent a man, could hope that in so corrupt an age, the soldiers, who had broke the peace to have a war, would can- guag- nor t their conte them fuit, tionei pacis ribus Lega rum Prin

(39) Ex eodem, ib. cap. xxxvii.

(a) Suidas, in Τράγωνα, calls him only a Grammarian, and mentions the titles of several grammatical books written by Suetonius.

S U E T O N I U S (CAIUS S U E T O N I U S son of Suetonius Lenis [A], flourished under th applied himself very much to study, and I think and Rhetoric (a). It is certain he pleaded some pleaded some real ones before the judges. Pliny: called Scholastici (b), a sort of men who never or by way of exercise (c), affirms in another

(1) Sueton. in Othone, cap. x.

[A] Son of Suetonius Lenis.] The proof of this is contained in the following passage. Interfuit huic bello pater meus Suetonius Lenis, tertiae decimae legionis Tribunus angusticlavus (1). - - My father Suetonius Lenis was present at this battle, being Tribune of the thirteenth legion, and an Angusticlavian. It appears also from these words, that Suetonius's father was Tribune of the thirteenth legion, and that he was at the battle of Bedriacum, in which Vitellius's troops defeated those of Otho. Had Muretus exactly remembered the passages of Tacitus, alledged by him, he would have made a better use of his critical learning. He found Linus with a little hole before it in a manuscript, whereupon he fancied that three letters were lost, and that instead of Linus, the true reading was Paulinus; from whence he inferred that Suetonius the Historian was the son of Suetonius Paulinus, who is the subject of the foregoing article. Vidi ego librum, qui cariem et tinea fenestrat, in quo post nomen Suetonius foramen erat exiguum: deinde sequebatur linus: et supra alia manu emendatum lenis: Omnino autem legendum est Paulinus; id enim ei verum cognomen fuit. Testem in eam rem laudabo Tacitum, qui fortis viri neque nomen, neque virtutem tacitam esse sivit. Ejus enim et saepe in annalibus, et in Agricola vita perhonorificam mentionem facit (2). He was so fond of his conjecture, that he did not mind the testimonies of Tacitus, which he made use of; for if he had considered them with attention, he might easily have perceived that they were wholly inconsistent with his critical observation; and he would have concluded that Suetonius, whose exploits are mentioned by Tacitus, could not be him who was only a Tribune in the war of Vitellius. To which I add, that according to the same Tacitus, in a work (3) not quoted by Muretus, Suetonius Paulinus was one of Otho's Generals during the same war, which utterly destroys Muretus's correction. These are very strange faults, and yet a Critic ought never to take notice of them in an insulting manner, being always mindful that he may want the same indulgence when he commits the like mistakes, which is unavoidable. Were I allowed to compare the inferior with the great, I would apply to myself the inference drawn by Liptius from this mistake of Muretus (4). Quid dicam? Non infector te vir elegantissime, sed bona fide haec scribis. Erras nimis. Suetonius ille Lenis, Tribunus fuit: noster belli dux. Ille angusticlavus, id est, nondum Senator, sed inter equites: Ille Consularis, nec tenue usquam vestigium confusionis ejus quam facis. Hoc mihi in transcurso monitum, non ut carpam (Fidem testor); sed ut claro sub exemplo doceam quam fallax haec Critica, & ignoscendum etiam nobis esse, si labimur interdum in proclivi ista via. - - - What shall I say? Far be it from me to insult so ingenious a man as you are. You write these things candidly, tho' your error is too plain: for that Suetonius Lenis was a Tribune; our's a General. The one was

(2) Muret. Variarum Lect. lib. xv, cap. xi, pag. 1144.

(3) The first and second book of Tacitus's History.

(4) Liptius, in Tacit. Histor. lib. ii, pag. m. 424.

procure him a delay, because a dream made him afraid of miscarrying in a cause at the bar. There was a long and very strict friendship between those two writers (e); and it proved advantageous to Suetonius, for Pliny did him great services. He procured him an office of Tribune (f), and then he had it bestowed upon another, at Suetonius's request. He obtained for the latter, whose wife was barren, the jus trium liberorum, that is, the privileges of those who have three children. That favour was seldom granted, and Pliny had not obtained it for his friend, had it not been for the great interest he had at the Imperial court, and for the earnest desire he expressed to obtain it (g). He was then (h) governor of Bithynia, under the empire of Trajan. Suetonius raised himself considerably afterwards, for he was secretary to the Emperor Hadrian; but he lost that office about the year 121, when several persons were put out of favour for not paying a due respect to the empress [B]. He wrote many books [C], most of which are lost. We have only his History of the first twelve Emperors, and part of his treatise concerning the illustrious Grammarians and Rhetoricians. That history is very much commended by our most learned Humanists [D]: he speaks much more of the Emperors than of the affairs of the Empire; and the diligence wherewith he has collected so many particulars concerning their actions and inclinations, cannot be sufficiently admired. He does not observe the order of time; and no History was ever more different from annals than this is. He reduces every thing to some general heads, and places together what relates to each head. He is very concise, and frequently touches upon

(e) Id. lib. i. Epist. xxiv; lib. x. Epist. xcvi.

(f) Id. Epist. viii. lib. iii.

(g) See the 95th and 96th Letters of the 10th book of Pliny.

(h) About the year 104.

the author of them believed that Suetonius Lenis, and Suetonius Paulinus are the same person. La Popeliere expresses himself thus: Suetonius Lenis, the father of Tranquillus, wrote the life of the Emperor L. Otbo, and a book concerning the Prætors (10). This is all false.

Note, That Suetonius taking the fir-name of Tranquillus, retained the whole sense of the fir-name Lenis, [Gentle] which his father had. But we do not know the reason which made him prefer the one to the other: perhaps he only consulted his ear, and Tranquillus sounded better to him.

[B] He lost that office when several persons were put out of favour for not paying a due respect to the empress. This is to be found only in a passage of Spartianus. Septicio Claro præfetto prætorii, Et Suetonio Tranquillo Epistolæ magistro, multisque aliis qui apud Sabinam uxorem, injussu ejus, familiaribus se tunc egerrant quam reverentia domus aulicæ postulabat, successores dedit (11). The sense of those words is thus represented by Mr de Tillemont: 'Adrian put out of favour many persons in England, for having behaved themselves too freely, without his order, towards the Empress Sabina, which is not farther explained in history. Suetonius Tranquillus, who doubtless is the Historian, lost his office of secretary, &c (12).'

This is very judicious: we shall see in the remark, wherein I take notice of Moreri's mistakes, that every body has not been so cautious as Mr de Tillemont.

[C] He wrote many books. I shall use still the expressions of the same writer (13). 'Suidas ascribes to him several works, which concern that profession (14). Besides, he observes that he had wrote a book about the Grecian games, two upon the shews of the Romans, two upon the laws and customs of Rome, one upon the life of Cicero, or upon his books de Republica, a catalogue of the illustrious men of Rome, and the eight books, still extant, of the history of the emperors. * He had also writ three books of kings, of which St Paulinus made an abridgment in verse. † The book of the institution of Offices, quoted by Priscian, may be the book concerning the laws and customs of Rome.

The same Priscian quotes eight books of his concerning the Prætors. A book intituled, De Rebus Variis, is ascribed to him, wherein he treated of things that concern Grammar. ‡ It appears by several authors, who quote his works, that they have been very much esteemed even among the Greeks. § Tertullian quotes his book concerning shews, * and St Jerome that of the illustrious men, in whose imitation he wrote his. It is likely that what is now extant of Suetonius concerning the illustrious Grammarians, Poets and Orators, made part of that work. He speaks of some Grecians, but they taught at Rome.

[D] That history of the first twelve emperors, is very much commended by our most learned Humanists. [It is a continued series of choice and curious facts, related succinctly without digressions, reflexions, and reasonings. There is in it a character of sincerity, which plainly shews that the author feared and hoped for nothing, and that his pen was not directed by hatred or flattery. He represents abundance of vices, with all their deformity, without discovering any inclination to slander, and without omitting the good qualities of those whose crimes he describes (15). Which must needs please the judicious readers, who are extremely offended, when they observe that an author loves slandering, and relates wicked actions, not so much to perform the part of an Historian, as to satisfy his satirical humour. Many readers do not much care whether an Historian discovers such a humour, or appears free from it; it is enough for them if he be satirical; those men have doubtless wrong notions of things, and little honesty; but all things being otherwise alike, I think they would rather chuse a history, wherein wicked princes are ingenuously described, than one that may be suspected by reason of the author's malignity; and therefore they may agree with men of a good taste in approving Suetonius. He found the art of persuading the reader of his sincerity; which plainly shews that he is no passionate writer. Let us see what judgment has been made of him by some learned men: I begin with the eloquent Politian. 'Hæc singula ita Suetonius hic noster persecutus in sua Historia est, ut præter explicandi scientiam, qua mirifice est usus, etiam diligentiam nobis fidemque, & libertatem suam plane probaverit. Nulla in his libris suspicio est gratiæ, nulla similitudinis, nihil studio dictum, nihil suppressum metu, rebus ipsis data omnia, veritati in primis servitum est, ut plane appareat ad perpetuam magis possessionem (ut Thucydides ait) quam ad intuitum hoc opus, pugnamque præsentem comparatum est. Nam qui aut fœdis assentionibus, aut malignis obtestationibus, supra quam res ipsa postulet, quasi servire historiam cogunt, ii mihi haud minus eam dehonefata videntur, atque ii qui Herculem ipsum depingant, Lydiæ Omphalæ in muliebri & crocina tunicula famulantem (16). Hanc in primis captare Historicus laudem debet, ut libertate usus maxima in scribendo, ut neque assentioni quasi obnoxius, neque obtestationi quasi offensus, sed fidei servisse atque incorruptæ veritati existimetur, ne quid in eo servile, neve quid malignus deprehendatur, sic ut nec ullis conditionibus sollicitatus, neque mercedula cuiquam auctoratus, sed sui homo juris, rectus, atque intrepidus neutram in partem præponderet (17). Tantum abest, ut hic noster quicquam vel metu, vel studio adductus, rebus ipsis detraxerit, ut Nervæ etiam, Trajani, Adrianique suæ ætatis Imperatorum vitas tacere præoptaverit, quam aut periculose de viventibus male sentire, aut extollendo potentiores, parum videri liber (18). Every one of these things is so well executed by Suetonius in his history, that besides his deservings, he has likewise given us plain proofs of his diligence, veracity, and freedom. There is no room for any suspicion of partiality or ill-will in his books; nothing is said out of favour, nor suppressed out of fear: the facts themselves have engrossed his whole attention, and he has consulted truth in the first place; by which it appears that

(15) See Bodin. Method. Hist. cap. xv. pag. m. 65.

(16) Politianus, Prefat. in Suetonium, folio m. b. 3.

(17) Id. ibid. folio b. 4.

(18) Id. ibid. folio b. 5.

(10) La Popeliere, Histoire des Histoires, liv. vi. (and not v. as Vossius quotes it) pag. 344.

(11) Ælius Spartian. in Vita Adriani, cap. xi, pag. m. 103, Tom. i. Historiæ Augustæ Scrip. tor.

(12) Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. Tom. ii. pag. m. 418, ad ann. 121.

(13) Id. ibid. pag. 426.

(14) That is, that of a Grammarian.

* Aulon. Ep. 19, pag. 466.

† Suet. prol.

‡ Prol.

§ Tert. spec. c. 5. pag. 92. c.

 Hier. v. ill. pref. pag. 261. a.

upon customs and ordinances, so that those v mentary, or hear it explained by a learned C relating to antiquity. Some blame him for actions and horrid debaucheries of Tiberius, denied that the inquiries he made into those thi
a great deal of liberty to his pen; and therefo the Emperors with the same freedom as they li good morals, and great virtue (i). He made to be intreated not to keep them so long in hi that writer are those of Torrentius and Casau

(i) See the passage of Pliny in the remark [E] citation (31).

(A) See the remark [F], citation (50).

'his work was framed (as Thucydides says) for a per'petual possession, not for a transitory view, or to serve 'a present purpose. For such persons as make history sub'servient to vile flattery, or spiteful detraction, beyond
'what the truth requires, do no less dishonour it than 'those who introduce Hercules himself in petticoats, per'forming the offices of a domestic drudge to Omphale, Queen
'of Lydia An Historian ought chiefly to aim at 'this commendation, viz. of being esteemed a most free
'and impartial writer, who neither flatters nor de'tracts, but strictly observes the laws of sincerity and 'truth. He must take care not to discover any thing servile
'or malicious, nor to give ground for suspecting that he is
'acted by an undue influence, or bound, as a hireling,
'to any one, but he must shew himself to be a man inde'pendent, upright, and undaunted, who is no ways bias-
'sed to either side. Our Historian was so far 'from being influenced by the motives of fear or favour,
'to detract any thing from the truth, that he rather chose
'not to write the lives of Nerva, Trajan, and Adrian,
'the emperors of his time, than to run any risque by speak'ing ill of the persons then alive, or to seem less free and 'impartial, by extolling his superiors.' I shall add the following words of Lippius to this fine encomium.
'Suetonium Tranquillum non injuria commendo sæpe
'juventuti. Verba vides? Pura, tersa, propria.
'Filum totum orationis? Breve, nervosum. Rem
'ipsam? Utilis pariter & jucunda historia est: &
'quod mihi caput, plena moris & doctrinæ antiquæ.
'Quis obsecro, ritus publicus olim privatusque fuit,
'quem velut de industria non tangat? Quod munus,
'quis magistratus, quem non libet? Tangat & libet,
'dico. Non enim explicet: quod institutum ejus ve-
'luit & ratio scribendi. At viam tamen latam sternit
'ad indagandum: & aures atque animum imbuat au-'ditione aliqua, imò cognitione (19). I very 'often recommend Suetonius Tranquillus to the youth, not 'without reason. If you examine his words, they are 'pure, neat, proper: if the whole thread of it's dis'course, it is short and nervous. If you consider his 'subject, it is both an useful and pleasant history: and
'which chiefly weighs with me, it is full of morality
'and antient learning. What rite is there either pub'lic or private which he does not purposely touch
'upon? What office or magistracy which he does 'not briefly mention? I say, touch upon, and briefly 'mention; for he does not fully explain them, because 'the design and method of his book hindered him from 'doing so. Nevertheless he opens a large field for 'enquiry, and communicates to the ears and mind some 'hints, or rather some degrees of knowledge.' One witness more: 'Suetonius vitas aliquot descripsit Au'gustorum. Fidem si spectes, nihil certius. Acumen
'scribentis si consideres, & prudentiam, nihil acutius
'nihil prudentius. Verborum, quantum satis est, ad
'hibet; copiam autem rejicit. Formulas fori & curia
'omnes servat in loquendo. Mirificus planè vir, &
'dignus qui ab omnibus ametur & legatur (20). . . .
'Suetonius has writ the lives of some of the Cæsars. A 'his veracity, there is nothing more certain than what 'he says. If you consider his wit and discretion, in the 'no man has exceeded him. The words that he mak-
'use of are as many as are sufficient, but he rejects a 'pious superfluity. He keeps up all the phrases of the 'Forum and the court in his style. In short, he is true
'an admirable writer, and deserves to be read and lik'ed by all. If any one desires a greater number of testimonies, he needs only read Hanckius in the first volun-de Romanarum rerum scriptoribus, pag. 112, and 113 and in the second volume, pag. 287, and 288. S also Sir Thomas-Pope Blount, pag. 104, of the Censu celebriorum Autorum. But the reader ought also to fi-here what the Antients have said of Suetonius's cand

(19) Joſtus Lip-pius, Eleſtor.
lib. ii, cap. xviii,
pag. m. 811,
Tom. i, Oper.

(20) Franciſc.
Robortellus, in Literis ad Jo.
Bapt. Campegium, Tom. i, de Populi Romani vita & vic-tu præmiſſis.

with the notes of some learned Critics, in the edition of Utrecht 1672 (l). I have not seen the French translation of Suetonius, printed at Lyons in the year 1556, in 4to (m); and therefore I cannot say whether George de la Bouliere, who is the author of it, has been as cautious as Mr du Teil (n). The latter has left out whole chapters, and in many places

(m) Du Verdier Van-Privas, Bibl. Franc. pag. 446. La Croix du Maine, pag. 118, mentions only the edition of Lyons, 1569.

(n) The fourth edition of his translation of Suetonius, is that of Amsterdam, 1699.

* pridios & ejusmodi vitarum scriptores Suetonius emi-neat, illâ se jactet in aulâ; hoc ceteris melior, quod etatis beneficio, melius quàm illi latine loquitur: ad Taciti quidem gloriam aspirare, aut se cum eo conferre si voluerit, omnium eruditorum convicio vapu-labit. Equidem quod ad me attinet, Suetonii lectionem non minus quàm Catulli aut Martialis ado-lescentibus perniciosam, etiam confirmata ætatis viris periculofam putô (22). --- But it is said that St Jerom commends Suetonius. An honourable testimony, if he does so. For Jerom not only excelled in piety, but likewise in learning and judgment. But how does he commend him? He says that he writ the lives of the Cæsars with the same freedom as they lived.
This is no great commendation, if it be any at all; for my part I do not think it is any. For since the Cæsars lived up to the height of looseness and debauchery, what praise is it for any man to have equaled their crimes by the immodesty of his description, and to have set before the eyes of men, in bare-faced and obscene words, their vile actions, which should rather have been buried in perpetual oblivion. You find nothing more frequently mentioned in Suetonius than Catamities, and the authors of unnatural lusts; Sporus married to Nero, and Nero to Doryphorus. He does not even forget the expressions which they made use of in the middle of their crimes;
as if it concerned posterity to know these things, the bare mention of which should have made not only the author but the paper itself to blush. Nevertheless he insists upon them so minutely and particularly, as if he had a mind to teach them. We find nothing like this in Tacitus. He either passes over such things, or he hints at them in such a manner as shews his hatred and abhorrence, but does not eagerly dwell upon them, as the other does. Wherefore let Suetonius shine among the Vopisci, the Spartiani, the Lampridii, and other writers of lives of that sort; in this he is preferable to them, that the age in which he lived gave him an opportunity of writing a better Latin stile than they:
but if he should aspire to the glory of Tacitus, or dare to compare himself with him, he would be censured by all learned men. I for my part look upon the reading of Suetonius to be no less hurtful to young people than the reading of Catullus or Martial. Nay I think it even dangerous to men of a ripe age. Take notice that he opposes Tacitus to Suetonius, in order to shew that Tacitus has deserved no blame, considering how cautious he is either to suppress those filthy things, or to mention them only in general, and with indignation. Bodin made the same observation before Muretus, to make it appear that Tacitus is more to be commended than Suetonius, whom he otherwise acknowledges to be less blameable than Lampridius.
Hoc fortassis improbari potest (Suetonius) quod scdis-simas quasque principum libidines nimis studiosè con-secatur quas Corn. Tacitus omisit. Sed in eo ge-nere longe à Lampridio superatur, is enim tot portentia novarum voluptatum ab Heliogabalo inventa describit, ut non magis ea narrare, quàm unicuique ad imitandum proponere videatur (23). --- In this perhaps Suetonius is blame-worthy, viz. in following too closely all the abominable lusts of princes, which Tacitus has omitted. He is nevertheless far out-done by Lampridius, who describes such a number of monstrous and new pleasures brought in by Heliogabalus, that he does not more seem to relate them than to propose them for the imitation of every one. But Bodin and Muretus did not consider what difference there is between the author of an History of the Empire, and the author of an History of the Emperors. The former ought to touch but lightly upon the private actions of a prince; he ought to say but little of kings, except when they have an influence upon the general affairs of the state. But those, who write the history of the person of a monarch, ought chiefly to dwell on his private actions. Which is the reason why Suetonius thought himself more obliged than Tacitus to insist upon the personal actions of the Emperors. Besides, it may be affirmed that Tacitus did not take such a

VOL. V.

a method as the censurers of Suetonius ascribe to him.
He expresses the lewdness of that time in very plain words, and perhaps he speaks as much of it in proportion (24) as the other does. We might judge better of it, if we had all his history of Caligula. What Muretus says, that the public is not concerned to know the particulars of the Emperors debauchery, proves too much; for he may be answered that the public is not concerned to know the particulars mentioned by Tacitus concerning Agrippina, who inticed her own son to commit incest with her. What have we to do, may one say to Muretus, with the ' lasciva
' oscula & prænuntias flagitii blanditias, --- quantas
' kistes and carresses that were the forerunners of the crime,' which we read in Tacitus (25)? You must either condemn that Historian, or acquit Suetonius, and acknowledge that they are only more or less faulty.
Note, that Erasmus, whose authority is as good as that of Muretus, does not think that the description of the lewdness of the Emperors, whose history has been written by Suetonius, is unprofitable to the public. On the contrary, he believes it may be a curb to wicked princes, and that no tyrant could be at rest, should he consider that his memory would be one day as execrable as that of Caligula and Nero is at this Day. It was for the public good that he put out an edition of Suetonius, and of the other Historians, who give us a particular account of the abominable actions of the Roman Emperors. I shall set down his own words, which represent his thoughts more fully and more emphatically than I can do. Ex bonæ fidei scriptoribus super alias innumeras, hæc præcipua capitur utilitas, quod non alia res æque, vel bonorum regum animos ad res cum laude gerendas accendit, vel Tyrannorum cupiditates cohibet ac refrenat, dum utrique cernunt bonum literis suam vitam omnem, mox in totius orbis, imo seculorum omnium Thea-trum producendam, & quidquid nunc vel in abdito patrant, vel ascito furo prætexunt, vel metu dissimulari cogunt verius quàm ignorari, paucis post clarissima in luce sub oculis omnium tradendum, cum jam metu pariter ac spe libera posteritas, nec ullo corrupta studio, magno consensu recte factis applaudit, parique libertate his diversa explodit exhibilibique. Nec enim arbitror quenguam tyrannum, sic penitus omnem hominis sensum exuisse, ut vitam sibi jucundam ducat, si norit suum nomen apud posteror omnium ætatum ac nationum, tam invisum & execrabile fore, quàm est Neronis, Caligulae, Helioga-bali, Commodi, ad quorum mentionem, seu portentorum verius quàm principum, nemo jam non desipit, non abominatur, non detestatur (26). What Erasmus says may be confirmed by the following example. The Emperor Commodus caused a man, who had read the life of Caligula, written by Suetonius, to be devoured by beasts; and he used him thus, because he was born the same day with Caligula (27). From whence it may be inferred that he was more concerned for the memory of Caligula, than for that of the other Em-perors defamed by that Historian. But since he exercised so great a cruelty upon a reader, by virtue of his concern grounded on such frivolous reasons, it is an easy matter to apprehend that he would not, for any thing in the world, have been used as Suetonius used Caligula; and therefore it is certain that tyrants are not willing their infamous actions should be known.
Such an historian as Suetonius may therefore make them uneasy, and afraid that, some time or other, their memory will be as execrable as that of the Emperors, whose debaucheries he lays open.

Politian maintained, many years before Erasmus, that the leud and cruel actions described by Suetonius, might inspire the reader with love for the contrary virtues; and he alleged the conduct of the Lacedæmonians, who in order to make their children hate drunkenness, took care to shew them drunken slaves.
Read his words, wherein you will find also that a Musician, the better to instruct his scholars, would have them hear very bad fingers. Sed neque aut ob-scenitatis apud hunc quisquam, aut crudelitatis exempla reformidet. Siquidem & Lacedæmonii (ut est apud Plutarchum)

(l) Published by Mr. Grævius.
It was reprinted in 1691.

(24) That is,
considering that he wrote the History of the Roman Empire, and that Suetonius wrote the memories of the Em-perors.

(25) Tacit. Ann.
nal. lib. xiv,
cap. ii.

(26) Erasmus.
Epist. Dedicat.
Suetonii, Dionis
Cassii, Spartiani, Capitolini, Lampridii, &c.
He dedicated that work to Frederic, Electors of Saxony, and to Prince George, cousin to that Elector.
The Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Antwerp the fifth of June 1537.

(27) Eum etiam
qui Tranquilli li-brum vitam Caligulae continentem legerat, fe-
ris obici jussit, quia eundem diem natus habuerat
quem & Caligula.
Lamprid. in Commodo, cap. x.

places enervated Suetonius's phrases; for he was not bear the vivacity and strength of the description of the Emperor's debauchery. I must not forget!

Plutarchum) soliti etiam sunt per festos dies bene potos servos, atque ex eo parum sui compotes, quos illi Εἰλωτας vocabant, offendere inter convivio, atque illo pacto docere adulescentis, quantum in se mali ebrietas contineret. Et Thebanus Gismenias (28) bonos juxta malosque tibi- cines discipulis ostendens, Hoc modo, aiebat, canere oportet, illo non oportet. Videlicet collata vitii virtutes, magis aliquanto, quam si seorsum inspexeris, diluce-

(28) He should have said Gismenias.

(29) Politianus, ubi supra, fol. 5.

† Voff. Hist. Lat. lib. 1. c. 31. pag. 166.

(30) Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. Tom. II, p. 483.

J. Ruold. v. Plut. c. 28, pag. 51. 2.

(31) Tillemont, ibid. pag. 486. These are Pliny's words, Epist. xcv, lib. x. Suetonium Tranquillum, probissimum, honestissimum, eruditissimum virum, & mores ejus sequutus & studia, jam pridem, domine, in contubernium adsumsi: tantoque magis diligere cepi, quanto hunc propius inspe-

(32) See above the remark [C], of the article CALDERI-NUS.

(33) Politianus, ubi supra.

scunt (29). Mr de Tillemont is of Muretus's opinion. † Vossius quotes out of St Jerom, says he (30), that Suetonius is as loose and infamous in his narration, as the princes, whose history he writes, were in their lives; wherein he contradicts the praises bestowed upon him by Pliny †: and it may be said of him and Lampridius, that they teach the greatest crimes by relating them. I cannot grant him all the parts of this sentence of condemnation; for I am persuaded that Suetonius might write after such a manner, without contradicting the praises bestowed upon him by Pliny. Pliny says, That the more he knew him, the more he loved him, by reason of his probity, honesty, good conduct, application to study, and learning (31). The particular account Suetonius gives of the Emperors debauchery is no proof that he was a leud man, or that he took delight in describing leud actions, nor in general that there was any thing wanting to his probity and honesty. It shews only that he was a very ingenuous and sincere man, and that he believed an historian ought faithfully to relate all the truths he can find out: and those who are never so little qualified to judge of the character of an author by his way of writing, will be of opinion that Suetonius was only directed by his sincerity and natural ingenuity, and not by a desire of amusing or tickling his passions. Nay, it ought to be presumed, that he designed to punish vice as much as an historian can punish it, and to cast a blot upon the memory of those monstrous men, by transmitting it to future ages, attended with all the execration it deserves, and that he thought such a method might in time prevent the like brutishness. It is certain that he and Lampridius inspire a greater aversion and horror for the princes, whose abominable actions they have described, than the most precise and most grave writers can do. Lastly, I must observe that Mr de Tillemont did not make a right use of his judgment, when he undertook to invalidate the formal testimony of Pliny the younger, by loose and uncertain consequences. Let us stick to the testimony of one of the most honest men of that time. It were in vain to say that he bestowed this encomium upon Suetonius in a letter wherein he begged a favour for him. I know that in such cases it is a common thing to use flattery; but Pliny affirms in the same letter, that he and Suetonius had contracted a strict friendship long before: It was not a lie; for the truth of it appears from some other letters of Pliny. This great friendship and familiarity between Suetonius and Pliny had not lasted long, if Suetonius had not been such a Man as Pliny represents him to be. I add that there is no author extant that reflects in the least upon Suetonius's virtue; for we must not mind what Domitius Calde- rinus, a great romancer (32), says. Read this passage; 'Sinisteriora quædam de Suetonii moribus con- scitatur, Marii, nescio cujus, testimonium citans. Nos enim adulescentis ipsum meminimus audire Do- mitium, cum diceret habere se peculiarem Marii Rustici librum, quem cæteris incognitum secum de Gallia attulisset, qui tamen codex, ne extincto qui- dem illo, nunquam comparuit. Atque ego quidem studio incogniti mihi scriptoris incensus, etiam ad ip- sius Domitii parentis Benaci lacus accolæ accessi, om- nemque ejus librorum suppellectilem scrutatus, Marium certe hunc rusticum inveni nusquam (33). - - - He makes some harsh reflexions upon the morals of Suetonius, and quotes one Marius for his voucher: but who that Marius is I know not. We remember, indeed, in the days of our youth to have heard Domitius say, that he had a certain book of Marius Rusticus unknown to others, which he had brought with him from France: but it never appeared, not even after his death. I for my part had such a curiosity to see this unknown writer, that I was at the pains to go to the parents of Domitius, this permission was not unlimited; he did not always permit such an usage, some persons were only allowed to treat the Empress in that manner, and he told them how far that permission might go. Those who lost their places did not keep within those bounds; which is the reason why the Historian made use of the words injussa ejus, which shew the true cause of their disgrace, and at the same time remove all suspicion of gallantry. Salmastius (43) perfectly unfolds this little mystery. What he says against those, who find love-intrigues in the matter, might have been confirmed by a reason, which he did not think of. Spartianus adds immediately after, that Sabina would have been divorced for her ill humour, if her husband had been a private person. Uxorem etiam ut morosam et asperam dimissurus (ut ipse dicebat) si privatus fuisset (44). He does not say one word of her unfaithfulness, and gallantry (45). From whence I conclude, that the deprived officers were only guilty of a blunt proceeding towards Sabina in her ill humour. Her vexation made her peevish and intolerable; but because the officers of the court knew that the Emperor despised her, and did not much care she should be respected, they scolded at her in their turn, and went so far in it without the Prince's approbation, that they lost his favour. The other particular, mentioned by Moreri, for which he quotes Spartianus, is really to be found in some manner in that author. Sabina uxor non sine fabula veneni dati ab Adriano desuncta est (46), that is, Sabina died, not without a report that she had been poisoned by Hadrian. Nevertheless Moreri is mistaken; for he will have it that the discovery of Sabina's gallantry was the cause of her being poisoned; which would be very false, though we should grant him that some love-intrigues were discovered when Suetonius was put out of favour. There were sixteen years between the depriving of that Secretary, and the death of the Empress (47).

(43) Salmastius, in Spart. Adr. ubi supra.

(44) Spart. ubi supra.

(45) This may serve to confute the fabulous story published by Brantome, against Sabina in the first volume of his Dames Galantes, pag. 218.

(46) Spartianus, in Adr. cap. xxiv, pag. 204.

(47) See Tillamont, ubi supra, pag. 418, & pag. 450.

I shall further examine Moreri's narrative. That disgrace, says he, put Suetonius upon writing for the public; and he composed the lives of the twelve Cæsars. . . . Pliny the younger desired him to put off no longer the publication of that work, and told him he found it so perfect, that the further polishing of it would but spoil

it. There are many faults in those words. IV. It cannot be proved that Suetonius's disgrace inspired him with the desire of writing for the public. V. And therefore it is a great piece of rashness to say in express words, that it moved him to write the History of the twelve Emperors; for since he composed many books, he might have writ when he was out of favour, and it cannot be concluded that he wrote precisely a certain book. VI. No body knows what books Pliny the younger desired him to publish. Why then does Moreri affirm that he desired him to publish the twelve Cæsars? VII. It cannot be said, without helping the letter, that he found them perfect. Which supposes that he declared he had read them; but this supposition does not well agree with these words: 'Pater, me videre titulum tuum; pater audire, describi, legi, vœnire volumina Tranquilli mei' (48). . . . Suffer me to see your title, suffer the books of my friend Tranquillus to be heard and talked of, to be read and sold. It is true he had been saying what Moreri quotes, 'Perfectum opus absolutum' que est; nec jam splendet lima, sed atteritur. . . . The work is perfectly finished; nor will further polishing add to the beauties of it, on the contrary it will rather diminish them. But how do we know but he said so like a friend? VIII. However it be, were it true that Suetonius did not write the lives of the twelve Cæsars till he was turned out of favour, Pliny the younger could not have complained of his slowness in publishing them (49); for doubtless he writ that letter to him under the Empire of Trajan. But Suetonius did not lose his place till the fourth or fifth year of Hadrian's reign. IX. Instead of Sicon Polemon, Moreri should have said Sicon Polenton.

Some of these mistakes of Moreri have been committed by la Mothe le Vayer, in his judgment upon the chief Historians (50). I wonder at it; for he was a much more learned man than Moreri, and had been directed in that work by Messieurs du Puy, and had the assistance of four great libraries, the King's, Thuanus's, their own (51), and that of Cardinal Mazarin. With such helps he should have writ an excellent book, and might even have avoided those four mistakes without them.

(48) Som & ipse in edendo hæsitator, tu mora tamen meam quoque constitutionem tarditatemque vicisti. . . . I myself am tardy in publishing any thing, but you by your delay, have exceeded my slowness. Id. ibid.

(49) The ad, the 3d, the 4th, and the 5th. Moreri had them from him.

(51) La Mothe le Vayer, Præface to his Jugement sur les princip. Historiens.

SULACHA (a) (SIMON) a Nestorian Monk, of the order of St Pacomus, withdrew his obedience to his patriarch, and united himself to the Church of Rome. Those who shook off the yoke as he did, made him their patriarch, and sent him to Rome, where Pope Julius III, confirmed his patriarchate in 1552 (b). Sulacha made his confession of faith at Rome, which was translated into Latin by Masius, with the letter those Nestorians wrote to Julius III, to desire him to confirm the election of Sulacha, and to ask his protection against a family, which had kept the patriarchate a long time (c). This was the subject of their division: several of them could not endure that this dignity should always remain in one family; and that family, which had enjoyed it above two hundred years, would not resign it. Simon Sulacha being returned into the East, established his patriarchal see at Caramit, a town of Mesopotamia, took the title of Patriarch of the Assyrians, and ordained several bishops and archbishops. The Turks put him to death at the solicitation of the Schismatics. They elected for his successor a Monk of St Pacomus, whose name was Hebed-Jesu (d). I have mentioned him under that name, and under that of Abdissi: see those articles. Father Paul (e) insinuates that the Court of Rome, out of policy, made a great noise of that embassy of the Nestorians, to support her reputation in Europe by chimera's. I shall relate in a remark what that Historian says [A].

(a) See the remark [A], in the article HEBED-JESU.

(b) Petrus Strozza, de Dogmate Caldeor. apud Aubert. Miræum, Polit. Eccl. lib. ii, cap. v.

(c) See the Histoire Critique du Levant, par le Sieur de Morisy, ch. viii.

(d) Strozza, apud Miræum, ubi supra.

(e) History of the Council of Trent, book v, at the beginning.

(1) F. Paul, History of the Council of Trent, book v, at the beginning.

[A] I shall relate . . . what that Historian says. We find in his work (1) that the Pope received with great magnificence the Patriarch sent to him by all the Churches between Euphrates and the Indies; that he caused him to be consecrated bishop; that he gave him the pallium with his own hands in a private Confistory; that he sent him back into his country, and had him accompanied by some Monks who understood Syriac; that at Rome, and all over Italy, the only talk was about the vast number of Christians that were in that country, and the great acquisitions the Holy See had made in it; that people discouraged particularly of the great number of Churches at Muzal (2), a town which was said to be the ancient Assur, situate upon the Tigris, not far from Nineveh; that they reckoned the most famous towns under the jurisdiction of that Patriarch, such as Babylon, Tauris, Arbela where Darius was overcome by Alexander, Ecbatana, called by others Seleucia and Nisibis, and several provinces of Assyria and Persia; . . . that all those things were printed and read with great curiosity. There was doubtless more ostentation than truth in the matter; and it was a good piece of policy to make the names of those famous cities sound so high.

(2) The Confession of Faith of that Patriarch mentions 18, whereof 15 were possessed by the Nestorians, and 3 by the Jacobites. See F. Paul, ibid.

SULPICIA,

S U L P I C I A.

SULPICIA, or SULPITIA, a Roman lady, daughter of Sulpicius Paternus, and wife of Fulvius Flaccus, obtained a very great honour, when it was thought proper to seek out a remedy against the leudness observed among the women of Rome. The evil appeared so great that recourse was had to the assistance of Heaven, and to those religious helps which supply the want of human means. The books of the Sibyls were consulted, and upon the report of the consultants it was decreed by the senate that a statue should be consecrated to Venus Verticordia, that is, Converter of hearts [A], that women and maids might be more easily reclaimed from their leudness, and become chaste. It was ordered that a most virtuous woman should consecrate that statue of Venus; and at first a hundred women were chosen from all the rest, and then ten out of that hundred, and all of them unanimously nominated Sulpicia to perform that function: so that this lady was acknowledged to be the most chaste of all (a). I shall inquire

(a) Taken from Valerius Maximus, lib. viii, cap. xv. You will find his words in the remark [A].

[A] It was decreed by the Senate that a statue should be consecrated to Venus Verticordia. . . converter of hearts. This particular is to be found in several authors, but in none with so many circumstances as in Valerius Maximus. Merito, says he (1), uirorum commemorationi Sulpitia, Ser. Paterni filia, Q. Fulvii Flacci uxor, adicitur. Quæ, cum senatus libris Sibyllinis per decem viros inspectis censuisset, ut Veneris Verticordie simulacrum consecraretur, quo facilius uirginum mulierumque mentes à libidine ad pudicitiam converterentur; & ex omnibus matronis centum, ex centum autem decem sorte ductæ, de sanctissima femina iudicium facerent, cunctis castitate prælata est. Pliny says the same in fewer words, only he does not mention the cause of that consecration, nor the epithet of Venus. Pudicissima femina semel, matronarum sententia, iudicata est Sulpicia Paterni filia, uxor Fulvii Flacci: electa ex centum præceptis (2), quæ simulacrum Veneris ex Sibyllinis libris dederat (3). Solinus (4) transcribes Pliny, as he uses to do. Ovid says nothing of Sulpicia, and instead of a statue, he pretends that a temple was built to Venus Verticordia. He does not forget the cause of that new devotion; he says in express words that it was occasioned by the loss of chastity.

(1) Valerius Maximus, lib. viii, cap. xv, num. xii, pag. m. 738.

(2) That is, who had been already chosen. Read præceptis, and not præcipuis as there is in most editions. See Salmafus in Sabinum, pag. 54, and Father Harduin, in Plin. Tom. ii, pag. 56, and 124.

(3) Plin. lib. vii, cap. xxxv, pag. m. 56.

(4) Solin. cap. i, pag. m. 12.

(5) Ovid. Fastr. lib. iv, ver. 157.

Roma pudicitia proavorum tempore lapsa est:
Cumæam, veteres, consuluisse animum.
Templa jubet Veneri fieri: quibus ordine factis,
Inde Venus verfo nomina corde tenet (5).

Of old when Roman chastity was fled,
Our fathers, anxious for the marriage-bed,
At the Cumæan prophetess enquir'd,
To know what offering the gods requir'd.
She bid a temple to be rear'd anon
Unto the Paphian Queen of Love: which done,
Venus did straight acquire another name:
From working changes on the heart it came.

He is to blame for not having paid to Sulpicia the honour she deserved. The glory she acquired then, is so great, that he should not have been silent about it. The other ladies acknowledged that she surpassed them in chastity. Such an acknowledgment is as glorious to her, as it would be for a brave man, if a hundred brave men should confess that he had more courage than they. It is a rare thing, says Martial (6), to see any body that is willing to yield to others in point of wit. But it is still more rare among soldiers to find any that will yield to another in point of courage: nay, compliments are very scarce upon that head; and in general an honest man will seldom acknowledge that he has less honesty than another, and a virtuous woman that she is less chaste than others. Such a civility is as rare among virtuous women, as it is among gallant women to acknowledge that their rivals exceed them in beauty. However, civil words and compliments are far from being looked upon as judicial and solemn acknowledgments; for if the question was to chuse for an honourable function appointed by the magistrates, the most honest woman or the most honest man in a town, none would be willing that others should take advantage of the compliments they might have made them. Every one would revoke them, and enjoy the freedom of his judgment, and would think it a very hard thing publicly to acknowledge, that he is less worthy of being chosen for the appointed function; and therefore Sulpicia's virtue must needs have been very shining, since a hundred Roman ladies voted for her upon such an occasion. But perhaps it ought to be supposed that the Senate ordered that no lady should vote for herself. The circumstances of this fact are not clearly described by authors. Their meaning seems to be that a hundred Roman ladies were first of all chosen by lots, and then that ten of them were likewise chosen in the same manner, and that all of them acknowledged that Sulpicia deserved to consecrate the statue. The management of that affair seems to me intricate; for why did they cast lots twice, if they had a mind that the hundred women of the best reputation were first of all set apart, and then they drew lots, that ten of them should name the woman, who was to consecrate the statue, and it was ordered that none should name herself. Thus Sulpicia by the votes of ten ladies was preferred to a hundred women of the best reputation in the city; and yet none did formally declare that she was less chaste than Sulpicia. It had been a hard thing to require such an acknowledgment in such a conjuncture.

(6) Aurum & opes & rura frequens donabit amicis: Qui velit ingenio cedere rarus erit. Mart. Epig. xvi, lib. viii.

Perhaps it will be said that the senate did not make a right application; for, according to the doctrine of the Heathens, Venus equally preferred over unlawful and lawful love, and she had occasioned the prodigious leudness they intended to put a stop to. This objection is of no weight: the senate knew very well what they did, and for this very reason that Venus had occasioned such a disorder, it was necessary to have recourse to her; for, according to Cato's maxim, those who are the cause of great evils, ought to put an end to them. Τὸν γὰρ αὐτὴν εἶναι καὶ ποιεῖν τὰ μέγιστα κακὰ καὶ πᾶσι. Nam eorundem esse & facere magna mala & comprimere (7). The senate might expect that Venus being appealed by the consecration of that new statue, and acknowledged to be the mistress of hearts, would reclaim the fair sex, either by ceasing to inspire them with love, or by fixing it on lawful objects. The first method is not amiss; for how many people may use the complaint we read in an opera?

Mon cœur auroit encor sa premiere innocence,
S'il n'avoit jamais eu d'amour.

My heart had still been innocent,
Had it not been for love.

The second method is a very good one: the senate might have told Venus; inspire them with love, we are not against it; but let their love be lawful. Reclaim them from their ill courses; bring them back into the right way. They are like rivers that run out of their channels, and overflow the country; let those waters return into their channel; this we beg of you, as you are the goddesses Verticordia, . . . converter of hearts.

I have read in Pausanias, that Harmonia, Cadmus's wife, consecrated three statues to Venus at Thebes; the first to Venus Urania; the second to Venus Pandemos, and the third to Venus Aprostrophia. The first was for spiritual love, the second for bodily love, and the third was designed to prevent extravagant conjunctions, such as incest, &c. Ἐξέλετο δὲ τῇ Ἀπρόστροφῃ τὰς ἐπὶ πρῶτῃ μίαν ἢ Ἀρμονίαν τὴν μὲν Οὐρανίαν ἐπὶ ἐρωτὶ καθαρῷ, καὶ ἀπηνάλαγμένῃ πρὸς σωματικὴν δῆμιον inquire into the date of this fact [B]; it has been too much neglected by authors.

(7) Plutarch. in Cato's minor, pag. 184. D.

ἡμῶν δὲ, ἐν ταῖς μίξαις τρίτῃ δὲ Ἀποστοφίαν, ἵνα ἐκιδύμιας τὴν ἀνδρῶν καὶ ἔργων ἀποστοφίαν τὸ γένος τῶν ἀνδρῶν. Cognomina imposed Harmonia Urania, purum significans, & corporum cupiditate vacantem amorem: Popularis, ob Venerios congressus: jam vero Apostrophiae numen coli instituit (id est Averfaticis) quo ab exlege cupiditate & incestis stupris hominum genus averteret (8). The Romans, you see, might have learned of other nations to honour Venus under the title of Verticordia; for there is no great difference between this title and that of Apostrophia: one implies the notion of a Converter, and the other that of a Diffuader, if I may be allowed to use such a word.

(8) Pausan. lib. ix, cap. xvi, pag. 742.

[B] I shall enquire into the date of this fact.] The ancient authors do continually afford new occasions to complain of their negligence in chronology. Tho' you examine the words of Ovid, Valerius Maximus, Pliny, and Solinus, never so narrowly, you will find nothing in them, whereby you may know at what time the consecration of that statue of Venus was performed. That time may be known from Julius Obsequens, who mentions (9) a certain prodigy, which happened under the consulship of Marcus Acilius and Caius Portius, that is, according to Sigonius's Fasti, in the year of Rome 639. The daughter of a Roman knight was thunder-struck, and it was found that her tongue was gone through that part of her body not proper to be named. The Soothsayers were consulted; their answer was, that the maids and the knights were threatened with infamy (10): which proved true; for three Vestals, who had love-intrigues with some Roman knights, were punished at the same time. It was then that a temple was built to Venus Verticordia (11). Note, that from the year of Rome 639, till Julius Caesar made himself master of the commonwealth, the corruption of manners, and particularly luxury, increased more and more; and therefore the statue consecrated by chaste Sulpicia, did no good. See the margin (12).

(9) Julius Obsequens, in Libro de Prodigis, num. 97, pag. 51.

(10) It is to be observed that this maid was on horseback when she was thunder-struck.

(11) Tres uno tempore virgines Vestales nobilissimae, cum aliquot equitibus Romanis, incesti penas subierunt. Aedes Veneri Verticordiae facta. Id. ib.

(12) The evil grew greater and greater from the time of Caesar, instead of growing less. See what I quote out of Seneca in the remark [H], of the article V A Y E R.

SULPITIUS (JOHN) firnamed Verulanus, because, if I am not mistaken, he was a native of Verulum (a), a town in the Campania di Roma, applied himself to the study of the Belles Lettres with good success. He flourished towards the end of the XVth century. His commentary upon Lucan's Pharsalia was pretty good for that time. He published Vegetius with two other tracts de Re Militari (b). He also published some Latin verses de Moribus, and Praeludia Grammatica. I think he ought not to be distinguished from Sulpitius, who taught in the college of Rome, under the pontificate of Innocent VIII, and who began to restore the use of Music upon the stage [A], so that he may be looked upon as the first author of Opera's. He is also the first who published Vitruvius.

(a) Veroli in Italian.

(b) Aeliani & Frontini. See Geſner's Bibl. fol. 457.

His

[A] Who began to restore the use of Music upon the stage.] I ingenuously confess that I should be ignorant of this particular, had I not read it in a book of the Jesuit Menetrier. I shall set down the whole passage (1). 'Thofe remains of Dramatic Music, which had been preserved in the church, served to restore it two hundred years ago; and Rome, which had in a manner lost it, to bestow upon the recitation and declamation of actors, what the Grecians bestowed upon singing and harmony, brought it upon the stage towards the year 1480, as I learned it from Sulpitius in the Epistle Dedicatory prefixed to his notes upon Vitruvius, which he presented to Cardinal Riari, Great Chamberlain of the Church, and nephew of Pope Sixtus IV. . . . Sulpitius praising the magnificence of that Cardinal, who had built stately palaces in and about Rome, begs of him that he would set up public theatres for Musical representations, of which this Sulpitius calls him the Restorer, having shown at Rome, a few years ago, what had not been in use there for many ages. He tells the Cardinal in that epistle, that Rome expects from him a theatre for such performances, because he has already given such an entertainment to the people upon a moveable theatre, set up in a public place, and at other times in the castle of St Angelo for the Pope's diversion, and in his palace for some Cardinals. Tu enim primus Tragediae quam nos juvenutem excitandi gratia & AGERE & CANTARE primi hoc ævo docuimus, (nam ejusmodi actionem jam multis sæculis Roma non viderat) in medio foro pulpitu ad quinque pedum altitudinem erectum pulcherrimè exornasti. Eandemque postquam in Hadriani mole Divo Innocentio spectante est acta, rursus intra tuos penates tamquam in media Circi cavea toto confesso, umbraculis tecto admissa populo, & pluribus tui ordinis spectatoribus honorificè excepisti. Tu etiam primus picturatae scenæ faciem, quàm Pomponiani (2) comædium agerent nostro sæculo ostendisti: quare à te Theatrum novum tota urbi magnis votis expectat.' Father Menetrier is mistaken, when he says that this Latin passage is taken from the Epistle Dedicatory of Sulpitius's notes upon Vitruvius. Mr du Francaſtel, keeper of the Mazarine Library, has been pleased to inform me of some things relating to the book, wherein that Epistle Dedicatory is to be found, VOL. V.

(1) Menetrier, des Représentations en Musique, pag. 155, 156. That book was printed at Paris, in 1681.

(2) That is the scholars of the academy or college of Pomponianus Letrus.

and thereby I know it is a Vitruvius (3) without any notes upon the text, and without any various readings. It is not paged, and has no signatures. Neither the time nor the place of the impression, nor the Printer's name, are to be found in it. There is no date in the advertisement to the reader, nor in the Epistle Dedicatory. That advertisement contains these words, among other things: 'Jo. Sulpitius Lectori salutem . . . Collatis multis id genus libris & im- primis uno nostri Delii manu factis accurate per- scripto, eum mihi laborem assumpsi ut quantum per plurimas occupationes meas fieri posset, redderem unum imprimendorum archetypum adeo emendatum, ut parvus labor cuivis alteri ejusdem rei studio re- linqueretur. Quod si fidelis ut spero librarius fuerit & cum his impressis scripti calamis conferentur, facile fides nostra & diligentia apparebit . . . Primus hoc in stadio curro & ad certamen via jam liberaliter strata reliquos inter se excito. . . . John Sulpitius to the reader. . . . Having collated several manuscripts of this kind, particularly that which my friend Delius wrote with exactness, I took upon me, as much as the multiplicity of my affairs would allow, to procure a copy for the press so correct, that there should be little trouble left for any other person that might set about the same thing. If the Printer should do justice, as I hope he will, when the manuscripts shall be compared with the printed copies, my diligence and fidelity will soon appear . . . I am the first who start in this course, and excite others to a mutual strife, having paved the way for them in such an ample manner.' The Epistle Dedicatory begins thus: 'Raphaelli Riario Cardinali Sanctæque Ro. Ecclesiæ Camerario, Jo. Sulpitius fœlicitatem. Quidquid curæ, studii, vigiliarum, & operæ in emendando & vulgando Vitruvio posui . . . tuz dedico amplitudini. . . . John Sulpitius to Cardinal Raphael Riari, Great Chamberlain of the Church, wishes happiness. Whatever pains, diligence, and labour, I have bestowed upon the correcting and publishing of Vitruvius . . . I dedicate it all to your Eminence.' Then follows the passage quoted by Father Menetrier. This edition of Vitruvius did not come out in the year 1480; for it was published under the Pontificate of Innocent VIII, who kept his see from the year 1484, till 1492. Here follow some words of the Epistle Dedicatory, whereby it appears that it was

(3) A very small folio.

Y y y

was

(c) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç.,
pag. 1000, calls
him Brohe.

His book de Moribus was translated into French verse by Peter Brocé (c) a native of Tournon on the Rhone. La Croix du Maine (d), from whom I learn this, places the printing of that translation in the year 1555, by Macé Bonhomme at Lyons, and he calls the author of the original, John Sulpitius of S. Alban, named Verulanus.

(4) I am beholden for all these passages to Mr du Francastel, keeper of the Mazarine library.

was written towards the last years of that Pontificate. 'Innocentius imposito bellis fine, Prætorio suburbano peracto, agilitatis certaminibus & equitum concursionibus, dotalibusque & sumptuariis legibus revocatis. . . . Tum floræ campus, tum Circus Flaminii lateribus aptissime sternitur . . . de Gymnasio nostro evertendo & magnifice construendo (quod utinam præoccupasses: ibi enim cotidiana omnium disciplinarum eduntur spectacula) prudentissimi Reformatores jam iniere consilium (4). . . . Pope Innocent having put an end to the war, finished his court by house, promoted games and tournaments, and repealed the dotal and sumptuary laws . . . Then the Campus Floræ, and the Circus Flaminii, were neatly paved with bricks. . . . Immediately after that, the wise Reformers resolved upon pulling down our academy, and building it up a-new in a magnificent manner (which I wish you had thought of before, because there all manner of sports and exercises are daily exhibited).'

From what has been said, I conclude that Father Menestrier does not well describe this work of Sulpitius; for he says they are notes upon Vitruvius, published about the year 1480.

Note, that this edition of Vitruvius is little known. The reader will be convinced of it by this extract of a letter, which Mr du Francastel has done me the honour to write to me. I infer it here the more willingly, because I am sure that those, who love the history of books, will find it very curious. 'To be better informed of the matter, I have read all the Prefaces, the Epistles Dedicatory, and other Prolegomena, prefixed to the Vitruvius of the Mazarine Library, that have been printed with and without commentaries, in Latin, Italian, and French. It is a surprising thing that none of them mentions this

Jo. Sulpitius, nor his edition, which must needs be the first. Nay, most Commentators and Editors pretend to be the first who have gone about it. Mr Perrault, who, in the Preface to his French translation of Vitruvius, mentions the names of those who have published, translated, or commented upon that author, says nothing of Sulpitius. I have seen the editions of Jocundus, Philander, Daniel Barbarus, Celsariano, and Caporali, besides that of Mr Perrault, which are in our library. I have found out another thing concerning one Hiero. Advocatus Ambrosii J. Citi. F. It is in a letter from Joannes Britannicus Brixianus, to that Advocatus, wherein he speaks to him thus: 'Fecisti tuâ industriâ, studio, & labore, ut Vitruvius de architectura, qui jam tot sæculis in lucem caput suum proferre non audebat, qui ex omni parte mancus, lacerus, mutilum se sentiebat, nunc politus, purus, integer huc & illuc gestiat meare, omnibus carus occurrat, omnibus gratus excipiat. . . . It is owing to your pains and industry, that Vitruvius, an Architect, who was so maimed and imperfect in every part, that, for many ages, he could not show his head, does now come forth fresh, uncorrupted, and entire; and is every where received with the greatest fondness and approbation. That letter is printed at Venice, in 1493. Having read the Vitruvius's, without finding any thing in them, whereby one may know who was this Jo. Sulpitius, I thought that if I should read all the prefaces, &c. of Verulanus's works, that are in our library, I might discover something in them, supposing he had made the notes in question; but it was to no purpose, for that author makes no mention of them in seven or eight books which I have seen (5).'

(5) A Letter of Mr du Francastel, written from Paris, the 11th of December 1699.

(a) Plutarch. in Crasso, pag. m. 556.

SURENA, General of the Parthians in the war against the Romans, commanded by Crassus in the year of Rome 701 (a), was for wealth, family, and authority, the second man in the kingdom, but for courage and prowess he was the first; neither was any one so large sized, or so well shaped. Whenever he travelled he had a thousand camels to carry his baggage, two hundred chariots full of concubines, a thousand compleatly armed men for his life-guards, and a great many more lightarmed, so that there were at least ten thousand of his servants and retinue. And the honour had long belonged to his family, that at the king's coronation he put the crown upon his head; and when King Orodes had been exiled, he brought him in: it was he that took the great city of Seleucia, was the first man that scaled the walls, and with his own hand beat off the defendants; and though at that time he was not above thirty years old, he was counted wise and discreet: wherein he had much the advantage of Crassus, who was easy to be imposed upon, first through his overweening confidence, and afterwards because he was dispirited and terrified by his calamities. Many stratagems were used against the Romans, and besides, the Parthians fought with great vigour. Surena (b) was the tallest and comeliest man in the army. And the sweetness of his looks, and effeminacy of his habit, could not promise so much manhood, as he really was master of; for his face was painted [A], and his hair parted, after the fashion of the Medes; whereas the other Parthians looked more terrible, with their hair shaggy, after the Scythian mode. The success of the battle was glorious to him;

(b) Id. ibid., pag. 557.

[A] The sweetness of his looks, and effeminacy of his habit, could not promise so much manhood, as he really was master of; for his face was painted.] Generally speaking, those men, who pretend to be handsome, and who have recourse to art to set off the lustre of their complexion, and who often consult their glass, that the symmetry of their hair and curls may often charm women, are not fit for war. They are meer beaux and sparks; the assemblies of ladies, feasts, and balls, are the places where they signalize themselves: the fatigue of war does not agree with them; it requires men who are not afraid of being sun-burnt: bravery does rather inspire a desire of frightening the enemy with a martial look, than of pleasing women with a beautiful air. But here is an exception to that general rule: Surena shews himself a valiant man in battle, he performs all the duties of a General, with all imaginable vigour and application; and yet he paints, and is very careful of his hair; which puts me in mind of a common topic very contrary to Cæsar's practice. It is a common maxim in war, that soldiers ought not to be permitted to enjoy the sweets of a delicious life, that it is the way to enervate them and make them lazy; and, among other instances, the fault of Hannibal, after the battle of Cannæ, is frequently alledged. He quartered his army in several places, where the soldiers used themselves to a voluptuous life, and wine, baths, good cheer and women, destroyed that martial vigour, which had made them so formidable. The delights of Capua were to him what the battle of Cannæ had been to the Romans (1). 'In hyberna Capuam concessit: ibi partem majorem hyemis exercitum in testis habuit, adversus omnia humana mala sæpe ac diu durantem, bonis inexpertum atque insuetum. itaque quos nulla mali vicerat vis, perdidere nimia bona ac voluptates immodice: & eo impenitus, quo avidius ex infolentia in eas se immerferant. somnus enim & vinum, & epulæ, him; but he cast a blot upon his glory by his perfidiousness, in demanding an interview with Crassus to conclude a treaty of peace (c). He was very civil to that Roman General, (c) Id. ibid. pag. 562, 563. he gave him his word, and assured him there was an agreement concluded between the Parthians,

(1) Titus Livius, ubi infra, pag. 376. Florus, lib. ii, cap. vi.

(1) Titus Livius, lib. xlii, pag. m. 362. See also pag. 377, where Marcellus encourages his soldiers, representing to them how the delights of Capua had enervated the soldiers of Hannibal.

* & epulæ, & scorta balneaque, & otium consuetudine * indies blandius, ita enervaverunt corpora animosque,
* ut magis deinde præteritæ eos victoriæ quàm præ-
* sentes tutarentur vires: majusque id peccatum ducis
* apud peritos artium militarium haberetur, quàm
* quod non ex Cannensi acie protinus ad urbem Ro-
* mam duxisset, illa enim cunctatio distulisse modò
* victoriam videri potuit: hic error vires ademisse ad
* vincendum. Itaque hercule, velut si cum alio exer-
* citu à Capua exiret, nihil usquam pristinæ disciplinæ
* tenuit. nam & redierunt plerique scortis impliciti:
* & ubi primum sub pellibus haberi cœpti sunt, via-
* que & alius militaris labor exceperit, tyronum modo
* corporibus animisque deficiebant: & deinde per
* omne æstivorum tempus magna pars sine commea-
* tibus ab signis dilabebantur: neque aliæ latebræ quam
* Capua defertoribus erant (2). - - - Hannibal with-
* drew to Capua, where he took his winter-quarters.
* There he lodged his soldiers in houses, for the greatest
* part of winter; those soldiers who had long been en*ured to all manner of hardships, and were unacquainted * with ease and pleasure. But those men whom no hard* ships, no misery, could tame and subdue, were spoiled
* and undone by too much wealth, and immoderate plea* sures: and so much the rather, because, not having
* tasted pleasures before, they abandoned themselves
* wholly to them, and plunged in voluptuousness and de*bauchery. For sleeping on soft beds, wine and feasting, worshipping and bathing, idleness and ease, which by * habit grew daily more pleasant and delightful, enervated their bodies and minds to such a degree, that
* from thence forward the reputation of their former vi*ctories defended them more than their present strength:
* and men skilled in military affairs have judged Han*nibal their General more blameable for this action,
* than for not leading his army directly forward to * Rome, after he had won the battle at Cannæ. For * that they seemed only to defer the final victory for a * time, whereas this error seemed to disable him from * ever obtaining it. Thus he departed from Capua, as * if he had led some other army; so little did they retain
* of their ancient discipline: for they not only returned * from that city, most of them entangled and ensnared in
* the love of barlots, but so soon as they came again to * lie abroad on the bare earth, under tents and pavilions
* covered with beastly hides, to march long journeys, and
* to resume their military hardships, their bodies became
* as tired, and their hearts as faint, as if they had * been raw soldiers, newly come into the field: and all * the time of their summer abode in the camp, many of * them without licence or passport straggled away and
* deserted their colours; while these deserters had no * other haunt, but Capua. The maxim grounded up*on such examples was neglected by Julius Cæsar; and * he had no occasion to repent that he had not follow*ed it. He suffered his soldiers to plunge themselves
* into all manner of debauchery after a great victory,
* and used to say that they could fight stoutly, even
* when they were perfumed. *Nemquam post magnam
* pugnam atque victoriam, remisso officiorum munere, li-
* centiam omnem passim lascivendi permittebat: jaculare
* solitus, milites suos etiam unguentatos bene pugnare
* posse (3).*

(3) *Sueton. in Cæsar, cap.
lxxvii.*

SOME examples of voluptuous men, and yet very laborious.

(4) Remark
[d].

(5) *Vell. Pater-culus, lib. ii, cap.
lxxviii.*

I think our Surena was one of those men, of whom I have given two examples in the article of Henry IV (4). They give up themselves to pleasures, and entirely abstain from them, according to the severest degree, when there is nothing to do; and extremely vigilant and laborious, when there is a necessity for it. If we believe Velleius Paterculus, Mæcenas laboured very hard, when it was necessary; but when there was no pressing business, he gave up himself to idleness, and lived as deliciously as the most effeminate man can do. C. Mæcenat, vir ubi res vigilantiam exigeret, sane exomnis, providens atque agendi sciens: simul vero aliquid ex negotio remitti posset, otio ac molliori pene ultra feminam fluens (5). What the fame Historian says of Lucius Piso, though it falls short of that, may yet serve for an example of the character I here describe. 'De quo viro hoc omni-

* bus sentiendam ac prædicandum est, esse mores ejus
* vigore ac lenitate mixtissimos, & vix quemquam re-
* periri posse, qui aut otium validius diligit, aut faci-
* lius sufficiat negotio, & magis, quæ agenda sunt,
* curet sine ulla ostentatione agendi (6). - - - Concern* ing whom every one ought to think and say, that in his
* manners there is a perfect mixture of vigour and soft* ness, and that it is scarce possible to find any man who * is either fonder of ease, or more capable of business,
* and assiduous without ostentation in doing what is ne* cessary to be done.' He says much the same thing of Sentius Saturninus. 'Virum multiplicem in virtutibus, navum, agilem, providum, militariumque officiorum patientem ac peritum pariter, sed eundem, ubi negotia fecissent locum otio, liberaliter lauteque eo abutentem; ita tamen, ut eum splendidum ac hilarem potius, quam luxuriosum aut desidem diceret (7). - - - A man endowed with many virtues, laborious, active, provident, who equally well understood civil and discharged military offices. Nevertheless as often as he had any respite from business, he mispent it, yet in such a manner, that you would say he was rather magnificent and gay, than luxurious and indolent.'

(6) *Id. ibid. cap.
xxviii.*

(7) *Id. ibid. cap.
xxviii.*

Tacitus mentions a General (8) of the same temper. It was he who contributed most to raise Vespasian to the throne. He was too voluptuous when he had nothing to do, and very active in time of business.

* Luxuria, industria, comitate, arrogantia, malis bo-
* nisque artibus mixtus: nimis voluptates cum vaca-
* ret: quotiens expedierat magnæ virtutes (9). - - - (9) *Tacit. Hist.
lib. i, cap. x.*
* A man in whom there was a mixture of good and bad
* qualities, luxury, diligence, arrogance, and courtesy.
* He was too voluptuous, &c.' See also what Tacitus says of one Crispus Sallustius in the 30th chapter of the third book of his Annals. Every body knows that Demetrius was a dissolute man to the highest degree; and yet in time of war that Prince gave over his pleasures, and applied himself entirely to his great enterprizes. Let us see how Plutarch relates the matter. He says (10) that Antigonus being incapable of the fatigues of the war, by reason of his great age and the bulk of his body, committed the management of his greatest affairs to the Prince, his son, whose conduct was admirably dextrous in military matters; and the old King was induced to bear with those excessive liberties, wherein he drowned himself in the time of peace, because he observed him to be the most temperate and abstemious person in the world, in the time of war and action. . . .
As for Demetrius, if he devoted himself to his pleasures and luxury, he abandoned himself entirely to them; and if the trumpet sounded to horse, he was no less assiduous in the fatigues of war; he was, beyond all doubt, a very great Captain, and most notably dextrous, not only in his conduct, but in forming his levies, and raising an army, and in making all the necessary preparations of stores and magazines, the very muscles and nerves of war, which he ever took care to provide in great abundant (11). I shall add an observation of the same author, attended with a fact relating to the matter I treat of. 'Artaxerxes plainly proved that cowardice, & effeminacy are the effects of a base vile nature,
& guided by erroneous notions, and not of niceness & superfluous excesses, as most men suppose. For notwithstanding his jewels of gold, his robe of state, & the rest of his costly attire, worth no less than twelve thousand talents, with which he was constantly clad, his labours and toils were no less than those of the meanest persons in his army. For he marched himself the first on foot, having his quiver slung over his shoulder, and his shield on his arm; he led them through craggy mountains & rugged ways; inasmuch that the soldiers & observing his courage and unwearied strength, took wing, and went the more swiftly along with him, whose daily march was above two hundred furlongs (12). I shall here apply an observation that was made upon the Athenians. An author who had described their luxury and softness, adds, and yet they won the battle of Marathon. Τοῖς τοῖς δὲ οἷς τὴν ἐν Μαραθῶνι μάχην ἐνίκησαν. Εἰ ἐν τῷ μὲν ἐσθρῶ, τὰ μὲν ἀπὸ πρὸς Μαραθῶνι νικητὲς διεσφύραν (13).
One

(9) *Tacit. Hist.
lib. i, cap. x.*

(10) Plut. in Demetrius.

(11) Zozimus speaks of Theodorus in the like strain.

(12) Plut. in Artaxerxes.

(13) *Elian. Var.
Hist. lib. iv,
cap. xxi.*

Parthians and the Romans, and that the only thing that remained to be done was to advance as far as the river to write it down. Crassus had a mind to send for a horse, but Surena told him that it was needless, since King Orodes gave him one. Crassus got on

One would think that when the Antients suppose that Bacchus did wonders on the day of the battle with the giants, their design is to give us to understand that those who seem only fit for dancing and amorous sports, will nevertheless shew their bravery in a battle.

Tu, cum parentis regna per arduum
Cohors Gigantum scanderet impia,
Rhetum retorfiti leonis
Unguib, horribilique mala:
Quamquam choreis aptior, & jocus,
Ludoque dictus, non sat idoneus
Pugnæ ferebaris: fed idem
Pacis eras, mediisque belli (14).

(14) Horat. Od.
xix, lib. ii.

When impious giants climb'd on high,
And dar'd to storm thy father's sky,
Thy single hand secur'd his crown:
You with a lion's dreadful jaws,
And frightful nails retriev'd the cause,
Bold Rhetus quell'd and sav'd the falling throne.
Too much more us'd to soft delight,
Unfit, unable for a fight
You once were thought, and doom'd to ease,
Yet when your heat and virtue rose,
What fury seiz'd your haughty foes?
How equally inclin'd to wars and peace?

I will not reckon the great Scipio among the voluptuous men who minded important affairs. I shall only say, that his great cares were attended with innocent recreations. The rigid and austere Cato did not approve of it; but he was too severe in his judgment about the difference that is between an effeminate life and gaiety. However it be, he openly complained of Scipio's behaviour, who, during the preparations for the expedition of Carthage, made merry in Sicily. Cato was to be his Quæstor; but he left him as soon as he perceived that his remonstrances were not acceptable to him. He returned from Sicily, and, together with Fabius, made a huge noise in the open senate against Scipio's lavishing of unspeakable sums, and his childish loitering away his time in wrestling-matches and comedies, as if he were not to make war, but holiday; so that he caused some of the tribunes of the people to be sent, by commission from the senate, to enquire into the truth of these allegations upon the spot, and, in case they found them true, to bring him back to Rome. But, on the contrary, Scipio shewed them the evident and certain promise of victory, in the prodigious provision he had made of all things necessary for the war; and that he only lived pleasantly with his friends, when there was nothing else to do; shewing also that he was not, by his liberality to his soldiers, the more negligent in things of consequence and moment (15).

(15) Plut. in Catone majore, pag. 338. See also Livy, lib.
xxix, pag. m.
532.

(16) Valer. Maximus, lib. iii,
cap. vi, num. 1,
pag. m. 298,
299.

Maximus mentions this pretended remissness of Scipio, and says, among other things, that great souls launch forth with greater impetuosity when they have been at rest. Let us give the passage entire. 'P. Scipio, cum in Sicilia augendo, trajiciendoque in Africam exercitu opportunum quærendo gradum, Carthaginis ruinam animo voveret; inter consilia ac molitiones hujus tante rei operam gymnasio dedit, pallioque & crepidis usus est. Nec hac re segiores Pœnicis exercitibus manus intulit: sed nescio an ideo alacriores, quia vegeta & strenua ingenia, quo plus recessus sumunt, hoc vehementiores impetus edunt. Creditur etiam favorem eum sociorum uberiorem se adepturum existimasse, si victum eorum & solennes exercitationes comprobasset: Ad quas tum veniebat, cum multum ac diu fatigasset humeros, & cetera membra militari agitatione firmitatem suam probare coegisset, confitebaturque in his labor ejus, in illis remissio laboris (16). . . . Publius Scipio, while he was in Sicily, consulting how to augment his troops and transport them into Africa, where he meditated nothing less than the ruin of Carthage, did nevertheless, amidst his designs and preparations for this great work, frequent the Academy, and make use of the gown and slippers. Nor did the Carthaginians find him at all more remiss upon this account, but rather brisker, because strong and resolute minds launch forth with so much the greater impetuosity as they have had a long ease and respite. I likewise fancy that he expected to ingratiate himself the more with the Allies, by seeming to approve of their way of living and their solemn exercises. But he did not come to these, before he had once heartily fatigued his shoulders, and tried the strength of his other members by military work. In these things consisted his labour, and in those his rest.'

It appears from the end of this passage that there was no effeminacy in Scipio's conduct, and that he only mixed some recreation with his most important cares and labours. All great men are not capable of such a variety; some despise pleasures, and love an uninterrupted gravity; others are not equal to this sort of variation, the chequering of great designs with dancing and drunkenness. Flaminius, one of the most illustrious persons of antient Rome, could not apprehend how a man can be capable of such a variety. Here follows what Plutarch says of him. 'At another time Dinocrates the Messenian, having been fuddled at a merry meeting in Rome, danced there in a woman's habit, and the next day addressed to Titus for assistance in his design to get Messina out of the Achæan hands. I shall (says he) consider of it, but cannot but wonder that you who are enterprising designs of that moment, can find leisure to revel and sing in your cups (17).'

Montagne makes very fine observations upon the capacity of the soul, whereby a man may turn his mind sometimes one way and sometimes another, and is able to do things that seem inconsistent. (17) Plut. in Q. Flamino, pag. 378.

(18) I am well pleased to see a General of an army at the foot of a breach he designs to attack, talking freely at dinner-time with his friends; and Brutus, against whom and against the Roman liberty, heaven and earth were combined, stealing some hours in the night, as he goes the rounds, to read Polybius. Little souls buried under the weight of affairs, know not how to extricate themselves; they know not how to lay them aside, and re-assume them. (18) Montagne, Essays, book. iii, in the last chapter, pag. m. 595.

. . . . ô fortes pejoraque passi,
Mecum sæpe viri, nunc vino pellite curas,
Cras ingens iterabimus æquor (19).

(19) Horat. Od.
vii, ver. 30,
lib. i.

. . . . Cheer, rouse your force,
For we have often suffer'd worse.
Drink briskly round, dispel all cloudy sorrow,
Drink round, we'll plow the deep to-morrow.

CREECH.

He alledges many examples upon that subject.

It were to be wished that the general rule in question were not liable to so many exceptions; for a young man well qualified for the war, who is given to drinking, gaming, and women, has something to answer to those who endeavour to reclaim him by representing to him the ill consequences of such a course. You will never be able to command an army, say they to him; such an employment is inconsistent with an unfurmoutable inclination for a voluptuous life. Why so? will he say: why should not I be in time like so many others, who have been debauched and laborious by turns, according to the posture of affairs? Surena painted, and was attended by many concubines. Was he a worse General for it? How many such examples does antient and modern History afford? Montgomery, who performed so many noble exploits in the XVth century, was extremely careless in his office, for he loved an easy life and gaming; but when he was once got into the saddle, he was the most valiant and careful captain that ever was seen (20). Many Generals avoid being surprized, and perform actions that require an extreme diligence, though they love drinking, and make long meals; and their enemies are often mistaken in the consequences they draw from it. Granvelle, Bishop of Arras, made

(20) Brantome
in his Encomium upon the Prince of Condé, Tom.
iii, of his Memoirs, pag. m.
234.

on horseback, and soon after they cut off his head. This perfidiousness was attended with insults and derision [B]: but Surena did not long enjoy the pleasure of the victory; for the King of the Parthians grew jealous of him, and caused him to be put to death (d).

(d) Plut. in Crasso, p. 565.

made a very imprudent answer, as it appeared by the event. It (21) was represented to the Emperor Charles V, that Duke Maurice was not to be trusted; but Granvelle answered that there was no occasion to suspect those great drinkers, because their heads being always clouded with thick vapours, were not clear enough to carry on a nice intrigue (22). Maurice made it appear that he was more cunning than the Italians and Spaniards.

(21) The Duke of Alba represented it. See Mémoires, ubi infra.

(22) Melvil, Mémoires, p. 40.

A voluptuous young man, who considers the examples I have mentioned, grows more incorrigible, and exposes himself to great inconveniences. The best way is to follow the rule, without trusting to expectations.

[B] This perfidiousness was attended with insults and derision. Surena sent the head and the hand of Crassus to the King his master; but himself by his messengers scattered a report, That he was bringing Crassus alive to Seleucia, and made a ridiculous procession, which, by way of scorn, he called a triumph. For one Caius Patianus, who of all the prisoners was most like to Crassus, being put into the habit of a woman like the Barbarians, and instructed to take the title of Crassus, and Emperor, from those who spoke to him, was brought fitting upon his horse, preceded by a parcel of trumpeters and lictors upon their camels; the girdles and purples of the Romans were hung at the end of the bundles of rods, and the heads of the slain, fresh bleeding, at the end of the axes; after them followed the Seleucian minstrels, making abundance of scurrilous and abusive reflexions upon the effeminacy and cowardliness of Crassus, with a musical cadence: and this show was seen by every body. But Surena calling together the Senate of Seleucia, shewed to them a wanton book of Aristides, called his Milesia; neither was this a forgery, for it was found amongst the spoils of Rustius, and furnished Surena with sufficient matter of derision upon the profligate manners of the Romans, who were not able even in time of war to forbear such wanton writings and practices. But the Senate of Seleucia had reason to commend the wisdom of Æsop, who tells us that every man carries a wallet across his shoulder, putting into the pouch before the faults of others, and into the pouch behind his own, when they saw their General Surena had put the loose book of Aristides into the pouch before, and into that behind a long train of Parthian luxury, which he dragged after him in such a number of chariots filled with concubines, that he seemed to lead, as it were, an army of vipers, whose furious front appeared terrible, where nothing was seen but lances, javelins, bows, and steeds; but all ended in a train of wenchings, instruments of music, dancing, singing, and the whole night consumed with harlots in riotous banquets (23).

(23) Plut. in
Crasso, p. 564.

This conduct of Surena plainly shews that the Parthians deserved to be called Barbarians, as they were by the Greeks and Romans; for none but brutish people, who are incapable of civility, will treat an enemy in such a manner, much less an enemy overcome by a shameful treachery. Take notice that Plutarch blames that Rustius, who brought the lewd books of Aristides to the army. People are not now so rigid; and if Boccaccio's novels, or La Fontaine's tales were found in the baggage of an officer, no notice would be taken of it. I do not think the most biting and the most burlesque news-writers would reflect upon him for it. Much less would they censure those, who should have a looking-glass among their things. But in Juvenal's time they were more severe in that respect: an Emperor was laughed at for having a looking-glass in the camp (24). It is true that glass did belong to a man who painted, and by reason of that circumstance, it afforded a better occasion for raileries and insults. I am sure the reader will excuse me for mentioning this particular, since it concerns a Roman like Surena in that part of effeminacy, who nevertheless showed a great courage (25); so that this is a new example to be added to those, which I have mentioned (26). Juvenal does very much exclaim against Otho's inequality.

(24) See, above, citation (41), of the article APULEIUS.

(25) See his Life in Suetonius, and Tacitus, Hist. lib. ii.

(26) In the foregoing remark.

Nimirum summi ducis est occidere Galbam,
Et curare cutem summi constantia civis:
Bebriaci campo spoliū affectare Palati,
Et pressum in faciem digitis extendere panem.
Quod nec in Assyrio pharetrata Semiramis orbe, Mœsta nec Ætiaca fecit Cleopatra carina (27).

(27) Juven. Sat. II, ver. 104.

*Galba to kill he thought a General's part,
But as a courtier us'd the nicest art,
To keep his skin from tan: before the fight,
Would paint and set his soil'd complexion right:
A softness which Semiramis ne'er knew,
When once she had the field and foe in view,
Nor Egypt's Queen, when she from Ægium flew.*

T A T E.

The courage Otho expressed, when he killed himself, appeared the more admirable, because he took care to paint and trick up himself like a woman. Read these words of Suetonius. 'Munditium vero pene muliebrium: vulso corpore: galericulo capiti propter raritatem capillorum adaptato & annexo, ut nemo dignosceret. Quin & faciem quotidie rasitare, ac pane madido linere consuetum: idque instituisse à prima lanugine, ne barbatus umquam esset. Sacra etiam Idis sepe in lintea religioaque veste prophanam celebrasse. Per quæ factum putem ut mors ejus minime congruens vitæ, majori miraculo fuerit' (28). --- He imitated a female nicety in his dress. His body was plucked quite smooth; and, on account of his baldness, he had a perriwig, so well fitted to his head, and clapt on in such a manner, as not to be distinguished from his own hair. He shaved his face very close every day, and then laid moist bread upon it. This he began to do, as soon as he had any down upon his cheeks, to prevent his ever having a beard. He was frequently wont to celebrate the holy rites of Isis in public, having on a religious garment made of linen. For these reasons it came to pass, in my opinion, that his death being not at all suitable to his life, was reckoned so much the more strange and wonderful.

(28) Sueton. in Othone, cap. ult. pag. m. 642.

SURGIER (FRANCIS) a Friar in the monastery of Sainte Croix at Paris, was punished in the year 1595, for having preached in a seditious manner. He had stuffed one of his sermons with invectives, calling Queen Elizabeth frequently by the name of Jezabel, and upbraided with the name of Sectaries the Allies of that Queen [A]. The parliament of Paris, having caused him to be put in prison, condemned him to retract upon

[A] He upbraided with the name of Sectaries the Allies of Queen Elizabeth. It is impossible to describe sufficiently the ravings of the Roman Catholic bigots, who took upon them to decry Henry IV and his successor, for protecting the Protestants in Holland and Germany against the house of Austria. The books that were published against the alliance of France with the Protestant States are without number, and it is certain there was a great deal of oddness in the conduct of that crown; for while it laboured to extirpate the Huguenots in its own dominions, it supported the Protestants elsewhere, and enabled them not only to keep their own ground, but likewise to aggrandize themselves. I have, in another place (1), taken notice of this contradiction, and I shall now confirm what I said there by a remarkable passage. I find it at the end of an observation concerning the letters which Pope Pius V writ into France, to condemn the treaties

VOL. V.

(1) See the remarks [P] and [R], of the article FRANCIS I.

of

Z z z

upon his knees and bare-headed these rash and inconsiderate words, and to ask pardon of God, of the king, and of justice. They forbade him to preach till such time as the court had ordered otherwise, and prohibited him upon pain of death to spread about discourses that were injurious to the princes in alliance with his most Christian Majesty, or to say anything that tended to sedition. This was done privately in the court of criminal causes, and they shewed such indulgence to him, out of regard to his profession, and to the memory of his father, who had taught the institutes at Paris, and whose scholars several members of that court had been (a).

(a) Taken from Thuanus, book
cxiv, pag. m.
702, ad ann.
1595.

(2) I believe that there is an error of the prefs here, and that we ought to read Impiorum, instead of Imperiorum.

of peace between the Roman Catholics and Heretics. Sed precipue tangunt Gallorum fœdera cum Exteris Patrocinium Genev. Unde Auctor lib. Gesta Imperiorum (2) per Francos, p. 8. adeo excañdefcit, & se comprehendere posse negat, quomodo cum Christi-anismi appellatione conveniat Genevæ protectio & Patrocinium susceptum jam ab a. millefimo quingentesimo septuagesimo nono, & semper continuatum ad hæc usque tempora. Quod monstrum, quod portentum, quæ Chimeræ? Quæ conventio lucis ad tenebras? quæ communicatio Christi cum Belial; quid arcæ Dei cum Dagon, quid Sioni cum Babilone? quid janititum cum impietate, quid Christo cum Beelzebub, quid Christi-anismo cum Genevæ? Tum Fœdus Gallorum Bel-gicum, de quo Idem pag. 10. Putabam fingi vix quidem posse Christianissimi nomine indignius, nec quidemquam Christianismo exitiarius, quam Genevæ tutelam & patrocinium, uti supra ostensum est: verum-tamen postea consideranti Fœdus Hollandicum, quod jam pridem Gallia studiosius excoluit, tanto illud perniciosius esse religioni visum est, quanto plures in Statibus illi Hollandici inesse Genevæ censit sentitque incredibili suo malo Ecclesia. De fœdere Gallo-Suevico, pag. 16. Ab Aquilone pandetur omne malum. Reviviscunt in uno Gothorum & Alarici & Genferici, (quem nunc Suecivæ vocant) Alarici & Genferici, qui rursus Imperium & Ecclesiam Dei miserrimè diripiunt, deformant, lacerant; non illi quidem à Ruffino & Eudoxia exorti, qui ambo postea hujus evocationis penas ultimi Numinis iustissimas dederunt; sed (qui credat?) à Gallia Christianissima animati facio fodere cum mortalium furiosissimo, consilio, pecunia, armis adjuți (3). But the leagues which the French have entered into with foreign Princes chiefly relate to the protection of Geneva. Upon which the author of a book called Gesta Imper-

(3) Hoornbeeck, Disput. ad Bullam Innocentii
X, pag. 265.

(a) See citation (94) of the article ERASMUS.

(b) See the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliothéque, pag. 362.

(1) La Croix du Maine, Bibl.
Franç. p. 171.

(2) Hubert Suffannæus, in Ludorum Libris,
fol. 81, Edet.
Parif. 1538.

* Suff. annos 24
natus, cum hæc scriberet.

S U S S A N N E A U (a) (H U B E R T) was born at Soissons in the year 1514 [A]. He distinguished himself by his Latin verses, and published some Grammatical tracts (b), that met with a good reception. He taught Philological learning at Turin, before he had a beard (c). He taught it also at Paris. He styles himself Doctor of Law and Physic.

[A] Was born at Soissons in the year 1514.] La Croix du Maine, who says he was born there (1), was better informed of the place than of the time of his birth. He pretends that he flourished in the year 1520; which is not true; for Sufanneau says he was only twenty-four years of age, in a book published by him in 1538. He speaks thus in his Poem upon the siege of Perone (2).

*Taurinum nuper studiis ignobilis oci
Furisque & legum florebat: ubi impiger artes
Ingenuas docui, Musarum gratus alumnis,
Tum cum nulla genas vestiret barba decoras:
Quæ nunc in floræ puberæ sedes hispida mento,
Ad quintum quinquam lustrum, mihi deficit annus.

It appears from those verses that he taught the Belles Lettres at Turin. He was sent thither when the French had made themselves masters of Piedmont in the year 1536. He made no long stay in that country: it appears from the collection of the Latin

(a) In Latin Sordivius.

riour per Francos falls into a violent passion, and says that he cannot understand, how the protection of Geneva, undertaken from the year 1579, and continued down without interruption to the present times, is consistent with the title of Most Christian. What a monstrous thing, what an absurdity, and what a chimera is this? For what agreement can there be between light and darkness? What communication can CHRIST have with Belial; the ark of GOD with Dagon, or Sion with Babylon? What has holiness to do with impiety, CHRIST with Beelzebub, or the most Christian Kings with Geneva? Next as to the league between the French and Dutch the same author says. I imagined that nothing could be conceived more unworthy of the title Most Christian, nor any thing more fatal to Christianity, than the protection of Geneva, as I have shewed above: but afterwards when I considered the league with the Dutch, which France has long cultivated with the utmost care, I took that to be so much the more destructive to religion, as the Church, to her incredible sorrow, sees many Geneva's arise out of the States of Holland. Concerning the league between the French and Swedes, he adds. All manner of evils shall come from the North. For in one King of the Goths and Vandals (now called King of Sweden) the Alarics and Genferics revive, and a second time miserably waste, disfigure, and tear to pieces the Kingdom and Church of GOD. Nor are these stirred up by Rufinus and Eudoxias, who both suffered the punishment of their crime by the just vengeance of the Deity: but (who would believe it?) they are set on by the most Christian country of France, and assisted with advice, arms, and money, a league being struck up with the most furious man alive.

Poems, which he published in 1538, that he had already begun again his public lectures upon the Æneid at Paris. This advertisement is to be found in the twenty-second leaf.

Fixit ab Italia Luteciam reversus.

Venit ab Italia Gallorum redditus oris
Hubertus, sacri maxima cura chori.
Qui cras doctiloqui repetet compendia vatis, Unde tibi Aeneas Aeneasque canit.

Hubertus who is dear to the Muses is returned from Italy to France, and to-morrow resumes his lectures on the Æneid.

He observes, that in order to make himself more capable of explaining Virgil, he had been at Rome to examine the antient monuments of that place, and had sucked in the air of Mantua (3).

(3) Mox diversum
laute sacra Mantua cepit, Plenaque Virgilii mens nova menta fuit. *Saf-
san. Ludor. lib.
ii. fol. 22.*

SUTCLIFFE (a) (MATTHEW) an Englishman, and a Protestant Divine, flourished towards the latter end of the XVIIth century, and beginning of the XVIIIth. He published several controversial books, some in Latin, and others in English, and made it his chief business to confute Cardinal Bellarmin. He also wrote something against against the Presbyterians. He did not put his name to a book which treats of the conformity of Popery and the Turkish Religion [A].

- [A] A book, which treats of the conformity of Popery and the Turkish religion. He published it at London in the year 1604. It is the confutation of a book printed at Antwerp in the year 1596 (1), and at Cologne in 1603, with this title, Calvino-Turcismus, id est, Calvinistica perfidia cum Mabumetana collatio, & dilucida utriusque sectæ confutatio. There is hardly any book more violent than this Calvino-Turcismus: it was the work of two English Catholics, who left their country: one of them was William Reynolds or Reginaldus, and the other William Gifford. The first died while he was composing it; the second put the last hand to it, and published it (2). The latter was a Priest, who had several times encouraged some assassins to kill Queen Elizabeth (3), and who was well beloved by the Flemish women (4). He had fled to Little. William Reynolds had been formerly a minister (5), and expressed a great zeal for the Protestant religion. Afterwards he turned Papist. He was brother to John Reynolds (6), Professor of Divinity at Oxford, who wrote excellent books against the Roman Catholics. I have mentioned in another (7) place what is reported of these two brothers, viz. that they were brought up out of their country, John in the Church of Rome, William in the Protestant religion, and that meeting together one day, they disputed with so great force, that both of them changed their religion. I very much doubt this (8). William was Professor of Divinity in the English college of Rheims. He is said to be the author of a very seditious book, dedicated to the Duke of Mayenne, and written according to the most furious maxims of the league, and in a most violent rage against Henry III. and the King of Navarre. My edition is that of Antwerp, apud Joannem Keerbergium 1592, in 8vo. Here is the title of that book. De justa Reipub. Christianæ in Reges impio, & Hæreticos Autoritate; justissimaque Catholicorum ad Henricum Navarraum, & quemcunque hæreticum à regno Gallie repellendum con-
- (1) Sutclivius knew not that edition.
(2) See the preface to the Calvino-Turcismus.
(3) Sutcliffe, ubi infra.
(4) Sacrificus, ut aiunt, comptus & calamiistratus, & apud mulieres Belgicas gratiosus. Sutclivius, in Pref. Turco-Papismi.
(5) Id. ibid.
(6) Rivetus, in Jesuita vapulante, cap. xi, num. 14, pag. 531, Tom. iii, Opera.
(7) In the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for July 1681, Art. vi, pag. 769.
(8) This seems to me inconsistent with a letter of John Reynolds to his brother, which is to be found in Whitaker's answer to a book of William Reynolds.

fæderatione. G. Guilelmo Rosseo Autore. Sutcliffe affirms (9) that William Reynolds wrote that book. Moreri (10) says so too, and quotes Pitæus, nay he adds that it is one of the best (11) performances of this writer. But others ascribe it either to William Gifford, or to John Boucher, or to a Jesuit, or to Gnebrard (12). The surest way is to ascribe it to the author of the Calvino-Turcismus. Boucher's book has another title, as you may see above in the remark [B] of the article BOUCHER.

The title of Sutcliffe's answer runs thus. 'De Turco-Papismo, hoc est, de Turcarum & Papistarum adversus Christi Ecclesiam & fidem conjuratione, eorumque in Religione & moribus consensione & similitudine; liber unus. Eidem præterea adjuncti sunt, de Turco-papistarum maledictis & calumniis, adversus Gulielmi Giffordii famosi Pontificum Rom. & Jebusitarum supparastastri volumen illud contumeliosissimum, quod ille Calvino-Turcismum inscripsit, libri quatuor. In quibus non tantum hujus hominis levissimi, sed etiam aliorum importunissimorum scurrarum adversus Orthodoxam Christi Ecclesiam continenter latrantium, malitia & petulantia reprimatur, hominumque piorum fama ab eorum calumniis vindicatur. --- Of the Mahometan Popery, or a treatise of the Conspiracy of the Turks and Papists against the Church and Faith of CHRIST, of their agreement and resemblance in religion and morals. To which are added four books concerning the slanders and calumnies of the Mahometan Papists, in answer to that most defamatory libel, intitled, Mahometan Calvinisme, written by William Gifford, a notorious and vile flatterer of the Popes and Jesuits. In which books are detected the malice and insence not only of this worthless man, but likewise of other busy slanderers, continually railing against the orthodox Church of CHRIST, and the reputation of pious men is vindicated from their calumnies.'

(9) Sutcliffe, in Pref. Turco-Papismi.

(10) Upon the word Reginaldus.

(11) The word best has been left out in the Dutch editions.

(12) See Placcius, de Pseudonym. pag. 249, 250, and the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for June 1684, Art. iii, and Decker's de Script. Adeptis, pag. 337, 339. Edit. 1686.

T A B O R

T.

(a) In Latin Budissa.

TABOR (JOHN OTTO) a famous German Civilian, was born at Bautzen (a) the capital of the Upper Lusatia, the third of December 1604. He went through his studies in Philosophy and Civil-Law at Leipzig; and before he was twenty years of age rendered himself capable of explaining to his comrades the Paratitles of Wefenbecius. He went from the university of Leipzig to that of Strasburgh, and afterwards made a journey to France at the time of the taking of Rochelle. He was scarce returned home, when he undertook to travel into Italy, with two young gentlemen, as their governour; but there arose some obstacles to this journey. He was admitted Doctor of Law at Strasburgh November the 10th 1631. The wars of Germany deprived him of part of his patrimony, and reduced his birth-place to ashes, in the year 1634. Where he then discharged the office of advocate and syndic of the city. He was invited a few days after this disaster to succeed Joachim Clutenius, who had left vacant a professor of Law's chair at Strasburgh. He accepted of that professorship, and was soon after honoured with the chief post in the faculty of the Law. He continued in that city till the year 1656, though he had the offer of a great many very honourable employments from divers places; but about the end of this year he found himself more disposed to remove. The restoration of the peace, the regret of having lost a wife, with whom he had lived twenty-two years, the distaste he took against the place where he died, and some other discontents, to which persons of great merit are usually exposed (b), brought our Tabor to the country of Mecklenburgh, to be chancellor to the Duke. He soon quitted this post, to devote himself intirely to his books; but before he could regain the repose of his study, he was obliged to go to the court of Saxony, and to that of the Emperor, about some affairs of that duke. He retired to Gießen in 1659, and was there chancellor of the university, and counsellor to the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt (c). Several reasons obliged him to remove again, which he did in 1667, in order to retire to Francfort, where his son was advocate. He was not exempt from troubles there any more than in other places. He died the twelfth of December 1674. He published at different times several books on law subjects, which had sold very well: this was the reason that the copies were grown very scarce; and therefore a professor of Leipzig, named Mylius, made a collection of them as exactly as he could, which he published in two volumes in folio (d) in the year 1688. Mr Praschius, an ancient Burgomaster at Ratibon, and son-in-law to Tabor, printed in 1675, a little piece containing an account of the life of his father-in-law (e) [A].

(b) Restituta pax, erepta conjux,
de hinc innatum
loei tedium, tum causae alie quae infectari solent magnas virtutes.
Mausel. Jo. Otton. Taboris.

(c) They give him these qualities in the title of the new edition of his works.

(d) Lipsiae, apud
Joh. Frieder.
Gleditschium.

(e) It is intitled
*Mauselium Jo.
Otonis Taboris*,
J. C.

[A] Mr Praschius . . . printed . . . an account of the life of his father-in-law. In some respects there is no fault to be found with it for want of particulars; but in those things, concerning which the public might have most curiosity, the author has confined himself to general notions, and contents himself with telling us, 'Si tantas virtutes aliquo vitiorum confini olæsit, si in vita nonnunquam vel doctrina offendit, aut justam causam paulo acrius defendit, exemplo docuit illustri nihil in humanis rebus perfectum, aut superbie con-cessum esse, quo maneat SOLI DEO GLORIA. . . .

'If he tarnished such great virtues with a tincture of vice, if he sometimes offended in his life or doctrine, or vindicated a just cause a little too warmly, he has proved, by an eminent example, that in human affairs there is no such thing as perfection, or room for pride, but a reservation of all GLORY TO GOD ALONE.' This is the conclusion of Mr Praschius's account, from which I have taken this article.

TABOUÉ, or TABOUET (JULIAN) in Latin Tabætius, would have deserved a place among the learned of the XVIth century, if he had not sullied by his ill actions all the merit of his eloquence, learning, and wit. He was born at Chantenai four leagues from Mans (a). [A].

(a) La Croix du
Maine, pag. 278.

[A] Note, that this affair of Taboué is not to be met with in all the editions of John Papon's Arrêts. I could not find it in the Latin edition, published at Geneva, Sumptibus Samuelis Crispini, in 1624, in folio, and in book XXIV, title I, page 734, you have these words; Hanc ad rem notatu dignum est Arrestum Taboueti, supra, tit. de author. rer. judic. &c. which shews that they who suppressed the Arrêt against Taboué, forgot to expunge the passage in book XXIV, where reference is made to this Arrêt.

Such oversights as these too frequently happen to those who undertake the correction of a work. They strike out certain things in one place, and leave elsewhere a quotation of the very same things. . . . See, concerning Taboué, the history of the Bishops of Mans, by Antony le Courvaissier, pag. 854, and correct his omissions; that of Thuanus, lib. XVII. pag. 357 (it is pag. 952 of du Rier's translation); Papon especially; and Menage's history Sablé.

TACFARINAS, General of the army in Africa against the Romans in the time of Tiberius, was by nation a Numidian (a). He served at first amongst the auxiliary troops of the Romans, and having deserted, got together a band of vagabonds and robbers, and betook himself to making incursions, and to plundering. Afterwards he disciplined this band of highwaymen, and divided them into companies, according to the art of war. At length he became General of the Muzulans, a potent nation near the deserts of Africa, and confederate with the Moors of the neighbourhood. These were commanded by Mazippa, and formed a flying camp, carrying fire and sword, and terror on all sides; whilst Tacfarinas, with the choicest of the troops, encamped after the manner of the Romans, and accustomed them to military discipline. The Cinithians, another considerable nation, entered in the same interests. Furius Camillus, Proconsul of Africa, informed of these motions, marched against the enemy, and put them to flight. This procured him the honour of a triumph (b). This happened in the year of Rome 770 (c). Tacfarinas renewed his robberies some time after, and laid siege to a castle where Decrius was commander, and defeated the garrison which went out to engage him in the open field. Decrius performed the part of a very brave and experienced warrior: the wounds he received, by one of which he lost an eye, did not hinder him from making head against the enemy till he was slain: his soldiers had betaken themselves to flight. The Proconsul Apronius punished them for their cowardice very severely, for he put every tenth man to death. This had such an effect, that five hundred soldiers, having charged the same troops of Tacfarinas, who were besieging a place, routed them. After this Tacfarinas resolved not to stand an engagement with the Romans; he detached his men into different places; and when he was pursued he betook himself to flight, and when the Romans retired, he charged them in the rear. But, having stopped in a camp, he was there beaten, and forced to fly into the deserts (d). This was for no long time, for he quickly after appeared again in the field; and this news being brought to Rome, they sent into Africa against him Junius Blæsus, uncle to Sejanus (e). This new Proconsul acquitted himself very well in his office (f) [A]; and yet Tacfarinas repaired his losses so well, that he had the boldness to send deputies to Tiberius to demand that he would assign him a country; otherwise he threatened him with a perpetual war. The Emperor was so provoked at this insolence, that he gave order to Junius Blæsus to take

(a) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. lii.

(b) Taken from Tacitus, ibid.

(c) It was the 17th of the Christian Æra.

(d) Ex eod. ibid. lib. iii, cap. xx, xxi.

(e) Id. ibid. cap. xxxii, xxxv.

(f) Id. ibid. cap. lxxiii.

Tacfarinas

[A] Junius Blæsus, uncle to Sejanus. This new Proconsul acquitted himself very well in his office.] The emperor acquainting the senate with Tacfarinas's new irruptions, exhorted them to make choice of a new Proconsul, very well skilled in war, and capable to undergo the fatigues of it (1). The senators referring this choice to the Emperor's care (2). This prince (3) gave them an oblique reprimand, for throwing all difficult affairs upon him, and named to them two persons, Manius Lepidus, and Junius Blæsus, that they might choose one of them to send into Africa. Lepidus desired that he might be excused from undertaking that employ; Junius spoke to the same purpose; but it was easy to perceive the difference of their language, and that Lepidus spoke his mind, but Blæsus did not. The reasons which Lepidus alledged were very well understood, as well as that which he did not alledge, and which was the chief, namely the superiority of Junius Blæsus, who was uncle to the favourite. Prudence required him not to be his competitor in this affair; and that it was better for him not to commit himself to the decision of the suffrages: so the proconsulship was confirmed to Blæsus, as if he had been the only person the emperor had named. I say nothing but what results from the words of Tacitus. 'Tum audita amborum verba, intentius excusante se Lepido, cum valetudinem corporis, ætatem liberum, nubilem filiam obtenderet: intelligeretque etiam quod silebat, avunculum esse Sejani Blæsum, atque eo prævalidum. Respondit Blæsus specie recusantis, sed neque eadem adseveratione; & consensu adulantium auditus est (4). - - - Then they were both heard, Lepidus with great earnestness excusing himself, under pretence of his infirm state of health, the age of his children, and a daughter just marriageable: what he thought proper not to mention was also understood, that Blæsus was the uncle of Sejanus, and therefore too powerful for him. Blæsus also made some sort of excuse, but not with that earnestness; and was favoured by all the court flatterers.' This uncle of the favourite is an example which proves, that the relations of a prime minister are sometimes very worthy of those offices, which are conferred upon them purely on account of their relation. He took the best way that could be thought of to subdue Tacfarinas (5), and we read in Tacitus, that the triumphal honours, which were granted him, were truly deserved by him; and that Tiberius declared, that he granted them in consideration of Sejanus. Neque multo post Cæsar cum Junium Blæsum Proconsulem Africæ triumphis insignibus attolleret, dare id se dixit honori Sejani, cujus illa avunculus erat. At tamen res Blæsi dignæ decore tali fuerit (6). Note, that this emperor commanded the legions to honour Junius Blæsus with the title of Imperator. This title, conferred by the acclamations of the soldiers, was very glorious. This had been a custom in the wars of the Romans, in the time of the Republic; but it grew almost out of use under Augustus, and was entirely abolished under Tiberius; for Junius Blæsus was the last that was honoured with this salutation. This whole matter deserves to be related in Tacitus's own words. 'Tiberius pro confecto (Bello) interpretatus, id quoque Blæso tribuit, ut Imperator à legionibus salutaretur: prisco erga duces honore, qui bene gesta Re-publica gaudio & impetu victoris exercitus conclamabatur: erantque plures simul Imperatores, nec super ceterorum æqualitatem. Concessit quibusdam & Augustus id vocabulum; ac tunc Tiberius Blæso postremam (7). - - - Tiberius looking upon the war to be concluded, granted also to Blæsus that he should be saluted Imperator by the legions: an ancient honour paid to the General for his services to the Commonwealth, by the acclamations of a rejoicing and victorious army: and there were several who enjoyed this title at the same time, nor yet did this make any difference in their rank. Augustus had granted this title to some; and Tiberius had now bestowed it, for the last time, on Blæsus.' The first words of this passage inform us, that Tiberius thought the war with Tacfarinas to be ended, altho' Blæsus returned into Italy before he had crushed all the seeds which might revive it again (8). Tiberius, thinking the business was over, recalled the ninth legion out of Africa. Tacfarinas gave out, that they were drawn off out of necessity to a distant place, because some other nations were invading the Roman empire; and that therefore, it would be an easy matter to hem in those Roman troops that were left, provided that all those, who preferred their liberty before servitude, would readily re-unite their forces. He was joined and assisted by a great many people, and gave a great

(1) Tacit. ibid. cap. lxxiii, lxxvii.

(2) Id. ibid. cap. lxxv.

(3) Fratre ejus (Tacfarinatus) capto regressus est, prosperantibus tamen quam ex utilitate sociorum, relicta per quos resurgeret bellum. Id. ibid.

(1) Judicio patrum deligendum Proconsulem, gnarum militiæ, corpore validum, & bello succurrerum. Tacit. Ann. lib. iii, cap. xxxiii.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Id. ibid. cap. xxxv.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) See Tacitus, ibid. cap. lxxv.

VOL. V.

A a a great

Tacfarinas whatever it cost. This war was not ended till the year of Rome 777, and it was the Proconsul Dolabella, who finished it. The army of Tacfarinas was defeated; they endeavoured to take the General, but he chose rather to lose his life in a courageous defence than to fall alive into the hands of the Proconsul (g). The faults of the supplement to Moreri shall be observed below [B].

(g) Id. ibid. lib. iv, cap. xxiii, & seq.

(9) Ex eod. ibid. lib. iv, cap. xxiii, & seq.

(10) Id. ibid. cap. xxvi.

(11) Priores duces, ubi imperando triumphalia insignia sufficere res suas crederant, hostem omitebant. Jamque tres laureas in Urbe statuae, & adhuc raptabat Africam Tacfarinas. Id. ibid. cap. xxiii.

(12) This has been struck out in the Dutch editions.

(a) About the CIVth Olympiad.

(b) Taken from Plutarch, in Vita Agefilai.

(c) Theopompus, & Lycas Naukratites, apud Athenæum, lib. xiv, pag. 616.

(1) Athen. lib. xiv, pag. 616.

great deal of trouble to the new Pro-consul, Dolabella, who, at length, totally vanquished this enemy (9). He demanded the honour of a triumph, but could not obtain it; for Tiberius, out of complaisance to Sejanus, refused to consent to what might eclipse the glory of Junius Blæsus. This refusal added more to the glory of Dolabella, than to that of the uncle to the favourite. Tacitus took care not to suppress this remark. Dolabella petenti abnuvit triumphalia Tiberius Sejanus tribuens, ne Blæsi avunculi ejus laus obsoleceret. Sed neque Blæsus ideo inferior, & huic negatus honor gloriam intendit. Quippe minore exercitu, insignis captivos, cædem ducis, bellicque confecti famam deportarat (10). - - - Tiberius refused to Dolabella the triumphal honours, which he did in complement to Sejanus, that the honours paid to his uncle Blæsus might not be impaired. But neither was Blæsus on that account the more glorious; his rival being rather set above him by this very refusal. For with a smaller army, he had come off with the reputation of having taken many illustrious prisoners, killed the General, and finished the war. It was a great injustice, to refuse to Dolabella, who had concluded this war, what had been allowed to the half-conquerors of Tacfarinas (11).

[B] The faults of the Supplement to Moreri. He was in the wrong to say, I. That Tacfarinas was a slave. II. That he retired into Africa. III. That out of the robbers assembled by him, he formed a powerful army of Saracens (12). IV. That he caused himself to be proclaimed King. V. That he beat the Roman army, commanded by Decius, Pro-consul of Africa. VI. That he wounded him in the eye. VII. That he was afterwards vanquished by Camillus. VIII. And that Tacitus relates all this in his second book. Here are eight capital errors, too many certainly for an article of ten lines, and which besides is so defective. Tacitus says nothing which can induce us to believe, that Tacfarinas was a slave, or that he had served out of Africa in the Roman army. It was in Africa that he bore arms for them, in all appearance; and by consequence he did not retire into Africa after he had deserted. As for this army of Saracens, I believe I am not mistaken in my conjectures, if, I say, that the word Muzulani, which Tacitus makes use of, made the continuator of Moreri think that Tacitus meant the Musulmans; and because the followers of Mahomet go by that name, and have also been known by that of Saracens, he fancied it was indifferent to say an army of Saracens, or an army of Musulmans. Tacitus does not speak of a Pro-consul named Decius, but of one Decrius, who commanded in a castle; the garison of which consisted of a cohort (13), which is here converted into an army of Romans, commanded by the Pro-consul Decius. Now, since Decrius was killed, Moreri's continuator should not have been contented to say, that Tacfarinas wounded him in the eye. Camillus's victory preceded this defeat of Decrius. He should have cited the second, third, and fourth books of Tacitus's Annals; for these words, Tacitus, lib. 2. refer you as readily to the second book of his History, as to the second book of his Annals: and after all, whatever second book you take, you will not find there all the things which you are told of Tacfarinas.

(13) Which was about 600 men.

TACHUS, King of Egypt, in the time of Artaxerxes Ochus (a). The government of the Persians was so odious to the Egyptians, that it was no hard matter for Tachus to cause an insurrection; but he stood in need of the succours of Greece, to maintain him in the dignity with which he was invested. He was not ignorant of the valour and experience of Agefilas, King of the Lacedæmonians; and therefore took him into his service. Agefilas, though above eighty years of age, did not refuse it. He raised troops with the money which he received from Tachus, and led them into Egypt, without considering that he might be blamed for accepting an employ so inferior to his rank and reputation. He was soon disgusted at Tachus, who, instead of giving him the command of his whole army, left him only the command of the foreigners, giving the dignity of Admiral to Chabrias the Athenian, and retaining to himself the character of Generalissimo. Agefilas waited a favourable opportunity to show his resentment, which soon offered itself, and he as readily embraced it. Neftanabus, a relation of Tachus, commanded part of the army; he drew them off from their obedience to Tachus, and procured himself to be chosen king by the Egyptians. This made him send ambassadors to King Agefilas, to desire him to joyn with him, and he failed not to make him magnificent promises. Tachus, on the other hand, did not forget any thing to retain him. Each of those competitors sent their deputies to Lacedæmon. Agefilas also sent some thither, but much more to recommend the interest of Neftanabus, than that of Tachus. He received full power, to act as he should think most expedient for the good of his own country, and he thought it more advantageous for the Lacedæmonians to abandon Tachus, than to support him; and so he went into the service of Neftanabus with the troops he commanded: which, as his historian has observed, deserves to be called no better than treason, howsoever it may be screened under the pretence of the public good. Tachus, being thus abandoned, fled where he could (b), and I do not believe that he is found any more in History. Some (c) say he retired into Persia. He must needs have been at a loss for a safe place of refuge, if he fled to a prince, who could not but look upon him as a ring leader of rebels. Athenæus assigns a very different cause of Agefilas's resentment from that which has been just given: but in this matter I should much sooner chuse to trust Plutarch than Athenæus [A].

[A] In this matter I should much sooner chuse to trust to Plutarch than Athenæus. The latter attributes the whole to a jest: he would have it (1), that Tachus, bantering Agefilas, upon seeing his small stature, said to him, A mountain has been in travail, Jupiter has been in great fears about it, it has brought forth a mouse: ἀδινεν ὄρεα, ζεύς δ' ἐπολείτο, τὸ δ' ἔτρεν μῦν. He adds, that Agefilas fell into a passion, and answered, You shall one day find that I am a lion. He was as good as his word; for an insurrection happening against Tachus, he saw himself abandoned by Agefilas, and forced to fly into Persia. I see no probability in this. First, Plutarch, who gives a large account of the contempt which the Egyptians shewed Agefilas, upon observing his sorry equipage and mien, and finding his indifferent taste, by the choice he made of the presents that were sent him, doth not say, that Tachus used any such jest. He does indeed say, that the great concourse of people who went to the sea-side to see this great captain, so much celebrated by fame, applied to him the fable of the mountain that brought forth a mouse; but he doth not say, that Agefilas made any answer answer to it, and Tachus was not there. The sharp saying, which Athenæus ascribes to this king of Lacedæmon, would no doubt have found a place among the apophthegms, which Plutarch has left us of this prince, had it been founded upon good authority. Besides, is it probable, that a man who had so much occasion for the assistance of Agefilaus, would be so imprudent as to exasperate him by so severe a jest? I do not deny, but that Plutarch has observed, that Tachus's vanity made Agefilaus uneasy. Ἐπειτα τὴν ἀλλαν ὠλαζομένην καὶ κενόφρονον τὴν Αἰγυπτιῶν βαρύνοντα. Deinde reliqua Ægyptii insolentia & vanitate fatigatus (2). But once more, this Historian would not have forgot in this place the story of the mountain, and the quick repartee of Agefilaus. I verily believe, that Athenæus's narrative ought to be reduced to this. It was told this king of the Lacedæmonians, that the Egyptians, after they had seen him so little, of whom they had formed so great an idea, had mentioned the mountain that brought forth a mouse: he probably replied, they shall soon see, the mouse they saw on the sea-shore fight like a lion. He did not pretend to threaten Tachus, but to fill him with hopes. I have heard say, that some French Generals, being in Germany, and observing, that the Germans had no good opinion of some of their regiments, because the soldiers were not tall, large, stout, and well-clothed, encouraged them with these words; You shall see these little, lean, and meagre soldiers, fall on like lions, and make those great giants truckle. However that be, one may learn by this account of Athenæus, true or false, a very important lesson; which is, that princes should never offend any body with raileries (3): it may sometimes cost them dear.

(2) Plutarch, in Vita Agefilæ, pag. 617.

(3) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for the month of March 1684, pag. 47.

TACITUS (CAIUS (a) CORNELIUS) a Roman Historian, who flourished in the first century. We know nothing of his ancestors, and probably the dignity of his family began in his own person. His first employ is said to have been that of procurator to Vespasian in Gallia Belgica [A]. Being returned to Rome, he received from the Emperor Titus a more honourable post (b). He was Prætor under the empire of Domitian [B], and Consul under Nerva [C]. But all these dignities gave him but very little glory, compared with that which he procured to himself by the performances of his pen. His Annals, and his History [D] are something admirable, and one of the greatest efforts of the human mind; whether you consider the singularity of the style, or attend to the beauty of the thoughts, and to that happy pencil, with which he knew how

(a) Others give him the prænomens of Publius, and are blamed for it.

(b) See the remark [A].

[A] Of Procurator to Vespasian in Gallia Belgica. You will find these words in the life of Tacitus, composed by Justus Lipsius. 'Initium dignitatis illi sub Vespasiano fuit, à quo Plinio auctore, procurator datus Gallie Belgicæ rationes principis administravit. -- The beginning of his promotion was under Vespasian, by whom, as we have it from Pliny, being made procurator in Gallia Belgica, he had the care of that prince's revenues.' I shall cite below (1) what Pliny says, and we shall there see, that he makes no mention of Vespasian. Why then is he cited as an author who informs us, that this emperor gave Tacitus that employ? Is it because Tacitus exercised this office under the empire of Vespasian? But does this give a right to ascribe to authors what they never said? However it be, there is little doubt but that Tacitus enjoyed this employ under Vespasian; which is grounded upon this: 'Dignitatem nostram à Vespasiano inchoatam, à Tito auctam, à Domitiano longius provecitam non abnuerim. (2) -- I do not deny but that my advancement was begun by Vespasian, seconded by Titus, and carried to a far greater height by Domitian.' They are Tacitus's own words. We shall see below (3) whether this opinion be well founded or not.

(1) In the remark [K].

(2) Tacitus, Hist. lib. i, cap. i.

(3) In the remark [K].

(4) Lipsius, in Vita Taciti, confutes him for it.

(5) It was in the year 84, of Rome, according to Lipsius, or 840, according to Calvisius.

(6) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xi, cap. xi.

(7) 849 according to Calvisius.

(8) Plinius, Epist. i, lib. ii.

[B] He was Prætor under the Emperor Domitian. Vertranus places this prætorship under the ninth consulship of this emperor (4), but he should have placed it under the 14th; for it falls in with the time in which Domitian celebrated the secular games: Now it is certain, that he celebrated them when he was consul for the 14th time (5). Let us cite Tacitus. 'Is (Domitianus) quoque edidit ludos sæculares; iisque intensius assui sacerdotio quinquaginta præditi, ac tum prætor. Quod non jactantia refero, sed quia collegio quinquaginta antiquitus ea cura, & magistratus potissimum exsequebantur officia cærimoniarum (6). -- Domitian also solemnized the secular games; at which I gave a constant attendance in regard to my office, being one of the college of priests, and at the same time prætor. Which I do not mention out of vanity, but because antiently that college, and especially that magistracy had always the direction of the ceremonies.'

[C] . . . and Consul under Nerva. He was substituted in the place of Virginus Rufus, who died in his third consulship, in the year of Rome 850 (7), and he honoured him with a funeral oration. 'Laudatus est à consule Cornelio Tacito, nam hic supremæ felicitati ejus cumulus accessit, laudator eloquentissimus (8). -- His funeral oration was spoken by Cornelius Tacitus, his good fortune met with this finishing stroke, a most eloquent Orator.'

[D] His Annals and his History. He wrote the History before the Annals; for he refers us to his History in the eleventh book of the Annals; he refers us thither, I say, about some things concerning Domitian. 'Utriusque Principis rationes prætermittito, factis narratis libris quibus res Imperatoris Domitiani composui (9). -- I omit the purposes of both these Princes, having sufficiently explained them in my work concerning the History of Domitian.' Now it is certain (10) that his History extended from the reign of Galba inclusively to the reign of Nerva exclusively. He designed a particular work for the reigns of Nerva and Trajan, and that was the business he reserved for his old age: but I believe he never was able to put his design in execution. 'Quod si vita suppeditet, principatum Divi Nervæ, & Imperium Trajani, uberius seculioremque materiam senectuti seposui: rara temporum felicitate, ubi sentire quæ velis, & quæ sentias dicere licet (11). -- But if my life will permit, I shall reserve the reigns of Nerva and Trajan, as a more copious and secure subject for my old age; as we enjoy that rare felicity to think what we please, and say what we think.' These words shew, that he began his History, after the death of the Emperor Nerva, and during the life of Trajan: and therefore he gives the title of Divus to the first, which he does not give to the second. We have now but five books of his History left, which is but a very small part of it; for they do not contain above a year and an half, when the whole work ought to contain about twenty-nine years. Those who number these five books, as the continuation of the Annals divided into sixteen books, are to blame; for the Annals ought to be considered as a separate work. The author composed them after he had finished his History (12), they began at the death of Augustus, and were continued to that of Nero. We have but part of them left, namely, the four first books, some pages of the fifth, all the sixth, from the eleventh to the fifteenth, and part of the sixteenth: The two last years of Nero, and part of the foregoing year are wanting. These were the last books of the work. The five first books were found in Germany, by a Receiver of Leo X. He carried them to that Pope, and received a gratification of 500 crowns. 'Corbeia, quod ad Vifurgim Monasterium est, à quæstore Pontificio fuere inventi, qui eos ad Leonem X. detulit, ac ævri loco quingentos accepit aureos (13). -- At the abbey of Corwey, which is a monastery on the Weser, they were found by one of the Pope's Receivers, who presented them to Leo X, and received from him a reward of 500 gold crowns.' Philip Berroaldus had orders to publish them (14). I remember to have heard the late Mr Faure, Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, say, that Leo X having published a brief, by which he promised not only indulgences to those who should discover Tacitus's manuscripts, but also money, and honour (15); there was a German, who searched all the libraries, and at last found

(9) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xi, cap. xi.

(10) See Tacitus, at the beginning of his History.

(11) Tacitus, Hist. lib. i, cap. i.

(12) See the proofs which Lipsius gives of it in the preface to his Commentaries on Tacitus.

(13) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. lib. i, cap. xxx, pag. 159.

(14) They were printed at Rome, an. 1515.

(15) That is, that their names should be prefixed with an elegy to what they should find out.

how to paint the disguises and cheats of Politicians, and the weakness of the passions. Not but that he may be censured for the affectation of his language, and for his inquiring into the secret motives of actions [E], and construing them to be criminal; but it is a great compliment to his understanding, to remark the esteem which several princes have had for his works [F]. A modern author has passed this judgment on them: Tertullian charges him with telling us a great many falsehoods. He was not only an enemy to the true religion; but it appears from several passages that he had none at all. His style is certainly very obscure; nay it is sometimes harsh, and has not all the purity of good authors in the Latin tongue. Nevertheless, his art of comprizing a great deal of sense in a few words; his vivacity found some books of the Annals in the monastery of Corwey. He went and presented them to the Pope, who received them with great pleasure, and asked him what recompence he desired. The German was content to be re-imburfed the charges he had been at in going to view those libraries, and in his journey to Rome. Leo thought that was too little, and gave him more; and in order to procure him both honour and profit, he would have had him take the care of publishing this Tacitus. But the German excused himself, on account of his wanting the necessary abilities (16).

(16) Note, that Mr Faure said, that he had read this Narrative in the preface to the first edition of these books of Tacitus. See an eulogy on Mr Faure in the Journal des Savans, November 16, 1693, pag. 673, Dutch edition.

[E] Not but that he may be censured for the affectation of his language, and for his enquiring into the secret motives of actions. Muretus has made three Orationes in answer to those who have criticized Tacitus. Their criticisms were too sharp, and unjust in some respects: Therefore it was no hard matter for the apologist, who was a good Orator, and a subtle Rhetorician, to elude them. You may see in those Orationes what Tacitus is censured for. You will find the same thing also in Strada's Prolegomena (18). He is one of the most formidable enemies of Tacitus: he thereby displeased Paganinus Gaudentius (19), who not only criticized (20) many places of his History of the Low-Countries; but also undertook to justify Tacitus. This Gaudentius was no very stout champion: he understood a little of many things, but nothing perfectly. Magis literis tinctus quam imbutus . . . nihil in ingenio solidum, cum per artes & disciplinas peregrinaretur nulli penitus infensus (21). . . . He was rather superficially than deeply learned. . . . his judgment was not solid enough to dwell long upon any thing in the course of his studies. In my opinion, Cardinal du Perron has too much despised Tacitus (22).

(17) The xvith, xviiith, and xviiiith, of the second volume, in the Leipzig edition 1672.

(18) Lib. 1, Proleg. II.

(19) Professor at Pisa. He was of the country of the Grisons, if I am not mistaken.

(20) See his book, de Candore Politico, printed at Pisa, ann. 1646.

(21) Octav. Ferrarius, in Prolegomena cui Titulus, Literarum finis.

(22) See the Perroniana at the word Styles.

(23) Anonymiana, pag. 7.

(24) Ibid. p. 9.

(25) That is to say, La Mothe le Vayer.

(26) This is to be understood in general. See citation (28).

(27) Anonymiana, pag. 10.

The book intitled, Anonymiana, or Miscellanies of Poetry, Oratory, and Learning, which was printed at Paris in 1700, contains a discourse which is not very much in favour of our Historian. This is the judgment the author passes upon his style (23): 'Tacitus's Latin is very good, but too obscure to express what he would write. His difficult and contracted style might be esteemed any where else but in a History, where the whole ought to be clear and well established; and where the distance of facts, their variety, their epochas, and their changes, continually controverted, render it obscure enough in itself, without being made more so by the style. . . . (24) It is a mistake to pretend, that Tacitus's way of writing is commendable: if some wines are esteemed for a little bitterness, it is because that is occasioned by some good quality; but a harsh and rough way of writing will never gain reputation in a History. It is so far from raising the mind to greater knowledge, as this learned man pretends (25), that it perplexes and discourages it. Will any one say, for example, that Cæsar would have excited more attention, if he had been more obscure, and less natural? Does not he raise the mind to his own thoughts, which in reading his History ought to be always the just bounds of ours? Whereas in an obscure manner of writing, the mind of the reader roves where it pleases, when it is not tired, and forms imaginations which frequently have no exactness or proportion to the things. Cæsar, by his clearness, never gives occasion to desire more light in the actions he describes. I could readily subscribe to this judgment; and, in my opinion, what the author adds concerning the other affectation of Tacitus, is no less judicious (26). (27) Tacitus was an able Politician, and a yet more judicious writer: he has drawn very just consequences from the transactions of the reigns, of which he wrote the History, and has formed maxims from them for the well governing of a state. But if he has sometimes assigned to the actions and commotions of the republic their true principles, if he has rightly unravelled their causes, it must be owned, that he has often supplied with too much nicety and penetration, those actions which had none: so true is it, that men characterize themselves in whatever they do, and that the writing of History never is in the hands in which it ought to be, when those who undertake it, being ignorant of the true cause of an action, assign to it that cause which they imagine to be the least sensible, and most concealed from the eyes of the people. They often happen to represent that as a particular secret, in the breast of the Prince, which was a matter public to all the world: and this is a fault so familiar with Tacitus (28), that I dare venture to say, supported otherwise by a great many good reasons, that it is paying him too great a compliment to take him for a very exact Historian, who has written according to rules. . . . (29) He has made choice of the nicest actions, and the most susceptible of the delicacies of art: those reigns to which he has principally applied himself in his History, are no small proof of this. In that of Tiberius, which is without dispute his master-piece, and in which he has best succeeded, he found a kind of government more adapted to the character of his genius. He loved, as I have said, to unfold the intrigues of the cabinet, to assign their causes, to turn pretences into designs, and deceitful appearances into realities. A genius too subtle, who saw some mystery in all the actions of this Prince. A sincere deference of his designs to the judgment of the Senate, was sometimes a snare laid for their integrity; sometimes a nice way of becoming their master; and always the art of making them the accomplices of his designs, and of executing them without any reproach. When he punished the seditions; it was an effect of his natural diffidence of the citizens, or some slight marks of anger spread among the people, to dispose their minds for greater cruelties. Here the contrariety of humours of two Generals, is a secret method of crossing the fortune of a competitor, and the means to lessen him in the affection of the people. The honours conferred on those that deserved them, were gentle ways of removing a rival, or of destroying an enemy, and always fatal recompences. In a word, Policy has a hand in every thing, vice and virtue are there equally dangerous, and favours as fatal as disgraces. Tiberius is never natural, he does not do the most ordinary actions of other men without design. His repose is never without consequence, and his motions are always full of contrivances. The other things which I have read in this dissertation of the author of the Anonymiana, are more liable, in my opinion, to be contradicted.

[F] The esteem which many Princes have had for his works. Pope Paul III, wore out his Tacitus by much reading of it. Cosmo de Medicis, the first Great Duke of Florence, accounted the reading of him his greatest pleasure. Muretus tells us this in finer words. Paulus III P. M. quo nullum sapienterem senem nostrum vidit ætas, Tacitum sæpe relegendo contriverat, neque ullum profanum scriptorem æque libenter legebat. Cosmus Medicus, qui primus Magnus Etruriæ Dux fuit, homo factus ad imperandum, qui eam, quæ vulgo fortuna dicitur, in consilio & prudentia consistere docuit, Taciti libros in deliciis habebat, eorumque lectione avidissime fruebatur. Neque non hodie multi aut Principum, aut eorum, qui de summis rebus à Principibus in consilium adhibentur, eundem studiofissime legunt, & quasi pro magistro quodam prudentiæ habent (30). . . . Pope Paul III, the most learned man of our age, wore out his

(28) The author should not therefore have said, that he was thought a more judicious writer, than an able politician.

(29) Anonymiana, p. 16, & seq.

(30) Moret. O. rat. XVI. Fd. ii, pag. 343. Edit. Lips. 1672. See Oratorem.

Heinli, pag. 4. and the preface of Arms Antiquas; and Piquet, Let. i, pag. 443, & 444.

vivacity in painting out events; the sagacity with which he penetrates through the darkness of the corrupt heart of men; the force and superiority of genius, which appear throughout the whole, makes him looked upon at this day almost universally as the chief of Historians (c). There have been so many translations of him, and so many comments upon him [G], that they alone might compose a tolerable library. I shall take notice of some faults in Justus Lipsius [H], la Mothe le Vayer, and Moreri [I]; and you will find in my remarks, his Tacitus by frequently reading him, nor did he meet with so much pleasure in perusing any other profane writer. Cosmo de Medicis, who was the first Great Duke of Tuscany, and formed for governing, who taught that what is commonly called Fortune, consists in council and prudence, held the works of Tacitus in high esteem, and read them with the greatest delight. And at this very day, there are several Princes, and privy-counsellors to Princes, who read him with great application, and regard him as a sort of Oracle in Politics. I shall subjoin to this Latin passage, one from Balzac. It is taken from a letter he wrote to d'Abancourt, the 4th of June 1643. 'Tacitus being become your's, my ill opinion of him can subsist no longer. I cannot hate a man whom you love; and, to tell you the truth, I do believe that he is become more agreeable, and less thorny, by passing through your hands. The best of all is, that you have not deified yourself by meddling with dirty matters, and that among those excrements of Policy, your Morality is preserved in its purity. A Stoic Philosopher of the last century, as you may call Justus Lipsius, had the same taste for him that you have. A great General, as you may call, the Marquis of Spinola, has also translated him into his mother tongue, though his translation has not been published; and I inform you of this as a secret which I learned from one of his most intimate confidants (31). Add to this a passage of Guy Patin: Cornelius Tacitus, who is a State-breviary, or the first or chief master of the Secrets of the Cabinet, and whom Mr de Balzac calls somewhere, the ancient original of modern Policy, says, speaking of Tiberius, &c (32). We must remember in this place the great zeal of Leo X: I have taken notice of it above (33).

(c) Tillemont, History of the Emperors, Tom. ii, Part. i, pag. 357, of the Bruffels edition.

Let us join Queen Christina to the examples I have already given. Mr Chanut says, that she made the Greek tongue only her diversion in spare hours; and that the reading of this language, and others, did not keep her from her serious studies, so she called, among others, Tacitus's history, some pages of which she read constantly every day. This author, who exercised the most learned, was very familiar to her (34).

[G] There have been so many versions of him, and so many comments upon him. Mr Amelot de la Houfflaie, who has translated the six first books of the Annals into French, has prefixed to his translation a critical discourse, where you may find the names of a great many persons, who have laboured on this writer. There you may see the judgment that is passed on their labours, and on Tacitus's style and morals. All this is very curious. But you must not suppose that this French translator speaks in general of all those who have written on Tacitus, or who have translated him into other languages; he only speaks of the principal ones. I wish Peter Andrew Canonheri had named the eleven Commentators that he points at in these words: Præter hos sunt undecim qui Tacitum notis & commentariis illustrarunt (35). - - - Besides these there are eleven who have illustrated Tacitus with notes and commentaries. He had just before given a long list of those, qui ex professio de jure status conscripserunt. That list contains eight pages in 4to. I know some persons of good judgment, who make a great account of the critical commentaries on Tacitus, such as is that of Justus Lipsius, and slight very much the political commentaries with which Italy has infatuated Germany: for since the Germans have seen the dissertations of Scipione Ammirato, translated into Latin by Christopher Pflugius, a gentleman of Misina, they have been a little too much inclined to comment on Tacitus's works after that manner. Not but that one may profit by their writings, chiefly by those of Boeclerus (36). That which Berneggerus composed on the same Historian, is intermixed with Literature and Politics. He has therefore intitled it, Questiones Miscellaneæ. The French did not bite at the hook, when John Baudouin added to his translation of Tacitus (37), accompanied with notes, a translation of Scipione Ammirato.

[H] I shall take notice of some faults in Justus Lipsius.

I. I have already observed (38), that he makes Pliny say more than he should have done. II. He chafes rather to believe, that Tacitus was the first of his family who enjoyed any honours, and that this family was not very illustrious, than to believe, that his father had any office: and nevertheless, in another place, he understands of his father, what Pliny says of Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, and procurator of the demesne in Gallia Belgica. Let us compare these two passages of Lipsius together. Here is the first. 'Pater avulque honores gesserint, & ad remp. accesserint, necne, ut re vetustâ & incertâ nihil adfirmem: prius à verò abest, ipsum primum jus imaginis & honores in familiam non nimis illustrem intulisse. Initium dignitatis illi sub Vespasiano fuit, à quo, Plinio auctore, procurator datus Gallie Belgicæ, rationes Principis administravit, quæ dignitas equestri ordini diu peculiaris fuit (39). - - - Whether his father and grandfather were honoured with any offices, or had any employments in the common-wealth, I cannot take upon me to determine, this being a point of great antiquity and uncertainty: it is most probable, that the grandeur and honours of his family, not before that time ever illustrious, were wholly owing to himself. His first advancement was under Vespasian, by whom, according to Pliny, he was made Procurator of Gallia Belgica, and had the care of that Prince's revenues, which was a dignity long peculiar to the equestrian order.' Here is the other, which serves for a commentary on these words of Tacitus: Dignitatem nostram à Vespasiano inchoatam; - - - Our dignity begun by Vespasian. How can this be, says Lipsius? 'Quomodo, quia Procurator sub illo Belgicæ? E Plinio id suspicere, sed suspicere tantum, imò verius id ceperis de hujus patre. Intellege ergo dignitatem ejus inchoatam à Vespasiano, quod ab eo laticlavus factus, & relatus in ordinem primum (40). - - - What, because he was under him Procurator of Gallia Belgica? This account of Pliny is to be suspected, nay, more than suspected, for it will be more truly understood of his father. The meaning therefore of his dignity being begun by Vespasian, is, that he made him a senator, and ranked him in that supreme order.' Lipsius will have it, in the first of these two passages, that Pliny says, that Tacitus was honoured with a commission by Vespasian; and in the other he will have it, that this is meant of Tacitus's father. According to this last case, this Historian had for his father a knight promoted by the Emperor to honourable employments; and that which to Lipsius did not appear likely, would nevertheless be very true. No body can deny, but that this office of Procurator was very honourable; they attributed to it, under the Emperor Claudius, the authority of Judicature, and that without appeal (41). Consult the learned Gutherius (42): and tho' Augustus had conferred this office on some freed-men (43). Tacitus did nevertheless look upon it as an appendage of knighthood; 'Utrumque avum procuratorem Cæsarum habuit (Agricola) quæ equestris nobilitas est (44). - - - Both Agricola's grandfathers were procurators under the Cæsars, which is an honour belonging to the equestrian order.' III. Lipsius asserts, that Tacitus being grown grey-headed at the bar, devoted his old age to the writing of history. Historiæ scribendæ senex demum vacavit, cum reliquum ætatis in foro & causis orandis egisset. But if it be so, how comes it, that Tacitus declares, that he undertakes to write a history which is to extend from the death of Nero to that of Domitian; and that he reserves for his old age the empire of Nerva and Trajan? Quod si vita suppediet, principatum divi Nervæ, & imperium Trajani, uberiorem securioremque materiam senectuti seposui (45). One may here apply to Lipsius the proverb, Sorex suo indicio perit, - - - He has betrayed himself. He tells us (46), that he has very nearly made

(37) Printed at Paris in 4to, ann. 1628.

(38) In the remark [A].

(39) Just. Lipsius in Vita Taciti in limine Commentar. ad Tacitum.

(40) Lipsius, in Tacit. Histor. lib. i, tit. pag. 451.

(41) Eodem anno sepius audita vox Principis, parum vim rerum habendam à procuratoribus suis judicaturum, ac si ipse statisset. Ac ne fortuito prolapsus videretur, Senatus quoque consulto cautum, plenius quam antea & uberius. Tacitus, Annal. lib. xii, cap. ix.

(42) Gutherius, de Officiis Domus Augustæ, lib. iii, cap. xxxiii.

(43) Dio, lib. lvi, pag. 506.

(44) Tacit. in Vita Agricolæ, cap. iv.

(45) Tacit. Histor. lib. i, cap. i.

(46) Lipsius, in Vita Taciti.

(31) Balzac's Letter to d'Abancourt. It is the sixth of book xii, and the sixth of the third part of the choice Letters, p. 128, Amsterdam edition, 1656.

(32) Patin, Letter cxcvi, pag. 171, Tom. ii.

(33) In the remark [D].

(34) See Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 305.

(35) Petrus Andreas Canonheri, Philologus, Medicus, ac Sacre Theologie Doctor Romanus, in Dissertationibus Politicis ac Historicis variis in C. Cornelii Taciti Annalium Libris, pag. 66, Edit. Franc. 1610.

(36) I have seen a political Commentary, which he published anno 1643, on the fifteen first chapters of the first book of Tacitus's Annals, and a like Commentary which he published, anno 1648, on the History of the same author.

V O L. V.

B b b b

remarks, several particulars, which relate to the life of Tacitus. He married the daughter out the year of Tacitus's nativity, which is thus: Pliny the younger, almost of the same age with Tacitus (47), was in his eighteenth year when his uncle died; that is to say, according to Lipsius, the second year of the reign of Titus. He was therefore born in the year of Rome 816; so that Tacitus being a little older than he, must have been born the last year of the Emperor Claudius, or rather, the first year of Nero. Whereupon, I say, that he was therefore but forty-four years of age when Trajan ascended the throne: and since nothing obliges us to put back the beginning of his work beyond the second, or the third year of this prince, it manifestly follows, that he was not old when he began to apply himself to it. It is certain, supposing that he undertook this work in his forty-fifth year, that it may be much better conceived that he had time to finish it, and afterwards to go about his Annals, which he carried on from the beginning of Tiberius's reign, to the death of Nero. And observe, that in writing his Annals, he proposed to himself a new enterprize when he should have finished them (48). Observe also, that his manner of writing required much time, every thing in it favours of pains, meditation, polishing, study, and the sfina lente. And lastly, observe, that the letters Pliny the younger wrote to him, either to intreat him to make mention of him, or to communicate to him some memoirs concerning the death of his uncle, seem to be of the year 102 or 103 (49); that is, of the fifth or sixth year of Trajan. Now it is certain, that Tacitus was then writing his history; and since there is great likelihood that he was not far from the time when the fire of mount Vesuvius destroyed Pliny the Naturalist, in the first or second year of Titus, we may fairly judge, that he did not long defer the beginning of his work after the installation of Trajan. IV. Lipsius conjectures (50), that Tacitus's history contained twenty books. The ground he goes upon is this, that it contained an interval of twenty-one years; and that the five first books relate only the actions of a year and some months. This is a falsity in fact, and a prodigious forgetfulness of the rule of proportion. There are more than twenty-eight years between the death of Nero, and that of Domitian, which are the two boundaries of Tacitus's history: and no man that understands the Rule of Three would reason after this manner; If fifteen months take up five books, twenty-one years take up twenty books. Note, that the years that are lost of the history of Tacitus, are not at all, in the main, less fruitful in events, than those that are left. St Jerom says, that Tacitus composed the History of the Emperors, in thirty books, from Tiberius to the death of Domitian (51). This testimony can be of no use, because the History of Tacitus does not begin at the death of Augustus; and there is no likelihood that this work and his Annals contained but thirty books. So that St Jerom has not well expressed himself. See the margin (52).

(47) See Epistle xx, of the 7th book of Pliny.

(48) Sed aliorum exitus, simul cetera illius ætatis memorabo, si effectis in quæ tendi, plures ad curas vitam produxero. Tacitus, Annal. lib. iii, cap. xxiiv.

(49) Tillemont, History of the Emperors, Tom. ii, Part. i, pag. 350.

(50) Lipsius, in Præfat. Comment. ad Hist. Tacit.

(51) Hieronym. in Zachariam, lib. v, cap. xiv, apud Vossium de Hist. Lat. pag. 159.

(52) Note, that the book which we reckon the fifth in the History of Tacitus, is cited as the fifth by Tertullian, in Libello de Spectaculis.

(53) Lucan died under Nero.

The greatest part of these mistakes of Justus Lipsius are to be found in the writings of the most learned men, who have spoken of Tacitus historically. I excuse them: for who could believe, that so able a writer had committed them in a work very short, and framed in such a manner as to make us believe, that the author of it had very attentively weighed all his words? I do not think, that his conjecture concerning the year of Tacitus's nativity is amiss, which shews a gross error of Francis Garasse, who believed, that Lucan's Pharsalia is later than Tacitus's History (53). His words are these: The first objection 'may be of those who imagine, that God takes pleasure in our calamities, and is delighted to see us exposed to tempests, rebellions, and wars, as tho' we had a barbarous and revengeful God, who bathes himself in the blood of men. Such are, in some measure, the pompous objections, and atheistical sentences of Tacitus and of Lucan, who was, in his time, accounted the father of Atheists: for they say in express terms; Tot Romanæ Republicæ clades manifestum est fuisse curæ Diis VINDICTAM, non fuisse SALUTEM: that is to say, by so many calamities, and by the divers disorders which have shaken the Republic of Rome, it plainly appears, that the gods take care to be revenged on us, and not to succour us. These are the words of Tacitus, in the first book of his History; and Lucan, who perhaps had it from him, as an aphorism, who borrows venom from the viper, says, in lofty terms.

Felix Roma quidem, civesque habitura superbos,
Si LIBERTATIS Superis tam cura fuisset, Quàm VINDICTA placet, &c.

Rome, says he, would be the most happy city in the world, if GOD took as much care of our liberty, as he delights in revenge (54).

[I]n la Mothe le Vayer, and Moreri.] The first of these two authors says (55), that the twelve last years of Nero are wanting in Tacitus's Annals. This is false: the two last years, and part of the preceding, are only wanting: this is the first fault. The second, is to say, that this author's history reached to the happy government of Trajan. A new mistake: it ended at the death of Domitian. III. It is not true, that, according to the conjectures of Lipsius, we have lost ten books of Tacitus's history: for, according to his conjectures, this work comprehended twenty books; therefore, since there remain but five, we have lost fifteen, according to the opinion of this Critic. IV. This author should not have said (56), that there are at least twenty-one years from Galba to Nerva. This is a fault of Lipsius which I have refuted, and which Vossius has also committed (57). V. It is not to be wondered at, if Tacitus having imitated Thucydides, and both of them Demosthenes . . . the first has retained I know not what harshness or austerity, which has always been observed in the style of those two Grecians (58). These words of la Mothe le Vayer contain a prodigious anachronism; for Demosthenes was much later than Thucydides. VI. The Emperor Tacitus, in that supreme dignity of the world, wherein he was placed, did, nevertheless, about two hundred years after the death of this Historian, of whom we speak, glory in the name that was common to them both, esteeming himself honoured to have him for his ancestor, and to be taken for one of his posterity. He caused his statue to be set up in all libraries, and his works to be written out ten times every year; to the end that they might pass from hand to hand, and from age to age, as they have done even to ours (59). This account is not exact: it supposes, that this emperor reigned a certain number of years; for otherwise it would be absurd to say, that he caused such or such a thing to be done every year. However it is certain, that his reign lasted only about six months. Besides, this account supposes the event answered this emperor's intentions; that is, that the books of Tacitus did pass from age to age down to ours, according to the design of the Prince who caused them to be transcribed: and yet there remains with us but a very small part of them. I do not much wonder, that the care of this emperor should not have procured to us the preservation of all the works of his ancestor: for, considering the short duration of his empire, I believe the execution of his orders went but a very little way. However it be, here is what he ordered (60): 'Cornelium Tacitum, scriptorem historiarum Augustæ, quod parentem suum eundem diceret, in omnibus bibliothecis collocari jussit: & ne lectorum incuria deperiret, librum per annos singulos decies scribi publicitus in eicis (61) archiis jussit, & in bibliothecis poni. . . . He commanded that Cornelius Tacitus, the Historian of the Cæsars, because he owned him for his ancestor, should be placed in all the libraries: and that, to prevent his works from being lost by the negligence of his readers, they should be publicly transcribed ten times in every year, and put up in the libraries.' VII. La Mothe le Vayer concludes this chapter with these words: 'It is also well known, that Tacitus did not go about writing, till he was far advanced in years, after the empire of Nerva, and under that of Trajan, as we learn from himself (62).' Here are two faults: for, in the first place, the Historian speaks not one word of his age; and, in the second place, it is very wrong to conclude that he was an old man, because he composed his work under the empire of Trajan. See the preceding remark (63). VIII. The clamours of La Mothe le Vayer against two Civilians, who spoke

(54) Garasse, Somme Theologique, pag. 440, 441.

(55) La Mothe le Vayer, Jugement on the principal Historians, pag. 307, Tom. iii, Edit. in 12mo.

(56) Ibid. pag. 308.

(57) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 159.

(58) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi supra, pag. 209.

(59) Ibid. pag. 216.

(60) Vossius, in Tacito Imperatore, cap. x, pag. m. 618, 1/2, ii, Scriptorum Hist. Augustæ.

(61) This word is without doubt corrupted; the manuscripts vary much; Casaubon and Salmasius have not ventured to decide any thing.

(62) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi supra, pag. 219.

(63) Numero III.

daughter of Agricola, whose life he wrote. Several people believe he had a son, of whom Pliny relates a very extraordinary thing [K]. It is an idle fancy to pretend that Domitian ill of Tacitus's Latin, appear to me very ill founded. He accounts those two persons, in this their delirium, more worthy of pity, than of an answer (64). He adds

(64) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi supra, pag. 209.

(65) Ibid. pag. 210.

(66) Ibid. pag. 212, 213.

(67) It is prefixed to the first volume of the Histories of Paul Jovius.

(68) Vossius, de Hist. Latin. pag. 160.

(69) Emil. Ferretus, in Castig. ad Tacitum, apud Petr. Andream Canonherium, Discurs. Polit. in C. Tacitum, pag. 2.

(70) Canonher. ibid. pag. 3.

(71) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi supra, pag. 209.

very much corrupted. He had therefore no reason to fall into so great a passion against Alciatus and Ferretus. He should not have exaggerated the clamours and invectives of Muretus (72). He neither spoke the truth, nor his own thoughts, when he said, that the cooks and mule-drivers of the ancient authors spoke, and understood the Latin tongue better, than the most learned among the Moderns, either speak or understand it. Quorum coqui & muliones multo melius quam omnes nos Latine & intelligebant & loquebantur (73). He would have been offended at this hyperbole, if another person had offered to include him in it; and there is no doubt but that he believed himself much more master of the Latin tongue than the common citizens of ancient Rome. He might be also in the right; for it is certain, that there are some foreigners, who without having seen France, speak and understand our tongue better than several Frenchmen: And I am sure, that Casaubon and Salmastius wrote better in Latin, than in their own tongue. If Mr de Tillemont (74) were to be treated at this time, as Alciatus was, there would appear a great deal of pedantry in such a censure. Balthasar Bonifacius, a great admirer of Tacitus, does nevertheless own, that his style is harsh. 'Stylus magis gravis quam elegans, asper enim parumque duriculus est, atque à Latine linguæ candore discedens (75). . . . His style is rather grave than elegant, being a little harsh and rough, and degenerating from the purity of the Latin tongue.' As for what concerns Mr Moreri, he may be blamed, first, for having a little too much exalted Tacitus's birth. II. For having asserted, that Tacitus was very old when he began his History under the empire of Trajan. III. And that the author himself observes it. He has avoided the over-sights of Charles Stephens; for he has not made this Historian flourish from the empire of Tiberius, the year of Rome 767, till the time of Vespasian, ann. 822 (76). He does not say that Tacitus, an illustrious Orator under Hadrian, lived to the time of the Vespasians, and that they promoted him to dignities, and that his History extends from Augustus to Hadrian (77). Lloyd and Hoffman have adopted all these last faults. I believe Charles Stephens copied them from Gesner (78), who had copied them from Volaterranus (79).

[K] A son, of whom Pliny relates a very extraordinary thing.] Here it is, according to Du Pinet's version. 'We read in the Chronicles, that at Salamis one named Euthymenes had a son, who in three years grew three cubits: he was very unwieldy and heavy both in motion and understanding, and yet he had got a downy beard, and a strong voice; but as soon as he was three years of age, he died suddenly with a contraction of the nerves. I have seen myself something like this, setting aside that he had no hair on the privities, in the son of Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, and receiver and treasurer of Gallia Belgica.' I quote the old French version, on purpose to have an opportunity of observing, that some people pretend, that the translator did not well understand his original. These are the words of Pliny, in the edition of Father Hardouin. Invenimus in monumentis Salamine Euthymenis filium, in tria cubita triennio adolevisse, incessu tardum, sensu hebetem, & jam puberem factum voce robusta, assumptum contractione membrorum subita, triennio circumcincto. Ipsi non pridem vidimus eadem ferme omnia, præter pubertatem, in filio Cornelii Taciti Equitis Romani, Belgicæ Gallie rationes procurantis (80). This signifies, as some would have it, that the son of Euthymenes, having grown three cubits in three years, began immediately to decrease, and was consumed at the end of three years. He lived therefore six years. I shall not decide on these two versions: but that of du Pinet does not seem to me the worst (81). I insist more upon what follows. It can not be proved from this passage, that our Tacitus had an employ in Gaul; for it is not true that Pliny speaks of him. Let us remember, that Tacitus did not marry till after Agricola, his father-in-law, had been consul. Here is the proof of it. 'Consul egregie tum spei filiam juveni mihi despondet, ac post consulatum collocavit, & statim Britannicæ præpositus est' (82). . . .

(72) See the 17th oration of the 1st volume of Muretus.

(73) Muret. ibid. pag. m. 354. The Abbot Pichon, Præfat. in Tacit. in usum Delphini, says in like manner, that the censurers of Tacitus are rude & barbari, præ equione aut colono ipsius Taciti.

(74) See his words in the text of this article.

(75) These words are related as being of Balthasar Bonifacius in the Prolegomena to Tacitus in usum Delphini.

(76) Carol. Stephanus, in Diction. voce Cornelius.

(77) Id. ibid. voce Tacitus.

(78) Gesner, in Biblioth. voce Publius, folio 572, verso.

(79) Volaterranus lib. xx, circa init. pag. m. 717, 718.

(80) Plin. lib. vii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 35, 37. Vide Senecam de Consolatione ad Marciam, cap. xxiii, pag. 762.

(81) See Salmastius in Solinum, Tom. i, pag. 44.

(82) Tacit. in Vita Agricolæ, cap. ix.

Domitian banished him [L]; and perhaps it is another, to say that he lived eighty years [M].

'The Consul agreed to marry his daughter to me, a young lady of great hopes, which he accordingly did as soon as his consulship was finished, and was himself immediately after made Prefect of Britain.' The consulship of Agricola, according to the most probable opinion (83), falls in with the 77th year of Jesus Christ; we must therefore hold, that Tacitus married in the 78th.

(83) See Tillemont, note 3, on the History of Titus, pag. m. 853, 854.

(84) See ibid. note 4, pag. 855.

(85) Note, that Pliny, lib. x, cap. xlii, p. m. 435, shews that he began this work before the death of Agrippina.

(86) See the Notæ & Emendationes of Father Hardouin, on the seventh book of Pliny, num. 65, pag. 119.

(87) In his Commentary on those words of Pliny, pag. 37.

(88) This would make me doubt, whether he was the father of the Historian.

(89) Tillemont, ubi supra, Tom. ii, Part. i, pag. 348.

+ Rationatoris honore ulurus secundum.

It appears, that this child died, aged three years, without strength or sense. Pliny had seen him a long time before, pridem. And so Tacitus his father, who had some children, before the year 77, in which Pliny wrote, is not the Historian, as Vossius thinks de Hist. Lat. lib. i, cap. xxx, pag. 158.

(90) In the Life of Tacitus. But he judged better of the thing in his Commentary, in lib. i, Hist. init. See, above, citation (40).

(91) Balch. Bonifacius, de Scripturibus Historie Romanæ.

Now Pliny died in the 79th or 80th year (84). Consequently he could not have seen a son of Tacitus who had such an extraordinary growth at three years. I do not bid you to observe, that he makes mention of this prodigious growth in the seventh book of his Natural History, a work divided into 37 books: I have no design to infer from thence, that it is very probable he had seen this some years before he finished that work; for it may be answered me, that he probably revised it after he had finished it, and that he might every where make use of the time of that revision for the date of the whole piece. We find the same date in the fourth chapter of the fourteenth book, and in the second chapter of the twenty-eighth book. The author in these two places points at the 830th year of Rome, which is the 77th of the Christian Æra. This is enough to make my objection good. Besides he says that he had seen, a long time before, this extraordinary growth, nos pridem vidimus (85). I know very well, that Father Hardouin has corrected these words, and has put non pridem vidimus. I shall let this correction of his pass; it can do me no harm, for though it should be supposed, that Pliny wrote this chapter of his History a few days after he had seen this tall child, it is not possible, that this Roman knight, of whom he speaks, should be our Tacitus. And therefore I do confidently assert, that the reason for which this commentator reads non pridem instead of nos pridem, is frivolous; he goes upon the false supposition that Pliny means the Historian, of whom I am speaking (86). He applies to him (87) the inscription recited by Reinefius; but he should have taken notice, that it was made by Cornelius Verus Tacitus (88). Now no body ever put Verus among the names of Tacitus. He may have had for his father, they are the words of Mr de Tillemont (89), Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, intendant of Gallia Belgica, [that is probably] Cornelius Verus Tacitus, of whom there is an inscription found in the country of Juliers, made when he was going to exercise a second intendantship. [Thus he had been intendant of Gallia Belgica, and the Lower Germany where Juliers is.] This intendant had a son, of whom Pliny & the Naturalist relate something extraordinary, in taking notice, that he was dead at that time: [So that this is not the Historian.] Those who from henceforward will attribute to Tacitus an employ in Gaul under Vespasian, will do well to look for better proofs than this passage of Pliny. How many learned men have been misled by it? Lippius (90) and Vossius are not the only persons. Nay, there are some, who might be censured, even though it could be reasonably pretended, that Pliny spoke of our Tacitus; for they suppose he had great military preferments, and that he governed the Lower Germany in the quality of Pro-consul. They even pretend that becoming at that time acquainted with the manners and laws of the Germans, he wrote concerning them, during his Pro-consulship the work we now have. 'Flourit diutissime in militari urbanaque disciplina & Proconsul Germaniam infirmior obtinuit, quo tempore Germanorum mores, instituta, ritus, tanta diligentia perscripsit, ut uni Tacito suam antiquitatem Germani acceptam ferant. . . . He enjoyed great posts a long time both civil and military, and obtained the Pro-consulship of the Lower Germany, at which time he wrote with so much accuracy concerning the manners, laws, and rites of the Germans, that the Germans owe the account of their antiquity to Tacitus alone.' This is what Bodin says, in his treatise concerning the method of History. Balthasar Bonifacius (91) has transcribed him without any alteration. Mr Pichon meant without doubt that Tacitus was governor of Gallia Belgica. This title is too great. However it be, here is what he says, in his Epistle Dedicatory to his Tacitus IN USUM DEDICATO. PHINI. 'Hoc autem oportet esse Tibi TACITUM acceptiorem, quod olim in Gallia tua, & quidem Belgica, quæ maximè rectoris impatiens, obtinuit Imperium, & quod hic forsitan ea ipsa meditatus est, & usu didicit, quæ scriptis mandaret ac posteris relinqueret. . . . But Tacitus ought to be the more acceptable to you on this account, because he himself formerly obtained the government of this your kingdom of France, which of all others is a country the most impatient of a ruler; and because it is very probable that in this very place he studied and became master of those subjects, which he has left explained in his writings for posterity.'

[L] It is an idle fancy to pretend, that Domitian banished him. There are some who are not content with asserting this, but even compute the duration of this exile; they make it amount to ten years, and then conclude it by the efficacy of an intercession that wrought upon Domitian. This exile in general is not founded on any proof; and as to the duration of it, it is invincibly refuted by the words of Tacitus, mentioned above in the remark [B]. They are those wherein he tells us, that he exercised the Prætorship at Rome, when Domitian celebrated the secular games. They were celebrated in the seventh year of Domitian's reign, and after that time this Prince lived not quite eight years (92). We are beholden to Lippius for having observed, that this mistake owes its rise to a vulgar custom, which makes people fond of representing illustrious men under remarkable misfortunes. This error might also proceed from a wrong method of reasoning. It was concluded, that since Domitian set himself up as a persecutor of good men, he did not spare Tacitus, who was a man of honour, and in great reputation. These consequences are too vulgar, and authors ought not to draw them. 'Exulasse sub

Domitiano quidam tradiderunt, magis tamen ut opinor, pro more vulgi, qui magnis viris insignes casus adfingere amat, quam quod ejus rei certus auctor sit. Ego legendo non aliud comperio, quam abuisse eum aliquot annis ab urbe, idque eo ipso tempore quo Julius Agricola focer ejus mortem obierit coss. Pompejo Conlega, & Cor. Prisco, non tam exilii necessitate, ut arbitror, quam tadio temporum & cupidine otii. Nam quod iidem, ut omni ex parte tam anxia diligentia consuet, decennium in exilio egisse scribunt, ac demum exorato Domitiano restitutum, Latine ut loquar, inanis fabula est (93). . . . Some have said he was banished by Domitian, but more, in my opinion, in compliance with the vulgar notion, which loves to ascribe eminent misfortunes to eminent men, than out of any just authority for it. I could never in all my reading discover any thing surer, than that he was absent for some years from Rome, and that this happened at the time of Julius Agricola his father-in-law's death, in the consulship of Pompeius Conlega, and Cor. Priscus, not so much, I think, because he was forced to it, as from a dislike of the times, and a desire of ease. For what the same authors, are so busy to say, that his banishment continued ten years, and that at last he was pardoned by the favour of Domitian, is, to speak plainly, an idle tale.' I observe also, that, though this Historian (94) has described the tyranny of Domitian in the strongest colours, yet he has not in the least insinuated, that the storm fell upon him personally. On the contrary, he acknowledges, that he had some obligations to that Prince; and is afraid that he should be suspected of suppressing the truth by way of gratitude (95). A man who had been banished, would hardly have expressed himself after this manner.

[M] And it is perhaps another, to say that he lived eighty years. The testimony I am going to cite is of no great weight. 'Vixit annos 80 ut legitur in lib. 3. Thef. Histor. (96). . . . He lived 80 years, as we read in Thef. Histor. B. 3.'

(92) See Lippius, in Vita Taciti.

(93) Lippius.

(94) In Vita Agricola, cap. ii, pag. 44, 45.

(95) See the beginning of book i, of his History.

(96) Canonbadius, in Vita Corn. Taciti, lib. i. Dicitur saum Poliorum.

T A I S N I E R (JOHN) in Latin Taisnerius, was of Ath in Hainault (a). He was preceptor to the pages of Charles V, and followed this emperor in his expedition to Tunis. He read some Mathematical lectures at Rome and Ferrara; and after he had travelled a long time, he devoted himself entirely to the writing of books (b); but making choice of a subject very unworthy of a man of judgment, he lost all his reputation (c). He betook himself to Chiromancy; and though he had gained the credit of being very successful in it, nevertheless by the great bulk of his book [A], he tired those who were desirous to benefit themselves by his instructions. Many persons were so simple as to send him the picture of their hands, on purpose that he might tell them their fortunes (d). Consult Moreri's Dictionary and Bullart's Academie. They speak at large of our Taisnerius; but whether with that order and exactness that is necessary, is what I shall examine another time. There is nothing to be found in them, concerning his being a Plagiary [B], of which he has been accused.

(a) Valer. Andreas Desfilius, Bibl. Belg. pag. 570.

(b) Jacobus Philippus Tomafius, Elog. Viro-rum illustrium, pag. 161, 162, Edit. Patav. 1630.

(c) Bullart, Acad. des Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 288, 289.

(d) See the remark [A].

[A] He nevertheleſt tired by the great bulk of his book. Consult Jacobus Philippus Tomafius; there you will find these words: 'Uno volumine quacun- que Chiromantiam attingeret complexus est. At crescente illo in vastam molem factum est ut studen- tium animos defatigarit quos sibi proposuerat erudi- endos (1). - - - He comprized in one volume every thing relating to Chiromancy. But this swelling to a prodi- gious size, wearied out the patience of the persons for whose instruction he had compiled it.' If you would know the credit this man acquired by his Chiromantic Quackery, read this passage of the same author. 'Di- viniandi munere ex manuum lineis temperamenti signa, & animi characteres varios colligebat, & spre- tis geniturum laboriosis supputationibus, ignaras curiosorum mentes, rerum suarum sciscitantibus even- tus, vaticiniis circumducebat. Jamque Viri quoque gravissimi fide prædictionibus illius haberi ceptâ, ei typos manuum suarum lineis effigiarum undique demandabant, & ab ejusdem ore, ut de privatis rebus statuerent, pendebant (2). - - - By his art of Di- vination, he found out the several temperaments, and dispositions of the mind, from the lines on the hand, and despising the tedious method of calculating nativities, he drew after him by his predictions, the ignorant minds of such as were curious to know their fortunes. And now even the most serious persons also, from the credit his art had obtained, sent him from all parts the figures of their hands, with the lines marked upon them, and depended, for the conduct of their private affairs, on what he should pronounce.'

(1) Jacob. Phil-ippus Tomafius, Elog. pag. 162.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 161.

[B] Concerning his being a Plagiary, of which he has been accused. It is pretended that he did not content himself to steal some thoughts, but that he appropriated to himself entire books, which others had published. Gabriel Naudæus reproaches him with this, with respect to a book of Bartholomew Cocles, concerning Physiognomy; and with respect to a book of Peter Peregrinus, concerning the loadstone. He de- fames him, as he deserves, for those thieveries com- mitted with such assurance. This was not committing petty-larceny, or adding the part of a pick-pocket in the Republic of Letters; but that of a corsair of Barbary: this case deserved immediate punishment on Parnassus. Let us see after what manner Gabriel Naudæus exercises justice. 'Inter recentiores qui artem ejusmodi (crisim Physiognomicam) scriptis explicarunt, potiores semper habe- re Augustinum Niphum, & Camillum Baldum, erudi- tissimos Aristotelis commentatores: Bartholomæumque Coclitum Bononiensem cujus integrum librum conva- savit, ac in suum opus mathematicum transtulit, Jo- annes Taisnerus, plagiarius insignis, & imprudentior longe Horatii Corniculâ, cum præterea tractatum editum de Magnete, à Petro Peregrino Gallo quondam editum, furto vendicavit. Quod equidem velut per transennam observandum esse duxi, ut suis bene de Republica literaria meritis honos asseratur, & ipse Taisnerus,

(3) Gabriel Nau- dæus, Bibliogra- phia Politica, pag. m. 62, 63.

Regali conspectus in auro nuper & ostro, Migret in obscuras furci mente tabernas (3). - - - Among the moderns who have wrote upon this Art (Judicial Physiognomy) you ought to esteem Augustinus Niphus; and Camillus Baldus the chief, those most learned Commentators on Aristotle: as also Bartholo- mæus Cocles of Bononia, whose whole book was pyrated, by Johannes Taisnerus, that notorious Plagiary, far more ridiculous than Horace's crow; having besides this stolen a whole treatise concerning the loadstone, written by Petrus Peregrinus, a Frenchman. Which is indeed an observation I thought proper to make by the way, that those who have justly merited of the Republic of Learn- ing may have their due honours vindicated, and that even Taisnerus himself,

Who lately such a noble figure made, With stolen robes, may seek his native shade.

Thomafius was not ignorant of this public accusation, against Taisnerius; he has mentioned it in his list of Plagiaries (4): but he did not know, nor perhaps Naudæus neither, that in the year 1574, an Italian Mathematician, published severe reflexions, and a ter- rible invective against the same Plagiary. All that he has said about it deserves to be repeated in this place. It will furnish us both with some universal instructions, relating to these thieves, and some particulars con- cerning the person we are speaking of. Besides, the book from which I have taken all this is very scarce. 'Si hos non laudamus qui aliquid ab aliis sunt mu- tuati, quid de manifestis furibus dicemus, qui vel ipsa integra aliorum volumina sibi imprudentes ad- scribunt, & quasi steriles ac scelesti plagiarii, viven- tium filiorum (est enim haud dubiè legitima proles quicquid secundum ingenium longo studio concepit, & peperit) miserandas infligunt piis parentibus or- bitates, & se, summa cum jactantia, eorum operum auctores mentiuntur, quæ magna cum infamia rap- erunt, ut fecit impurissimus omnium Joannes Taisne- rus Hannonius. Qui opusculum nostrum, demon- strationis proportionum motuum localium contra Ari- stotelem, & alios philosophos, jamdiu antea à nobis editum, & iterum impressum Venetiis anno salutis 1554, ita integrum sibi desumpsit, ut nihil præter auctoris nomen immutaverit, quid enim mutavisset, qui nec percipere poterat, quæ in ea disputatione continerentur? Homo vanus ab omni mathematica facultate alienus, qui merito propter crassissimam ig- norantiam verebatur, ne vel aliqua Syllaba sublatâ, aut addita totius tractationis inficeretur substantia. Credit (ut opinor) me jam vita functum qui furti nunquam argui posse confidit, & non intellexit suam temeritatem, qui seipsum mille argumentis qualis effect prodidit; dum utre inflato inanior sese juris docto- rem, & simul etiam musici facelli rectorem asseruit, quasi jura docere sit musici, aut jurisperiti facellum regere, & dum de magnete, & motibus, tractatus emisit, nusquam in titulis se mathematicum nomi- navit, sed poetam, eo quod crediderit poetæ, aut musici, aut jurisperiti, esse de naturalibus motibus cor- porum differere. Debebat saltem & in hoc mentiri infamis impostor, ut se mathematicum in titulis prædicaret, ut in præfatione ad lectorem ejusdem usurpati opusculi fecit, dum se matheos publice legisse Ferrariæ, & alibi, trecentis, & pluribus audi- toribus prædicat, cujus numeri auditorum ne sextam quidem partem, quispiam vidit in Italia, in auditorio cujusvis (etiam primi nominis) mathematici: quis inquam hos infames laudaverit in Flaviam legem committentes? ac non potius juxta Constantini Cæ- saris sententiam, ad Celsum Aphricæ Vicarium re- scribentis, bestius subjiciendos censet (5). - - - If those for two persons in who borrow from others are not to be commended for it, what shall we say of direct thieves, who either ridi- culously assume to themselves the whole works of others, and like barren and wicked Plagiaries, basely rob the true parents of their living offspring. (for what favour the ingenious mind has by long study conceived and dicta, and after- wards under that of Joh. Baptista Benedictus.

(4) Thomafius, Mathematician, published severe reflexions, and a ter- rible invective against the same Plagiary. All that he has said about it deserves to be repeated in this place. It will furnish us both with some universal instructions, relating to these thieves, and some particulars con- cerning the person we are speaking of. Besides, the book from which I have taken all this is very scarce. (5) Jo. Baptista Benedictus, Pa- tricius Venetus, Philosophus, in Præfatione Libri de Gnomonum Umbrarumque solarium usu. This book was printed at Turin, ann. 1574. in folio. Passus says nothing of this author in his de Scientiis Ma- thematicis. He has been mistaken in the Oxford Cata- logue: there he is spoken of first under the name of Joh. Bap- tista de Bene- dictis, and after- wards under that of Joh. Baptista Benedictus.

Cccc

arrogance to be the authors of these works, which they have most infamously stolen, as was done by Johannes Taisnerius of the country of Hainault the most impudent of them all. He claimed to himself a work of mine, containing a demonstration of the proportions of local motions, against Aristotle and other Philosophers, which I had long since published, and the second edition of which was printed at Venice in the year 1554, and that so entirely, as to change no part of it, but just the name of the author; for what could he change, who did not so much as understand one word of that controversy? A vain wretch, so thoroughly unacquainted in Mathematicks, that he very justly apprehended from his gross ignorance that the taking away or adding the least syllable, would destroy the substance of the whole discourse. He believed, I suppose, that I was dead, and took it for granted, that no body could convict him of the Plagiarism, not being aware of his own rashness, which betrayed him in a thousand instances; while, more vainly puffed up than a blown bladder, he affirms himself to be a Doctor of Law, and at the same time also, a Master of Music in a Chapel, as if it were the business of a Musician to teach law, or of a Lawyer to regulate the choir of a chapel; and while he publishes discourses on the loadstone, and motion, he no where in the title page calls himself a Mathematician, but a Poet, as believing it to belong to a Poet, or Musician, or Lawyer, to treat of the natural motions of bodies. This infamous impostor ought at least to have framed a lie on the title page by calling himself Mathematician, as he has done in his preface to the reader before that prated work, where he pretends to have read Mathematick Lectures at Ferrara, and elsewhere to three hundred and more auditors, the sixth part of which number was never known in Italy to attend the audience of any Mathematician even of the greatest name. Who, I say, would commend these notorious offenders against the Flavian Law? And not rather rank them below brutes, according to the judgment of the Emperor Constantine, writing to Celsus his Lieutenant in Africa.

(a) Fieri non potest quin Deus certas de Almamone penas fumaret, quod scientiis philosophicis introductis Mahometanorum pietatem interpellaverit. Sephardim, in Commercio ad Torrai

TAKIDDIN, a Mahometan author. I shall mention but one thing relating to him; which is, that he said, the Caliph Almamon would be infallibly punished by God, for having disturbed the devotion of the Mussulmans, by the introduction of Philosophical studies (a). This thought has nothing singular in it. It has appeared in all the countries of the world and in all ages; and at this very day we find an infinite number of people complaining of Des Cartes, and other modern Philosophers of the first rank, as having occasioned the contempt which so many persons express for devotion, and the mysteries of Christianity. This might afford matter for a large commentary [4].

Perme, apud Pocockium, Notis in Specimen Histor. Arabum, pag. 166.

Of learning, who introduced

[A] This might afford matter for a large commentary.]

A thousand things might be said upon this subject, both as to the fact itself, and the reason for it. However I shall be short, for I have already more copy than I want to make an end of this volume. As to the matter of fact, I shall be content with saying, that Philosophers have been at all times suspected of having but little religion. The antique Rhetoricians after having said, that among probable propositions, some were grounded upon what generally happens, and others upon the common opinion, alledged immediately these two examples: Mothers love their children: Philosophers do not believe the existence of the gods. Probabile est id quod fere fieri solet, aut quod in opinione positum est. . . . In eo genere, quod fere solet fieri, probabile hujusmodi est: SI MATER est, diligit filium: SI AVARUS est, negligit jurandum. In eo autem, quod in opinione positum est, hujusmodi funt probabilia: Impiis apud inferos pœnas esse præparatas: Eos, qui philosophia de operam, non arbitrari deos esse (1). -- That is probable which is confirmed by general experience, or which is commonly believed. Among the first sort from general experience, are these examples following; A MOTHER loves her child; A MISER never regards an oath. Among the latter from common belief, are these: infernal punishments are prepared for the wicked; Philosophers do not believe there are any gods. Apuleius observes, that almost all the ancient Philosophers were accused either of denying the existence of the gods, or of applying themselves to Magic. Hæc ferme communi quodam errore imperitorum philosophis obijciuntur: ut partim eorum, qui corporum causas meras & simpliciter rimantur, irreligiosos putent, eosque aiant Deos abnuere; ut Anaxagoram, & Leucippum, & Democritum, & Epicurum, ceterosque rerum nature patronos: partim autem, qui providentiam mundi curiosius vigilant, & impensius Deos celebrant, eos verò vulgò Magos nominent: quasi facere etiam sciant, quæ sciant fieri: ut olim fuerit Epimenides, & Orpheus, & Pythagoras, & Othanes (2). -- These things are generally by the ignorant vulgar, objected against the Philosophers; that one part of them who are for enquiring into the first and simple causes of bodies are irreligious, and deny the being of the gods; as Anaxagoras, Leucippus, Democritus, Epicurus, and other patrons of nature: that the others who search more curiously into the conduct of providence in the world, and worship the gods with greatest zeal, are commonly styled Magicians; as if they themselves had found out how to do those things, which they find to be done; as formerly Epimenides, Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Othanes. Our Takkidin would not have delivered over to divine justice the great Al-mamon, that protector of learning, who introduced the study of Philosophy, had he not observed the ill effect of that study. It had raised doubts in the minds of men; it had discovered to a great many people the fooleries of the Mahometan sect: and by that means the public worship, piety, and devotion, had laboured under a surprizing discouragement. Some learned men maintain, that the Arabian Philosophers professed only Mahometism outwardly, and laughed at the Alcoran in reality, because they found in it some things contrary to reason (3). A great many people are not to be beat out of the notion, that Des Cartes and Gassendus believed the real presence in the Eucharist, as little as the fabulous stories of old Greece. It is no less difficult to persuade the world, that the followers of those two great Philosophers are good Catholics; and that, if they were allowed to teach publicly their principles, they would not quickly undermine all the foundations of the Romish religion. The Protestants have not a better opinion of Des Cartes's doctrine. Generally speaking, the Cartesianes are suspected of irreligion, and their Philosophy is thought to be very dangerous to Christianity: so that, according to the opinion of a great many, the same persons, who have removed in our age the darkness which the schoolmen had spread all over Europe, have increased the number of freethinkers, and made way for Atheism, or Scepticism, or the disbelief of the greatest mysteries of Christianity. But irreligion is not only ascribed to the study of Philosophy, but also to Philology; for it is pretended, that Atheism never began to discover itself in France till the reign of Francis I. and that the first appearance of it in Italy, was when Philological learning was revived there. The less foreign learning we have, says a Catholic writer, the greater submission we express for the Christian Faith; and the most learned ages, says Baronius, have often proved the most unbelieving. The Aladinists appeared only under the reign of Almanzor, who was the most learned monarch of his age; and I find no Atheists in France before the reign of Francis I. nor in Italy till after the taking of Constantinople, when Argyropolus, Theodorus Gaza, Georgius Trebizontinus, with the most celebrated men of Greece, retired to the Dukes of Florence (4). It is certain, that most of the wits and learned Philologists, who shined in Italy, when the Belles Lettres began to revive there, after the taking of Constantinople, had but little religion. But, on the other hand, the restoration of the learned languages, and polite literature, made way for the Reformation; as the Monks, and their adherents clearly foresaw, who continually inveighed against Reuchlin, Erasmus, and the other scourges of ignorance. Thus whilst the Roman Catholics deplore the fatal consequences of the study of good literature, the Protestants

(3) Tostatus, in cap. xxviii. Ex. Suppl. XX. refert quod Philosophi inter Sacerdotes non recipientes propter hoc Alcoranum. Idem probat Ciceronem in Disp. de Verit. Relig. Christi. ex Averro. disputante contra destructiones Algazelii, & Avicennae, Metaph. lib. 14. cap. vii. Annotationes ad Religionem Medici, lib. 1. §. xxi. pag. m. 146. in hac verba, Cum Philosophia paganismi

(4) Clavigero de Sainte Honorine, Dictionnaire de l'Usage des Livres Suspects, pag. 82. Note, ibid. I do not allege it but as says a matter of fact.

Reſma, apud Pecockium, Nervis in Specimen Hi-ſtor. Arabum,
pag. 166.

(3) Tofautus, in cap. xxiii. ex Quest. XX. referit quod Philosophi inter Sacerdotes non recipientes propter hoc Alcoranum. Idem probat Calixtus in Reliq. de Verit. Religio. Christi. ex Averrois, disputante contra destructiones Algezalis, et Avicennae. Metaph. lib. ii. cap. vii. Annotata ad Religionem Medicorum, lib. i. §. xxiij. pag. m. 145. in hoc verbo, Cum Philosophi pagani- bus.

(4) Clavigny de Sainte Honorine, Discernement & Usage des Livres suspects, pag.
82. Note, that I do not allege what he says as matter of fact.

(1) Cicero, de Inventione, lib. i,
fol. m. 29.

(2) Apuleius,
in Apologia, pag 291.

(c) See Mr. Yrrien's Reflexions, Apologie pour la Réformat.
pag. 66, & seq.
of the first volume in 4to. upon what Maimbourg had said,
Hist. du Calvin.
pag. 4, that the course taken by Francis I, to receive learning in his kingdom...
proved, by a misfortune he did not foresee, an occasion of bringing in heresy into his kingdom.

impus
in herba

have all the reason in the world to praise God for it (5). They are not so much beholden to the new Philosophy, which demonstratively overthrows Transubstantiation, and all its dependencies; because the same weapons are made use of against the most essential doctrines. In a word, no unhappy is the fate of man, that the knowledge which frees him from one evil, throws him into another. Drive away ignorance and barbarity, and you put an end to superstition, and the foolish credulity of the people, so profitable to their leaders, who afterwards employ their gain only to plunge themselves into idleness and debauchery: but by putting men in a capacity of discovering such disorders, you raise in them a desire of examining every thing; and at last they are so much for enquiring and scanning, that they find nothing that will satisfy their miserable reason.

However it be, I have heard some wise men say, that the too common affectation of charging the Philosophers with impiety, is very imprudent: for how great a scandal would it be for ignorant people, if they took the pains to consider it with due attention, to find that, according to the opinion of a great many Divines, there is but little religion among great Philosophers; and that devotion is chiefly to be found among the vulgar; and that those who have most carefully examined the marks of the divine authority of the holy scripture, are commonly less pious and devout than others (6). It was much more edifying to teach, with Plutarch (7), that Philosophy is a remedy for impiety and superstition; and, with Origen, that no man can be truly pious without Philosophy. Omnino nec pium erga communem omnium Dominum esse absque Philosophia quemquam censebat (8). The mixture of good and evil, that is to be found in all human things, appears on this occasion in a particular manner. The Arabian Philosophers came to know, by their Philosophy, that the Alcoran was a false Revelation; but on the contrary many Jews forsook their religion, and embraced the Pagan Philosophy, which discovered to them, as they pretended, that Moses had prescribed them need- less laws. Multis e judæorum gente adeo peritula est opinio, quod, sub initia regni Saraceni ad Philosophiam Ethnicam defectionem fecerint, quod iis leges haud paucae inutiles & supervacaneæ viderentur (9). - - - This opinion was formerly so strongly maintained by a great many Jews, that about the beginning of the Saracen empire, they were drawn over to the Pagan Philosophy, by their looking upon several parts of the law as useless and superfluous. He confirms this. Thus the same principle, which is sometimes service- able against error, is sometimes prejudicial to truth.

(6) Juriæ, apud Saurin, Examen de la Théolog.

(7) See Plutarch, de l'Idée & Of- fide, pag. 378.

(8) St Cyran quotes that pas- sage of St Grego- ry of Neocesarea, in Panegy. in his work against Father Garasse's Somme Théologi- que, Tom. ii, cenici ad Philosophiam Ethnicam defectionem fecerint, quod iis leges haud paucae inutiles & supervacaneæ viderentur (9). - - - (9) Joan. Spence- ras, de Legibus Hebræorum, lib. ii, cap. iii, §. 1, sub fin. pag. 225; Edit. Hag. 1686.

He confirms this by the testimony of Gulielmus Parisienfis, Lib. de Legibus, p. 3, 4.

T A L A U S, King of Argos, son of Abas or Bias, and grand-son of Lynceus one of the fifty sons-in-law of Danaus, lost his crown and his life by the plots of Amphiarus (a). His son Adrastus was forced to fly to Sicyon, where some say he married the daughter of King Polybius, and succeeded him. But others will have it, that he succeeded him, because his mother was the only daughter of Polybius. See the article of ADRASTUS. Some tell us, that he, whom Amphiarus dethroned and put to death, was Pronax the son of Talau. See the scholiast upon the ninth Nemean Ode of Pindar, wherein we are told upon what the pretensions of Amphiarus were grounded: namely that Melampus having cured the daughters of Proetus King of Argos, who were grown mad, received, as a reward, one half of the kingdom of Argos, which he divided between him and his brother Bias. But Melampus left behind him a son called Antiphates, who was Oicles's father, and Amphiarus's grand-father.

T A M I R A S, was sent for from Cilicia into the isle of Cyprus, to teach the art of the Haruspices or of divining by looking into the entrails of the sacrifices. The temple of Venus at Paphos was consecrated by Cinyras; and it was said, that this god- dess, conceived and born in the sea, had landed in that place; but application was made to this inhabitant of Cilicia for the establishment I have been mentioning. Things had been so ordered, that the descendants of Cinyras and Tamiras were to preside over the ceremonies; but, that the royal family might have some pre-eminence, the family of Tamiras quickly resigned their share to them [A]; so that from thence no other priest was consulted, but of the family of Cinyras (a).

[A] The family of Tamiras quickly resigned their share. This Orthography in Hesychius's manuscripts gave Nevertheless, Hesychius mentions certain Priests of the isle of Cyprus, called Ταμिरαδαι, Tamirade. Thamyras in Tacitus, ought to be read Tamiras (1).

(a) Schol. Pin- dari, in Od. VIII Pyth. & IX Nemea.

(a) Ex Tacito, Hist. lib. ii, cap. iii.

(1) Meursius, in Cypro, pag. 50.

(a) Taken from Livy, lib. i, pag. 23.

(b) Cum divitie jam animos fa- cerent, auxit docta in matri- monium Tana- quill, summo loco nata, & que haud facile iis, in quibus nata erat, humiliora inseret es, que innotuisset. Sper- nitibus Etrur- cia Locumonen- saule advena

T A N A Q U I L, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus King of Rome, was born at Tarquinii in Tuscan. Where she was married to Lucumon, the son of a person who fled thither, being expelled from Corinth his native place. Lucumon inheriting his father's whole estate, became a very rich man; and the family of Tanaquil being one of the noblest in the town, he hoped to raise himself to some dignities; but being a son of a foreigner, he met with great obstacles (a). Tanaquil, being provoked by the flight put upon her husband, and being unwilling to lose the rank she was born to resolved to leave Tarquinii, in hopes of advancing herself in some other place (b). She therefore represented to her husband that their best way was to go and settle at Rome, where men of merit, of whatsoever country they were, might hope for the noblest preferments. Lucumon followed her advice, and had preface of his great fortune before he got to Rome. That preface was explained to him by his wife [A], for she had great skill that way. He took the name of Tarquinius. He gained the esteem and affection of the ortum, ferre in- dignitatem non potuit, oblitque ingenite erga patriam caritatis, dummodo virum honoratum vi- deret, consilium migrandi ab Tar- quinio cepit. Livius, ibid.

[A] That preface was explained to him by his wife. When they came to the Janiculum, an eagle lighted gently upon their chariot, and took off Lucumon's hat, and after having some time hovered over their chariot, with a great outcry, restored the hat very orderly to the same place. Tanaquil, sitting by her husband, embraced him, and assured him of very great fortune, explaining to him the circumstances of that preface. Upon this they entered Rome, full of high expectations. Ad Janiculum forte ventum erat: ibi ei carpento sedenti cum uxore, aquila suspensis demissa leniter alis pileum aufert: superque carpentum cum magno clau- gore volitans, rursus velut ministerio divinitus missa, capiti apte reponit: inde sublimis abiit. Accipisse id au- gurium lata dicitur Tanaquil; perita, ut vulgo Etrusci, caelestium prodigiorum mulier. Excessa & alta sperare complexa

the Romans ; and insinuated himself into the king's favour in such a manner, that the offices he obtained from him enabled him to aspire to the crown, and to succeed in his ambitious design. He was killed in his palace in the thirty-eighth year of his reign. Tanaquil was not discouraged by this severe blow ; she managed things so dexterously, that she settled the crown upon Servius Tullius her son-in-law, whose good fortune she had foretold [B] long before (c). Her memory was in veneration at Rome for several ages ; her handiworks were preserved there [C], and great virtues were ascribed to her girdle

(c) Taken from
Liv. lib. i, pag.
m. 23.

complexa virum jubet: eam alitem ea regione carli & ejus Dei nunciam venisse: circa summum culmen dominis auspiciis fecisse: levasse humano superpositum capiti decus, ut divinitus eidem redderet. Has spes cogitationesque suum portantes, urbem ingressi sunt (1).

(1) Titus Livius,
lib. i, cap.
xxxiv, pag. m.
23. See also Dionysius Halicarnassicus, lib.
iii, cap. lxx,
where the thing is more particularly related than by Livy.

[E] She had foretold the good fortune of Servius Tullius. He was born and educated in the palace of King Tarquin. One day a fire was seen about his head whilst he slept: the great noise that was made at the sight of this prodigy, obliged that Prince to go and see what was the matter. Some body had a mind to throw water upon the fire, but Tanauquil prevented it, and ordered that the child should not be disturbed, till he awaked of himself. He awaked soon after, and the fire was no more seen. Then the Queen took her husband aside, and told him that this child would one day support the royal family in their adversity, and that he ought to be bred up as a person of high expectation. This advice was followed, great care was taken of the education of that child, who became so accomplished that none was thought more worthy of being the King's son-in-law. He succeeded.

(2) Taken from Livv, ibid.

(3) A town of Italy, which was besieged, taken, ransacked, and burnt by Tarquinius Priscus. Dionys. Halicarn. lib. iii, cap. lxxiii.

(4) Τὴν δὲ Τανακυλίδε τάτε ἀλλὰ σοφὴν ἦσαν, καὶ δὴ καὶ τὰ μαντικὰ ὕδατος χεῖρον τυρρηνῶν ἐτι-μαίνον, ἐλ-πὴν πρὸς αὐτὸν. Taniqui-lem, uxorem, & alioqui fapientem, & di-vinandi scientia nulli Etruscorum
secundam, dixit Dionys. Hali-carn. lib. iv,
circa init. pag.
207.

(5) See Plutarch, in Vita Romuli, pag. 18.

(6) Taken from Dionysius Hali-
carnasseus, lib.
iv. init.

Tarquinius accordingly (2). Some say, that Tarquin was the wife of Servius Tullius, who was killed in defending his principality of Corniculum (3). They add, that this woman was with child, and that she was known among the other women-slaves, regard to her quality. Tanaquil set her at liberty, and received her into her palace, where she was delivered of a boy. This is likely enough, but not wonderful enough for all sorts of Historians : for which reason some pretended that the birth of a King of Rome, of such a mean extraction, was to have some more mysterious in it. Therefore they supposed, that Ocrisia, widow of the Prince of Corniculum, was for some time a slave in Tanaquil's palace before she was made free ; and that while she was a slave she perceived in the chimney the figure of a man's privilege. She acquainted the King and Queen with it. When the King saw this prodigy he was amazed at it : the Queen, who was as well skilled in prefaces as in the best Augur in Etruria (4), told her husband, that it was decreed by fate, that a person of merit more than human, should be born in the palace ; and that the figure, which appeared in the chimney, was to be his father, and that the woman who should have to do with that figure, would be his mother. Tarquin being informed by some men well skilled in such things, that Tanaquil gave a right explication of that prodigy, resolved to make the woman, who had seen that member first, to lye with it : she was therefore dressed up like a bride, and brought into the chamber where that figure was. They left her alone, and she was enjoyed by some Genius, whether it was Vulcan, or the household god. That figure was never seen afterwards. Ocrisia was got with child, and brought to bed at the usual time (5). The same thing almost has been said of Romulus's mother (6). If there had not been Annalists at Rome a long time before Rhetoric was taught there, I should be apt to think, that the declamations which the Sophists put their scholars upon, had been converted into historical relations ; for it is very likely that the young Rhetoricians were allowed to feign whatever they had a mind to, in their Panegyric essays. The design of those fictions was to discover whether they had any invention, and whether they were able to turn and handle a commonplace with dexterity. They were therefore not blamed for their supposing a divine, miraculous, and very surprising origin. But this must have occasioned great abuses, if the most ingenious pieces of those young men had been preserved in the archives, and looked upon, some ages after, as historical relations. How do we know but that most of the antient fables owe their original to a custom of making Panegyrics upon the antient Heroes, on their festival days, and preserving those pieces that appeared to be the best.

See what will be said about Martyrologies, in the article VALERIUS.

[C] Her valentius were preserved.] Varro, contemporary with Cicero, affirms, that he had seen in Sangus's temple, Tanquil's distaff and spindle, with the wool upon it which she had been spinning; and that they kept in the temple of Fortune, a royal robe which he wrought, and Servius Tullius wore. Pliny, who relates it, adds, that this was the reason why the maids, who married, were followed by a person, who carried a distaff and a spindle, with wool and yarn upon them. He also says that this queen was the first who wove that sort of garment, which was given to young lads to wear, when they put on the Toga Virilis, and to maids when they married. Morelli has committed a gross mistake: he takes the tirones in Pliny to mean new soldiers, instead of understanding by that word the boys, who had lately left off the gown of childhood, the prætexta. Here follows the whole passage of Pliny (7). 'Lanam in colo & fuso Tanquilis, quæ in templo Fortunæ, in regali veste, quæ Servio Tulio

Pliny (7). 'Lanam in colo & fulo 1 Tanquilus, que eadem Caia Cecilia (8) vocata est, in templo Sangi durasse, prodente se, auctor est M. Varro : factamque ab ea toga regiam undulatum in sede Fortuna, qua Ser. Tullius fuerat usus. Inde factum, ut nubentes virgines comitaretur colus compta, & fusus cum flamine. Ea prima texuit reftam tunica, quales cum toga pura tirones induuntur, novaque nuptæ. . . . We have M. Varro's authority, that the diſſaft and ſpindle of Tanquil, who was alſo called Caia Cecilia, was remaining in the temple of Sanguis, where he himſelf met with them; and that there was in the temple of Fortune a royal robe made by her in a waving form, which Servius Tullius had made uſe of. From rubence it came that virgins, in their matrimonial ceremony, were attended with a diſſaft full of wool, and a ſpindle of yarn. She firſt of all wove the ſtrait veſt, which the young ladies wear with the toga virilis, and brides on their wedding-day.' I do not know why Father Hardouin prefers Plutarch's opinion to that of Varro, and Verrius. ' Verius Plutarchus in quæſt. Rom. pag. 271.
uxorem ait fuiſſe (Caia) Ceciliam) aniam e Tarquinii liberis : eideſque in templo Sancti ſanctus priſcis temporibus poſitam cum ſandalis & fuſo, quæ domo actæ vitæ induſtrique argumento eſſent (9). . . . Plu-tarch with greater truth affirms, that Caia Cecilia was the wife of one of Tarquin's ſons : and that a ſtatue had been of old erected in honour to her in the temple of Sancus, with ſandals and a ſpindle, which were emblems of her induſtrious and domeſtic life.' It is more reaſonable to think, that this Caia Cecilia, whoſe ſtatue in braſs, with ſandals and ſpindle, were to be ſeen in Sancus's temple, was the wife of the firſt Tar-quin, than to think ſhe was the wife of one of Tarquin's ſons. I know Dionyſius Halicarſaſſeus ſup-poſes (10) that the firſt Tarquin had a ſon, who was married, and was the father of the two ſons-in-law of Servius Tullius ; but neither he, nor any other Hiſto-rian ſays one word concerning the merit of the woman, who married that ſon of Tarquin. And yet ſhe muſt have been very illuſtrious, if the Romans paid her the honour mentioned by Plutarch. Was ſhe the wife of one of the laſt Tarquin's ſons ? The Romans could never have had ſuch a veneration for the daughter-in-law of a tyrant, whom they had expelled with his whole family, and whoſe memory was always execrable to them ? Was ſhe the firſt wife of Tarquinus Superbus ? I know very well ſhe was a good woman (11), but her merit is not to be compared with that of Tanquil. She never was queen at all, ſhe died young, and therefore had not the opportunities of ſhew-ing her excellencies, as Tanquil had, who lived a long time on the throne. We may therefore ſay, that the monuments preſerved in Sancus's temple, belonged to that queen, and not to the wife of one of Tarquin's ſons, and boldly affirm that Feſtus and Pliny, or rather Verrius and Varro, have been more exact than Plutarch ;

(7) Plin. lib. viii,
cap. xlviii, pag.
m. 228, 229.

(8) Festus observes, that Tannaquil, being at Rome, took the name of Caia Cæcilia. Her husband, to comply with the custom of the Romans, called himself Lucius Tarquinius, as Dionysius Halicarnæensis observes, lib. iii. cap. lxxi.

12- (9) Hardinus
in Plinius, ibid.

was (10) Lib. iv, cap.
of iv.

(11) Idem, Dionys. Halicarn.
ibid. cap. xxxiii,
pag. 823, Edit.
Lat. in 8vo,
1615.

(d) Notior est marito suo Tanaquil, illum inter multa regum nomina jam abscondit antiquitas, haec rara inter famulas virtus girdle [D]. St Jerom observes, that Tarquin was not so well known as his wife (d). He adds, that the admirable virtue of that queen is too strongly impressed on the memory of all ages, ever to be forgotten. Yet it seems one might infer from some passages in ancient authors, that she was looked upon as a woman, who had been too imperious [E]. It is not true that she was alive when Tarquinius Superbus put his brother to death, nor that she was the mother of this Tarquin [F]. The Historian, who altius saeculorum omnium memorie, quam ut excidere possit, infixit. Hieronym. adv. Jovinian.

shews

Plutarch; this may be placed among the mistakes of the latter, which are very numerous. Perhaps it will be objected to me, that those sandals, and that spindle, do not suit with a queen so intriguing as Tanaquil. The design of those monuments was to honour the memory of a woman, who seldom went abroad, and kept close to her distaff: but was this Tanaquil's character? I answer, that she was indeed an able queen, and a stateswoman, and that she shewed a great deal of conduct and resolution upon proper occasions; but this was no hindrance to her applying herself to her distaff and her needle, for her ordinary employments.

[D] Great virtues were ascribed to her girdle. If I had said that it was preserved in order to work miracles I should have expressed myself wrong; for the Romans had not recourse to this girdle as to a Moral cause, but as to a Physical one. They supposed that Tanaquil had found out excellent remedies against distempers, and that she had enclosed them in her girdle. And therefore those who got some scrapings of it, believed they should be cured by them, not because the soul of that queen would reward their faith, but because they had some particles of the remedies contained in that girdle. So that no exact parallel can be made between those who had recourse to Tanaquil's statue, in order to rub her girdle, and those who endeavour to obtain a piece of St Hubert's stole, or to have their beads touched by some relic. There is a great deal of credulity on both sides. I leave it those, who have leisure, to examine whether old Rome equalled the new in this respect; and to assist them a little in their enquiry, I shall relate the words of my author. 'Prædia Verius vocari ait ea remedia quæ Cæcia uxor Tarquinii Prisci invenisse existimatur, & immixtisse zonæ suæ qua præcincta statua ejus est in æde Sancti qui Deus Dius Fidius vocatur, ex qua zona periclitantes ramenta fumunt: ea vocari ait prædia quod mala prohibeant (12). - - - Verrius says, that those remedies are called prædia, which Cæcia Cæcia, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus, is supposed to have found out, and incorporated with her girdle, which is placed about her statue in the temple of Sancus, who is a god, known by the name of Dius Fidius; from which girdle those who are in any danger take some of the scrapings: he says they are called prædia, because they prevent ill accidents.' What Pliny relates of Pelops's rib, is much more miraculous. It was shewn as a remedy, Elide solebat offendi Pelopis costa quam eburneam affirmabant (13). - - - At Elis used to be shewn Pelops's rib, which they affirmed to be ivory. Here is a relic which wrought miracles among the Heathens: for Pliny had been saying, that certain members of some people have the virtue of curing distempers (14), he must therefore mean that this part of Pelops had that faculty. So that Charles Stephens is only to be blamed, for his making no distinction between what he infers from Pliny's words, and what Pliny himself says. Such a distinction ought never to be neglected: those, who take no care to observe it, occasion many authors to quote, as the words of an ancient writer, what is but a paraphrase, or a consequence drawn by some Modern. These are Charles Stephens's words (15): 'Ad quem quidem humerum (16) post ejusdem Pelopis mortem varia morborum sanabantur genera, & multiplicia edebantur miracula. Plin. libro decimo nono, capite tertio. - - - By which shoulder, after Pelops's death, various kinds of distempers were cured, and a great many miracles performed.' Lloyd and Hoffman have not rectified this passage in the least, nor even the false citation contained in it.

A French author, who lived in the XVIth century, tells a story which he would never have been able to prove. The Tarquins, says he (17), caused a statue to be erected in the middle of their palace, with only steps on, a distaff and a spindle, that those who should succeed their family, might imitate their assiduous dil-gence, in minding domestic concerns, without stirring abroad. Thus you see how the passage I have cited from Pliny, concerning Tanaquil's statue, has been misrepresented. Every body takes upon him to alter some circumstance in what he quotes: by this means matters of fact are corrupted, and soon perverted by those who cite them.

[E] She was looked upon as a woman who had been too imperious.] This is what many persons infer from these words of Juvenal:

Consultis iſtericæ lento de funere matris,
Ante tamen de te TANAQUIL tua (18).
Your Tanaquil would from the quizzard know
Her mother's fate, but first when you're to go.

(18) Juvenal. Sat. VI, ver. 563.

And from these words of Aufonius:

.... Tanaquil tua nefciat iſtud.
Tu contemne alios (19).

(19) Aufon. Epist. xxiii, ver. 31.

If from your Tanaquil the tale you hide,
You're very safe from all the world beside.

This seems to signify, that the wives, who took too much upon themselves, were called Tanaquils. It is Scaliger's opinion. 'Uxorem sanctissimam Paulini, cujus meminit Ambrosius Epist. XXXVI vocat Tanaquilem Aufonius, ridens scilicet: quia ei erat addictus Paulinus. Et, ut ex eodem loco Ambrosii cognoscimus, videtur secutus uxoris consilium Paulinus in secessu Nolano. Quare vocat eam femininam Tanaquilem poeta noster: quia illis temporibus ita solerent uxores vocare, quæ imperabant maritis (20). - - - The pious wife of Paulinus, mentioned by Ambrosius, Epist. XXXVI, is, by Aufonius, by way of banter, called Tanaquil; because Paulinus was very obsequious to her. And from the same passage of Ambrosius we find, that Paulinus followed his wife's advice in his retirement to Nola. This was the reason of our Poets calling his wife Tanaquil; because that was the name commonly given in those days to wives who governed their husbands.' He confirms it by a passage in Sidonius Apollinaris, wherein Chilperic's wife, who had a great ascendancy over her husband, is called Tanaquil; she is also compared with Agrippina. Quod principaliter medetur afflictis, temperat Lucum monem nostrum Tanaquil sua, & aures mariti virofa susurrorum face complectas, opportunitate falsi sermonis eruderat, cujus studio factum scire vos par est, nihil interim quieti fratrum communium apud animum communis patroni juniorum Cybistrarum venena nocuisse, neque quicquam (Deo propitiante) nocitura; si modo, quandiu præfens potestas Lugdunensem Germaniam regit, nostrum suumque Germanicum præfens Agrippina moderetur (21). - - - Her principal care was to relieve the afflicted, and our Lucum was so far governed by his Tanaquil, that she guarded his ear against the venomous insinuations of subversers, by the sharpness of her discourse; nor is it amiss for you to know that it was owing to her, that the malice of the junior Cybistras was hindered from doing the brotherhood of Freres any ill, and by the favour of Heaven will always be hindered; so long as the present French government shall see the present Agrippina continue her ascendancy over her and our Germanicus. Here is a prince under his wife's direction; but because such a direction proved advantageous to his subjects, it is to Tanaquil's honour. It ought to be inferred from it, that if the first Tarquin was governed by his wife, it was no misfortune. Another Commentator upon Aufonius observes, that Paulinus was not well pleased to have his wife compared with a queen, ambitious, and addicted to Magic (22); he would have liked better to have had her compared with Lucretia (23).

[F] It is not true that she was living, when ... nor that she was the mother of this Tarquin.] The two daughters of Servius Tullius and of Tarquinia, the daughter

(20) Solig. in Aufon. Epist. xxiii, pag. 678.

(21) Sidon. Apollinar. Epist. vii, lib. v, pag. 338.

(22) Moleste tulisse videtur Paulinus in Epistola ad Aufonium prima & secunda: & Lucretie illi pudicissimæ matrone comparari maluit, quam isti Tanaquil, ambiciose mulieris, & sage. Vincit in Aufonium, Epistola xxiii, pag. 678.

(23) Nec Tanaquil mihi, sed Lucretia conjux, - - - Nor is my wife a Tanaquil, but a Lucretia, says he in another place.

(12) Sæxus Pompeius Festus, de verborum significacione, voce Prædia.

(13) Plinius, lib. xxviii, cap. 10, pag. m. 568.

(14) Quorundam partes medicæ sunt sicuti dicimus de Pyrrhi regis pollice.

(15) In Dictionario, voce Pelops.

(16) Pliny says costa, and not humerus; But he is the only author, who mentions the ivory rib of Pelops. All the rest speak of the shoulder.

Humeroque Pelops insignis eburneo. And Pelops for his ivory shoulder fun'd. Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver. 7.

(17) Franc. Tillet, of Tournai, in his Philogæne, p. 120, Paris 1578.

VOL. V. No. CXXVI.

shews the falsity of it, has been more successful in confuting his predecessors [G] than in avoiding daughter of Tarquinius Priscus and of Tanaquil, were married to Lucius Tarquinius, and Aruns Tarquinius. Those two brothers were not like one another in any thing, any more than their two wives: one of them was an honest man, and the other a profligate: one of the Tullia's was an honest woman, and the other worthless. The latter was married to the honest man; and the other to the profligate. The wicked Tullia proposed to the wicked Tarquin to marry her: she promised him to make away with her husband, and made him promise her to kill his wife: and before they parted, they committed incest. Ἀρμένιος δὲ χεῖλαι τὰς αἰρήσεις ὁ Ταρκύνιος, καὶ αὐτίκα δὲς αὐτῇ πύσεις, καὶ λαβὼν τὰ πρωτόλεια τῶν ἀνδρῶν γάμων, καὶ διαπραξάμενος, ἀπὸρχεσθαι. Libenter conditionem accepit Tarquinius, moxque data et accepta fide, ac delibato in-

(24) Dionys. Halicarn. lib. iv, pag. 234, Edit. Lips. 1691.

(25) Livius, lib. i, pag. 29.

(26) Dionys. Halicarn. ubi supra.

(27) Idem, lib. iii, pag. 211.

(28) Idem, lib. iv, pag. 234.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 211.

cestarum nuptiarum fructu, abiit (24). Aruns Tarquinius was soon after poisoned by his wife, and the eldest Tullia by her husband; and then the two murderers were not long without marrying together; rather without the king's opposition, than with his consent, magis non prohibente Servio quam approbante (25). Fabius Pictor had said, in his Roman History, that Tanaquil buried Aruns Tarquinius. For which he is severely censured by Dionysius Halicarnassus (26), who shews, that Tanaquil must have been at that time 115 years old. Here is the proof of it. Tarquinius Priscus was at least twenty-five years of age, when he went to settle at Rome (27). It is very probable his wife was twenty. Now they came to Rome the first year of the reign of Ancus Martius, according to some Historians, or the eighth, according to others. Let us take the latter opinion; for if they did not come to Rome sooner, they did not certainly come later; since all the Historians are agreed, that Ancus Martius, in the ninth year of his reign, sent Tarquin against the Latins, in quality of General of the horse. Since therefore that prince reigned twenty-four years, it follows, that when he died Tarquin had attained his forty-second year, or thereabouts, and Tanaquil the thirty-seventh year of her age. To which if you add the thirty-eight years of this Tarquin's reign, you will find that he died at eighty years of age, and that he left Tanaquil seventy-five years old. Now Aruns died the fortieth year of the reign of Servius Tullius, who succeeded this Tarquin. Ἐν ταῖς ἐνιαυτοῖς ἀναγραφαῖς κατὰ τὸν τεσσαρακοστὸν ἐνιαυτὸν τῆς Τυλλίας ἀρχῆς τὸν Ἀρύναν τελευτήσασθαι παραλέγεται. In annalibus invenimus anno regis Tullii quadragesimo defunctum Aruntem (28). If therefore Tanaquil had been then alive, she must have been 115 years old. Nothing can be more exact than this computation of Dionysius Halicarnassus, nor more reasonable than the liberty he takes of censuring the negligence of Fabius Pictor. Οὕτως ὀλίγον ἐστὶν ἐν ταῖς ἱστορίαις αὐτῷ τὸ περὶ τὴν ἔξτασιν τῆς ἀληθείας ἀτακτικῶς. Adeo parum laboris hic scriptor impendit perquirendæ veritati historice (29). -- So little pains appears in the history of this author towards the discovering of truth. He proves the same Fabius Pictor, and several other Historians, guilty of the like carelessness, who affirm, that the two Tarquins, the sons-in-law of Servius Tullius, were the sons of King Tarquin. This was giving relations of things without regarding the absurdities that might follow from them. Παταπασί γὰρ ἀπεικτικῶς καὶ βαθυμῶς οἱ συγγραφεῖς αὐτῶν ταύτην ἐξηγνοῦσιν τὴν ἱστορίαν, ὅθεν ἐξηλατότερος τῶν ἀναρτήσεων αὐτῆν ἀδυνάτων τὸ καὶ ἀτόπων. Omnino enim inconsiderate ac negligenter historiam hanc prodiderunt scriptores Latini, non excussis absurdis & impossibilibus quibus fides ipsorum elevetur (30). -- For their writings have delivered this history altogether inconsiderately and rashly, not in the least examining whether impossibilities and absurdities lie against it. Let us see his proofs. Since Tanaquil was seventy-five years old, when she lost her husband, the youngest of her sons must have been at that time twenty-five years of age: for women leave off child-bearing, by that time they are fifty years old. The other son must have been twenty-seven years of age. Would they have been so silly as to suffer Tanaquil to deprive them of the crown, in favour of Servius Tullius? Would he have been so foolish and unnatural as to exclude them from it? All these absurdities are strongly represented by the author. He adds, that if Tarqui-

nus Superbus had been twenty-seven years of age, when Tarquinius Priscus was killed, he must have been above seventy when he dethroned his father-in-law, and above ninety-five when he was expelled from Rome, and about 110 when he left off making war in person with the Romans. And yet he is represented as a man, who was in the flower of his age, when he usurped the throne. He commanded at the siege of Ardea, when the Romans dethroned him. He endeavoured, for the space of fourteen years, to recover the throne, being present at several battles (31), and discharging all the functions of a General. Some Historians, being sensible of these absurdities, have supposed, that he was not the son of Tanaquil, but of one Gegania, the second wife of Tarquinius Priscus. But, besides that they have no proof for it, there being no monuments extant, wherein Gegania is mentioned, they involve themselves in several difficulties: they must advance, that Tarquinius Priscus being about eighty years of age, and having two daughters married, did, nevertheless, marry again, and had children by his second wife. These last objections of Dionysius Halicarnassus are not very strong: for it might be answered, that Gegania was married before Tarquin was extremely old, and that she would not have been the only woman that has born children by a husband about eighty years old: and that a king, who has only daughters, is willing, tho' he be never so old, if he finds himself not quite decayed, to try whether he can get sons. This Historian had forgot one of the strongest objections which he could have made use of; he does not take notice that, according to the general tradition, Tanaquil did so cunningly manage matters, after Tarquin's death, that she raised Servius Tullius to the throne. Which shows what is said of Gegania, to be fabulous and romantic. How surprising is it after all this, that Dionysius (32) should have found out but one author (33), who said that the two sons-in-law of Tullius were not the sons of the first Tarquin, but his grandsons. The opinion of this single author has been adopted by that great Historian. Livy was not so judicious; he rather chose to follow the crowd (34), and thereby involved himself in a great many difficulties, injurious to his memory. See Laurentius Valla's Dissertation upon that subject. One can hardly apprehend how to great a man as Livy should commit so many faults, in his account of the Tarquins. The greatest objections that can be raised against Dionysius Halicarnassus is this, that Tanaquil would not have endeavoured to place her son-in-law, Servius Tullius, on the throne, had she had two grandsons: but it may be answered, that they were in their cradle, and that the state of affairs required a successor, of an age that might enable him to reign vigorously, and by himself. She was obliged therefore to prefer her son-in-law to her grandsons.

[G] The Historian . . . has been more successful in confuting . . . than in avoiding mistakes himself.] He fell into his own snare; for he ascribes to Tanaquil a daughter, of whom it is no less absurd, that she should be the mother, than that Lucius Tarquinius, and Aruns, should be her sons. He pretends (35), that Brutus was the son of Tarquinia, the daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, and of Tanaquil; and says, that Brutus was very young, when his father and eldest brother were put to death, by order of Tarquinius Superbus. Let us turn his arguments against himself. If the mother of this Brutus was Tanaquil's daughter, she was twenty-five years of age, when her father was assassinated, and sixty-nine when Tarquinius Superbus usurped the crown. Brutus must then have been nineteen years of age at least. It is not likely that Tarquin put to death his brother-in-law, and his nephew, the same year he took away Servius Tullius's life. It is probable he had the policy to leave some intervals between his great crimes. We may therefore say, that Brutus was at least twenty years of age, when his father was put to death; but if he had been of that age, would he not have had an opportunity shewing his parts? Whoever undertakes to conceal a great courage, a noble soul, and a great design, under the outside of a fool, must needs be a man of a great genius to do it consistently. Brutus did admirably succeed in hiding those things, under the false appearance of stupidity. He therefore had a great address, and noble qualifications: these

(31) According to Livy, lib. ii, pag. 48, he drove his horse against the Roman Dictator, at the head of his army, and was wounded.

(32) Lib. iv, pag. 213.

(33) Lucius Plo Frugi.

(34) Hic L. Tarquinius, Prisci Tarquini regis filius nepos fuerit, periculum liquet: pluribus tamen auctoribus filium crediturum. Titus Livius, lib. i, pag. m, 29, A.

(35) Dionys. Halicarn. lib. iv, pag. 264.

avoiding mistakes himself.

these he must have discovered before his father's death ; and therefore would have had the same fate with his eldest brother : the tyrant would have destroyed them both, for fear they should revenge the death of their father. It must therefore be said, that Brutus had not yet discovered his natural endowments, consequently he was not nineteen years of age, when Tullius was dethroned. Let us allow him to be fifteen, as I have done in his article (36), according to which supposition he will appear to be born in the fifty-fourth year of his mother's life, which will destroy some of the objections of Dionysius Halicarnassensis.

(36) See the remark [D] in that article.

Laurentius Valla urges against Livy, the argument taken from the age of Tarquin's sons, as if that Historian had said, that Brutus and they were of the same age : but I do not find that Livy says so, nor that it can be inferred from Brutus's going with them to Delphi. This would prove a very strong argument against Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who tells us, that the marriage of Tarquin and Tullia falls in the fortieth year of Servius Tullius's reign (37) ; from whence it follows, that Tarquin's children were but two or three years of age, when their father usurped the throne. If therefore it was necessary for Brutus to be nearly of the same age, he must have been born in the 65th, or 66th year of his mother's life. I would not much insist upon this proof : for tho' that Historian informs us, that Tarquin would have Brutus to be bred up with his own children, it is not allowable to charge him with having pretended that they were not a great deal younger than Brutus. Διατίθεσθαι τε μετὰ τῶν οἰκείων παίδων ἐπείτρεπε, ἢ διὰ τιμῆς, ὥς ἐκκαπίστο πρὸς τὴν πύλιν, οἷα δὴ συγγενῆς, ἀλλ' ἵνα γέλωτα παρέχῃ τοῖς μισοῦσιν, λέγων τε ἀνὴρα πολλὰ, καὶ πρᾶτον ὁμοῖα τοῖς κατ' ἀλλοθίων ἡλιθίοις. Verfarique inter liberos suos patiebatur, non bonoris causa, ut videri voluit, quasi cognatum ; sed ut ridiculis dictis fastidium oblectamento esset adolescentibus, quemadmodum solent veri fatui (38). A youth of eighteen or twenty years may be placed with Princes of seven or eight years of age, to be their companion ; especially when such a familiarity, a vain piece of honour, is only designed for their diversion. In reality, it must of necessity be acknowledged, that they were younger than he ; for he had children old enough to engage in a conspiracy, when (39) the eldest of Tarquin's sons was not yet thirty years of age. I must take notice of a mistake in these four propositions of Dionysius Halicarnassensis : I. That if Tarquinius Superbus had been the son of the first Tarquin, he would have been twenty-seven years old, when the first Tarquin was killed. II. That Servius Tullius would have been only three years older than he. Τετρί μόνον ἔτεσι διαίρεσιν προεσφύετο. Ἰν. Triennio tantum eorum alterum antecederet (40). III. That Servius Tullius was forty years in possession of the crown, which was placed upon his head, after the death of the first Tarquin. IV. And that therefore, Tarquinius Superbus would have been about seventy years old, when Servius Tullius was dethroned. This is a very false consequence ; and rather than ascribe it to

(37) Dionys. Halicarn. lib. iv, pag. 234.

(38) Id. ibid. pag. 264.

(39) The year in which Tarquin was expelled. But he was expelled the 25th year of his reign and he began to reign four years after he married Tullia ; for Servius Tullius was dethroned the 44th year of his reign.

(40) Ibid. pag. 212.

the Historian, I should chuse to say, that the transcribers skipped the word τέτταρα, quatuor ; for he could not be ignorant that Servius Tullius reigned forty-four years.

Have you observed, said one to me the other day, that Henry Glareanus (41), having read Valla's Dissertation, and Dionysius's Arguments against Fabius Pictor's opinion, does nevertheless adopt that opinion ? It is upon this foot he has branched out the pedigree of the Tarquins. He makes the two sons-in-law of Servius Tullius to be the sons of the first Tarquin : he gives him also Brutus's mother for his daughter. I do not much wonder, that Stephen Pasquier (42) has committed the same fault (43), for, perhaps, he never heard of Valla's book, nor took any notice of the dispute of Dionysius Halicarnassensis against Fabius Pictor, and the other Roman Historians. I know Glareanus acknowledges, that the opinion of Dionysius is grounded on good reasons, multis id ac dignis finis affructus argumentis. Generally speaking, they are the same with those made use of by Laurentius Valla. However, I believe, with Glareanus, that he did not steal them from this ancient Historian : he had read the old authors : but after all, more learned men than he are not aware while they are composing, that such or such things are to be found in Plutarch, or Diodorus Siculus, &c. He protests, he knew not that Dionysius Halicarnassensis had made use of those arguments, and he is much more ingenuous than Perottus and Politian in acknowledging from what authors he takes what is not his own. Nisi quis Dionysium ab eo non lectum, atque eum suapte hoc ingenio expicatum contendat, quod ipse fatetur in priore defensione adversus Benedictum Morandum quendam. Nam ut de Valla aliud suspicer ejus candor obstat. Liberè enim ac ingenuè ubique fateri solet, per quos profecerit, & unde habuerit quod scriperit : secus certè atque Perottus in suo cornu, aut in suis operibus Politianus, gloriolæ ac popularis auræ captatores, ut mihi quidem visum est, etsi bonæ literæ eis multum debent (44). -- Unless any one will insist that he had never read Dionysius, but had fished this out by his own ingenuity, as he confesses in a former defence against one Benedictus Morandus. For to suspect any thing else of Valla, his candor forbids. Since he freely and ingenuously every where owns the authors he is beholden to, and from whom he borrows what he writes : a conduct certainly very different from that of Perottus and Politian in their works, who seem to me to be ambitious of a little glory and popular applause, tho' otherwise the learned world is not a little indebted to them. I heard this person out patiently, and afterwards shewed him, that Glareanus declares plainly enough against Livy, and acquaints his readers, that he gives the genealogy of the Tarquins only according to the plan of that author. I farther alleged a very probable reason against those, who charge Valla with Plagiarism in this particular, viz. that he did not make use of an observation which might have strengthened his arguments, and was to be met with in Dionysius Halicarnassensis (45).

(41) Glareanus, in Annotationibus ad Librum I. T. Livii, pag. m. 40.

(42) In the 7th letter of the 9th book, pag. m. 546.

(43) Except that he says, pag. 548, that Brutus was Tarquin's cousin-german ; where-in he is mistaken.

(44) Glareanus, ubi supra.

(45) Dionysius Halicarnassensis shews, that Lucumon went to Rome the 8th year of Ancus's reign at the farthest ; from whence it follows, that he lived 16 years at Rome before he was a king. But Valla says he lived there only ten years.

TANDEMUS (a), an Heretic, who rose in Germany, under the Emperor Henry V, about the year 1124, and spread his errors particularly among the citizens of Antwerp. He was a lay-man, who had his tongue well hung, and in subtilty of wit, eloquence, and many other respects, exceeded the greatest scholars of his time. He was magnificent in his apparel [A], kept a good table, and was attended by three thousand armed men ; by whose means he brought about what the charms of his language could not effect. He had infatuated his followers to such a degree, that they drank the water in which he bathed himself, and preserved it as a relic. One may very well wonder, though perhaps it is no wonder at all, how he could seduce many people with doctrines and actions so shocking as his were. He maintained, that it was no sensual action, but rather a spiritual one, to lye with a maid in her mother's presence, and with a wife in the sight of her husband, and he himself practised that doctrine. He killed those whom he could not convince. He ascribed no virtue to the sacrament of the Eucharist, and acknowledged no distinction between lay-men, and those who had taken orders. A priest

(a) He is also called Tanchelinus.

[A] He was magnificent in his apparel. This is a killing blow for Moreri, who says (i), that Tandemus revived the Heresy of the Adamites. These had for their distinguishing character the doctrine of nakedness : but no body observes, that Tandemus was for having every one to shew his whole body, as Adam and priest he happened to meet with in a boat, gave him a blow on the head, which killed him. His errors were not quickly extirpated; but at length those erring people were brought back into the pale of the Church. Norbert (b) was the chief instrument of their conversion; and so moved both men and women that they brought back the hofts they had kept for the space of ten years in some holes or trunks (c).

(b) He was the founder of the order of the Premonstratensies.

(c) Prætorius, voce Tandemus, et Sigebertus.

and Eve did theirs before the Fall. On the contrary, ' & vestibus deauratis incedens (2). --- He went in (2) Prætorius in Elencho Heretico, voce Tandemus, et Sigebertus.

TAPHIANS. A people situate towards Acarnania, the same with the Teleboes. See the remarks in the article TELEBOES.

TAPPERUS (RUARDUS) a native of Enchuysen in Holland, lived in the XVIIth century. He studied Philosophy and Divinity at Louvain, where he was professor of Divinity thirty-nine years, and Dean of St Peter's Church about twenty-four years. He was also chancellor of the university. He followed sometimes the court of the Emperor Charles V, and was consulted by that prince upon several important occasions (a). Some say, that those avocations hindered him from thoroughly studying the doctrine of Grace [A], and that not having read St Augustin carefully, and being desirous of keeping at too great a distance from the Protestants, he approached too near Pelagianism [B]. He was deputed to the council of Trent as the Emperor's Divine, in the year 1551 (b), where he discovered a great capacity (c), and immediately upon his return, he set up for a party-leader against Michael Baius (d), who strictly adhered to St Augustin's doctrine on the articles of Predestination and Free-will. He died at Brussels the second of March 1559, at seventy-one years of age [C], and was buried at (a) Valer. Andrezus, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 802.

(b) Opera Baili, Part. ii, pag. 191, Edit. 1696.

(c) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 803.

(d) Opera Baili, ibid. pag. 207, 217.

(1) That is the university of Louvain.

[A] Those avocations hindered him from studying thoroughly the doctrine of Grace. ' He would never have departed from the common doctrine of the university (1), had not his attendance at court, and extraordinary occupations, deprived him of the time he ought to have spent in reading St Augustin, before he filled his head with the notions of a new Divinity. ' This is what I find in page 48 of a book printed in 1688, with this title, Apologie Historique de deux Censures de Louvain & de Douay sur la matiere de la Grace.

[B] Being desirous of keeping at too great a distance from the Protestants, he approached too near Pelagianism. ' The desire of being always, and in every thing, of a contrary opinion to the new Heretics, was a common temptation at that time, which made some great men depart from tradition. Tapperus was one of them. . . . Peter Soto, that learned Dominican, Confessor to Charles V . . . wrote a long and learned letter to Tapperus, wherein he shewed him, that he could not follow those new opinions, without running into Pelagianism (2). ' Soto was in the right to address him in these terms; for Tapperus taught, in express words, that man is able to do many good actions by the meer strength of nature, and without the assistance of Grace; Sine Gratia ex viribus nature multa bona ab hominibus fieri posse (3), and that the wicked and the infidels might glorify and worship God, and avoid sin, without any other assistance than that of nature. ' Quod Impii & Infideles per solam naturæ legem, sicut Deum cognoscere, ita eum solum adorare & glorificare poterunt: & quod Impius & Infidelis solis naturæ talentis naturalibusque viribus relictus possit vitare peccata: quia, inquit, discernit inter multa licita atque illicita, ita pro tempore & loco potest non peccare, nolle fornicari, ex eo quod judicat illa esse illicita. OMNE ENIM QUOD MALUM ESSE NOVIT, ODISSE ATQUE ABOMINARI POTEST (4). -- That the wicked, and the Infidels, by the law of nature only, as they were able know GOD, so might they worship and glorify him; and that a wicked man, or an Infidel, left only to his natural strength and talents, might avoid sin: because, says he, he can distinguish between the lawfulness and unlawfulness of a great many things, and consequently can, at the proper times, and occasions, avoid sinning, resolve against fornication, from his judging them to be unlawful. FOR EVERY THING WHICH HE KNOWS TO BE EVIL, HE MAY HATE AND ABOMINATE. ' He maintained, that a man would not be guilty of sin in not being converted, if he wanted the grace necessary for his conversion. ' Sic igitur deest gratia, quæ opus est, ut ad Deum cor converti pos-

(2) Gery, Apologie Histor. de Censures, p. 49.

(3) Ruard. Tapperus, in Art. vii, contra Protestant. apud Opera Mich. Baili, Part. ii, p. 218, Edit. 1696.

(4) Oper. Baili, ibid.

fit, NEC PECCATUM EST quod quis non convertitur; quia non potest pro tunc ad Deum converti, & necessario non convertitur, & per consequens non liberè (5). --- If therefore the grace be wanting, (5) that without which the heart cannot be converted towards GOD, NEITHER IS IT A SIN for one not to be converted; because it is not in his power at that time to be converted, and he is of necessity not converted, and consequently not of his own free will. ' Some other propositions of this nature, extracted out of Tapperus's book, may be seen in the new edition of Michael Baius's works, at page 218 of the second part.

[C] He died . . . the second of March 1559, and at seventy-one years of age (6). ' It will be said, perhaps, (6) This does not agree with his Apotheosis, where it is affirmed, that he died at the council. Would he have said so, if he had known, that Tapperus returned from Trent to Louvain in the year 1552? He found the first mistake in Valerius Andreas; but how came he not to find there also the correction of that mistake? The two Latin verses wherein the numeral letters point out the day and the year of that Doctor's decease, give us the year 1558. Moreri quotes them after Valerius Andreas, and therefore ought to have concluded from them, that 1559 was a fault of the press. Besides, Valerius Andreas observes, that Tapperus's Apotheosis was printed in the year 1558 (7). ' This is what may, I think, be objected to Moreri: but I have something to say in his vindication, as to the first head; for he was in the right to place Tapperus's death in the year 1559: and because the nature of his work did not oblige him to make any criticisms, he may be excused for keeping to the Bibliotheca Belgica, without entering upon the discussion of the faults. ' The author of that Bibliotheca is not exact enough, he confounds his reader, and throws him into disagreeable perplexities. He acquaints us, that the two verses mentioned by him, point out the year in which Tapperus died; but they point out the year 1558. I add, that the Apotheosis of that Doctor was printed in the year 1558, how can those things be reconciled with the year 1559, in which he says Tapperus died? Why does he not remove such a difficulty? Should he not have acquainted us, that the author of those two verses began the year at Easter? According to this reckoning, the second of March, 1558, mentioned by him, is, in effect, the second of March 1559. I think Valerius Andreas knew nothing of this solution. Note, That the author of Tapperus's Apotheosis (8) supposes, (8) Fol. m. A5 that Tapperus died after Charles V. ' It is certain that this Emperor died in September 1558: which proves, that at Louvain (e). He left his estate to the poor, and his books to the Faculty of Divinity (f). I will give the catalogue of his works [D], and some extracts of that doctor's Apotheosis [E]. His violent zeal against the Protestants did not prevent his declaring that that the second of March, on which Tapperus died, belongs to the following year, and that the Apotheosis was not printed till the year 1559 (g).

(7) It is certain, that the Book-seller, who printed that Apotheosis, put 1558, at the end of the advertisement to the reader.

(e) Valer. Andr. ibid.

(f) Id. ibid.

[D] I shall give the catalogue of his works. He published in two volumes in folio, at Louvain, 1555: Explicationes in articulos circa Ecclesiastica dogmata hoc seculo controversa, à Facultate Theologica Academicæ Lovaniensis Caroli V. Imp. jussu collectas. His Orationes Theologicae una cum corollario de veris calamitatibus Belgii causis atque remediis, were published by Lindanus at Cologne in the year 1577, in 8vo. An edition of his works in folio was printed in the same town, in the year 1582. The original of his treatise, de Providentia Dei & Prædestinatione is kept at Louvain; but it is written in fo bad a hand that no body could ever decypher it (10).

(E) . . . And some extracts of his Apotheosis. The edition I make use of is that of Basil 1567, in 8vo. The title of it runs thus (11). D. Ruardus Tappart Enchiridion, hæreticæ pravitate primæ & postremæ per Belgicum inquisitorem, Cancellarii Academicæ Lovaniensis, Apotheosis: Gratiano vero autore: Lexe læstor fustissimam ecclesiasticorum tyrannidem, qua quid profecerint demonstrabit, nisi Deus avertat, totius tandem inferioris Germaniæ excidium: liber ante octo annos primum editus fuit, sed ita ut omnia ista, quæ nunc præsentibus motibus gliscent, tanquam in speculo ostenderit. Tum igitur est collatis omnibus inter se, judicium facere quàm nihil autorem præfagientem fessierit. It is a dialogue between Tapperus, a Genius, and St Peter. We find in it, that Tapperus aspired to the bishopric of Louvain (12). That when he delivered, in the same town, a panegyric upon Maximilian King of Bohemia, that prince silenced him with these words; I have heard what he will say, as well as what he has already said; that he had an extreme aversion to those who talked of permitting the clergy to marry, and exhorted the latter to beg of God, that he would be pleased to deliver them from the temptation of the flesh by some dreams; or, if such a remedy was not sufficient, to be prudent, when they could not be chaste: Ad castitatem servandum, vitandumque conjugium solæ nostris orgiis initiatis horti ut quoties sentirent desiderio humanitatis intumuisse venas, orarent Deum, ut ab ea imbecillitate liberaret ipsos per somnia, & nocturnas palutianculas. Si ne hoc quidem profecisset, quod non possent casti, facerent caute, nec admitterent ullo pacto in animos suos flagitiosam cogitationem de conjugio sacerdotum: That his first exploit against the sectaries, was to cause John Vordenas to be burnt at the Hague, who maintained, that he had done well to marry, though he was a priest: That the city of Antwerp, for fear of losing their trade, did not approve that the heretics should be persecuted; and that he advised the King of Spain to order it to be burnt, that the other towns might be terrified by such a severe punishment: That he was deputed to Trent, where he spoke first as being the eldest of his colleagues: That the Spaniards themselves laughed at his speech: That he lost a great many books in his return to Louvain: That, after his return, he and his colleagues caused all the translations of the scripture to be condemned, except the Vulgar: That they endeavoured to destroy all the works of Erasmus, but could not succeed in it, being thwarted by the President of Brabant, and the Bishop of Arras: That Sleidan's history proved a most pernicious poison, which every body greedily swallowed: That it was translated into all sorts of languages: That the emperor commended that Historian for his faithfulness, and was surprised to find in it so many hidden truths (13). That it could not be put into the Index of prohibited books, before it had been read over and over by every body: 'Tunc demum (si diis placet) Sleydani nomen ridiculè adjectum est catalogo nostro, cum omnes (inquam) ut ungues suos tenerent, aut potius satietate nauferent. Ante nihil impetrari potuit (14). . . . Then at last (as Heaven would have it) Sleidan's name was ridiculously added to our Index, when every body, I say, had got him by heart, or rather were grown tired with him. Before this nothing could be obtained.' That the great care taken to get the books of the Protestants condemned, was not sufficient to prevent the artifices of the Bookfellers: That by altering or leaving out the names of the authors, many dangerous books were put off, and the Inquisitors imposed upon; and that it fell out sometimes, that they condemned a book, which they had before approved of. Quamquam ne sic quidem cavere potuimus quin typographi, homines verisutissimi imposuerint nobis: mutatis auctorum nominibus, vel omisiss, vel inversis, vel etiam Græcè reditis quæ erant Latina, & è contrâ: ut sæpe coacti simus quæ antè approbaveramus, ea damnare post, vix auri prosteri apud regem nostram simplicitatem. Nam ex titulis librorum æstimanda nobis omnia erant, cum non vacaret perlagere quæ intus erant, quorum quedam ita etiam erant obscura & ingeniosa (qua fraude semper hæretici abundarunt) ut quid scriberetur, non assequeremur. Ad quem modum turpiter nos decipit Philippi Melancthonis libellus de Theologia Christiana, qui titulo Hippophili Melangei passim senatorum, præsidum, & nostrorum etiam Bæcalauorum manibus tritus est: donec amici, qui in Germania adhuc synceri erant, admonuerunt, ut habita synodo consuleremus lexica nostra, fore enim ut idem esse Philippum & Hippophilum deprehenderemus (15). . . . Idem accidit in Cælii Secundi de providentia libello quidem non magno, sed pestilentissimo: quem ille nebula tum primum innotescens Areneum inscriperat. Nos enim rati esse poeticum, aut grammaticum figmentum, non ante officiebamus fucum quàm omnia exemplaria essent Lovanii distracta. Taceo de Hutteno, Calvino, Urbano Rhegio, & aliis (prò dolor) multis, quos nobis oscitantibus nescio quibus titulis, ex metamorphosi opinor Ovidiana petitis, insinuaverunt (16). . . .

Alto even all this care was not sufficient to prevent the Bookfellers, who are a very cunning sort of people, from imposing upon us: by changing authors names, omitting, transposing, or even translating into Greek what was Latin, & vice versa; so that we were often forced to condemn what we had before approved, and scarce durst own our simplicity before the king. For all the judgment we could be able to make, was only from the titles of the books, as we had not time enough to read their contents, and there were some of them so obscurely and artfully contrived, the Heretics being always ready at this sort of deceit, that we could not be certain what subject was treated of. We were basely imposed upon in this manner by Philip Melancthon's book de Theologia Christiana, which, under the name of Hippophilus Melangeus, passed every where currently thro' the hands of our senators, presidents, and even the bachelors of our university, till some of our orthodox friends in Germany, advised us to call a synod, in order to consult our Lexicons, for that we should find Philippus and Hippophilus to mean the same thing. . . . The like imposition happened in regard to Cælius Secundus's book concerning Providence, not great indeed, but very pernicious: which the vile author then first appearing intitled Areneus. We believing it to be some poetical or grammatical fiction, did not discover the cheat, till all the copies brought to Louvain, were sold off. I omit Hutten, Calvin, Urban Regius and others, alas too many, whose works they sold under our noses, by I know not what titles borrowed: I think from Ovid's Metamorphosis.' Afterwards Tapperus tells us, that he forced several students in Louvain to recant, and pay a fine: That he caused some women of good families were by his order buried alive (17). That he persecuted Perlevald, a Rhetorician, who spoke ill of the inquisitors: That, fearing this accused person would prove his innocence, since he was favoured by several people, he brought against him a charge of Sodomy, which deprived him of most of his protectors (18). That he privately condemned him to perpetual imprisonment; but, that in order to avoid the charges of maintaining this prisoner, or the odium of having let him starve, he delivered him to a gentleman, who interceded for him: That afterwards he forced that gentleman to answer for the guilt of that intercession, and condemned him to forfeit his whole

The Inquisitors
Comple

(15) Ibid.
D a verso.

(16) Ibid. fol. 3 verso.

have been confiscated rect

(17) Mulieres primarias & optimas in urbe prognatas terra obruentes (ut videtur) curavi. Ibid. fol. E verso.

(18) Homini caeco & deformi masculi amoris infamiam affixi, statimque oculus Euro à favore causæ plerisque deterrui. Ibid.

(9) It is said in the title of the edition of 1567, that this work had been printed eight years before.

(10) Taken from Valerius Andreas, ubi supra, pag. 303. See also Puffendorf, Apparatus, Tom. ii, pag. 316.

(11) You will find the title of the first edition at the end of this remark.

(12) Episcopatum Lovaniensem spectasti. Atque circa init. But how can this be, will some say, since Louvain is not an episcopal town? The answer is, that the abbots of Aftrem, St Bernard, and Tongerlo, who opposed the erection of the new bishoprics, endeavoured to reduce them to one only, which was to be at Louvain. See Brandt, in his History of the Reformation, Tom. i, p. 239.

(13) Ipse Cælius delectatus lectione obdormit & cretissimarum rerum narratione, & commendabat veritatem. Apud Ruardus Tappart, folio D verso.

(14) Ibid.

VOL. V.

E e e

TAPPERUS.

294

(g) Poffev. in Appar. Tom. ii, pag. 358.

(b) Id. ibid.

that what is said in the sixth chapter of St John's Gospel does not concern the Lord's Supper, though the Fathers have applied the words of this Evangelist to that mystery in their sermons (g). This opinion of his was confuted (b). He esteemed Faustus Regienfis to be orthodox [F]. Lindanus bestowed singular praises upon him, and believes, that Tapperus was endowed with the gift of prophecy [G].

whole estate. I omit a long account of the proceedings against Angelus Emphilius, a Paris divine. Fraud and violence had here an equal share. It is observed, and in the preamble to that account, that Bartholomew Latinus compared the Christian Church to a bear's cub, which could not receive its true shape, till it had been licked for many ages: Perinde ac si religionem Christianam urfa aliqua peperisset, quam non una mater tamen lambendo detergeret atque efformaret, sed mille quingentorum annorum somnia (19). Here follows a reflexion of the author of the Apotheosis. 'O cæci! Christi lex æterna est, nec eget maturatione temporum, ut stabilitatem consequatur. Alioqui primis ecclesiæ membris magna fuisset injuria facta, si quid ad illorum institutionem defuisset ejus percipiendi edentula ista mundi senectæ demum capax fuisset. . . . O ye blind! The law of Christ is eternal, and it wants not to be ripened by time to gain its perfections. Otherwise the first members of the Church must have suffered great hardship, if any had been wanting in their institution, which the toothless old age of the world might afterwards have been capable of perceiving.'

Let us here, by the way, take notice of the fate of the controversies. At that time the objections of the Protestants forced Latomus to maintain, that the beginning of Christianity was a chaos, which had been continually saying, that things should be brought to the first institution; and that whatever was not prescribed in the scripture should be abolished. What course did he take to answer them? He bethought himself of this hypothesis, that the Church had attained to perfection only by degrees. The above-mentioned reflexion, which was the Protestants reply, is the foundation of a book which the Bishop of Meaux wrote against them, an hundred and forty years after (21). What course did M. Jurieu take to answer him? He revived Latomus's hypothesis (22). What an exchange is this?

Note, it is supposed, that Tapperus confessed he had performed the part of a midwife in a boat, without knowing what he did, and without having heard that children came into the world in that manner; believing still what his mother had told him, that they came out of the parley-bed. 'Ecce auditus vagitus est (ut sit verbo veritas) nescio quo loco Dii talem terris avertite pestem: ego inde prodire infantes putarem? Mater mihi persuaserat apud nos e proximis arundinetis dari mulieribus (23). Behold I heard a squalling (you will pardon the expression) I know not from what quarter Ye gods avert so dreadful a scene: could I have ever believed children to come from thence My mother had persuaded me that women had them from among the reeds.' Note also, that, though he is made to confess, that he felt, since that time, the motions of lust, and looked upon his servant-maids, with some sort of temptation (24). Yet he is not contradicted, when he protests, that he had never lain with a woman, nor even saluted any (25). He did not come off with being instrumental in the delivery of one: For at his coming out of the boat, he was surrounded by a great number of country women, who hurried him into a tavern, and forced him to be god-father to the child, and to pay the reckoning. He had not one penny left, when he had paid for the entertainment that was made at his cost: 'Emunctus sum omni pecunia: nec potui redimere ubi navem appulsemus quin fierem compater hominis quem nunquam vidi. Pertrahebant me in diversorium palustres mulierculæ bibacillimæ, vocatus sacrificus æque sobrius omnes certatim pascabantur tanti compatri largitate nunquam nudior, nec sordidior redii domum (26). I was cheated of all my money: nor could I get ashore again, without becoming gossip to the child of a man I never saw. I was dragged to a tavern by some drunken jades who belonged to the sens, the priest was called, who was no soberer they all fell to as if for a wager, at the cost of my god-fatherhood I never got home in a poorer or dirtier condition.' His exploits against the Anabaptists are not forgotten in the Apotheosis, nor his pernicious maxims, or methods of inquisition. Take notice, that Valerius Andreas confesses, that this piece does very well discover Tapperus's conduct. 'Cæterum, sicut be (27), Apotheosis R. Tapperi scriptis Henr. Geldorpius, editam ann. 1558 in 4to. Verum fannus & scommatibus plena genium auctoris sui prodit: ex qua alioqui summi illius viri ACTA DILUCIDE PATENT. But Henry Geldorpius wrote Tapperus's Apotheosis, published in the year 1558, in 4to. But the satire and banter it is full of, shows the genius of its author; tho' otherwise that great man's ACTIONS ARE TRULY EXPOSED in it.

This article being ready to be sent to the press, I met with a copy of the first edition of the Apotheosis. I shall set down the title of it, that it may be compared with the title of the second. Clariss. Theologi D. Ruardi Tappart Enchiridion, hereticæ pravitate primarii & generalis inquisitionis, cancellarii celeberrimæ academici Lovanienfis, pridem inconfutabili suorum luctu laureo auctore. Reperies in hoc scripto, lektor, non parum multa scitu dignissima, & paucis hactenus cognita inquisitionum hereticæ pravitate consilia atque secreta: quæ omnibus tandem cognoscenda proponi, in primis interesse reipublicæ duximus.

[F] He believed Faustus Regienfis to be orthodox.] He quoted him, 'calling him an venerable man: Whereupon, being informed by one of his brethren, that Faustus had been condemned, as being full of errors; he was very much surprized at it, and could not believe it; as Eitius relates in a Theological discourse, pronounced at Douay, in 1609. He had it from the doctor himself, who gave that information to Tapperus (28). Here is another authority for it: Ut quantum Pelagianis faverit, neminem lateret, Faustum regiensem episcopum, qui Semipelagianorum fuit antesignanus, & cujus libri à sancto Gelasio papa in concilio Romano à Catholicorum albo deleti sunt, passim commendat & inter patres adducit (29). That all the world might know how much he favoured Pelagianism, he every where commands and ranks among the Fathers Faustus Bishop of Reggio, who was the leader of the Semipelagians, and whose works were struck out of the catholic list by St Gelasius the Pope, in a council at Rome.

[G] Lindanus bestowed singular praises (30) upon him, and believed that Tapperus was endowed with the gift of prophecy.] These are his words: 'Hoc ipsum certe tam vita, quam voce, cum apud nos mortalis ageret, magis præ se ferebat, disertè tantum non prophetans, quæ modò peccatorum nostrorum causa Belgici patimur, sicuti & his ipsius orationibus perspicue prædixisse cernitur (31). This very thing most certainly he more evidently pointed out while he continued with us in this mortal state, both by his life and doctrine, almost expressly prophesying what we in Holland have suffered for the sake of our sins, which from these very orations he appears to have clearly foretold.' There was no need of being a very great prophet, to foretel, that the conduct of the Roman Catholics against the new religion, would occasion great disorders; and that a civil war would be the consequence of their tiring out the patience of the Protestants.

(26) Ibid. fol. G 2 verso.

(27) Valer. Andr. ubi supra, pag. 303.

(28) Gery, Apol. des Centures, pag. 50.

(29) Opera Mich. Baii, Part. ii, pag. 218, 219.

(30) Ornamentum hujus seculi nostri singulari fabricata perpetue exemplum, inviolatum castitatis & ejus virginis speculorum, prudentie norma, eximie pietatis in pauperes specimen, juvenis frequentioribus assidue mo-deste regula, temperantie amplexus, tolerantie, patientie, charitatis Christianæ, omnia denique virtutis magister abolu-tissimus. Lindanus.

(31) Lindanus, in Prefat. Oratorum Theolog. Ruardi Tapperi, pag. 26. He has A Prophetarum vacuus plethique piis viris crederetur: alie non videretur qui cum spiritu prophetie divinitus prædium fuisse pronuntiavit.

bear's cub

(19) Ibid. folio E 3.

gradually perfect

(20) Ne vacillarent argumenta Latomii quum rudem indigestamque molem vocat primitivam Ecclesiam. Ibid.

(21) See the Preface to his Histoire des Variations.

(22) See his Pastoral Letters, wherein he describes the doctrine of the ancient Fathers.

valerius from persley

(23) Apotheosis fol. G 2.

(24) Ab eo die nunquam carui nescio quo pruritu, nec equis oculis aspexi famulas meas. Ibid.

(25) Ibid. fol. G verso. See below, citation (31), the passage of Lindanus.

TARPA

TARPA (SPURIUS METIUS, or MÆCIUS) was a Licencer, or a Critic, of the Poems, that were to be recited on the Stage. He had four colleagues, and it was necessary that one of them should approve those pieces before they were produced in public [A]. In order to it, the Poets were appointed to meet in the temple of Apollo Palatinus, where they read their works, and then the Critics passed their judgment upon them. Good judges were not always pleased with Tarpa's judgment, as appears from a passage of Cicero; which may be seen at the end of the last remark of this article. However it is true, that Horace, who was no flatterer, says nothing of that Critic but what is more in his favour than to his prejudice [B].

[A] It was necessary that one of them should approve those pieces, before they were produced in public. This particular is to be found in one of the scholiasts upon Horace, on these words of the tenth satire of the first book.

... Hæc ego ludo
Quæ nec in æde sonent certantia iudice Tarpa,
Nec redeant iterum atque iterum spectata theatris.

*These lines shall ne'er before the audience come,
From Tarpa's judgment to receive their doom,
Nor shall they entertain the stage of Rome.*

* Metius Tarpa, says he, fuit iudex criticus, auditor assiduus poematum & poetarum in æde Apollinis seu Musarum, quo convenire poetæ solebant suæ scripta recitare, quæ nisi à Tarpa aut alio critico, qui numero erant quinque, probarentur, in scenam non deferbantur. --- Metius Tarpa, says he, was a critical judge, a constant hearer of the poems and poets in the temple of Apollo, or of the Muses, whither the poets used to assemble to recite their works, which unless they were approved by Tarpa, or some other critic, there being five in number, were not admitted on the Stage. This office might be compared with that of the censors of books, in the countries where there is an inquisition. It was very troublesome, both because so many readers were to be heard, and because the censors were exposed to a double danger: For the pieces, which they rejected, made the authors very angry with them, genus irritabile vatum (1); and those, that were approved, might not please the people, or persons of judgment.

[B] Horace . . . says nothing of that Critic, but what is more in his favour, than to his prejudice.] Horace mentions him again in his de Arte Poetica *. And * Ver. 386. here are some of his words.

Si quid tamen olim
Scripseris, in Meti descendat iudicis aures Et patris, & nostras.

*If you have wrote some piece in poetry,
Read it to Tarpa, to your fire, and me.*

Vossius (2) after having observed, that Achilles Statius (2) Vossius, de (3) confesses he does not remember to have read any thing concerning that Metius Tarpa any where, except in the tenth satire of the first book of Horace, says, that he is also mentioned in the tenth satire of the first book, and repeats what Horace says there about Tarpa. This is plainly the effect of a great absence of mind. Vossius remembered, that Horace mentions this Critic twice; in the tenth satire of the first book, and in his de Arte Poetica; But he forgot, that the passage known to Statius was that of the tenth satire; which is the reason why he refers him to it. I do not know whether he perceived that mistake when the book was printed off; for, tho' there are many things in his Adenda which he desires to be inserted in the page, where Achilles Statius is mentioned, and though the passage concerning Metius, in Horace de Arte Poetica, is one of those things; yet the reader is not told, that there is any correction to be made in that page. Here is the passage of Cicero, which I have promised to set down: 'Reliquas partes diei tu consumebas his delectationibus quas tibi ipse ad arbitrium tuum comparas: nobis autem erant ea perpetienda quæ scilicet Sp. Mæcius . . . probavisset (4). --- The remaining part of the day you employed in such diversions as you had been pleased to prepare; but we were forced to bear those which Metius Tarpa had approved.'

(1) Horat. Epist. ii, lib. ii, ver. 105.

(3) Notis ad Hor. Sat. X lib. i.

(4) Cicero, Epist. i, lib. vii, ad Famil.

TARRUNTIUS (a) (LUCIUS) surnamed Firmanus, because he was a native of Firmum, a town of Italy, in the country of the Picentini, flourished at the same time with Cicero, and was one of his friends (b). He was a Mathematical Philosopher (c); I mean, that he pretended to a great skill in Judicial Astrology. He would be little known, had he not drawn up two Horoscopes, mentioned by the ancients, one was that of Romulus, the other that of Rome [A]. Those Horoscopes were retrograde, and

(a) Some call him Tarruntius, being deceived by the Greek word Tarruntius. See Salmasius, in Solin. pag. 15.

WE

(b) See the remark [A], citation (2).

(c) See the remark [C], citation (11), and the remark [A], citation (1).

[A] One was the Horoscope of Romulus, the other that of Rome.] Plutarch gives the following account of it. Varro, who was the most learned of the Romans in history, had a particular friend named Tarruntius, who being both a great Philosopher and Mathematician, applied himself out of curiosity to draw horoscopes by the means of Astronomical tables, and was esteemed the most eminent in his time. He proposed to him to find the day and hour of the birth of Romulus, from the known actions of his life, as the solution of Geometrical problems is performed by analysis from the data first laid down; for he maintained, that the same art which from a given nativity could predict the life which was to follow, might, and ought, with stronger reason, from a known life, exactly determine the nativity which had preceded. Tarruntius performed what Varro requested. After having considered the inclinations and actions of Romulus, the time of his life, and manner of his death, and compared all these accidents together, he very positively pronounced, that he was conceived the first year of the II^d Olympiad, the twenty-third day of the month which the Egyptians call Choiak *, about the third hour of the day, at which there was a total eclipse of the sun;

* December.

that he was born the twenty-first day of the month. That †, about sun-rising; and that the foundation of Rome was laid by him the ninth day of the month called Pharmouthi †, between the second and third hour; for these people pretend that there is a certain time fixed, which governs the fortune of cities, as well as that of men, and that by the position and different aspect of the stars may be discovered the first moment of their foundation (1). Cicero relates more particularly what concerns the Horoscope of the city of Rome, and very justly laughs at it. L. quidem Tarruntius Firmanus familiaris noster, in primis Chaldaicis rationibus eruditus, urbis etiam nostræ natalem diem repetebat ab iis Parilibus, quibus eam à Romulo conditam accepimus: Romamque in iugo quum esset Luna, natam esse dicebat, nec ejus fata canere dubitabat. O vim maximam erroris, etiam ne urbis natalis dies, ad vim stellarum & lunæ pertinebat? Fac in puero referre ex qua affectione cœli primum spiritum duxerit, num hoc in latere, aut in cœmento, ex quibus urbs effecta est, potuit valere (2)? --- Lucius Tarruntius Firmanus, indeed my very good friend, eminently skilled in the Chaldean Astrology, searched back for the birth-day even of our city, from the circumstances with which we have been

(1) Plutarch, in the Life of Romulus.

(2) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. ii, cap. xlviii.

we find scarce any examples of them; for there are very few Astrologers, who pretend to find out the moment of any person's birth, from the consideration of his adventures [B]. Tarruntius, at Varro's request, took that course, and boldly gave his answer as to the hour of the birth. There is reason to believe that he is quoted by Pliny [C].

'been told it was formed by Romulus: and declared that it was begun when the moon was in Libra nor did he scruple to predict its fortune. O the strength of error, to suppose that even the birth of cities can have any relation to the influence of the moon and stars! if we grant that in the case of a child, it may be of some consequence, under what disposition of the Heavens it draws its first breath; can this have any influence over brick and mortar, the materials of a city?' We may observe a considerable difference between the account of Cicero and that of Plutarch.

According to Cicero, Rome was founded on the day of the Palilia, that is the 21st of April, and therefore of the Palilia, that is the 21st of April, and therefore Tarruntius followed the common opinion (3): but according to Plutarch, he did not follow it; for he placed the foundation of that city on the ninth day of an Egyptian month (4), which day, according to some learned Chronologers (5), answered to the fourth of October. Some (6) Chronologers conjecture, that the year which the inhabitants of Alba, and Romulus made use of, was out of order; that the month of April corresponded with the Autumn; and that after King Numa had given a new form to the Roman year, the festival of Pales, which was celebrated the twenty-first of April, corresponded with the Spring. According to this conjecture, it might be true at the same time, that Rome was founded the twenty-first of April, of the year of the Albans, and the ninth of an Egyptian month, which corresponded with the month of October. However, Varro would not have exactly followed his friend Tarruntius, if he had said positively that Romulus began to build Rome the twenty-first of April, that is, in the Spring. Note also, that Plutarch does not tell us in what year the city of Rome was founded, according to Tarruntius. However, it is said that this Astrologer fixed on the third year of the VIth Olympiad. I take this opinion to be grounded upon Tarruntius's placing the conception of Romulus in the first year of the IIId Olympiad; and upon a supposition, that, according to the common opinion, he said, that Romulus built the city of Rome at eighteen years of age. Besides, it is supposed that Varro followed Tarruntius's opinion; which is a further reason why it is commonly believed, that he placed the foundation of that city in the third year of the VIth Olympiad.

I shall observe, by the way, that Dionysius Halicarnassus, after many Chronological computations, fixed upon the first year of the VIIth Olympiad for the epoch of the foundation of Rome (7). Father Labbe therefore expresses himself very ill, when he says (8), that some ascribe that epoch to Dionysius Halicarnassus. An eminent Divine (9) tells us, that he was followed therein by Tarruntius and Velleius Paterculus; but that Varro had pitched upon an epoch later by two years, that is the fourth year of the VIIth Olympiad. He must give me leave to observe three or four things. I. Tarruntius wrote before Dionysius Halicarnassus; for it appears from the manner in which Cicero speaks of the Horoscope of Rome that Tarruntius was then dead; and we know that Dionysius Halicarnassus composed his History after he had resided twenty years at Rome (10): now he came thither soon after the entire defeat of Marc Antony. II. Tarruntius's opinion does not agree with that of Dionysius; for, as we have already seen, he placed the foundation of Rome in the third year of the VIth Olympiad. III. Velleius Paterculus places it in the same year (11); and therefore does not follow the opinion of Dionysius Halicarnassus. IV. The most learned Chronologers ascribe the same hypothesis both to Varro and Tarruntius, and therefore Varro's epoch is not later by two (12) years than that of Dionysius.

[B] There are very few Astrologers, who pretend to find out the moment of any person's birth, from the consideration of his adventures. I do not understand what reason Mr Dacier could have to say; that it is always the surest way to draw retrograde Horoscopes; for an Astrologer may boldly infer from known actions the time of the conception and birth. Who will contradict him (13)? I answer, that there is nothing more easy than to contradict him. In most families the birth-day of each person is well known; and as for men of note, one may easily learn their nativity, by having recourse to the public monuments. So that a mistaken Astrologer would be quickly convicted of his error; which is the reason why those cheats will not venture upon it. They may safely determine at what hour a modern king was born, for they know it and may read it in History; and therefore they are not contented about such things. I shall occasionally take notice of a mistake of Amyot, which Mr Dacier has not avoided. Plutarch says there was an eclipse of the sun on the day that Rome began to be built. Σύ-ροδον ἐκλείπειν ἐν αὐτῇ γενέσθαι σελήνης πρὸς ἡλίον (14). Xylander is wrong in translating those Greek words thus: quo subiens solis orbem luna deficit. Amyot has not been more successful, on which day, Mr Dacier says he, there was an eclipse of the moon. Mr Dacier renders it, and that there was an eclipse of the moon. There is no obscurity in the original; it expresses a conjunction of the sun and moon. Now that is a time when the moon cannot be eclipsed, and the only one when the sun can be eclipsed. An observation should have been made upon the parenthesis, immediately following the Greek words, just now quoted out of Plutarch. That parenthesis runs thus: (ὅν ἔπει τριτὴ τῆς ἐκείνης οὐρανιας ἐκλείψεως εἰδέναι καὶ Ἀντίμαχον οἰόνται τὸν Θίων ἱστορεῖν) that is, it is thought, that the Poet Antimachus, a native of the Isle of Teos, saw that eclipse of the sun, which happened in the third year of the VIth Olympiad.

The whole note of Mr Dacier (15) amounts to this, that the Poet Antimachus, mentioned by Plutarch, is the same, whom others will have to be a Clarian or a Colophonian, and who lived in Plato's time. If this note was right, Plutarch must have been grossly mistaken; for how could Antimachus, cotemporary with Plato, observe an eclipse so long before he was born? To justify that Historian it must either be supposed, that he speaks of an Antimachus different from him, who was cotemporary with Plato; or that he only remarks in his parenthesis, that Antimachus, cotemporary with Plato, speaks of an eclipse, which is the same with that of the third year of the VIth Olympiad. It is certain this is not the sense of his Greek text. Father Labbe perhaps had been more in the right to censure Plutarch upon this account, than upon some other things. He observes (16), after Petavius, that not only in the month Pharmutbi, but also in the whole Julian year 3961 of the Julian period, there was no eclipse of the sun, that might have been observed in Asia, much less in Italy, by that Poet Antimachus of Teos. And then he adds: 'Plutarch is mistaken in this; for having said that Tarruntius affirmed that Rome was built when the sun and moon were in conjunction, he adds, of his own head, that this new moon was a true eclipsic one.' This censure is false in some respects; for Plutarch does not say, that Tarruntius affirmed that the sun was eclipsed on the day of the foundation of Rome. Tarruntius says this only of the day of Romulus's conception. And therefore Petavius (17) should not have affirmed, that Tarruntius said to both with respect to that day, and that of the foundation of Rome.

[C] There is reason to believe that he is quoted by Pliny. It is in most editions, 'L. Arruntio qui Grace de astris scripsit, Cæfare Dictatore qui item (18). -- Lucius Arruntius who wrote in Greek about the stars, Cæsar the Dictator who did the same.' (18) Plin. lib. i, cap. i. Which might make one think that Pliny speaks of L. Arruntius, a celebrated Historian; but because the best manuscripts have it, L. Tarruntio, it is easy to guess at the true reading; which is, Lucio Tarruntio (19). There is a quite contrary mistake in Solinus's (20) manuscripts, where we find L. Arruntius instead of L. Tarruntius (20); for it is plain Solinus speaks of the Mathematician, who drew up the Horoscope of Rome at Varro's request. 'Ibi Romulus manifestavit qui autem ante tertiam plenam: sicut Lucius Tarruntius prodidit Mathematicorum nobilissimus (21). -- There Romulus

(3) See, below, citation (21), what I quote out of Solinus, who ascribes also to Tarruntius the common opinion.

(4) According to Xylander, Amyot, and Mr Dacier, the month Pharmutbi answered to the month of April. But Petavius is of a different opinion. See the next citation.

(5) Petavius, in Rationario Temporum, Part. ii, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 157.

(6) See Father Labbe's French Chronology, Tom. i, in the introduction, ch. iii, num. 5.

(7) Dionys. Halic. lib. i, pag. m. 60.

(8) Labbe, Chronol. Française, in the introduction, ch. iii, num. 5.

(9) Jaquetot, de l'Existence de Dieu, pag. 11.

(10) Dionys. Halicarn. lib. i, pag. m. 6.

(11) Sexta Olympiade post duos & viginti annos quam prima constituta fuerat Romulus. . . . Roman urbem Palilibus in Palatio condidit. Vell. Paterculus, lib. i, cap. viii.

(12) He should have said three years.

(13) Dacier, remarks upon the Life of Romulus, pag. m. 178.

(14) Plutarch. in Romulo, pag. 24.

(15) Dacier, Remarques sur la Vie de Romulus, pag. 178.

(16) Labbe, ubi supra, num. 6.

(17) See his Rationarium Temporum, Part. ii, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 159, where he refers to the 48th chapter of the ninth book of his work de Doctrina Temporum.

(18) Plin. lib. i, pag. 2, Edit. Romul.

(19) See Vossius, de Scient. Mathematicis, pag. 447.

(20) Vossius, ibid. See also Solinus, lib. i, pag. 15.

(21) Solin. lib. i, pag. 2, Edit. Romul.

- * Romulus refused, who very auspiciously laid the foundation of the walls at eighteen years of age, on the eleventh of the Kalends of May, between the second and third hour: as Lucius Tarruntius, the Prince of Astro-
- * logers, has discovered. Note, that Pliny places our Tarruntius before Cæsar; which confirms what I have said, that this Astrologer lived before Dionysius Halicarnæus.

TARTAGLIA (NICOLAS) a native of Brescia in Italy, lived in the XVth century. The poverty of his parents did not prevent his becoming very illustrious (a). He distinguished himself extremely by his knowledge in Mathematics, and composed among other works [A], a large treatise on numbers and measures, divided into six parts, which gained him a very great reputation. He taught in Milan, and frequently disputed there with the famous Cardan [B], who did not find his account in it (b). He was afterwards called to Brescia, and there explained Euclid, but he had so many reasons to be dissatisfied with his country, that he quitted it, and retired to Venice where he was very much esteemed. He there met with persons of generosity: and received large presents from the Senators and Ambassadors. Some of his books were dedicated to Henry VIII, King of England, and others to Francis Donato, Doge of Venice (c). He died at Venice towards the end of the year 1557, if we believe Thuanus (d) [C]. I shall take notice of a French translation of his Arithmetic, and shall mention some encomiums bestowed upon him by the translator [D]. I shall also correct a mistake in Thuanus [E].

(a) Ghilini Teatro, Tom. ii, pag. 200.

(b) Leonardo Cozzando, Libreria Bresciana, pag. 271.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Thuanus, lib. xix, circa fin.

[A] He composed among other works. You will find the title of his works in Vossius (1), Ghilini (2), Mr Teiffier (3), and in Cozzando (4), &c. which I shall therefore omit. Note, that Tartaglia wrote in his mother-tongue.

[B] He frequently disputed with . . . Cardan. Thuanus has not expressed this very clearly: and his translator has made it still more obscure. Hieronymi Cardani emulationes varias questionis ingeniose pertrahavit (5): that is to say, according to the translation given by Mr Teiffier, he has, in imitation of Cardan, ingeniously treated a great many different questions (6). This was not a bare emulation, much less an imitation only, but a direct quarrel. See Cozzando, at page 271 of his Libreria Bresciana nuovamente aperta, printed at Brescia in the year 1685 in 12mo.

[C] He died . . . towards the end of the year 1557, if we believe Thuanus. This date is refuted by two Italian authors, Ghilini (7), and Cozzando (8), who assure us that he flourished about the year 1560. Paulus Freherus (9), falsely charges Ghilini with saying that he died that year. Mr Konig (10) places his death in the year 1566.

[D] I shall take notice of the French translation of his Arithmetic, and shall mention some encomiums bestowed upon him by the translator. William Gosselin has translated out of Italian into French, Tartaglia's Arithmetic divided into two parts, whereof the first part contains seventeen books, and the second eleven. These are the two first parts of his great work on numbers and measures. This translation was printed at Paris by Gilles Beys in the year 1578 (11) in 8vo, and dedicated by the author to Margaret of France, Queen of Navarre. The Epistle Dedicatory of the first part is dated from the college of Cambray in Paris the second of November 1577; and that of the second the twelfth of the same month. The first of those two epistles tells us that the Queen loved Mathematics, and that on this account she had retained Mr Gosselin, the author's father, as one of her household. She is exhorted to embrace with the same fondness all the other parts of Mathematics, as she had done Astronomy and Astrology.

The translator's Preface deserves to be considered. He says that Luke du Bourg, an Italian Fryar, and Stephen de Ville-Franche, a Frenchman, have opened a way for us to Arithmetic; 'however the Italian in my opinion has greatly surpassed the Frenchman, as well in his practical rules, as in his treatise of irrational numbers, and of this divine Algebra; after these two masters who flourished much about the same time, have followed disciples and scholars without number, who like little rivulets have all their original from these two fountains, but yet fall much short of the depth of their spring heads, either for the want of capacity, or sufficient application.' He names some of the principal writers who have treated of Arithmetic, and distinguishes them by their native countries (12): but he is mistaken in placing Tonifal among the French, for he was an Englishman. He affirms that several of the moderns have decked themselves with the spoils of Tartaglia; that he himself would not follow their example, nor rob him of the honour due to him; that it is Tartaglia who has dispelled our wretched ignorance, and introduced such a method of practice, that the whole world cannot possibly produce one shorter and easier; that he is an author, in comparison with whom that great Mathematician, Luke Paccioli (13), is no more than a wart compared with a mountain . . .; that Friar Luke, Pisano (14), and Ville-Franche, have opened the door, but committed a great many errors, and falsities; and that Nicolas Tartaglia has entered, put all their inventions into form, given a colour to the gross out-lines they drew and projected; and lastly, made an infinite improvement of their discoveries, laid open their falsities, and introduced truth. He pretends that 'all the succeeding Arithmeticians, have only translated word for word the rules of the Italian authors, and principally of Tartaglia, and published them under their own name; and, what is worse to prevent this from being discovered, they have inverted the whole order of our author's work, tho' they have stole only the most common things, with which they have stuffed their writings very confusedly; which is the reason that we have at present in French only pieces of Arithmetic, which have their practical rules borrowed from Italian ingenuity, the order only, or rather the disorder, is French, the obscurity is French, the clearness Italian; and this was absolutely necessary; for it would have been too notorious a thing to have seen the method, rules, examples, and brevity, of an author published under another's name: so that we are obliged to confess, to our shame, that the knowledge of this science is hitherto ingrossed in the hands of strangers.' He concludes with shewing what he has added new to this translation, and which consists, among other things, in the demonstrations he has invented, or borrowed from Peter Nunes a Spaniard.

Here is an instance of sincerity: he frankly confesses the inferiority of the French, their Plagiarism, the superiority of the Italians, &c. but he finds in this sincerity, disadvantageous to his country, his own particular advantage: he raised himself by this means above the level of others.

[E] I shall . . . correct a mistake in Thuanus. We read at the end of the nineteenth book of that Historian these words: Qui (Tartalea) multa in eo genere a Luca Brugenfi Monacho solertissime inventa illustravit, multa correxit. That is to say, according to the translation of Du Rier, Tartaglia has explained a great many things which Luke of Bruges a Monk had ingeniously invented, and has corrected a great many of them (15). I am inclined to believe that Thuanus had written Brugenfi, and that the Printer had changed the word to Brugenfi. This mistake occasioned the translator to put Luke de Bruges in his translation; and this might induce us to believe that the mathematical writings of this author have been corrected by Tartaglia. Nothing is more false. The author whose inventions he has adjusted, was a Franciscan Friar, called Lucas Paccioli, and a native of Borgo di S. Sepolcro, a town in Italy, called in Latin Burgum, or Burgus sancti Sepulchri. There was printed at Venice in 1509, a collection of his mathematical works in Italian, in folio. He has translated into Italian the books of Euclid (16).

(13) This is the same with Friar Luke.

(14) It is Leonardus Pisanus, who should have been named before Friar Luke. For the latter has taken several things from the former.

(15) See Teiffier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 120.

(16) See Gellner's Epitome, pag. 549.

He has published in the same language a volume of Arithmetic, in which he has inserted a treatise of Algebra, which is partly that of Leonardus Pisanus, the first of the moderns who has written on Algebra, but whose work was in Latin, and never yet printed (17).

(17) Blancanus, in Mathematicorum Chronologia, pag. 59.

TASSO (TORQUATO) an Italian Poet, one of the greatest wits of the XVIIth century. See his life written by the Abbot Decharmes. It is a very curious piece (a), and may be easily met with. I have collected a great many faults committed by several authors in speaking of this Italian author; but I am obliged to reserve them to another opportunity. You will find an abridgment of the life of this great Poet prefixed to his Moral Treatises, translated into French by Baudouin (b).

(b) They were printed at Paris in the year 1632, in 8vo.

(a) Printed at Paris in the year 1690, and reprinted in Holland. See the Histoire des Ouvrages des Savants, for December 1690, pag. 160.

TAVEAU (RENATA) only daughter and heiress of Leon Taveau, Baron of Mortemart (a), Lord of Lussac &c (b), was married to Francis de Rochechouart Lord of Tonnai-Charente in the XVIIth century. She lived a holy life, and as she was exhausted with a long exercise of prayers and penitence, she fell into so strong a trance that every body believed her dead, and she was accordingly buried: one of her domestics having observed that she was put in her coffin with a diamond ring of great value upon her finger, got into the vault in the night to steal it, and found her alive She lived to have children afterwards. She had a very great share in the good graces of Catherine de Medicis (c); but she forfeited them by an incident which deserves to be related [A]. She was mother of Renatus de Rochechouart Baron of Mortemart, great-grandfather of the Marshal de Vivonne [B].

(a) Anselme, Palais d'Honneur, pag. 582.

(b) Mercure Galant, of October 1702, pag. 107.

(c) Ibid.

[A] She forfeited the good graces of Catherine de Medicis by an incident which deserves to be related. The first occasion of her disgrace with that Princess was this: happening to be one day with her in the church of St John en Greve at a sermon of Menot, the famous Franciscan, she laid hold of the disposition which she found the Queen was put into by this discourse of Menot, which was extremely strong and pathetic, upon the irregularities of the Great, and gave her some good advice upon the conduct of the ladies of her court, and upon the inclination she had for Astrology. The Queen who had shed a great many tears at this sermon (to the great surprise of the audience, because it was not at all usual to see her shed tears upon such subjects) received her advice kindly at the time that her spirits were terrified with the truths this bold Franciscan had been pronouncing; but these ideas of terror being by degrees dissipated, the advice of the Lady de Mortemart was no longer seasonable, and she was sent away to Poitou (to which place she was banished) to bestow it upon some persons of more scrupulous consciences (1).

(1) Mercure Galant, October 1702, pag. 108, &c.

[B] She was mother of Renatus de Rochechouart . . . great-grandfather of the Marshal de Vivonne. Who in 1570 married Jane de Saulx, daughter of Gaspard, Lord of Tavannes, Marshal of France, and of Frances de la Baume Montreuil, who was so learned, and so perfect a mistress of the holy scriptures, that she had the honour to convert a famous Rabbi whom she overcame in a regular disputation (2). Let her therefore be placed from henceforth in the catalogue of learned women. Renatus de Rochechouart was father of Gaspard de Rochechouart, Marquis de Mortemart, who married Louisa de Maura, a lady of great virtue and beauty (3). She was daughter and heiress of Charles Count de Maure (4), and of Diana Descars who was esteemed one of the finest wits of the XVIIth century (5). Gaspard de Rochechouart was father of Gabriel, in favour of whom the Marquisate of Mortemart was erected in Duché-Pairie, and who was the first gentleman of the King's bed-chamber, and governor of Paris, and died in 1673, father of Marshal Vivonne, and of Madam de Montelpan, Madam de Thianges, and the Abbess of Fontevraud (6).

(2) Id. Ibid. pag. 106.

(3) Ibid. pag. 105.

(4) Le Port Anselme, Palais d'Honneur, pag. 524.

(5) Mercure Galant, October 1702, pag. 105.

(6) Ibid. pag. 103, 104.

(a) It appears from his Print prefixed to the first volume of his Travels, that he was 74 years old in 1679.

(b) Tavernier, Preface to the first volume of his Travels.

(c) See the title of the same volume.

(d) Mercure Galant, for February 1690. The author is mistaken, when he says that Tavernier was 89 years old in July 1689.

TAVERNIER (JOHN BAPTIST) Baron d'Aubonne [A], one of the greatest travellers of the XVIIth century, was born at Paris in the year 1605 (a). His natural inclination to travel was very much increased by what he daily saw and heard in his father's house [B]. He began so early to gratify that passion, that at twenty-two years of age he had seen the finest countries in Europe; as, France, England, the Netherlands, Germany, Switzerland, Poland, Hungary, and Italy (b). He travelled six times into Turkey, Persia, and the East-Indies, during the space of forty years, and by all the different routes it was possible to take (c). He was making a seventh journey when he died at Moscow in July 1689 (d). He had got a great estate by dealing in jewels; and yet he found himself in low circumstances towards the latter end of his life, by reason of the misconduct of one of his nephews, who had in the Levant the direction of a cargo made in France, amounting to two hundred twenty-two thousand livres prime cost; which ought to have produced above a million (e). It is thought he undertook his last journey in hopes of making up that loss. He had collected a great many observations (f); but he had never learned either to speak or write good French, and therefore the relations he has given us were drawn up by another hand [C]. In one of them he speaks very

(f) Some of which are mere fables, which they made him believe to impose upon his simplicity. See Doctor Giv: Francesco Genelli Carris, pag. 138, 139, of the second Tome of his Giro del Mondo, printed at Naples in the year 1699, in 12mo.

(1) Eldest son to Mr du Quefne the greatest seaman that ever was in France.

[A] Baron d'Aubonne. Being made noble by the King of France, he bought that Barony, situated in that part of the Canton of Bern called le pais de Vaud, near the lake of Geneva. He was obliged to part with it, either to pay his debts, or to make the necessary preparations for his last voyage into the East Indies. Mr du Quefne (1) bought it, and retired thither after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He is still in possession of it, and resides there, preferring that retirement to the great employments he might have pretended to by changing his religion.

[B] By what he daily saw and heard in his father's house. His father, a native of Antwerp, settled at Paris, where he had a great trade in Geographical maps. The curious, who bought them of him every day, used to discourse very much of foreign countries. His hearing all those discourses, and seeing so many maps, increased in young Tavernier his inclination for travelling.

[C] The relations he has given us were drawn up by another hand. They appeared (2) in two volumes in the year 1679, and contain his six voyages. After this ill of the Dutch (g). In some others he shews himself a down-right Plagiary [D]. He was grievously abused in a book intitled l'Esprit de Mr Arnauld: and it is thought he would have made his application to the Civil or Ecclesiastical courts of Holland, in order to have satisfaction for that affront, had he not considered that his adversary would have sheltered himself under the pretence of having done it to vindicate the country and religion. Those, who approved this reason of his patience, wondered that he did not pay some author to revenge him [E]. Mr Chappuzeau, who was abused in the same book upon

(2) At Paris in 4to, they have been reprinted in Holland in 12mo.

(g) See the remark [C].

this he published an account of the Seraglio, and some particular tracts, viz. an account of Japan and the kingdom of Tunquin; the History of the conduct of the Dutch in Asia, &c (3). It is in this last tract that he violently inveighs against the Directors of the East India company: and it is but just to observe, that he declares at the very beginning, that he does not blame the conduct of the Dutch in general (4); on the contrary he commends them very much. What I say, adds he, does not concern the States-General, for whom I have a due respect: I speak only of private men, for whom I am not obliged to have any regard, since they have been so unjust to me upon several occasions. If you desire to know who put his memoirs into order, you need only read the following words of Mr Chappuzeau (5). 'At his return in the year 1668, having a great estate, he (6) thought fit to buy the Barony of d'Aubonne in the Canton of Bern: to that end he came to Geneva, and lodged for some time in my house. Our friendship was then renewed, but upon a very heavy condition; which was, to give a form to his chaos, as you rightly call the confused memoirs of his six voyages; which he had taken partly from one Father Raphael a Capuchin, who had been a long time at Ispahan. For above two years, I amused him with hopes of taking my pen in hand for him; but at last losing all manner of patience, and meeting with me at Paris, whither I went upon private occasions; how unwilling soever I was for a great many reasons to grant him his request, as several of my friends can testify, he at last found means to engage me in that work by a superior power. For this purpose he made use of the interest of the first President de Lamoignon, who having spoke to the King about it, as he gave me to understand, told me, that his majesty desired to see Tavernier's voyages; and that, since he could not find any body else, whose assistance he could ask in this work, I should not put him off any longer. Mr de Lamoignon, and Mr de Baviile his son, loved to hear him tell stories of his voyages; and the first being besides curious of medals, had received a great many from Tavernier, as the latter often told me, which obliged him in gratitude to espouse his interest. Thus, Sir, if you knew how much I was mortified, not to say put to the rack, for above a year that this wretched work lasted, by the bluntness of the husband, and the ridiculous humour of the wife, doubtless you would not have been so cruel as to insult me about a thing which I did in spite of myself, terribly against my will, and without any profit. This is what a great many honest men can still witness. Besides, I must acquaint you, Sir, that when I came to that chapter, relating to the conduct of the Dutch in Asia, the friends to whom Mr Tavernier communicated his memoirs, which he generally trusted to his memory, and dictated to me in bad French, having nothing in writing but what he had from the Capuchin, did whatever they could to dissuade him from harping upon that string. I did the same, and when I saw that neither they nor I could prevail upon the man, whom you have well described, I told him plainly, that he might look for some body else to write down such a discourse. After the high encomium, I had bestowed upon the Dutch nation, with no less gratitude, than justice, twenty years before, in the first volume of my Europe vivante, which has been printed twice in French, and translated into the German language: after all these encomiums, I say, so sincere and so well-grounded, should I have been so base as to contradict myself, and be guilty of such a shameful complaisance? Upon my refusal, therefore, which occasioned our falling out for some days, and was like to have occasioned our falling out for ever, Mr Tavernier made his application to Mr de la Chapelle, Secretary to Mr de Lamoignon before-mentioned. This Secretary undertook to write for him; and it is he, who, after my return to Geneva, wrote the third volume of Tavernier's relations, which contains the History of Japan; and wherein, either out of imprudence or malice he introduces a Protestant speaking the language of a Roman Catholic. I can easily prove that I was at Geneva with my family, and not at Paris, when that volume was written and printed.'

It will not be improper to acquaint the reader, that the Jesuits complained of Tavernier's relations (7). See what Mr. Arnauld has said to them by way of answer (8).

[D] In some others he shews himself a downright Plagiary.] Dr Hyde (9) having quoted a long passage of the relation of that author, informs us (10), that Tavernier took it, like a downright plagiary, out of a book printed at Lyons, in the year 1671, in 8vo, and written by a person who had been thirty years in Persia. 'Sciendum est Tavernierum ad initia Plagiarum hocce de Gavris paragraphum (& forte multa alia) defumpisse ex alio itineraio Gallico ed. Lyons 1671, in 8vo, cujus autor est P. G. D. C. i. e. Pater Gabriel de Chinon, qui 30 annos in Persia transegit (11). --- It is to be observed that Tavernier, like an errant Plagiary, has stolen what he says of the Gavris, pag. 545. (and perhaps a great many other things) out of a French book of travels published at Lyons 1671, in 8vo, whose authors name is P. G. D. C. that is, Father Gabriel de Chinon, who lived 30 years in Persia.'

[E] They wondered that he did not pay some author to revenge him.] Although Tavernier did not write the books that came out under his name, yet he was obliged to look upon himself as the author, and to act accordingly in regard to those who would criticize him. I mean, that regularly, and according to the laws of the commonwealth of learning, he ought to use no other weapon but pen against pen. The censuring of a book, is, properly speaking, an action brought against an author before his true judges. He is summoned to appear before the public to be told, either that he argues wrong, or that he understands certain things in a wrong sense. He is therefore cited before a lawful tribunal; for it belongs to the public to give judgment on such sort of accusations, both in the first and last instances. He ought not therefore to appeal to other judges. This would be too plainly betraying his own weakness; this would be changing the order of things, and endeavouring to supply his want of knowledge by the favour he hopes his intriguing may procure him before the tribunal of the magistrates (12). But I except out of this rule those authors, who are wounded in their reputation: For if a critic is not contented to censure a wrong version, a false principle, a wrong consequence, an unfaithful quotation, &c. if he will also charge a blot in the family, a robbery, an adultery, a state-crime, &c. it is very allowable to bring him before the secular Judges. The accused person, let him be never so learned, may without appearing to mistrust his pen, very well remove the cause from one tribunal to another, and declining the jurisdiction of the publick, have recourse to the magistrates and the laws established by sovereigns against defamatory libels. I do not say that he is obliged to have recourse to them; for he may be contented with the short way of giving the lie, in imitation of Father Valerian (13): He may with a mentis impudentissime, -- thou art a most impudent liar, confound his accusers, and fully justify himself, unless they make out their accusations. So that every author, struck with this thunder-bolt of honest Father Valerian, will be accounted a public calumniator by all equitable judges, if he does not clearly prove the scandalous facts he has broached against the honour of his neighbour. His silence is a full vindication of those whom he accuses, ad hoc non probante absolvitur reus, if the prosecutor brings no proof

(7) In the the ad volume of the Defense des nouveaux Chrétiens.

(8) At the end of the third volume of the Morale Pratique.

(9) Hyde, de Religione veterum Perfarum, in Appendice, pag. 535, & seq.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Compare what shall be said in the remarks of the article THOMAS.

(13) See the article MAGNI, remark [C].

(3) At Paris in 4to, in the year 1681, reprinted in Holland, in 12mo.

(4) Tavernier, Histoire de la conduite des Hollandais en Asie, ch. i, pag. 241, of the third volume of his relations, Dutch edition.

(5) Défense du Sr. Samuel Chappuzeau contre une Satire intitulée l'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, pag. 7.

(6) That is to say, Mr Tavernier.

his account, has not been altogether true. I was treated there with civility and kindness. See what a difference the thing is curious enough.

(14) See the Entretiens sur la Cabale Chimerique, pag. 202, & seq.

(15) See, above, remark [C], citation (4).

(16) Chappuzeau, Défense
&c. pag. 8.

Cabale chimérique (18).

(18) Pag. 201,
& seq.

(19) It consists of two letters of which contain but ten pages in 4to, in two columns. I have set down above, citation (5), the title of this pamphlet.

(a) Taken from a public Thesis maintained at Wittemberg the 31st of March, 1688, intituled. Memoria Job. Tauleri restaurata, &c. composed by Georgius Friedericus Heupelius Argentoratensis.

[A] So many different opinions about the year in which he died. According to some (1) he died in the year 1355. Others (2) will have it that it was the 15th July 1379. Others (3) are of opinion that he departed this life in the year 1380.

[B] He wrote several books.] He wrote them in his mother-tongue: The most considerable were translated into Latin by Surius, and published at Cologne, in the year 1548, in the following order. Historia vite & conversationis Joannis Tauler. Conciones de tempore. Conciones de Sanctis. De veris virtutibus, institutionibusque divinis. Epistolæ devotionem, divinumque amorem spirantes. Prophetiæ de plagis nostri temporis. Cantica quedam spiritalia animæ Deum impendendi amanti. De

(3) Stratemannus, Theatr. Histor. Eccles. pag. 847, apud Georg. Frideric. Heupelium, in Memoria J. Tauleri restaurata pag. ult.

novem rubris sive gradibus Christianæ perfectionis. Speculum lucidissimum & exemplar Domini nostri J. Christi. Convivium M. Eckardi jucundum & pium. Colloquium Theologi & Mendici. Oratio fidelis præparatoria ad mortem. Præparationes quatuor notabiles ad mortem sed mortem. Notabiles alia ad mortem silem præparatio. De decem cæcitatibus, & quatuordecim divini amoris radicibus libellus. Note, that all the works, are collections out of Taulerus, and intermixed with the writings of some other authors (4). Note also, that the work intituled, Sermones quibus explanatio evangeliorum quæ diebus Dominicis ac festis sanctorum enarrari solent, comprehendi- was printed at Augsburg, in folio, in the year 1508, at

(4) Taken from Father Labbe, Differt. de Scrip-tor Eccl. Tom. i,
pag. 608, 609.

concerning which there are different opinions: they are blamed by some Catholics, and commended by some Protestants [C]. It cannot be denied that he corrupts several of his readers by leading them into Fanaticism [D]. We shall see below the character which a man

Basil in 1521 and 1522 in folio, at Francfort in 1681 in 4to, and that the Augsborg edition does not contain all the sermons that are to be found in the other editions (5). Some will have it, that Taulerus is the author of a book intitled, Theologia Germanica, printed in 1518, 1519, 1520, 1528, 1681, &c. No body doubts that the person who translated it into Latin, under the name of Johannes Theophilus, was Sebastian Castalio. Many are of opinion, that Taulerus is not the author of that book: For, say they, he is quoted in it, and the author styles himself priest and warden of the order of the Knights of the Teutonic order, in their house at Francfort (6). James Thomafius has made a collection of several encomiums bestowed upon that book (7). But see particularly the Preface to the French edition (8) of Theologia Germanica, and the letter concerning mythical authors at the end of that edition. You will find in the preface many particulars concerning the book translated into Latin by Castalio, and the following passage may be seen in the letter. 'Taulerus wrote in old German, which is rarely to be met with. Surius made a Latin translation of it, printed several times at Paris, and at Cologne, till the year 1615, which now serves instead of the original. There are many German editions of it, published both by the Roman Catholics and the Protestants: The Flemings have also printed it several times; but the old Flemish edition of Francfort in 1565, is altered, as well as that which M. Serrarius published at Hoorn, about forty years ago, though otherwise the latter contains more pieces of the author than any other. The best is that of Antwerp 1685: However, his institutions, his letters, and his exercises upon the passion, are wanting in it; but they are to be found by themselves, the two first with this title Medulla Animæ, of which there is an old French edition, but inferior to a new and very fine translation, both of his Institutions, printed at Paris in 1668, and of his Exercises upon the passion, printed in the same place the next year, with the Exercises of the pious Eschius, upon the purgative, illuminative, and unitive life, thereunto subjoined. Father Mabillon, in the catalogue inserted at the end of his Traité des Etudes Monastiques, places Taulerus's works among the spiritual books, translated into French. I never saw his Sermons among his works, though they are the most considerable part of them: And I am sure that this treatise concerning the poor life of Jesus Christ is much less to be found there, since it is wanting in Surius's Latin translation, and is only to be found in German and Flemish (9).

[C] They are blamed by some Catholics, and commended by some Protestants. Eccius said that Taulerus was a doating man, suspected of heresy, and one who ought always to have remained in obscurity. Vocavit Eccius Taulerum somniantem, hæreses arguit, & ut prorsus lateret, & nunquam in monasteria involare optavit (10). Blofius vigorously opposed this censure. 'Eccius strenue se opposuit Ludovicus Blofius Abbas Lætiensis qui Taulerum Catholicæ fidei integerrimum cultorem appellavit, dixit ea quæ scripsit sana & plane divinæ esse, optavitque in nomine domini, ut Taulerus ubique gentium cognitus esset, & à pluribus diligentissime legeretur: addit minus circumspexit Eccium, Taulerum nondum satis à se lectum damnavisse (11). - - - Eccius was strenuously opposed by the Abbot Ludovicus Blofius, who called Taulerus a most hearty maintainer of the Catholic Faith, and said, that his writings were not only sound but even divine, and wished in God's name, that Taulerus were known all over the world, and most diligently read: he adds, that Eccius had been too hasty and condemned Taulerus before he had sufficiently read him.' This judgment of Blofius Possivien mentions and approves (12). Spondanus takes Taulerus's part, and says he foretold Wickliff's heresies, and praises Blofius his apologist. Cujus (Tauleri) extant sermones, & alii tractatus unionem divini spiritus referentes: prædixitque hæreses contra Sacramenta & Dogmata Ecclesiæ Catholicæ brevi ab Wickliffe orituræ. Contra cujus obtractatores apologiam scripsit Ludovicus Blofius, VOL. V.

recenter ejusdem Spiritus Sancti devotissimus discipulus (13). - - - Taulerus's sermons are extant and other treatises, which seem as if inspired; he also foretold the heresies which Wickliff should soon broach against the sacraments, and the doctrines of the Catholic Church. His apology, in answer to those who censured him, was written by Ludovicus Blofius, a later and most zealous disciple of the same holy Spirit. Sixtus Senensis highly commends the devotion of our Dominican (14). I have read in Hottinger (15), that some Catholics call Taulerus an Herefiarch, and say that several people doubted of his salvation; but an apparition removed their doubts. Luther was one of those, who bestowed great encomiums upon Taulerus. Hunc doctorem, says he (16), scio quidem ignotum esse Scholis Theologorum, ideoque forte contemptibilem, sed ego plus in eo (licet totus Germanorum vernacula sit conscriptus) reperi Theologiæ solidæ & synceræ quam in universis omnium universitatibus Scholasticis Doctoribus reperiuntur, aut reperiiri possunt in suis sententiis. - - - This doctor, says he, I know is not taken notice of in the schools of Divinity, and therefore perhaps despised, but I have found more solid and sound Divinity in him, though all his works are written only in the German language, than in all the scholastic doctors the universities ever produced, or than can be found in their opinions. Let us see what he wrote to Spalatius (17). 'Si te delectat puram solidam antiquæ simillimam Theologiam legere in Germanica lingua effusam, sermones Joh. Tauleri prædicatoriæ professionis comparare tibi potes. Neque enim ego vel in Latina vel in nostra lingua Theologiam vidi salubriorem, & cum evangelio consonantior. - - - If you like to read pure solid Divinity, such as the primitive was, expressed in the German tongue, you may consult the sermons of Job. Taulerus, that famous preacher. Nor have I, either in the Latin or our own tongue, met with sounder Divinity, or more agreeable to the Gospel.' Luther's encomiums upon Taulerus have been prefixed more than once to the works of that mystical Divine (18). Some affect to say, that Luther spoke of him in this manner, either before he made his attack against Popery, or during the first years of his reformation, and afterwards grew more reserved in praising that writer. Post illa tempora ubi B. viro datum fuit tenebras papales magis magisque superare, & negotium cum novis prophetis intercessit in Taulero ejusque Theologia commendandis capiti esse parior (19). Nay, they quote a sermon, wherein he censures him for a pernicious doctrine, namely, that we ought not to pray to God. 'Taulerus exemplo nescio quo docere vult esse à precibus desistendum: sed hac doctrina nihil est perniciosius: nimis enim ad intermittendas preces jam antea propensi sumus (20). - - - Taulerus, I know not by whose example, teacheth, that we ought to desist from praying: but nothing is more pernicious than this doctrine: for we are too apt already to forget our prayers.' However it be, Michael Neander, Nicolas Hunnius, Dorſcheus, Quenstedt, Spener, Arndius (21), and some other Lutherans, have bestowed fine encomiums upon Taulerus; and Flavius Illyricus places him among the witnesses of the truth (22). Let us conclude this remark with the words of a modern Mystic. 'Every good man that knows him must needs like and approve him. Hence it is, that the wisest Protestants, Dr Arndius, Dr Mullerus, and many others, without excepting Luther and Melancthon, have commended him no less than the Roman Catholics, as may be seen at the beginning of the German edition of his Sermons, procured by the pious Arndius, and also before that of all the works of this author which was published by the famous Dr Spener, and re-printed several times (23) at Francfort.'

[D] It cannot be denied that he corrupts several of his readers, by leading them into Fanaticism. Beza despised him very much: Sainte Aldegonde looked upon him as an Enthusiast: Voëtius took him only for a man, who, without being a downright Enthusiast, said many things that made way for the Enthusiasm of some sectaries (24). Here follows a passage of Hoornbeek: 'Fuerunt sub Papatu, qui vel inficii, vel imprudentes

(5) Georg. Friedricus Heupelius, in Memoria J. Tauleri restaurata, fol. B.

(6) Ex cod. ibid.

(7) Thomaf. Schedasma Histor. de Philosoph. Gentili, Gnoſticorum, Heretic, & Theologia Myſtica, pag. 75; apud eund. ibid.

(8) Amsterdam 1700, printed by Henry Wetſſſin.

(9) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, pag. 12, 13.

(10) Georg. Fried. Heupelius, folio B verso. He cites Possivien. Appar. Sac. Tom. 1.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Spondanus, ad ann. 1355, num. 17.

(14) Sixtus Senensis, lib. iv, Biblioth. Sanctæ, pag. 336, Edit. Colon. 1626, apud Heupelium, ubi supra, fol. B. 2.

(15) Hottinger, ubi supra: He cites Bæovius and Chrif. 1355. S. 21, 22.

(16) Luther. Tom. 1, Latin. Jenenſ. pag. 86, 6, apud Heupelium, folio B verso.

(17) Idem, Tom. 1. Epist. Epistol. xxiii, ad Spalat. A. 1516. dat. pag. 32. fac. 4, apud Heupelium, ibid.

(18) Christoph. Henric. Loebner, in brevi Judicio Theologico de Libello Germanico. That piece of Loebner was printed at Iena in 1681.

(19) Id. ibid. fol. A. 3.

(20) Luther. in Concion. domi publico habitis, Dominica Re. minific. Edit. Wankeliana, pag. 645, apud Loebnerum, ibid. folio A. 2 verso.

(21) See the same Heupelius, fol. ult.

(22) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, pag. 11.

(23) In 1680, and 1693, &c.

(24) See the same Heupelius, fol. B. 2.

a man well skilled in these matters gives of him [E]. We should do him wrong, did we not distinguish him from those mystical men, who have taught in Christianity something like the errors of the Eastern Philosophers [F], which I have mentioned in the article of Spinoza (b).

(b) See remark [A], of the article SPINOZA.

viam multam straverunt Enthusiasticis illis, sua Theologia mystica, quemadmodum loquantur, & libellis pietatis, quibus terminis & phrasibus duris, mysticis & allegoricis, tum inspirationis, tum deificationis, &c. utebantur, & ab aliis pro enthusiasmis suis habitibus vel acceptis postea fuerunt. Quales, Johannes de Schoonhoven, Job. Taulerus, quem inter Pontificios, Eckius; inter nostros Maraxius carpunt: defendit autem Lud. Blofius, singulari pro eo apologia (25). There were some under the Papacy, who either ignorantly, or imprudently, very much paved the way for those Enthusiasts, by their mystical Divinity, as it was called, and by books of piety, wherein were used the baroque mystical and allegorical terms and phrases of inspiration, deification, &c. which were afterwards borrowed and received by others in their Enthusiasms. Such as Johannes de Schoonhoven, Joh. Taulerus, who has been censured by Eckius, among the Roman Catholics, and by St. Aldegonde among us: but he is vindicated by Lud. Blofius in a particular apology. Nicolas Hunnius, and some other Lutherans, had the same opinion of Taulerus. Ex quibus & permultis similibus . . . proclive est iudicium ferre, an non Taulerus per se, minimum per accidens, Schwencfeldianorum, Anabaptistarum, & Weigelianorum mensis aniam dederit (26). . . . From which, and a great many others of the like kind . . . it is easy to judge, whether Taulerus of himself, and not at all by accident, has not given a handle to the fictions of the Schwencfeldians, the Anabaptists, and the Weigelians. Heupelius, so often quoted by me, reduces his whole disputation to these two propositions: 1. That Taulerus deserves to be recommended to the students in Divinity. 2. That he ought to be read with caution; for, says he, there are some false doctrines in his works, and some phrases that seem to favour the Enthusiasts and Quietists. Quod non solum haud pauci in eo reperiuntur errores approbati, qui in sermonibus edit. Francof. 1621, & 1681, diligenter sunt annotati, sed etiam non raro dictionibus & formulis loquendi utatur, quae videntur Enthusiasticis nominatim Weigelianis, & quos non ita pridem D. Michael de Molinos in Italia exclaustravit, Quietistis favere (27).

(25) Hoornbeek, Summa Controv. lib. vi, pag. m. 408.

(26) Nicolas Hunnius, in Confider. novae Paracelli. & Weigel. Theol. apud Heupelium, ibid. fol. B 3.

(27) Heupelius, ibid.

(28) That is, Taulerus.

(29) Lettre sur les Auteurs Mystiques, pag. 11, 22.

[E] The character, which a man, well-skilled in these matters, gives of him. The character of that mystical author (28), in my opinion, is this, That the soul, by the mortification of her passion, and vices, by the practice of virtue, by the denial and renunciation of herself, of her desires, of her will, self-love, and of her whole activity, and of all created beings, should return into her internal state, looking for God there, and finding him at last, who manifests himself there, by the birth of his divine Word, and the inspiration of his holy Spirit: and that afterwards, by a lasting and continual introversion, she should continue in that state of interiority, in which God may work in her his will, his wonders, and his special direction; of which nevertheless that author speaks but generally (29). These are the words of the author of the new edition of the Theologia Germanica.

[F] Something like the errors of the Eastern Philosophers. It is surprising that these mystical Christians, and these Heathen Philosophers, should have had so exactly the same notions, that one would think they had agreed among themselves to vent the same follies, some in the east, and some in the west. What a wonderful concert there is between people who never saw, and never heard of one another! I am going to cite a passage, which will shew us that some mystical men have taught the transformation of all things into God, and an identification, which would reduce the Creator and the creatures to a kind of nothingness, that is, to an eternal inaction. This is very like the Nireupan of the Siamese (30). These mystical men supposed the doctrine of the Trinity, and ascribed the whole action to the three Persons, and so they believed that the divine Essence itself did nothing; and that when the soul is transformed into God's Essence, and raises herself above the three Persons, she enjoys as great a rest as if she were annihilated. Ruysbroch shall be my witness. Itaque, says he (31), ne quis aliquo implicetur ac seducatur errore, diligenter falsos hosce Prophetas, me eos depingente, animadvertat. Qui primi generis sunt, Dei essentiam se esse ajunt supra divinitatis personas, adeoque se esse ociofos, ac si non essent: quandoquidem Dei essentia non agit, sed Spiritus Sanctus operatur. Putant ergo se ipso Sancto Spiritu esse superiores, & se neque ipso, neque ejus gratia habere opus: dicunt enim non modo nullam creaturam, sed nec ipsum quidem Deum quicquam eis vel conferre vel auferre posse. Quidam etiam ejus sunt sententiae, ut animas suas ex Dei substantia creatas affirmant, cumque mortui fuerint, rursum se futuros esse id quod antea fuerant: perinde ut scyphus aquae haustus ex fonte, si in ipsum fontem refundatur, idem est quod fuit prius. Ajunt praeterea, si quis per coelum omne pervagetur, nullum eum neque angelorum, neque animarum, neque ordinum, neque gloriae, neque praemiorum discrimen distinctionemque reperturum; siquidem nihil illic, nisi simplicem quandam beatamque essentiam, omni actione vacantem, esse arbitrantur: Addunt his, post extremum judicii diem omnes omnino homines, malos aequae ac bonos, & simul Deum ipsum, non nisi unam eandemque Dei essentiam, quae in omnem eternitatem abique ulla actione semper ocio vacatura sit, esse futuros. Atque eam ob rem nihil neque scire, neque cognoscere, neque velle, nec amare, nec cogitare, non gratias agere, non laudare, sed nec desiderare, nec habere volunt. Nam supra Deum & sine Deo esse, nec in ulla re Deum quaerere nec invenire, atque demum ab omnibus prorsus immunes esse volunt. Et hoc ipsi perfectam appellant spiritus paupertatem. Verum ejuscemodi paupertas in caelo minime invenitur, neque in Deo, neque in angelis, neque in sanctis, sed nec in hominibus bonis toto orbe terrarum. Itaque non nisi diabolica & tartarea paupertas est. . . . Therefore, says he, let every one in order to prevent their being seduced and led away into error, diligently attend to my description of these false prophets. Those of the first kind affirm themselves to be the divine Essence, superior to the persons of the Divinity, and therefore to be unactive as if they were not in being; because the Divine Essence is at rest, and the Holy Ghost only operates. They hold themselves therefore to be superior to the Holy Ghost itself, and to be in no want either of the Holy Ghost, or of it's influence: for they say that not only no creature, but not even GOD himself can add to, or take from them in any respect. Some also have embraced such an opinion, that they affirm their souls to be created out of the divine substance, and that after death they are again to return from whence they came, as a glass of water taken out of a fountain, if it is poured again into the fountain, is the same with what it was formerly. They say moreover, that if any one was to traverse the whole Heavens, he would find no difference nor distinction among angels, souls, orders, glories, or rewards; for that they believe nothing to be there but a certain simple and happy essence, void of all action: they add farther, that after the day of judgment, all men universally, the bad as well as the good, together with GOD himself, will make up only one and the same divine Essence, which will enjoy an absolute rest and inaction to all eternity. And for this reason, that they will neither know, understand, will, love, think, return thanks for, nor praise, nor so much as desire, or have any thing. For they will have themselves to be superior to and independent of GOD, and in no respect wanting to seek or to find GOD, but, in short, absolutely exempt from all things. And this they call a perfect poverty of spirit. But this sort of poverty is not to be met with, neither in GOD, nor in the angels, nor in the saints, nor even in good men, any where upon the face of the earth, therefore this poverty is only diabolical and hellish. Our Taulerus always differs from these doaters, and very solidly confutes those who fancy they are only a meer passive instrument in the hand of GOD (32).

(30) See, above, the remark [A], of the article SOMMONA-CODOM.

(31) Ruysbrochius, in Libro de vera Contemplat. cap. xix, pag. 445. apud Glib. Voetium, in Exercitiis Focatis, cap. iii, pag. 36.

Hartley

(32) See the 2^d page of Taulerus, quoted by Voetius, ubi supra, pag. 78, 79.

TAURELLUS (NICOLAS) a Physician, and a Philosopher, was born at Montbelliard, the twenty-sixth of November 1547. He was admitted Master of Philosophy at Tübingen in the year 1565, and when the magistrates of Nuremberg founded an university at Altdorf, in the year 1581, they gave him the professorship in Physic (a). He discharged it with great ability: but because he departed from the opinions commonly received, he had some enemies, and fell out with the Divines. Those of Heidelberg cried him down as an Atheist [A]. He died at Altdorf in September 1606 (b). It was a time of pestilence; and as soon as he saw that one of his servant-maids had got the plague, he left his house in the night-time, but came home again soon after, and died the same day (c). He published some books which made a noise [B].

He was a little man; hence it was that a Poet, alluding to the word Taurellus, a diminutive of Taurus, bestowed this encomium upon him, that he was Taurellus in body, but Taurus in mind, Corpore Taurellus, Taurus es ingenio. It is one of the verses of an elegy, that was made in his praise when he was admitted to the degree of Doctor of Physic in the university of Basil (d).

(a) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Medicorum, pag. 403.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Paulus Freherus, in Theatro Virorum illustrium, pag. 1320.

(d) Taken from Scappius in Scaligeri Hypobol. fol. 196, verso.

(1) Giff. Voëtius, Disput. Select. Tom. i., pag. 200.

(2) That letter is dated from Heidelberg the 26th of August 1610. It is the 149 among those published by the Remonstrants in the edition of the year 1684.

[A] The Divines of Heidelberg cried him down as an Atheist. Giffertus Voëtius tells us what was the occasion of it. He puts the question to him (1). 'Cur Theologi Heidelbergenses ante annos aliquot Nicol. Taurellum Philosophum non ignobilem dixerint Atheum Medicum, in Literis (2) ad Deputatos Synodi Holland. super libro & causâ Conr. Vorstii perscriptis? Et an non falcem miserint in alienam messem, & indignè traduxerint istius aliorumque similium magnorum virorum inventa ad illustrandam & perficiendam Philosophiam. . . . Why did the Heidelberg Divines, some years ago call Nicolas Taurellus, that eminent Philosopher, an Atheistical Physician, in their Letters to the Deputies of the Dutch synod, written on the occasion of the book and cause of Vorstius? And did they not meddle in a matter no way belonging to them, and unworthily traduce him, and other great mens inventions, towards illustrating and improving Philosophy?' And he answers it thus: 'Arbitror eus respectisse paradoxa non pauca quæ imprimis Compendio Metaphysico, & Triumpho Philosophiæ infargit; & ad divina ac Theologica passim applicat; quibus limites communes hodiernæ Christianissimæ Theologiæ transiliri, & dogmata nonnulla conquassari, atque adeo Scepticis, Libertinis, aliiisque fanaticis & secundi generis Atheis causam nimis tradi non immerito metuendum est. De intentione illius viri nolumus judicare, nec cætera ejus inquirimus. Aliter etiam judicamus de ingeniosis ipsius disputationibus, in naturalibus contra Piccolomineum, Cæsalpinum, alioque physicos: ubi omnem libertatem Socraticam tollere nolumus: nec theologi hoc fori est, sed medici, physici, mathematici: quomodo vice versa, metaphysica, pneumatologica, & theologica naturalia non tam, nedum solius physico-medici & mathematici fori sunt, quam theologi. Videant ergo juniores, ut cum judicio legant philosophemata ejus, quæ naturalia transcendunt. . . . I imagine they had an eye to the several paradoxes, which he has advanced, especially in his Compendium Metaphysicum, and Triumphus Philosophiæ; and has every where applied to Divine and Theological subjects: which there is too much reason to fear may be made use of in modern Christianity to break through the usual bounds of Divinity, to sap the foundation of some of it's doctrines, and consequently to make too great concessions to Sceptics, Libertines, and other Fanatics, and Atheists of the second rate. I shall form no judgment as to his invention, nor enquire into other particulars of him. I have a quite different opinion of him as to his ingenious disquisitions in Natural Philosophy, against Piccolomineus, Cæsalpinus, and other Naturalists: in which I am for allowing the freedom of Sacrales: nor does this regard Divinity, but Physic, Natural Philosophy, and Mathematics: as, on the contrary, Metaphysic, Pneumatology, and Natural Theology, belong not so properly, much less solely, to Physic, Natural Philosophy, and Mathematics, as to Divinity. Let therefore the young readers persevere with candor his Philosophical reflexions, which are above nature.' Tho' that famous author would not plainly condemn the Heidelberg Divines, he gives us room to believe that they were too hasty. Such accusations ought to be very rarely preferred. It appears, on the other hand, that he does justice to that professor, who was certainly a man of great parts, and a subtle disputant. I have quoted, in another place (3), a passage wherein it is said, that the same Divine charged him with Atheism: but I must observe here, that the terms of the original are not so strong: he only calls him an assertor of paradoxes, Assertio paradoxorum Taurelli (4).

[B] He published some books which made a noise. A Method of Prognostics in Physic; notes upon the works of Arnaldus à Villanova: Disquisitiones Physicæ de mundo contra Piccolomineum: Disquisitiones Physicæ & Metaphysicæ de celo adversus eundem: Alpes cæcæ, it is a book against Cæsalpinus: de infiniti continui sectione: de rerum æternitate. I have quoted in another place (5) a book, wherein he advances a particular opinion, concerning the souls of beasts. See the titles inserted in a passage out of Voëtius, in the foregoing remark.

He had begun a book de Usis per se subsistentibus, some pieces whereof were printed after his death, with a new edition of the tract de Cælo & Mundo. Picart, his colleague, took care of that edition at Amberg, in 1611, in 8vo. It appears from these fragments that Taurellus understood very well the nature of substance, and wherein it is distinguished from accidents. It is somewhat strange that the liberty he took to confute Aristotle should have exposed him so much to the hatred of Divines: for he principally confuted the doctrines of Aristotle that are contrary to religion. This we may see particularly in a book of his, printed at Marburg, in 1604, in 8vo, and intitled, De Rerum æternitate: Nicolai Taurelli Noricorum Academia Professoris, Metaphysicæ Universalis partes quatuor. In quibus placita Aristotelis, Vallisii, Piccolominei, Cæsalpini, Societatis Conimbricensis, aliorumque discutuntur, examinantur atque refutantur. He therein clearly and solidly confutes Aristotle's opinion, concerning the eternity of the world. He was certainly one of the best Metaphysicians of that age.

(3) In the article of GORLÆUS.

(4) Voëtius, in Theologico-Philosophica Corollaria.

(5) In the article SENNERTUS.

TAUVRY (DANIEL), Doctor of Physic, of the Faculty at Paris, was born at Laval, and there maintained a general Thesis in Philosophy at ten years of age. He was Physician of the Faculty at Angers, at the age of fifteen. He composed several works in Anatomy, and Physic [A], and was an illustrious member of the Royal Academy of Sciences. He died at Paris the first of March 1701, at thirty-two years of age (a).

(a) Mercurius Galant, for March 1701.

(1) See the next Journal des Savans, 1690, pag. 548, Dutch edition.

(2) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, March 1702, pag. 357.

[A] He composed several works in Anatomy and Physic. That which is intitled, Nouvelle Anatomie raisonnée, was printed at Paris in 1690 in 12mo (1): it has been translated into English (2). His new practice in acute Diseases, and in those which depend upon the fermentation of liquids, was published at Paris in 1698, in two volumes in 12mo. See the Journal des Savans of the fourteenth of July, 1698. In the same place was published, in 1699, a new edition of the Traité des Médicaments, which he had revised, corrected, and enlarged. The tenth Journal des Savans of the same year takes notice of it (3).

(3) Pag. 189, Dutch Edition.

TECMESSA

(g) Apud Servium, in Æneid
lib. i, ver. 619.
where instead of Theomissam read Tecmessam, and instead of Turifacen read Eury facen.

TECMESSA, the daughter of a Phrygian Prince [A], was made a prisoner when the Grecians ravaged all the countries adjacent to Troy. Ajax liked her so well that he made her his concubine. She forgot, by degrees, the fall of her family, and that he made her his concubine. She forgot, by degrees, the fall of her family, and that he conceived such an affection for Ajax, who promised to make her a queen (a), that she was extremely afflicted at his death [B]. He had by her a son called Euryfaces, who reigned in Salamis, after the decease of Telamon, Ajax's father. Teucer, the second son of Telamon, had a mind to return into Salamis, after he had settled in the isle of Cyprus; but Euryfaces prevented him (b). The Athenians had a particular veneration for Ajax and his son. Pausanias says (c) that the honours, which had been decreed to them, continued even to his time, and that there was still to be seen at Athens an altar of Euryfaces. We find in Plutarch (d) the privileges granted to the tribe of Æantides, and the encomiums on that tribe. I find nothing concerning the other son of Ajax, mentioned by Dictys Cretensis, whom he calls Achantides (e). His mother's name was Glaucia. He was put into Teucer's hands, as well as Euryfaces, when the Grecians took shipping in order to go home (f). Some have said (g) that Telamon grew angry with Teucer, because he did not bring back with him Tecmessa and Euryfaces. He embarked on board a vessel which made more haste than the rest. Pausanias observes (b) that Ajax's posterity was not very illustrious, and the private life of Ajax is the reason he gives for it; this, I think, is a false reason [C], I do not believe that, Lescalooperius had any grounds for saying, that Julius Cæsar composed a tragedy intitled, Tecmessa [D].

(1) Lib. ii.

[A] A daughter of a Phrygian Prince.] Dictys Cretenfis (1) calls him Teuthrantes. He ſays, that Ajax killed him ſolitario certamine. Every body will tranſlate theſe words as he thinks fit, and perhaps ſome readers will underſtand them of a duel. Afterwards Ajax took, plundered, and burnt the town of that Phrygian, whoſe daughter, Tecmeſſa, was carried away, with the reſt of the booty, and adjudged to Ajax, when the booty was divided. Poſt paucos dies expugnata atque incenſa civitate magnam vim prædæ abſtrahit, abducent Tecmeſſam filiam regis. . . . Ac deinde Ajax ob egregia laborum ſacina Teuthrantis filiam Tecmeſſam concedunt. If we believe Horace, the captive won Ajax's heart by her beauty (2). Sophocles (3) does not agree with Dictys in every particular : for he ſays, that Tecmeſſa's father was already dead (4); that his dominions were laid waſte by Ajax : and that it was his widow, who was killed when the town was taken. Tecmeſſa ſpeaks to Ajax in theſe words :

Was by his cap-tive's beauty won Horat. Od. IV,
lib. ii.

(3) In Ajace.

(4) He calls him
Telcutas.

(5) Here is what the Scholiast says upon that word.
 Ὡς τῆς ἰδίας θανάτῳ τῆς αὐτοῦ, τὸ δὲ ἄλλὰ, ἀντὶ τῆς δέ. See Camerarius's notes upon that place.

Σὺ γάρ με πατρίδ' ἤϊψωσας δορὶ καὶ μητέρ' ἄλλ' ἢ μοῖρα (5) τὸν φύσαντά με καθεῖλεν ἄδ' εὐ θανασίμους οἰκίητας.

Tu enim mihi patriam vastasti bello,
Matrem sustulisti, mors vero patrem
Abripuit ad manes qui apud inferos sunt.

*My country wretched by your sword was made,
My mother murder'd, while my father's shade,
Far from your reach had been by death convey'd.*

[B] Extremely afflicted at his death.] Sophocles and Quintus Calaber furnish her with very moving expressions. The first supposes that she used many entreaties to prevent his killing himself; that she begged of him not to leave her exposed to a thousand misfortunes by his death, and that she pressed it by reminding him of the pleasures he had enjoyed with her.

Ἄνδρὶ τοι χρεὼν
Μνήμην προσεῖναι, τερπνὸν εἴ τι πᾶσι παῖσι.

Decet enim virum
Memorem esse, si quid illi suave accidit (6).

*With ev'ry man who bears a grateful mind,
Each single pleasure must remembrance find.*

The scholiast observes upon this, that Tecmessa puts Ajax in mind of what had passed between them in bed, and that she does it modestly, and like a chaste woman (7). and not so bluntly as Hecuba in Euripides.

man (7), and not to blunty as Hecuba in Euripides' Oedipus at Colonus (μαστεικτικὰ εἰσάγει τὴν ἑκάβην λέγουσαν Πά τας φίλας δ' αὖτ' ὑφ' ὤμων διέζεις ἀνάξ; 'H τῶν ἐν ὤμῳ πάλαιον ἀσπασμάτων γὰρ τὴν' ἔχει παῖς ἐμὴ, κείνη δ' ἐγώ; What will my daughter get by the amorous embraces she will afford you in her bed? The French lady is more nice than that of Athens. The most excellent pieces of Racine would be huffed at for such a plainness).

[C] This, I think, is a false reason.] I will not object to Pausanias, that he says (8) Ajax succeeded his grand-father by the mother's side, who was King of Megara (9): I would readily agree with him, that Ajax lived always in a private capacity, because he died before his father Telamon: But I deny that this can be the reason why his descendants were less illustrious than those of Teucer, the second son of Telamon: These latter reigned in the isle of Cyprus till Evagoras at least, and the more some descendants of Telamon made a great figure for many ages. Why? Because Teucer reigned; but because Ajax did not reign, his descendants were not very illustrious. This is Pausanias's way of arguing. I repeat it again, this is a false way of reasoning; for Euryfaces, Ajax's son, succeeded to the kingdom of Salamis after the death of Telamon, just the same as if he had been a king's son (10). But here is the reason why his descendants did not make a great figure in the world. He had a son called Philæus, who gave away the kingdom of Salamis in order to be made a citizen of Athens: This we find in Pausanias (11). From that time the posterity of Ajax, being divested of sovereign authority, could not possibly shine like that of the other son of Telamon. They had in the person of Miltiades, descended from that son of Euryfaces, all the lustre that a family, not possessed of a kingdom, can have; but after all, they did not sway the scepter as Teucer's posterity did. I must observe, that Philæus, who, according to Pausanias, was Euryfaces's son, and Ajax's grand-son, was Ajax's son, according to Herodotus (12). He was, according to the same Historian, the stem of the Athenian Æcides, from whom Miltiades descended. Plutarch (13) will have it, that Philæus and Euryfaces, both Ajax's sons, resigned the property of the isle of Salamis to the Athenians, in order to be made citizens of Athens. He adds, that Euryfaces resided at Brauron in Attica, and Philæus at Melita (14); and that Philæus gave his name to the Philaides, a people of Attica, from whom Pifistratus derived his original. Stephanus Byzantinus ranks the Philaides under the tribe called Ægeides (15), and says, that Philæus, from whom that people had their name, was the son of Ajax and Lydice, the daughter of Caronus, the son of Lapithus.

son of Laphetus.

[D] Æsculapierus says, that Julius Cæsar composed a tragedy intitled Tecmeffa. This Jesuit observes, that the Romans inserted the vowel u in several Greek words; which was practised to the time of Julius Cæsar, who was the first author of a tragedy, intitled, Tecmeffa. These are his words. "In Alcumeffa, Alcmæmon, Tecmeffa, Hercules, Æsculapierus, & aliis ejusmodi Grecis nominibus, vocalis u a prefixis Latinis interjecta est, non tantum ubi carmen egeret, ut ait ille; sed ubique passim, quod ita mos ferret, etiam in solutâ oratione. Atque ille mos tenuit usque ad Julium Cæsarem, qui Tragediam de Tecmeffa primus scripsisse fertur, & ita pronunciari jussisse. Itaque post Tecmeffam ceptum est dici, uti hodieque dicimus, Alcmæna, & Alcmæon: verum Hercules & Æsculapierus prævaluerunt, & adhuc italicarum retineant vocalem (16). -- In Alcumæna, Al-

(16) Lefcopæ- rios, Comen- tarius in Cicero- de Nat. Deor. lib. iii. cap. 63.

(b) Lib. ii, pag.

S (8) Lib. i. par.

(9) His name

le- (10) Justin. Le

the (11) Lib. i,

(12). (12) Lib. vi,

ices. (10) In Vita

d at and (24) It was his where and other building s the faces, according

Tom. II, 443.

level- (15) Mr
of ibid. pag.

Alcu- scription,

en exi- tribe cal Oeneides

le mos iam de verum (16) L

ena, Al- de Nat

* Alcumæon, Tecmessa, Hercules, Æsculapius, and other Greek words of that kind, the vowel u was inserted by the ancient Latins, not only where it was required in verse, but every where throughout; because it was customary, even in prose. And this custom continued down to Julius Cæsar, who is said to be the first writer of a tragedy on Tecmessa, and to have directed the word to be so pronounced. Therefore after Tecmessa, it became the fashion to pronounce, as we now do, Alcmena and Alcmaeon: But Hercules and Æsculapius kept their ground, and yet retain the inter-placed vowel. The Grammarian Victorinus, was contented to say, that Julius Cæsar began to contract those words. If Lescalperius had read the book of one of his brethren, he would there have found the following passage: 'Scribit Victorinus, lib. i. veteres nunquam c, & m conjunxisse, usque ad Julium Cæsarem, qui primus Alcmaeon, Alcmena, Tecmessa, quos prius Alcumæon, Tecmestam Alcumæonem scribebant (17). --- Vi- (17) Martines, del Rio Syntag- m together, till the time of Julius Cæsar, who first wrote Alcmaeon, Alcmena, Tecmessa, which before were written Alcumæon, Alcmena, and Tecmessa.' I do not think Suetonius would have forgot this dramatic piece of Julius Cæsar, if there had been any such.

TE L A M O N, the son of Æacus and Endeis [A], is one of the principal heroes of fabulous History. He had two brothers, namely Peleus and Phocus; but the latter was his brother only by the father's side (a). There arose such a jealousy between Phocus and the two others, that they plotted to kill him. They took their time as they were playing together at quoits. Some say, that Peleus killed Phocus, by throwing his quoit at his head (b); others say Telamon did it (c): and it is generally agreed that he who did not kill him, was nevertheless an accomplice in that action (d). Æacus thought so [B], for he drove out Peleus (e), as well as Telamon. The latter retired into the isle of Salamis, where Cychreus reigned, who gave him in marriage his daughter Glaucæ, and made him his successor (f). Others say, that having no children he adopted Telamon for his heir (g). However it is certain, that Telamon reigned in the isle of Salamis. After the death of Glaucæ, he married Peribœa, the daughter of Alcatheus, son of Pelops, and King of Megara [C]. From this marriage issued Ajax [D] that [A] The son of Æacus and Endeis. The children of Telamon had a divine original by several descents. Æacus was Jupiter's son. Endeis was the daughter of the centaur Chiron, son of Saturn. Peribœa, the wife of Telamon, and the mother of Ajax, was the daughter of Alcatheus. The latter was the son of Pelops, whose father was Tantalus, the son of Jupiter.

[B] Æacus thought so. It will not be improper to mention what Pausanias says of it (1). Some time after the flight of those two brothers, Telamon sent a deputy to Æacus, to assure him that the murder had been committed thro' inadvertency. Æacus, returned answer, that he should take care not to come into the island; but that, if he had a mind to justify himself, he might speak on board a ship, or upon some bank which he should erect for that end. Telamon pitched upon the last expedient, and erected a bank near the port, where he pleaded his cause; but not being judged innocent, he retired again.

[C] He married Peribœa the daughter of Alcatheus, King of Megara. Though the account which Plutarch (2) had borrowed from Ætæades, concerning Telamon, is come down to us miserably imperfect; yet one may perceive he meant to say, that Telamon, having too much sported with Peribœa, thought it proper to make his escape. The father of this young woman, discovering the affair, and thinking that one of his subjects had debauched her, ordered one of his guards to throw her into the sea. The guard, moved with compassion, chose rather to sell her: The ship on board which she was, landed at Salamis, where Telamon bought Peribœa, who was brought to bed of Ajax. A learned man (3) is of opinion, that instead of Εὐβοία, we ought to read Μεγαρά in that passage of Plutarch, since most authors are agreed, that Ajax's mother was the daughter of Alcatheus, King of Megara. They are not so unanimous as to the name of that lady: Some call her Peribœa (4), and others Eriboea (5). It is plain this difference proceeds only from the fault of some transcriber, who left out, or added a letter to the name of Ajax's mother. Those who transcribed his copy, retained that fault, which occasioned a different reading; and afterwards authors followed the copy they had bought. The name Melibœa, which Ajax's mother yet bears in Athenæus, proceeds from the same cause. That author says, she was married to Theseus in due form (6). He names some other women, whom Theseus took by force; he names two other wives of that prince who are mentioned by Hesiod; and at last he says, that, according to Pherecydes, he had also another wife called Pherebœa. Those four women ought to be reduced to one; Peribœa, Eriboea, Melibœa, and Pherebœa, are four names of one and the same woman, which have been multiplied by the fault of the transcribers. If The-

seus's polygamy was not more certain, with respect to other women, than as to Melibœa, mentioned by Athenæus, and Pherebœa, mentioned by Pherecydes, I should positively assert, that he was a Monogamist, even according to the rigid sense of Tertullian. There is more difficulty in what follows. Ajax's mother was the lawful wife of Theseus; but when? Was it after Telamon's death, or before he married Telamon? If the first, it must be said, that Theseus survived the destruction of Troy, which is false; and that he had a very extravagant desire of marrying, since he pitched upon so old a woman, which is very improbable. It is better therefore to say, that he married Peribœa before her marriage with Telamon. But then, what shall we do with the story, mentioned by Plutarch? Instead of a young woman, whom Telamon thought he had debauched, we should say that he took up only with another man's leavings, either with a widow or a divorced wife. Nothing of this quadrates with Plutarch's narrative, nor can it be supported from other authors. It appears by a passage in Pindar (7), that Telamon was married to Peribœa, when Hercules desired him to follow him in his expedition against Laomedon. At this rate Theseus must needs have divorced his wife somewhat early. However it be, we ought to remember, that Peribœa was one of the virgins, whom the Athenians were obliged to deliver to Minos (8). Theseus was delivered to him at the same time, and boldly opposed Minos's attempt upon Peribœa's honour. This may make us believe, that Theseus fell in love with the maid during his voyage, for she was very handsome; and that he married her soon after. I cannot tell whether he contained himself till after his return; for the heroes of Greece were very dangerous fellow-travellers for a maid, they got children apace. They were very well qualified to preserve the fair sex from the violence of a fierce tyrant: but women ran no less danger in the hands of such deliverers; and it was never more necessary than in respect to them to ask this question, 'Sed quis custodiet ipsos custodes (9)? --- But who, I pray, the guards themselves shall guard?' Let us see how Theseus spoke to Minos. 'Dicitur cum Theseus Cretam ad Minos cum septem virginibus & sex pueris venisset, Minoæ de virginibus Peribœam quandam nomine, candore corporis inductum comprimere voluisse, quod cum Theseus se passurum negaret, ut qui Neptuni filius esset, & valeret contra tyrannum pro virginis incolumitate decertare, &c. (10). --- It is said that when Theseus was come to Crete with seven virgins and six youths, Minos charmed with the beauty of one of the virgins named Peribœa, would have debauched her, which Theseus declaring he would not suffer, as being the son of Neptune, and able to encounter with Minos in defence of the maid, &c.' Hyginus tells us afterwards

(a) Apollodor. lib. iii, pag. m. 230.

(b) Pausan. lib. ii, pag. 72. Note, that according to Diodorus Siculus, Peleus did it inadvertently.

(c) Apollod. ubi supra, Plutarch. in Parall. cap. xav.

(d) Apollodor. ibid.

(e) He reigned in the isle of Ægina.

(f) Diodor. Sicul. lib. vi, cap. x.

(g) Apollodor. ibid.

(1) Lib. ii, pag. 72.

(2) In Parallellis, pag. 312, num. 27.

(3) Meurice, upon Ovid's Epistles, pag. 275.

(4) Apollodor. lib. iii, Pausanias, lib. i, pag. 15, & 40.

(5) Sophocles, in Ajax. Pindar. Isthm. Od. VI. Diodor. Siculus, lib. iv. Hyginus, cap. xcvii.

(6) Νεφέλας δ' αὐτὸν γάμους Μελίβοιαν τῆς Αἰγύπτου γυναῖκα. Τῆσιν αὖτε ἰλίου conjugem fu- λῆ Μελίβοιαν Αἰγυπτίας matrem. Ister, lib. iv. Rerum Attic. apud Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 557.

(7) Isthm. Od. VI.

(8) Pausanias, lib. i, pag. 15. See also pag. 40, where he concludes from Peribœa's being sent to Minos, that Megara made in former times part of the state of Athens. Diodorus Siculus says Alcatheus was an Athenian.

(9) Juven. Sat. VI, ver. 345.

(10) Hygin. Poët. Astron. lib. ii, cap. v.

TELAMON. TELEBOÆ.

(b) Apollod. Bibl.
lib. iii, pag. 72.

(c) Pindar. Nem.
Od. III.

(d) Id. ibid. Od.
IV, & Ithm.
Od. VI.

(f) Apollon. &
Valer. Flaccus, Argon. passim.

(m) Pausan. lib.
i, pag. 34.

(n) It was at Aulis in the isle of Eubœa.

(o) See the article
TEUCER.

great warrior; of whom I speak in its proper place. We are told of a third wife of Telamon, by whom he had a son named Teucer. This wife was Hefione the daughter of Laomedon King of Troy, and sister of Priam (b). That marriage happened in this manner. Telamon followed Hercules, when Laomedon was to be punished for refusing to pay Hercules what he had promised him. His capital city was taken by storm; and because Telamon was the first who scaled the walls of Troy, Hercules presented him with Hefione. Telamon signalized himself on several other occasions while he attended upon that General, as in the war with the Amazons (i), in that with the Meropes, and in the fight with the giant Alcyoneus (k). He was in the expedition of the Argonauts (l), and if he did not go to the siege of Troy, probably it was only old age that prevented him. He sent thither his two sons. Even in Pausanias's time they shewed, near the port of Salamis, the rock on which he sat (m), that he might view as far as possible, the ship on which they embarked to go to the general rendezvous of the Grecian fleet (n). He was still alive when the Grecians returned from Troy. He was doubtless very sorry for the death of his son Ajax; but he appeared more displeased that Teucer, his other son, had not prevented or revenged it (o). He would not receive him; but repulsed him with a disgrace. It has been observed of him, as well as of his brother Peleus, that he had a son who surpassed him (p). See the fate of Ajax's descendants in the article ΤΕΜΕΣΣΑ, and that of ΤΕΥΚΕΡ's posterity in the article of that name.

(p) Vincens ut
Ajax Frateritē Tela-monem, ut Peleus Achilleus.
You'll be out done,
Like Telamon, and Peleus, by a son.
Juvenal. Sat.
XIV, ver. 213.

wards how Theseus proved his divine original. It is a curious thing: there never was so difficult a proof of one's nobility.

[D] From this marriage issued Ajax. I think Dares Phrygius is the only author, who says, that Hefione, the daughter of Laomedon, was Ajax's mother, and that Ajax and Hector, by reason of their kindred, after they had fought stoutly together, were very civil, and made presents to one another. The generality of authors are of a quite different opinion, viz. that Peribœa or Eriboea, was the mother of Ajax, and Hefione the mother of Teucer. I do not regard the supposition of Sophocles (11), that Ajax's mother was alive, when that unfortunate Prince killed himself; for a Poet does not pretend to much exactness in writing a Tragedy: besides that Telamon might have been married at the same time both to Peribœa and Hefione. It is certain Sophocles (12) says, that Teucer was a bastard, born of a woman who had been taken captive in the war. This was Hefione, as Servius informs us. 'Ejus (Laomedontis) filia Hefione, says he (13), belli jure sublata, comiti Telamoni tradita est qui primus ascenderat murum, unde Teucer natus est, nam Ajacem ex alia constat esse procreatum. - - Laomedon's daughter Hefione, says he, taken captive by the rights of war, was given to his companion Telamon, who first had scaled the wall, by whom he had Teucer, for it is certain he had Ajax by another.' The scholiast upon these words of Homer's Iliad (14), καὶ ὅς γε γόζον παρ' ἑνὸς τε (14) In Æn. lib. i, ver. 619. spurius licet existentem, says, that Hefione, a prisoner of war, was given to Telamon, who had Teucer by her; and that this Trojan original was the reason why the child bore that name.

TELEBOÆ, a people who inhabited an island in the neighbourhood of Acarnania, who perhaps had been long since forgotten, had it not been for the great relation they indirectly bore to the birth of Hercules; but by virtue of that relation they are become known in the very lowest forms of the schools. Is there any school-boy who does not know that Alcmena conceived Hercules, whilst Amphytrion, her husband, was making war with the Teleboæ, &c? The reason why he made war with them, is, that Alcmena had promised to marry the man, who should go to war with them. But in order to know why she hated that people, the matter must be traced a little higher. Mestor, the son of Perseus, had by his marriage with Lysidice (a), a daughter named Hippothoe, whom Neptune stole and carried away into the islands called Echinades (b), where she had a son by him, whose name was Taphius [A]. This Taphius settled a colony in Taphos, and named the inhabitants Teleboæ [B], because of the great way he thought

(a) The daughter of Pelops, (and of Hippodamia) Apoll. lib. ii, pag. 97.

(b) They are now called Curzolari. And are situated at the entrance of the gulph of Lepanto.

[A] A son, whose name was Taphius. We read in the scholiast upon Apollonius (1), that the son of Neptune and Hippothoe, was called Pterelaus, and that he had two sons, namely Teleboas, and Taphus, who went to Electryon and demanded of him the estate of their grand-mother Hippothoe; and not being able to bring him to reason, they had recourse to force, and killed a great many people. By this account we get a whole generation, and therefore this account is rather to be received. It is shocking to find in Apollodorus, that Electryon was attacked by the great-grand-sons of the daughter of his brother Mestor. There is another thing in Apollodorus, concerning Taphius, which is not well cleared up. This author says (2), that Taphius reigned at Mycenæ with Electryon, when the six sons of Pterelaus went to Electryon and demanded of him Mestor's kingdom for their grand-father by their mother's side. This grand-father was Taphius himself, who reigned at Mycenæ with Electryon: Electryon had no other kingdom; and therefore what kingdom could they demand of him for Taphius? Observe carefully, that, according to the scholiast upon Apollonius (3), the whole kingdom of Perseus was possessed in common, after his death, by his four sons, Alcæus, Sthenelus, Mestor, and Electryon. Agreeably to this account, no just claim could be made to Mestor's kingdom, in favour of Taphius,

(2) Pag. 99.

(3) Ubi supra.

since Taphius was already in possession of it. However it be, we read in this scholiast that Taphius, the son of Pterelaus, called the isle of Taphos by his name; and that his brother Teleboas gave his to the people I am speaking of in this article, whose chief habitation was in the isle of Taphos. This is one of their Etymologies: I have already mentioned another; the rest may be seen below. It is certain, that the same people were indifferently called Taphii and Teleboæ (4). [B] And called the inhabitants Teleboæ. Stephanus in Odyss. lib. i.

Byzantinus informs us, that the country of the Teleboæ, or Telebois, was part of Acarnania, and had its name from Teleboas, being formerly called Taphion. Aristotle (5) says partly the same thing, since he tells us, that the Teleboæ were possessed of part of Acarnania. He says also (6), that one Lelex, a native of Leucas, had a daughter, whose son, called Teleboas, had twenty-two sons of that same name. What I have just now been citing out of Stephanus Byzantinus, is directly contrary to Strabo (7), who affirms, that the isles of the Taphians, one of which was called Taphos, were originally called the isles of the Teleboæ. He adds, that Amphytrion subdued them, and gave them to Cephalus an Athenian fugitive, who helped him to conquer them. Some have thought, that the isle of Cephalonia was then given to Cephalus, who called it by that name (8), and became afterwards

(4) See Eustath. in Odyss. lib. i.

(5) In Acarnanum Republic, lib. vii, pag. 222.

(6) In Locadum Republic, lib. vii, pag. 222.

(7) Lib. x, pag. 316.

(8) Ibid. pag. 314.

thought he had gone (c). He had a son called Pterelaus, who was the father of six sons, and one daughter. These six sons going to Mycenæ to demand Mestor's kingdom, could obtain nothing from Electryon King of Mycenæ the son of Perseus, and brother of Mestor. It was for this reason they plundered his country. The sons of Electryon, endeavouring to repel force by force were all killed. Their father was preparing to revenge their death, when he was killed by a very strange accident (d). His daughter Alcmena was forced to retire to Thebes; and not being willing to leave the death of her brothers unpunished [C], she promised to marry the person, who should revenge it. Amphitryon offered himself to do it, and assembling all the troops he was able, made a descent upon the country of the Teleboæ. He laid waste some of their islands, but could not take Taphos; till Comætho, who fell in love with him, had plucked off the golden hair from her father Pterelaus [D], which made him immortal. Amphitryon did not keep those conquests for himself, but left them to Cephalus and Eleus, who had affixed

(c) Τηλεβοῶν ἐκλάσεν τὴν χώραν τῆς μυκηνῆς ἰσθμῶς. Teleboas vocavit, id est quod procul à patria ierit. Apollod. ibid.

(d) See the article of AMPHITRYON.

(9) Ibid. pag. 317.

(10) Ibid. pag. 315, 317. See the article LEUCAS.

(11) Strabo, pag. 316.

(12) Ἀνδρᾶς ἀμφίτρωνος τοῦ ἐκτρυῶνος.

(13) Schol. Apollon. in lib. i, ver. 247. See also Eulath. in lib. i, Odyss.

(14) Tacitus, Annal. lib. iv, cap. lxxvii.

(15) Virgil, Æneid. lib. vii, ver. 734.

(16) And Lipsum in Tacit. Annal. lib. iv, cap. lxxvii.

(17) Silv. V, lib. iii, ver. 100.

wards master of Acarnania (9). He was the first who tried the leap of Leucas (10). We read, that the Teleboæ were great robbers (11). See the proofs of it in Bochart's Geographia Sacra, book i. chap. xxiii. and the remark [F] of this article. I shall set down the words of the scholiast of Apollonius on a passage wherein that Poet calls the same people Teleboæ and Taphii. It is in the 747th verse of the first book.

The isle of Taphos is one of the Echinades: it was inhabited by the Teleboæ, who before lived in Acarnania; they were great robbers: (12) they went into the kingdom of Argos to carry off the oxen of Electryon, father of Alcmena. There happened an engagement, in which Electryon, and his sons were killed. Wherefore Alcmena declared that her person should be the reward of him, who should revenge Electryon; and because Amphitryon undertook it, she married him. It is commonly said in our Dictionaries, that Amphitryon revenged the death of Alcmena's brother. This is a fault, for the lost several brothers; and in Apollodorus it is the revenging her brothers, which the demands of him who would be her husband. In the scholiast upon Apollonius she desires the revenging her father. Some miscopying, some error of the Press, might be the occasion, that instead of pateris, the authors whom Charles Stephens copies wrote fratris; and this fault still continues. Here follow two Etymologies. Τηλεβοῶν ἐν οἱ τὰ βῆσι, ἵτοι ὅτι τῆς οἰκίας ἀπὸ ἀργύρου τὰ βῆσι ἀπὸ ἡλίου ἢ ἀπὸ Τηλεβῶν τὸ Πτερέλα τὸ βασιλικὸς οὖν (13). - - The Taphians therefore were called Teleboans, because they were persons living a great way off, who carried away the oxen from the Argives: or from Teleboas the son of King Pterelaus. Lloyd ascribes several things to the scholiast upon Apollonius which I do not meet with. 1. That Herodotus says, that Perseus left four sons. He should have said Herodotus. 2. That one of them was called Alarus: he should have said Alæus. 3. That another was said Nestor: he should have said Mestor. 4. That Electryon was bound for a sum of money for Hippothoe: the scholiast says no such thing. 5. That Alcmena married Amphitryon, a very powerful Theban lord: the scholiast could not call him a Theban; among his words was not a Theban. 6. That the kingdom of the Teleboæ, which was given to Cephalus, devolved to Ulysses by right of inheritance: I find nothing of this in the scholiast. See Lloyd at the word Taphiæ. His article is the same with that of Charles Stephens. It must not be forgot, that the Teleboæ settled in an island of Great Greece, in that island which Tiberius's retreat made so famous. This we find in Tacitus: 'Græcos ea tenuisse, Capreaeque Telebois habitatas fama tradit (14). - - They say that the Greeks possessed that country, and that the island Caprea was inhabited by the Teleboans.' Virgil says the same thing (15). And so do Aufonius, and Statius.

Quem generasse Telon Sebethide Nympha
Pertur, Teleboum Capreas cum regna teneret.

'Tis said Sebethis him to Telon bore,
While he the Teleboan crown in Caprea wore.

These are Virgil's words. As for Aufonius, he expresses himself thus: 'Virideque reluctant Teleboæ' (16). - - And Teleboan groves resound. He speaks of the isle of Caprea. And as Statius (17) he describes that isle in this manner.

Seu tibi Bacchei vineta madentia Gauri,

2

Teleboumque domos, trepidis ubi dulcia nautis
Lumina noctivagæ tollit Pharus æmula lunæ.

Or where mount Gaurus sam'd for vines is shown,
And Teleboan shores, by sailors known,
Whose pharus, lantern, emulates the moon.

[C] To leave the death of her brothers unpunished.]

It has been shewn in the foregoing remark, that the singular number ought not to be used here, and that some authors, contrary to Apollodorus's account, say, that Electryon was killed with his sons; so that Alcmena mentioned her father and not her brothers, when she demanded that her future husband should be the instrument of her revenge.

[D] From her father Pterelaus.] Plautus supposes, that Amphitryon killed Pterelaus with his own hand (18); and that he had for his share of the booty the golden cup of that Prince (19). Poets are allowed to suppose such things, though they be ever so false. But as to the rest, I do not think that the learned Mrs le Fevre had any grounds for charging Plautus with a small anachronism. It is certain, says the (20), that Pterelaus was not cotemporary with Amphitryon, since he was the son of Taphius, who was the son of a niece of Alcæus, father of Amphitryon; and consequently the cousin-german of Amphitryon was Pterelaus's grandmother. This genealogy is taken out of Apollodorus: I have already said, that this author is not so clear as the scholiast upon Apollonius. Nevertheless Plautus ought not to be censured upon this head; for since Apollodorus says, that Pterelaus was alive when Amphitryon went to attack him, Plautus does not advance of his own head that those two Princes lived at the same time; he might find it in historical monuments. It is not he therefore who is guilty of that Anachronism. It is much more surprizing, that the sons of Pterelaus should make war with Electryon, Amphitryon's uncle by the mother's side, as we read in Apollodorus.

Let us say something of Pterelaus's cup. Jupiter made a present of it to Alcmena; and afterwards when the true Amphitryon looked for it among his things, to know whether it had been given to his wife, as she affirmed, it occasioned a very surprizing and diverting incident in Plautus's Comedy. This was not wholly the invention of the Poet; for (21) Charon of Lampacus an Historian, who lived in the LXXVth Olympiad, that is, 478 years before Christ, said, that the cup bestowed upon Alcmena, was still to be seen in his time in the Academy; that it was long, somewhat hollowed in the middle, with the edges a little turned down. As Charon's works are lost, I have consulted Athenæus, who quotes him, and this is what I have met with in that author (22). He says Charon of Lampacus affirmed, in his book of Frontiers, that the cup, which Jupiter presented to Alcmena, when he put on the form of Amphitryon, was still to be seen in his time at Lacedæmon. I do not find that Charon left a description of that cup: it is Macrobius who has described it (23), building upon what Pherecydes had said (24), that the vessel which Jupiter presented to Alcmena, was a Carcæsum. Athenæus tells us, that Pherecydes, and Herodorus of Heraclea said so; and mentions Calixenus's description of the Carcæsum. There is no room to doubt that Macrobius took from Athenæus what he says of it, and his words ought to be corrected by those of that Greek author, as Calaubon observes. Here follow Macrobius's words. 'Plautus infuctum nomen reliquit, ait que

(18) Ipseque Amphitruo Regem Pterelam sua obruncat manu. Plaut. Amphitru. Act. I, Scen. I, ver. 93.

(19) Post ob virtutem hero Amphitruoni est patera donata aurea. Qui Pterela potitate Rex solitu f. Ibid. ver. 104.

(20) Remarks upon the Amphitryon, pag. 251.

(21) They are Mrs le Fevre's words, ubi supra, pag. 276.

If you compare them with the words of Macrobius, you will see whether the hath rendered them well.

OBSERVATIONS on the cup of Pterelaus.

(22) Lib. xi, pag. 475.

(23) Meminit carcæsi Pherecydes in libris historiæ, aitque Jovem Alcmenæ precium concubitus carcæsum aureum dono dedisse. - - Pherecydes in his Historical Works, mentions the Carcæsum, and says that Jupiter presented a golden one to Alcmena, in return for her favours. Macrobius, Saturn. lib. v, cap. xxi.

(24) Apud Athen. pag. 474.

affisted him in that war. This is what we find in Apollodorus (e). What I have met with in other authors, that may serve to rectify or explain him, or to give a more distinct account of this matter, may be seen in the remarks. I shall there make some observations upon some passages of Plautus's Amphitryon [E], and upon Mrs que in fabula Amphitryone pateram datam : cum longe utriusque poculi figura diversa sit : patera enim ut et ipsum nomen indicio est, planum ac patens est : carchesium vero procerum & circa medium par-tem compressum, ansatum mediocriter, ansis a sum-mo ad infimum pertinentibus (25). --- *Plautus in his Amphitryon expressis it by an improper name, and says the present was a patera, whereas the figure of these two sorts of cups was quite different : for the patera, as the name itself imports, is spreading and open :

but the carchesium is tall, and compressed about the middle, moderately banded, the handles reaching from the top quite down to the bottom.* Now see the text of Athenæus. Καλλιξένῳ ἐν τοῖς περὶ Ἀλεξάνδρειας ὁμοῖν, ὅτι ποσειδών ἐστὶν ἐπιμέλειας συνεργήσαν ἐῖς μίσην ἐπαικάς, ὅτα ἔχον μέγας ταυτὸν μὲν κατικοντά.
Calixenus Rhodius tradit
in suis libris de Alexandria, carchesium esse poculum oblongum, in medio leniter compressum, auribus utrinque ad fundum usque descendentibus. --- Calixenus the Rhodian in his books of Alexandria, describes the carchesium to be an oblong cup, moderately compressed about the middle, with handles on both sides descending quite down to the bottom. It is plain the adverb mediocriter in Macrobius, refers to compressum, and not to ansatum. A transcriber who thinks that an adverb belongs to a certain adjective, makes no difficulty to put it either before, or after that adjective. No body thinks there is any harm in writing ansatum mediocriter, rather than mediocriter ansatum. But sometimes it is of great importance, not to take such a liberty ; for instance, when the adverb does not belong to an- satum.

... Viſitis hoſtibus legiones reveniunt domum,
Duello extincto maximo, atque internecatis hoſtibus,
Qui multa Thebano populo objecerunt acerba funera.
Id vi & virtute militum victum atque expugnatum
opidum 'ſt,
Imperio atque auspicio heri mei Amphitruonis maxime.

*The conqu'ring troops return in triumph home,
The war extinguisht, and the foes cut off,
Who slew so many of our Theban people.
The town was taken by the soldiers' valour,
By my victorious lord Amphyrion's orders.
He cheer'd his men with presents and with spoils,
And fix'd King Creon on the Theban throne.*

This is perverting History ; for authors are agreed, that Amphitryon undertook this expedition only to punish the Teleboæ, who had killed Alcmena's father, or at least her brothers. He could not marry Alcmena without revenging her of the Teleboæ. This was the occasion of the war, in which Creon engaged merely out of complaisance to Amphitryon, or in acknowledgment of some service he had received from him (28). This historical fact might have afforded many ornaments, if the Poet had been willing to improve it. He has debased the rank of his hero : he represents him as only commanding the troops of another Prince, in a war undertaken for the interest of that Prince ; whereas, according to History, Amphitryon acted in chief for his own interests, and had with him none but auxiliary troops, whose commanders he rewarded with the countries he conquered. II. Plautus makes the troops take shipping in the port of Eubœa, which he calls Perficus by a too licentious anticipation. But this is not the worst : it is a great deal more shocking that he does not find a port more convenient for people, who were to fail towards the isles called Echinades. Bless us, what a round about course must be taken to go thither from the isle of Eubœa! III. The lying-in of Alcmena is an ill-contrived incident, which obliges the Poet entirely to overthrow tradition. All those, who have mentioned Hercules's birth, suppose, that Jupiter in the shape of Amphytrion, lay with Alcmena a whole night which he took care to make longer than others. Plautus should have built upon this ground, and adorned and embellished it; but he should not have supposed a second visit. Jupiter should not have returned to his post, under the same shape the night before the lying-in. This is not only contrary to tradition, but also shocking to the hearers and readers. It is no longer gallantry but brutality (29) : a woman, ready to be delivered of two boys, is not a fit object to be produced upon the stage; much less ought the greatest of the gods to be represented so enamoured with such an object, that the usual length of the night is not sufficient for him to satisfy his passion. If the charms he found in the embraces of that lady made him wish for a second interview, he should not have put it off till the day before her lying in. So great a forbearance exceeds probability. This objection cannot be got over; for to say, that Plautus makes his play last nine months, would be running into greater difficulties, and appearing ignorant of these words of Mercury :

HODIE illa pariet filios geminos duos (30).

TO DAY shall she be brought to bed with twins.

This bodie refers to the same day that he turned out Sofia in the first scene. IV. I do not approve what some say, that Alcmena's delivery without pain is too plainly contrary to what we are told by the Greeks of Juno's artifices: it is a thing, say they, which ought not to be supposed, without an extreme necessity. A Poet, who takes the death of Polyxena for the subject of his tragedy, may be allowed to alter a great many things in the tradition: but if he should suppose, that Achilles did not desire to have her sacrificed to him, if he should trample upon the capital facts of that History, he would offend against the rules. But of what service is it to Plautus to make Alcmena feel no pain?

Dum hæc aguntur, interea uxorem tuam Neque gementem, neque plorantem nostrum quisquam audivimus.

Ita profecto sine dolore peperit (31).

While these things pass'd, your wife
By none of us was heard to cry or groan.
So very free from pain was she delivered.

This seems to me a weak objection; for it was necessary, in order to unravel the plot, that there should appear something miraculous in Alcmena's delivery. Her chastity was to be justified, and a jealous husband was to be pacified; and therefore there was a necessity for the Poet to intertix Jupiter in the case. He was allowed therefore, nay, he was obliged, to lay aside what was faid of Lucina.

Quin nunc quoque frigidus artus
Dum loquor horror habet, parque est meminisse doloris.

Septem ego per noctes totidem cruciata diebus,
Fessa malis tendensque ad cælum brachia, magno
Lucinam ad nexos partus clamore vocabam,
Illa quidem venit, sed præcorrupta, meumque
Quæ donare caput Junoni vellet iniquæ (32).

*Cold chills my limbs while I the tale pursue,
And now methinks I feel my pangs anew.*

(29) See above, the article ALC-MENA, remark [D],

(30) Aa. i,
Scen. ii,

(31) Act, v,
Scen. I.

(32) Alcmena, apud Ovidium.
Metamorph.
lib. ix, ver. 290.
See also Pausa-
nias, lib. ix,
pag. 290.

Mrs le Fevre's notes [F].

Seven days and nights amidst incessant throes,
 Fatigu'd with ill I lay, nor knew repose;
 When lifting high my hands, in shrieks I pray'd, Implo'r'd the gods, and call'd Lucina's aid.
 She came, but prejudic'd, to give my fate
 A sacrifice to vengeful Juno's hate.

GAY.

And ravaged Acbaia, Etolia, & Phocis, Scouring the Ionian, Ægean, and Cretan seas
 With most audacious piracy.

Mrs le Fevre (38) charges him with having altered the history in this point: 'for Electryon was not killed by his enemies. It was Amphitryon himself who killed him by accident, as he was throwing his club at an ox.' I confess, that Plautus departs from Apollodorus in this; but there are some authors who have said, that Electryon was killed by the Teleboæ (39). I shall conclude with this remark: ' (40) I have pitched upon Amphitryon, because it is one of the finest pieces of Plautus; and it was so highly esteemed by the Antients, that in Dioclesian's reign it was still acted in times of a public calamity to appease Jupiter's anger. Arnobius says in his seventh book; Poenit animos Jupiter, si Amphitryo fuerit actus, pronuntiatusque Plautinus? - - - What, will Jupiter be appeased, if Plautus's Amphitryon be acted? I do not believe Arnobius means that the Heathens pitched upon a time of a public calamity, such as an irruption of Barbarians, a plague, or a famine, to act Amphitryon: but this seems to me to be his meaning. He thinks it wrong that the Pagans should make the solemnity of their public games, one of their religious performances; and that they should consecrate those games to a deity. He asks the reason of this conduct, and supposes the answer to be, that the celebration of those games was a means to be reconciled with the gods, and to make them forget the offences they might have received. Whereupon he asks, by way of reply, Whether Jupiter ceases to be in an ill humour when Plautus's Amphitryon is acted? It is certain, that the institution of the public games was owing to some public calamity, and to a design of worshipping, for the future, in a solemn manner, the deity whose anger they dreaded: but afterwards the anniversary celebration was not confined to the time of a public calamity: those games were exhibited in time of plenty, as well as in time of scarcity; nay, they were carried on with much greater expence of every kind during the prosperity of the State, than during its adversity.

(33) Confer above, remark [D].

(34) Notes, pag. 310.

(35) He says she was the daughter of Perseus, and that Amphitryon was the son of Alceus, son of Perseus.

(36) See the article GORGOPHON, remark [A].

[F] And upon Mrs le Fevre's notes (33).] She was of opinion (34), that Plautus made use of the word Nepos to signify nephew in this passage of the fourth scene of the fourth act. 'Ego idem ille sum Amphitruo, Gorgophones nepos, Imperator Thebanorum. - - - I am that same Amphitryon the nephew of Gorgophone, commander of the Thebans.' I cannot readily come into this opinion. It is true, that, according to the genealogy mentioned by Apollodorus, this was the sole degree of kindred between Gorgophone and Amphitryon (35): but, since Plautus has not followed Apollodorus in some things, we ought to suppose that he had consulted some other genealogies, wherein he found that Gorgophone was Amphitryon's grand-mother. There is more sense in boasting of being the grand-son of an illustrious lady, than in boasting of being her nephew: it is therefore probable, that the Poet took the thing in the most advantageous sense (36). I proceed to another fact: He has supposed, that the Teleboæ destroyed Electryon. I shall quote the whole passage, which contains a proof of what has been said above concerning the robberies of that nation.

Ego idem latrones hostes bello & virtute contudi.
 Electryonem perdidit, nostræ & germanos conjugis,
 Achaïam, Etoliam, Phocidem, per freta Ionium & Ægeum, & Creticum:
 Vagati, vi vortebant piratica (37).

(37) Act IV, Scen. IV, ver. 54.

I too have triumph'd o'er those villain robbers;
 Who kill'd Electryon, and my spouse's brothers;

TELLIER (MICHAEL LE) Chancellor of France, died the thirtieth of October 1685. See his elogium in Moreri's Dictionary. He left behind him two sons, one of whom has been very famous all over Europe, under the name of Marquis De Louvois [A]. The other is one of the most illustrious prelates of the Gallican Church for his learning, and for the vigour wherewith he has always maintained the rights and privileges of his dignity (a) and checked the attempts of the Monks in his diocese [B]. He is Archbishop of Rheims, and has collected one of the finest libraries in France. See the catalogue of it, which he published in the year 1693 (b). He continues to enrich it every day (c) with all all sorts of books, and all the curious have a free access to that noble magazine of learning (§ a).

(a) See the Memoirs published by him, about the Cardinals sitting in parliament; and against the election of Cambray into a metropolis.

(b) Under the title of Bibliotheca Telleriana, in folio.

(c) I write this in June 1701.

[A] Under the name of Marquis de Louvois.] He died at Versailles the sixteenth of July 1691, in his fifty-first year. He was Minister and Secretary of State, and had several employments. It is impossible to bestow a finer elogium on him, than by saying, that all Europe was persuaded, his death would be more advantageous to the allies, than the gaining of a complete victory, and the conquest of two or three towns. Mr de Barbesieux, one of his sons, succeeded him in the office of Secretary of State, and died the fifth of January, 1701. The Abbot de Louvois, another of his sons, is a great lover of learning. He was admired, in his younger years, by the answers he made to the difficulties he proposed to him about Homer, in the presence of a great number of persons. Read this passage of the continuation of the Menagiana. The Abbot de L. . . who, tho' so young, shows so great a skill in the Greek tongue, has been pleased to quote me upon that subject, and to praise me for the application of those two verses in an illustrious assembly, that was held at his house not long ago, in the presence of the most learned men in the kingdom, who proposed to him some difficulties upon Homer, which he answered with a wonderful presence of mind. One of the most considerable was proposed by the Abbot Faydit, viz. whether Homer had mentioned the Jews in his Iliad or his Odyssey. He answered, that he had made no mention of them, and that the word Ιουδαῖοι was not to be found in Homer, &c (1). You may see in the original what was further urged by the Abbot Faydit, and the reply made to him. See also Mr Coufin concerning the Philosophical thesis maintained by that Abbé on the twenty-fourth of August, 1692 (2), and concerning the Actus Vespertinus, or his disputation in the Sorbonne before Savans, of September 8, 1692, he was admitted Doctor of Divinity, on the seventeenth of March, 1700 (3).

I need not acquaint the reader, that the book published in Holland, in the year 1695, with this title, (3) Idem, Apud Testament politique du Marquis de Louvois, is a supposititious piece: but every body does not know that the author of that piece lives at Paris, and is a Roman Catholic.

[B] And checked the attempts of the Monks in his diocese.] I could give several instances of it; but I shall only refer the reader to what I have said in the remark [N] of the article of FRANCIS of ASSISI, and in the remark [M] of the article MARIANA. See also the Lettres Historiques for July 1697.

[(§ a)] This library was soon made up of the spoils of those which several Protestants in Paris and Champaign were forced to leave behind them on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. To be convinced that this is its proper epoch, we need only run over the Bibliotheca Telleriana,

(1) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 294, Dutch Edition.
 (2) Journal des Savans, of September 8, 1692, pag. 623, Dutch Edition.
 (3) Idem, Apud Testament politique du Marquis de Louvois, 5, 1700, pag. 271.

Telleriana, the main part of this fine library consisting of any other than those sort of books, which the Protestants in France, whether men of letters, or only curious persons, took care to purchase. REM. CRIT.]

- (a) Ptolemy, lib. v, cap. iii. calls it Τελμύσσος. Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. m. 457, and Stephanus Byzantinus, Τελμύσσος.
- (b) Quæ Lyciam finit urbs Telmessus. Plin. lib. v, cap. xxvii. Mela, lib. i, cap. xv. Vide ibi H. Vossium.
- (c) Livius, lib. xxxvii.
- (d) Strabo, pag. 458.
- (e) Sub Apollinis arula quæ Telmessi apud opidum visitur, Telmessum esse conditum vatem, non scriptis constantibus indicatur? Arnobius, lib. vi, pag. 193. See Suidas, voce Τελμύσσος.
- (f) Dionys. in Originibus, apud Suidam, ibid.
- (g) Idem, Dionys. ibid.
- (h) In voce Τελμύσσος. It is called there Τελμύσσος.

[A] Every body there was born a diviner. I do not define the reader to take this on my authority, and therefore I shall quote a considerable Historian for it. Τὸν δὲ (Γέρδιον) ἐκπλαγύνθη τῇ ὁρῇ, ἵεναι κοινῶς ὅλην τὴν Δεῖν παρὰ τὴν Τελμύσσος τὴν μάντιν. εἶναι γὰρ τὴν Τελμύσσος σοφὴν τὰ δὲ αὐτῇ ἐγγείσθαι, καὶ οἷόν τι ἀπὸ γένους δεδιδόσθαι αὐτοῖς καὶ γυναῖξιν καὶ παῖσιν τὴν μαντείαν. Gordium speculaculo attonitum, Telmissenses vates communicande rei causa adisse, (esse enim Telmissenses peritissimos prodigiorum interpretes, & vaticinandi scientiam ipsi pariter atque uxoris & liberis ab ortu infusam esse) (1). Pliny (2) seems to say, that the town of Telmessus, which he calls most religious, had been one of the principal seats of Magic; he does not scruple to join it with Thessaly in that respect. But there never was a country more cried down for witchcraft than Thessaly.

(1) Arrian. de Exped. Alexandri, lib. ii, p. m. 85, 86.

(2) Nec postea quisquam dixit quoniam modo venisset Telmessum religiosissimam urbem, quando transfisset ad Thessalias urbes. Plin. lib. xxx, cap. i. Father Harduin, going upon the authority of good manuscripts, reads matres instead of urbes.

(3) Lib. vi, ver. 451: vide Harduinum in Pinium, Tom. iv, pag. 771.

(4) Lib. xi, cap. vii.

(5) See Grævius's Justin, pag. 230.

Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula, fagas,
Nocturnos lemures, portentaque THESSALA rides?

Dreams, witchcraft, miracles, do you despise, Hobgoblins, and THESSALIAN prodigies?

Horace, who speaks thus in the second epistle of the second book, frequently uses the like expression; and it appears from Lucan (3), that Thessala, or Thessalis, without any addition, denoted a witch. If the thing be rightly considered, the passage of Pliny expresses the character of the Telmessians, as fully as the passage of Arrian. See what I shall quote out of Cicero hereafter.

[B] It was thither Gordius went to know the meaning of a prodigy, which made him uneasy. This story is to be found in Justin (4), if we change the usual reading, and instead of vicinæ urbis, read Telmessi urbis, or Telmessiæ urbis, according to the correction of the most able Critics (5). The passage runs thus: 'Gordius cum in his regionibus bubus conductis araret, aves eum omnis generis circumvolare ceperunt. Profectus ad consulendos augures vicinæ urbis, obviam in porta habuit virginem eximie pulchritudinis; percontatus eam quem potissimum augurem consuleret, illa audita causa consulendi, gnara artis ex disciplina parentum, regnum ei portendit, respondit,

'polliceturque se & matrimonii & spei sociam. Tam pulchra conditio, prima regni felicitas videbatur. --- While Gordius was plowing in this country with bired oxen, birds of all kinds began to gather and fly round him. Upon this, going to consult the Augurs of a neighbouring town, he met in the gate a beautiful virgin; she, being asked who was the most able Augur he could apply to, and hearing the question he had to propose, as she understood the art herself, by the instruction of her parents, answered, That a kingdom was portended to him, and promised to become his wife and partner of his good fortune. So agreeable an offer seemed to be an earnest of his royalty. What strongly confirms this correction is, that Arrian (6), relating this adventure of Gordius, says, in express terms, that Gordius applied himself to the diviners of the town of Telmessus. What follows in Arrian does not agree in all the circumstances with Justin's narrative; but this is of no great moment to the matter now in question. I omit not, however, to observe, that the translator of Arrian has thrust in Telmiffenium in a wrong place. It was not to the assembly of the inhabitants of Telmessus that the chariot carried Midas, attended by his father and mother, but to that of the Phrygians.

[C] Cicero thought that the reason why the inhabitants of Telmessus . . . became such great observers of prodigies, was, because they inhabited a country which produced several extraordinary things. To prove this, I shall set down two passages of Cicero not far from one another. The first runs thus: 'Licet videre & genera quædam & nationes huic scientiæ deditas. Telmessus in Caria est, qua in urbe excellit Aruspicum disciplina. --- We may see certain families, and nations, addicted to this science. Telmessus in Caria is a place famous for the teaching of Augury.' This is the other: 'Tum Caria tota præcipueque Telmessenses quos ante dixi, quod agros uberissimos maximeque fertiles incolunt, in quibus multa propter fecunditatem fingi gignique possunt, in ostentis animadvertendis diligentes fuerunt (7). --- The whole country (7) of Caria, and particularly the Telmessians, whom I de Divinat. have before-mentioned, because of their inhabiting in a most plentiful and fertile region, in which, by reason of its fruitfulness, many extraordinary things might be invented and produced, were great observers of prodigies.' As Telmessus was situated on the borders of Lycia,

of Dodona with a fellow-traveller, who founded a town, whose inhabitants were all divines. There is a great presumption, that the like virtue was bestowed upon Telmessus, both for him and those, who should build about the altar he erected by the direction of the oracle. We ought to believe that this altar was in the temple of Apollo Telmessus (i). The inhabitants of Telmessus had in particular a very great faith in dreams [D]. Aristander, a native of this town, and one of the most able diviners of his time (k), wrote a book upon that subject. Probably it was he who negotiated a treaty between his country and Alexander. Arrian has mentioned this treaty in his first book. I do not think the town of Termessus ought to be confounded with that of Telmessus [E]: it is better in my opinion, to distinguish them into two towns, and to preserve the name of Telmessus [F] to that which is situate on the frontiers of Lycia.

Lycia, it must be very near Caria; which is the reason why Cicero places it in this last province. Stephanus Byzantinus places it there also; but he adds, that Philo and Strabo place it in Lycia, and that it is a frontier town to those two countries.

[D] The inhabitants of Telmessus had very great faith in dreams. This we find in Tertullian, Telmissenses, says he (8), nulla somnia evacuunt, imbecillitatem conjectationis incusant. The meaning of which seems to be, that the inhabitants of Telmessus believe that all dreams signify something; that none of them is vain; and that the imperfection of our knowledge is the cause why we do not understand the signification of each dream.

[E] I do not think the town of Termessus ought to be confounded with that of Telmessus. Strabo so plainly distinguishes them from one another, that he leaves no room for any doubt about it. His way of describing the situation of Termessus (9), shews that it was a town of Pisidia, near the defile, by which they went over Mount Taurus in the way to Mylias; and therefore Alexander resolving to clear that passage, which was commanded by the town of Termessus, caused it to be demolished. As for what relates to Telmessus (10), that Geographer places it at the entrance into Lycia on this side of the river Xanthus, and even on this side of Phaelis, a sea-town, which he places near Mount Solymus, and Termessus, a town of Pisidia, says he (11). I shall confirm this by the authority of Arrian. After he had mentioned Alexander's entering Lycia, he says (12), that this conqueror got the town of Telmessus by a treaty; that afterwards he passed the Xanthus; that he took the town of that name, and several others which surrendered to him; that he advanced towards the province of Mylias; that he secured the place, from whence he sent part of his troops to Perga over the mountains, and marched with the rest along the sea; that he advanced as far as Sida; that he went back to Aspendus, because the inhabitants of that place had not performed their promise; that he forced them to surrender; that he went to Perga, and from thence into Phrygia; but the town of Telmessus, inhabited by Barbarians, who were by nation Pisidians, being in his way, he was obliged to take it; that it proved no easy thing, because that town stood upon a steep hill, and the inhabitants had possessed themselves of a neighbouring hill, so that they were masters of the straight or defile between those two hills. This is the very town, which Strabo calls Termessus; and it is manifest Arrian speaks of two different towns, when he says (13), that his hero concluded a treaty with Telmessus when he entered Lycia; and (14) that he besieged Telmessus as he was marching from Perga towards Phrygia. All that remains to be known, is, whether those two towns ought to be called Telmessus, as they are in Arrian, or whether that of Lycia ought to go by the name of Termessus, and that of Pisidia by the name of Telmessus, as in Strabo, Stephanus Byzantinus, and Suidas: for the opinion of some learned men, who reduce them both to one town, under the name either of Termessus or Telmessus, cannot be maintained. Bochart (15), who reads Telmessus in Strabo for Termessus, may be confuted by a medal (16), which has on the one side ΤΕΡΜΗΣΣΕΩΝ, and on the other ΣΟΛΥΜΟΝΣ: which plainly shews, that the town of Pisidia, called Τερμεσσοί by Strabo, is rightly named; for since the hill on the promontory of Termessus, was called Solymus, and the Termessians were also called Solymi (17), it is plain, that the people who have this great affinity with the Solymi, ought to bear the name expressed in the medal: but it is the name of the Termessians; and therefore Bochart is in the wrong to read Telmissus and Telmissenses in that passage of Strabo; and thus one of his etymologies comes to nothing. He says that Cafaubon found in the manuscripts Τελμισσῶς, instead of Τερμεσσοί. These ought to be corrected by the medal. He adds, that Eustathius, quoting Strabo, writes Τελμισσοί; but he might have found in Salmassius, that Eustathius should not have made use of that name (18), and that besides he very much misunderstood the passage he quoted (19).

[F] It is better . . . to preserve the name of Telmessus. As there are a great many medals (20) with the inscription ΤΕΡΜΗΣΣΕΩΝ, what remains to be known is, whether the town of Lycia, which makes the subject of this article, ought to be called Telmessus. I am of opinion, with submission to better judgment, that it ought to be called Telmessus; for otherwise we must look upon as corrupted, not only the passages already mentioned (21) of Polybius, Arrian, Aristides, St Gregory Nazianzen, Cicero, and Livy, but also many others of Plutarch, Aelian, Lucian, Ptolemy, Stephanus Byzantinus, Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Tertullian, Arnobius, &c. All those places, where Aristander, the Soothsayer, is named of Telmessus would, in that case, be faulty. This would be going too far. It is therefore better to admit of two names; that of Termessus for the town of Pisidia, and that of Telmessus for the town of Lycia, where all the people were so liable to be inspired. Correct with Salmassius the passage of Arrian, wherein the town of Pisidia is called Τελμισσοί. Male and Arrianum Τελμισσοί vocatur quæ est Τερμεσσοί (22). The town Termessus is very falsely in Arrian called Telmissus.

TENEDOS, an island in the Ægean sea, near the continent of Asia, over against Troy. Some say (a) it was uninhabited, and called Leucophrys, before Tenes, the son of Cygnus, landed upon it. It was he therefore who first brought inhabitants into that island. He reigned over them with so much equity, that great honours were paid to him in his life-time, and after his death he was placed among the gods, as I shall relate when I come to speak of him. He built a town, and it was from him the island was called Tenedos (b). In process of time the people rather chose to say, that he did not bring thither the first colony; but that he landed there as it were by a miracle [A], and that the inhabitants immediately expressed so great a respect for a man, who was so manifestly

(1) In the article TENES.
(2) Variarum lib. i, cap. xii.
[A] As it were by a miracle. His father being imposed upon by his wife's calumnies, put him into a chest, and threw him into the sea. I shall speak of him hereafter (1). I do not find in the authors I have consulted, the circumstances of his preservation; but I find in Muretus (2) that Neptune, Tenes's grandfather, came to the assistance of his grand-son; and that the chest, being carried to the isle of Leucophrys, was opened by the inhabitants, who no sooner discovered what it contained, but they made Tenes king, &c.

[B] The

(i) Τελμισσοί, ἐν Ἰαπυγίᾳ Ἰαθόν, ἔθ' αὖ Ἀπὸλλωνος Τελμισσοί, ἱερὸν. Telmissus in Cariam venit, ubi Apollinis Telmissii templum. Stephanus Byzantius, in Τελμισσοί.
(k) See his article.

(15) Bochart, Geograph. Sacra. lib. i, cap. vi.

(16) Apud Ezechiel. Spanhem. de Usu & Præf. Numism. pag. 477, 478.

(17) Τῆς γὰρ Τερμεσσοῦ, ἁπλῶς ὁ ὑπερκείμενος λόφος καλεῖται Σόλυμοι, καὶ αὐτοὶ δὲ οἱ Τερμεσσοὶ Σόλυμοι καλοῦνται. Et sine tumultu qui sunt Termessus sum pæet promontorium, Solymus appellatur: ipsi Termessii vocantur, Solymi. Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 433.

(18) Male Τελμισσοί vocat Eustathius. Salm. Exercit. Plinian. p. 784.

(19) Mira hæc supponit Eustathius in Strabonis verbis referenda. Ibid.

(20) Spanhem. ubi supra.

(21) Id. Ibid. pag. 478.

(22) Salmass. ubi supra.

(a) Diodorus, Siculus, lib. vii, cap. xvi. Servius in Æn. lib. ii, ver. 21.

(b) Quasi Τενεδος, id est, Tenedi sedes. Stephanus in Τενεδος.

T E N E D O S.

312

(c) See Diodorus Siculus, ibid.

(d) Plut. Quest. Gr. pag. 297. Pausanias, lib. x, pag. 330.

(e) See the article TENES.

(f) Antiphanes, apud Athen. lib. i, cap. xxii. See also Julius Pollux, lib. vi, cap. x, and Eustathius in Iliad. A.

festly protected by the gods, and afterwards so great an admiration of his noble qualities, that they made him their king (c). Thus we see how all nations have ascribed something marvellous to their old traditions. However it be, what is related of Tenes, could not have happened before the time of Priam, since Tenes lost his life when Achilles ravaged Tenedos, during the Trojan war (d). That island was then particularly consecrated to Apollo Smintheus [B]. It was behind that island the Greeks concealed their fleet, when they made a shew of giving over their enterprise; and it is this has made Tenedos more famous, than any thing else [C], and even to this day makes it known all over the world. Nevertheless that island was remarkable upon several better accounts. The administration of justice was very severe there (e): the best origanum in the world grew there (f): the most curious earthen vessels were made there (g): the grapes, and ears of corn, and figure of Ceres, that appear on its medals (b), testify that it abounded with wine and corn, as it does to this day [D]: and the women of that island were the most beautiful in all the world [E]. I say nothing of the singularity of their cray-fish [F]. It was at Tenedos, according to some, that Paris landed after the rape of Helen

(g) Plutarchus, init. Tractat. de vitando zere alieno, pag. 828, 8^a Scholiast. Aristoph. in Nubib. Act. IV, Scene III.

(b) Vide Spanhem. Epist. ad Laurent. Bege-

[B] The island was particularly consecrated to Apollo Smintheus. Homer plainly intimates it, when he puts this prayer in the mouth of the Priest Chryses:

ΚΛῦθί μιν ἀργυρότοξ' ὅς χεύσιν ἀμφιβέβηκας κίλλαν τε ζᾶδ' ἔην, Τενέδοιό τε ἴφι ἀνάσσεις Σμινθεύ.

Audi me argenteum arcum gerens, qui Chrysaetueris
Cillanque valde divinam, Tenedoque fortiter imperas Smintheu (3).

(3) Homer. Iliad. lib. i, ver. 37.

*O Smytheus! sprung from fair Latona's line,
Thou guardian power of Cilla the Divine,
Thou source of light, whom Tenedos adores
And whose bright presence gilds thy Chrysa's shores.*

MR POPE.

(4) Lib. xiii, pag. 415.

(5) Id. ibid.

Strabo (4) has confirmed from this passage what he had been saying, that there was a temple of Apollo Smintheus in the isle of Tenedos. There were the like temples in some other neighbouring towns (5); and the common opinion is, that Apollo was worshipped under that title, because he had killed the rats, which destroyed the fruits of the earth. His statue in the temple of Chrysa had a rat under its feet. According to the dialect of that country, σμινθεύ signified a rat. Some other reasons have been alledged, besides those which I have mentioned: See the learned collections of Cuperus upon this subject in his ancient monuments (6).

(6) Ad calcem Harpocratis, Edit. 1687, pag. 212.

Est in conspectu Tenedos notissima fama
Insula, dives opum, Priami dum regna manebant, Nunc tantum sinus & statio malefida carinis.
Huc se provecti deserto in litore condunt (7).

(7) Æneid. lib. ii, ver. 21.

*In sight of Troy lies Tenedos, an isle,
(While Fortune did on Priam's empire smile)
Renown'd for wealth, but since a faithless bay,
Where ships expos'd to wind and weather lay,
There was their fleet conceal'd.*

DRYDEN.

Et jam Argiva Phalanx instructis navibus ibat
A Tenedo, tacite per amica silentia lunæ (8).

(8) Ibid. ver. 254.

*The Grecians had embark'd their naval powers
From Tenedos, and sought our well-known shores.
Safe under covert of the silent night*

DRYDEN.

The beginning and ending of the story of the wooden horse are more taking to school-boys than any other part of that Romance, and consequently make more lasting impressions.

[D] As it does to this day. Mr Spon, who has been there, assures us (9), that the isle of Tenedos is fruitful in good vines, wherewith it supplies Constantinople, and that its Muscadine grapes are excellent; that there is game in abundance, especially hares and partridges. Sir George Wheeler, his fellow-traveller, says (10), it abounds with corn and wine, especially of the Muscadine kind, the greatest part whereof is exported to Constantinople. See the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

[E] The women of that island were the most beautiful in all the world. One may very well wonder that a thing of this nature should not be mentioned by several authors. Athenæus, who had read so much, and who quotes so many writers, would have quoted some other author besides Nymphodorus, had he known of any other, who had made the same observation. However it be, these are his words: Καὶ Νυμφόδωρος δ' ἐν τῷ τῆς Ἀσίας περίπλῳ, καλλίστας φησὶ γυναῖκας τῶν πανταχὺ γυναικῶν ἐν Τενέδῳ τῇ τρωϊκῇ νήσῳ. Nymphodorus autem in Asie circumnavigatione Tenedias feminas (ea Trojæ vicina insula est) omnes alias ubivis terrarum mulieres pulcritudine superare tradit (11). . . . Nymphodorus in his voyage round Asia says, that the most beautiful women in all the world are born in Tenedos, an island in the neighbourhood of Troy. A witness who has made or described the tour of Asia, is of great authority, and more to be credited than a hundred, who never travelled or studied Geographical History. Though Theophrastus does not affirm what Nymphodorus advances, yet his testimony may be alledged; because he says (12), that among the Barbarians there were judges appointed to inquire into the prudence and housewifery of women, in order to declare which of them exceeded the rest in these respects; there were likewise certain judges in the isles of Tenedos and Lesbos, who did the same thing in relation to the beauty of women: For it was thought that the very gifts of fortune and nature ought to be honoured and respected. Those judges of Tenedos had a very nice office. The gods themselves refused it; and it had been well for Paris if he had imitated them: he paid dear for his ingenious contrivance (13), and for the possession of Helen, whom he obtained as a reward for his sentence. But that fabulous story made no great impression; for there were some persons, who desired to judge of beauty, not only in Lesbos and Tenedos, but also in a town of Peloponnesus, where there was every year a dispute about beauty, and she who overcame her competitors, carried the prize (14). This custom continued down to Athenæus's time. Such an emulation was excusable in women; but it is very strange that men should also have contended for the prize of beauty (15).

[F] The singularity of their cray-fish. Their shell represented an ax; for which reason, according to Plutarch (16), the inhabitants of Tenedos consecrated an ax in the temple of Delphi. I should rather think that they consecrated it, because the forms observed in their tribunals, which occasioned the Proverb about the ax of Tenedos (17), induced them to pitch upon an ax for the arms of their country. It appears by their medals, that it was their constant symbol (18). Suidas mentions those cray-fish of Tenedos, and says they were to be found in a brook in that part of the country

(11) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 609.

(12) Apud Athen. pag. 610.

(13) He made the three goddesses pull off their shifts.

(14) Nicias, in Arcadice, apud Athen. p. 609.

(15) Theophrastus, apud Athen. ibid., says it was practised at Elis.

(16) De Pythie Oraculis, pag. 399.

(17) See hereafter the remark [H], and the article TENES.

(18) Vide Ex. Spanhem. Epist. ad Laur. Bege-

(7) In portum Tenedon perve-nit, ubi Helenam maestam alloquio mitigavit. *Dares Phryg. de Excid.
Trojae.*

(8) Pausanias,
lib. x, pag. 330.

(1) In Verrem, lib. iii.

Helen, and with his careffes foothed her uneafiness (i) [G]. The inhabitants of Tenedos finding themselves too weak to preserve their independency, submitted to the city of Alexandria situated in Troas (k). They were rich in Cicero's time, as appears from his orations (l). Their cause concerning their immunities was determined at Rome with too great rigour [H]. Cicero protected them, but he was not sufficiently seconded. That island is about ten leagues round, and lies not above two leagues and a half from the continent of Asia (m). The Turks have a fortress there, which is only a tower, with a rampart defended by about fifteen pieces of cannon. The Venetians made themselves masters of it, during the war of Candia; but the Turks retook it by means of a tun of Sequins, with which they corrupted the commander (n). Aristotle wrote a book concerning the republic of the Tenedians (o). Zoilus composed a panegyric upon them, wherein he has published a great falsity, namely that the river Alpheus had its source in the isle of Tenedos (p). That island was often mentioned in the Gazettes, whilst the Venetians were in possession of Chio, which they took in the year 1694.

(m) Wheeler, Voyage, pag. 103. Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 415, says it is 80 Stadia in compass, and the canal that divides it from Asia, 40.

(n) Spon, Voyage, Tom. i, pag. 153, Dutch Edit.

(o) Stephan. in Tenedos.

(p) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 187.

(19) In Tenedosios ἐννήγιοτος.

(20) Geograph.
Sac. Part. ii,
lib. i, cap. ix.

(21) Josephus Ikanus, Anglus, who lived in the XIIIth century.
See his Dares
Phrygius de bello Trojano, lib. iii,
pag. m. 52, 53.

(22) See the remark [L], in the article H E-LENA.

(23) Hec faciles
emere toros, do-nuere rebelles Amplexus, epi-gere fidem, non jam oscula reddit.

Non reddenda negat Helene, sed pectore toto lacumbens, gre-mum solvit, pre-mit ore laten-tem

Furatur Vene-
rem, jamque ex-pirante Dione Confusa secretos tristatur purpura
motus.
Proh scelus, &c.

country called Asferina (19). Bochart (20) rightly observes it should be read Asseior, and not Asseiora, because Plutarch says in express words, that the cray-fish of Tenedos, whose shell was like an ax, were to be found in a place called Asseior. Besides, according to Hesychius, the first inhabitants of that island were called Asseior, a name that might very well proceed from the place, which afforded those cray-fish. This conjecture of Bochart, and the corrections he makes in that passage of Suidas, are a great deal better than all his imaginary Etymologies, fluffed with Hebrew, to derive the Tenedians from Phenicia.

[G] He foothed her uneafiness. Nothing can be more modest than the words of the pretended Dares Phrygius, 'alloquio mitigavit. - - he foothed with his conversation.' The author, who wrote a Paraphrase upon him in verse (21), did not confine himself within such narrow bounds: he has carried the thing as far as it can go, leaving nothing to be supplied by the imagination of the readers. It is true he leaves two stumbling-blocks in their way. One is, that he supposes Paris did not enjoy Helen till he had landed in the isle of Tenedos; which is neither likely, nor consistent with the Iliad, where the isle of Cranae, less distant than Tenedos from the place, where the rape was committed, is made the scene of the last favour (22). The second difficulty is taken from the rich presents Paris is obliged to make, in order to obtain his wishes. This is contrary to decorum, in the opinion of those, who know the character of Helen: the author was sensible of it, and therefore he breaks out into an exclamation immediately after the verses, wherein he describes the presents and the enjoyment (23).

Proh scelus! an tantis potuisti pessima votis
Indulisse moras? expectabatque voluptas
Emptorem? O teneri miranda potentia sexus!

Præcipitem in lucrum suspendit femina luxum,
Nec nisi conducto dignatur gaudia risu.

For shame! how could'st thou, wretched fair, thus lay
Such cold demurrers in thy lover's way?
What, must he stay till every kiss be bought?
To what strange power will thy sex be brought!
While thus, for lucre, you each wish restrain;
And even grudge a smile, except for gain.

[H] Their cause concerning their immunities was determined at Rome, with too great rigour. This is what Cicero wrote about it to his brother. 'Tenediorum igitur libertas securi Tenedia præcisa est, cum eos præter me & Bibulum & Calidium & Favonium nemo defenderet (24). - - The liberty therefore of the island of Tenedos, was cut off with the ax of Tenedos, since it met with no other patrons besides Bibulus, Calidius, Favonius, and myself.' The proverbial expression of Cicero may be explained by Pausanias or Stephanus Byzantinus. Τενιδίω πέλκευς ἐπὶ τῶν νητοὶ πικρῶς ἢ καὶ μᾶλλον συνήμους ἀποκοτ[ή]ντων τὰ ζητήματα, καὶ τὰ ἄλλα πράγματα. Tenedia Securus, de iis qui vel asperè vel etiam magis concisè abscedunt quæstiones & alias res (25). - - The ax of Tenedos is applicable to those who either with much severity, or little formality cut off questions and other matters. Pausanias having said that Tened cut with an ax the rope, wherewith the ship of his father Cygnus was fastened, adds, Ἐπὶ τῷ μὲν ἐς τὴν ἀντιμῆνυσιν εὐρεῖς λίγισται καθέστηκεν ὡς ὁ δαίνα ὅστις δὴ Τενεδίῳ πέλκευι τόδε τι ἀποκόψας. Ex eo in Proverbiis consuetudinem venit ut quidquid quis præfracte negaret, id Tenedia bipenni præcidisse dicatur (26). - - From thence it became a common Proverb, whenever any thing was precipitately rejected, to say it lib. x, pag. 330. was cut off with the ax of Tenedos.

(24) Cicero ad Q. fratrem, lib. ii.

(25) Steph. Byzant. voce Tenedos.

(26) Plutarch. Quest. Græc. num. 28, pag. 207, calli bim Mulpus.

TENES or TENNES, the son of Cygnus, gave his name to the isle of Tenedos, where he landed, when his father exposed him in a chest to the mercy of the sea. Cygnus used him with that severity, because he had been too credulous in believing his wife, the step-mother of Tenes (A). She complained that Tenes had ravished her (B), and alledged the false evidence of a piper (a). This occasioned the law, that was observed in the isle of Tenedos, that no man of that profession should be admitted into

(1) Lib. x, pag. 329.

[A] His wife, the step-mother of Tenes. We read in Pausanias (1) that Cygnus, the son of Neptune, reigned at Colonæ in Troas, and that he had two sons by Proclea, the daughter of Clytius, and sister to Calator, who was killed at the siege of Troy by Ajax, as it is mentioned in the Iliad. Those two children of Cygnus were, a son named Tenes, and a daughter named Hemitheia. After the death of their mother, Cygnus married Philonome the daughter of Craugafus. This Philonome accused Tenes of having attempted to ravish her, whereas she on the contrary fell in love with Tenes, who refused to comply with her desires. This therefore is an example, which may be added to those of Theïsus and Constantine. Muretus has collected some others in the 12th chapter of the first book of his Varie Lectiones. See the article FAUSTA.

[B] She complained that Tenes had ravished her. I follow my author, who says, καταμαρτυρήσαντο.

V O L. V.

αὐλητῶν τινα βιάζεσθαι ταύτην. A certain Piper witnessing against him that she had been ravished. But as we have only some fragments of that work of Heraclides, which favour entirely of the carelessness and precipitation of a writer who wants to huddle up an abridgment, there is no doubt but some words are wanting in this place. A wife does not use to complain to her husband that she has been ravished; she is content to tell him that such a thing has been designed. Though Stephanus Byzantinus has gone through the hands of a most terrible abbreviator, he does nevertheless inform us, that Philonome, Cygnus's wife, complained only of Tenes's ill design, and that the evidence of the Piper went no farther. Τὴν γὰρ αὐλητὴν ἡ φιλονόμη πρὸς Κύκνον ἡγάγεε μαρτυρῶντα ὅτι Τέννης αὐτὴν ἠθέλει βιάσασθαι. Tibicinem enim Philonome ad Cygnum duxit, qui testabatur Tenem voluisse Philonome vim inferre (2). Pausanias makes no mention

(2) Steph. Byzant. in voce Tenedos.

(b) See the remark [H].

(c) See the remark [H]. in the article TENEDOS.

(d) Ex Heraclide de Politia.

(e) Suidas in T. s. 13. 04. 200. 200.

(f) Apud Suidam, in voce sequenti.

(g) See Erasmus in the Proverbia, Tenedia bipennis. Tenedius homo. Tenedius patronus. Tenedius Tibicen.

(h) Pafanias, lib. x, pag. 330.

into the temple. Tenes, who probably was the author of that law (b), extremely proper to perpetuate the just hatred he had conceived against that false witness, shewed himself worthy of commanding by some other laws, which he enacted, and caused to be executed without any distinction of persons. He condemned adulterers to be beheaded; and being asked, what should be done to his son, who had been guilty of that crime, he answered, let the law be put in execution. Upon this occasion some medals were stamped [C], having on one side the figure of an ax, and on the other the faces of a man and a woman upon the same neck. This likewise, and what shall be said below, was the reason why the ax of Tenedos became a proverb (c), to denote a great severity (d). Tenes ordered another thing very remarkable, namely that there should always stand behind the judge, a man holding an ax, in order to cut off the head of any one, who should be convicted of falsity (e). Others say he ordered that the executioner, with his ax lifted up, should stand behind the accusers, in order to put immediately to death those who should be found guilty of a false accusation [D]. Aristotle, says in general (f) that the King of Tenedos administering justice with an ax, made a quick dispatch of those, who had wronged any body. It is no wonder after this if the proverb, he is a man of Tenedos (g), denoted a man, whose looks struck terror. Tenes extended his inflexibility even to his father. Cygnus having discovered his wife's calumny, was desirous of repairing the injury he had done his son, and made a voyage to the isle of Tenedos, to give him satisfaction (h). He fastened his ship to a tree or a rock, but Tenes in a passion rudely cut the ropes with his ax. We are not told what became of Cygnus after this rough action mention of that evidence: he will have it that Cygnus gave credit to the bare complaints of Philonome; but he observes that the complained one of the ill designs of her son-in-law. Ψεύδεται πρὸς τὸν ἀνδρᾶ ὡς αὐτῇ μὲν ἐκ ἐβέλυσσεν. τὸν δὲ αὐτῇ Τένυν συγγένειαν (3); that is, she falsely complained to her husband, that Tenes attempted to lie with her against her will. The Latin translation of Romulus Amateus seems to me to go beyond the original, quod ille invitam et repugnantem confuturare conatus esset. The Latin words signify great endeavours; but the Greek may be understood only of a bare solicitation.

[C] Upon this occasion some medals were stamped. Mr Beger (4) has published one stamped at Tenedos having on one side two faces upon one and the same neck, and on the other an ax between a lyre and a bunch of grapes. Those two faces represent a man and a woman. This author pretends, that the design of this medal was to denote the union, which ought to be between married people. The medal of Tenes, mentioned by the Antients (5) was not stamped with such an intent; but rather to denote the capital punishment of a man and a woman, who had committed adultery, and to be a perpetual monument of the execution of the law upon Tenes's own son. It will be proper to see the answer a learned man gave to Mr Beger (6). What creates the greatest difficulty, is, that there are some medals of Tenedos, on which one of the faces represents an old man, and the other a young woman; on others, the two faces represent young people, &c. Those variations make it probable, that all these medals were not stamped agreeably to the first intent; but some for one purpose, and others for another: unless it should be said that as often as the law was put in execution, a new medal was stamped, and that the two heads upon one neck differed either as to the age or some other ornaments, according to the personal qualities of those, who had been punished. It would be no very great wonder if an old beard had been found in the fact with a young woman.

[D] That the executioner, with his ax lifted up, should stand behind the accusers, in order to put immediately to death those who were guilty of a false accusation. Suidas affirms this: Ἐνομοθέτης, λέγει ὅτι, τοῖς τὰ ψεύδῃ κατηγοροῦσιν ὀπίσθεν παρὰ τὸν δῆμον ἀνέστην ὡς ἐλεγχέειν αὐτοὺς πειράσθαι ἀναρπείσθαι. Legem tulit ut carnifex securum sublatam tenens à tergo astaret illis qui falsa crimina objicerent, ut convicti ex tempore occiderentur. . . . He made a law, that the executioner, with his ax lifted up, should stand behind those who brought false accusations, that as soon as they were convicted they might be put to death. This puts me in mind of a maxim which has been commented upon by a French Civilian of the XVIth century. It imports, that a man, who goes about to oppose the prevailing religion, and which has been regularly established for many ages, ought not to be heard, but upon this condition, that he shall be punished with death, if he does not convince others, that his private opinion is more certain than the opinion of the public. Qui antiqua, legitima, atque ordinaria sacra audent in contrarium adducere, cum non audendum esse, nisi periculo sui capitis, si non persuadeat veritatem esse suam sententiam (8). Upon this occasion he alleges a very remarkable example from Josephus, in the sixth chapter of the thirteenth book of his Jewish Antiquities. The Jews, and the Samaritans having a quarrel in the city of Alexandria about this question, Whether the temple of Jerusalem was to be preferred to that of Garizim; the cause was brought before the council of the King of Egypt (9), and before the cause was argued, it was determined, that the advocates of the party cast should be condemned to death. The advocate of the Jews spoke first (10), and so clearly proved the justice of his cause, that he obtained such a sentence as he desired; so that Sabeus and Theodotus, the two Advocates of the Samaritans, were condemned to lose their lives. The same Civilian alleges (11) Zaleucus's law, by virtue of which, whoever proposed any innovation, was to do it with a rope about his neck, that in case he should not prevail to have the old customs abolished, he might be hanged upon the spot: and he concludes with wishing that the same law were to be observed in France. He fancies that the factions and troubles, occasioned by innovations in the kingdom of France, would have been prevented by that means. Quibus omnino rationibus atque conditionibus si nos, praefertim hoc tempore uteremur, quo is demum nihil scire & illiberalis esse dicitur, cui non placent absurdissima quaeque, modò recentissima: non ita plane res incertae essent ac turbulenta, neque tam multi multarum patrium, factionum, opinionum auctores evaderent: cum suo saltem periculo ea differant amare, colere, pacem patriamque, leges ac magistratus, quae odio sanè prosequuntur (12). . . . If we were to make use of the same methods and conditions at this time, when every person is esteemed to be entirely ignorant and unpolite, who does not relish the most absurd notions, provided they are but new; we should not have that uncertainty and confusion in things, nor would so many set up for heads of parties, factions, and opinions: since from their own danger, at least, they would learn to respect and reverence peace and their country, the laws and the magistrates, those things for which they now discover the most inveterate hatred. It is plain he would have had the disputes between the Romish priests and the Protestants determined like that of Alexandria: but was there in France in a tribunal like that of the King of Egypt? the latter was composed of men, who were neither Jews nor Samaritans; and therefore the contending parties might expect a decision without any partiality. Luther and Calvin, and their followers, could not have the same expectations, since the same persons must have been both judges and parties. Consequently neither Zaleucus's law, nor that of the King of Tenedos, can be extended to matters of religion.

[E] W

action [E]; but we read that the father and the son were killed by Achilles, during the Trojan war: the first, when the Grecians landed (i), the second, when Achilles went to ravage the isle of Tenedos (k). Tenes came to the assistance of his dear sister [F] Hemitheia, who was pursued by Achilles; but he only got his death by it. This action was attended with many consequences [G]. He was honoured as a god in the isle of Tenedos [H]. See the article of that island.

[E] We are not told what became of Cygnus. As I have only followed Pausanias's narrative, I leave the account of that voyage very imperfect. It is plain, the principal design of that author was to describe statues and pictures, and that he did not always consider whether the stories he mentioned, by the way, were lame or not. He makes Cygnus land in the isle of Tenedos, and fasten his ship to a tree or a great stone, and then Tenes to come and cut the cable. This is all. He should at least have told us, whether the son permitted his father to live in Tenedos, or to go home. This adventure is better related by Conon (13), tho' we have but an abstract of his book. Cygnus, says he, fastened his ship, but did not land; he desired his son to forget what was past, but he desired it on board his ship. Tenes cut the cables with his hatchet to prevent his landing. We may easily see what became of Cygnus; he went home again.

[F] His dear sister. It is not without reason that I use this epithet, since Hemitheia was so concerned at her brother's misfortune, that Cygnus shut her up in the same chest, in which he committed his son to the mercy of the sea (14). What Suidas says of her is still more in her commendation, for he tells us that she voluntarily resolved to run the same hazard with her brother (15). It was very reasonable, that Tenes should expose his life to prevent such a sister from being ravished; and yet he died in so just a cause; and it is pretended, that Hemitheia was swallowed up by the earth; and that it was this only that put a stop to Achilles's attempts (16). The remedy was somewhat violent; and few people would think it more supportable than the evil itself. Hemitheia was very handsome (17).

[G] His death was attended with many consequences. When Achilles came to know that it was Tenes whom he had killed, he was sorry for it, and took care to get him buried. He killed a servant sent him from Thetis, because he had not justly executed Thetis's orders. She had not only strictly charged her son to take care not to kill Tenes, but besides she had enjoined that servant to put Achilles in mind of her orders, when there should be occasion for it, lest he should disobey his mother through inadvertency. Plutarch (18) gives no other reason for this care of Thetis, but that Tenes was beloved of Apollo: but others say, that he was his son, and that Cygnus was only his reputed father (19). Now, according to the Destinies, Achilles was to die as soon as he should kill one of Apollo's sons. As for the rest. The inhabitants of Tenedos conceived so great an indignation against Achilles, that they ordered that no body should mention his name in the temple of Tenes. They also prohibited all Pipers from entering into it (20). Diodorus Siculus (21) does not say, those two prohibitions concerned the temple of Tenes, tho' he observes, that the inhabitants of Tenedos built a temple to him, and worshipped him as a god. He tells us that Tenes himself ordered that the pipers should not enter into the temple. He adds, that the temple which was re-built, when Achilles had destroyed the town, was that, in which it was not lawful to mention the name of Achilles. He, and Plutarch are therefore of a quite contrary opinion as to the place, which those two prohibitions concerned. It is certain, that no temple was built to Tenes during his life.

[H] He was honoured as a god in the isle of Tenedos. I have just now quoted two authors who say so. Cicero may be added for a third: 'Jam vero, says he (22), in Græcia multos habent ex hominibus Deos, Alabandum Alabandi, Tenedi Tenem. . . . And now in Greece there are men worshipped as gods, Alabandus by the Alabandi, and Tenes by those of Tenedos.' He was one of the deities that Verres stole. 'Tenedo, prætereo pecuniam quam eripuit, Tenem ipsum qui apud Tenedios sanctissimus deus habetur, qui urbem illam dicitur condidisse, cujus ex nomine Tenedus nominatur, hunc, inquam, ipsum Tenem pulcherrimè factum, quem quondam in comitio vidistis, abstulit magnò cum gemitu civitatis (23). . . . I pass over his extortions at Tenedos, where he seized even Tenes himself, who among that people is revered with divine honours, and is said to have built that city, which is called Tenedus, after his name, this very Tenes, I say, a most beautiful statue, which you have formerly seen in the Comitium, he carried away to the great grief of the inhabitants.' We may infer from thence, that the ancient deity of Tenedos, namely, Apollo Smintheus, was, in a manner, forgotten, after Tenes was placed in the number of the gods: for it was not objected to Verres, that he had made an attempt upon the statue of this Apollo; which plainly shews that it was not worth taking away, as that of Tenes was. Men seem to act in point of religion, as they do in point of friendship. None but the wife and the rational prefer old friends to new ones. The generality behave like coquets; the last comers are the most acceptable. In like manner the new saints makes the old ones forgotten. This has been complained of by some grave writers.

T E O S, one of the twelve cities of Ionia, acknowledged Athamas for its first founder (a) [A]. This Athamas, the grand-son of another Athamas, the son of Æolus, conducted a colony of Orchomenians to Teos, to which, in process of time, were added some other colonies of Athenians and Bœotians. Herodotus says (b), that Teos was in the middle of Ionia; and that this was the reason why Thales advised the Ionians to make it the seat of their general assemblies. Strabo, who places it in a peninsula, is not so faulty as Pliny (c), who calls it an island, for it is certain that Teos stood on the south side of the isthmus (d) over against Clazomenæ [B], which was on the north side. The inhabitants of Teos not being able to hold out any longer against the troops (13) Apud Ptolemaum, p. 437.

(14) Conon, ubi supra.

(15) 'Ελευσίνης δὲ τῆς Ἡμιθέας θυγατρὸς ἡρώδης τῶ δὲ θεῶν ἱερέως: καὶ αὐτὴν Ἡμιθέα ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ περικύβητι οὐκ ἔλαβεν ἑαυτὴν ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς ἀπορίας.

(16) Tzetzes in Lycophr.

(17) Plutarch. Quæst. Græc. 29.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Tzetzes in Lycophr.

(a) Pausanias, lib. vii, pag. 208. Strabo, lib. xiv, circa init.

(1) In Theophrasto Geographicis, voce Teos.

(i) Ovidius, Metam. lib. xii.

(k) Plutarch. Quæst. Græc. pag. 297.

(20) Plutarch, ubi supra.

(21) Lib. vi, cap. xvi.

(22) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. iii, cap. xvi.

(23) Idem, in Verrem, lib. iii.

(b) Lib. v, cap. clxx.

(c) Lib. i, cap. xxvi.

(d) Strabo, ibid. Pompon. Mela, lib. i, cap. xvi, & ibid. lib. vii, cap. xvi.

name. 3. He thought the native country of Anacreon was not called Teos, when that Poet called it Athamantida. Charles Stephens has fallen into the same mistakes.

[B] Teos stood on the south side of the isthmus over against Clazomenæ. Here follows a passage of Pomponius Mela (2), which we must examine. 'Super angustias, hinc Teos, illinc Clazomenæ, & quia terga jungunt confinio adnexa maris, diversis frontibus diversa maria prospectant. . . . On the straits are situated Teos on this side, Clazomenæ on the other; which two places, as the back parts of them are almost joined by their nearness to the shore, have in their fronts the different prospect of two opposite seas.' Pincianus makes the

(2) Lib. i, cap. xvi.

(b) Stephanus,
in Tíros.

(i) Strabo, ubi supra, & lib.
xiii, pag. 419.

(4) In Melam,
pag. 85.

(5) Ita ut à tergo mare habeant vicinum cui adnexæ sunt, à fronte diversaria prospectant. Teos enim adversa fronte prospectat mare in quo sitæ sunt Claromenæ (Jo says Salmastus instead of saying Clazomenæ) et finum Smyrnenum illæ contra Teon respiciunt et finum cui iuncta est Teos

(8) Strabo, lib.
xii, pag. m. 374;
375, mentions it, but does not say it was in Paphlagonia.

(2) In Vita sua,
lib. i, pag. m.
1172.

mo mancipatus fuerat, & tunc an adhuc in vivis esset, incertum erat. . . . From Muretus he understood the misfortune of Scipio Tetti, the Neapolitan, a person otherwise, as he said, extremely learned, who being informed against for some heterodox opinions of the Deity, was condemned to the galleys, and whether he was then alive or not was uncertain. Thuanus speaks of the time when he was at Rome (3), and of the frequent conversations he had with Muretus. What we read in the Thuanus has a relation to this: 'The Inquisition was very severe under the Pontificate of Sixtus V. Muretus told me, we do not know what becomes of the people here. I am amazed, when I rise in the morning, and hear that such a one is not to be found, and yet none dares speak of it. The Inquisition made a quick dispatch of them.' There is a (3) That is, the year 1574.

A MISTAKE

A MISTAKE
by THEODORE

de Apollodorus, which was published at Rome by Benedictus Ægius in the year 1555 [B]. He was very much esteemed by the learned [C].

slip of memory in this passage. Muretus died soon after the election of Sixtus V, in 1585, and Thuanus was in France all that year; he could not therefore learn any thing from Muretus in that Pope's reign. I believe I should not be mistaken, if I were to advance, that Thuanus remembering on the one hand what Muretus had told him concerning the executions of the Inquisition; and knowing on the other hand, that Sixtus V was very severe, confounded the time in which Muretus spoke to him, with the time when Sixtus V was Pope. People do not use to be so exact in conversation, and the memory is not then so intent as to make one avoid anachronisms.

[B] He is the author of the treatise de Apollodorus, which was published at Rome by Benedictus Ægius, in the year 1555 (4).] He added it to his edition of Apollodorus, whole book he translated into Latin, and added notes to it, wherein he often mentions Tetti. He gives him the character of a very honest and learned man. 'Sic habet exemplar Scipionis Tetti Neapolitani, viri nobilissimi & summæ doctrinæ & modestiæ & humanitatis incredibilis (5). ---- Thus it is in the copy of Scipio Tetti, the Neapolitan, a person of considerable rank, and superior learning, and of incredible modesty and humanity.' Mr Baillet makes mention of him in his Jugemens des Savans, part II, chap. X, of the Prejudices of Precipitation. 'Scipio Tetti, says he, a Neapolitan, bestowed several years upon his small tract de Apollodorus, before he was sent to the galleys. It is a work only of two sheets; but the public, which approved of it, thought that neither the smallness of the piece, nor the length of the time employed in composing it, nor the author's misfortune, ought to make it suffer in their esteem.' Co-lomiés (6) thought that Tetti had only written that tract, and a catalogue of manuscripts published by Father Labbe (7); but he should have known, that the same Father ascribes to him (8) Bibliotheca scolastica instructissima Latine, Gallice, Italice, Hispanice, Anglicè, & Græcè, printed at London, in the year 1618, in 8vo. Nicodemo knew nothing of it, but what he found in Father Labbe.

[C] He was very much esteemed by the learned.] He himself informs us, that he had contracted friendships with several illustrious persons. 'Testes, says he (9), 'consequi nostrum utriusque laborum celeberrimi rerum antiquarum conservatores, nedom rei litterariæ acerrimi patroni ac defensores, Achilles Maffæus, Gentilisque Delphinus. Testes amici alii literis & ingenio præstantissimi Carus Hannibal, Baptista Sigicellus, Antonius Augustinus, Alexandri duo, Picolominus & Corvinus, Marcus Cafalius. Testes item alii quos longum esset enumerare. Denique & Fulvius Ursinus juvenis imprimis honestus & ornatus, & supra quam par sit ejus ætati Latine & Græcè eruditus. ---- Achilles Maffæus, and Gentilis Delphinus, those eminent preservers of Antiquity, as well as strenuous patrons and defenders of learning in general, are ready to give their testimony to both my works. So are others of my friends, who are also distinguished for their great parts and erudition: Carus Hannibal, Baptista Sigicellus, Antonius Augustinus, the two Alexanders, Picolominus, and Corvinus, and Marcus Cafalius. So are others, whom it would be tedious to enumerate. Lastly, so is Fulvius Ursinus, a young gentleman of great figure and politeness, and learned in Latin and Greek, far beyond what is usual at his age.'

TETRIX, was a native of the isle of Crete, and went with a fleet to the Peloponnesus. He landed at the promontory called Tænarium, and there built a town. He made his residence near a place called Ψυχρομετρίον, by reason of the ceremonies which were performed there to appease the Manes. It was hither the priests of Delphos sent him who had killed the Poet Archilochus [A].

[A] It was hither the priests of Delphos sent him, who had killed the Poet Archilochus.] Plutarch, from whom I have taken this whole article, expresses himself in this manner (1): 'Ἐκελευσθη πορευθῆναι ἐπὶ τὴν τῷ Τετρίῳ οἰκίαν ἰδεῖν αὐτὸν καὶ τὴν τῷ Ἀρχιλόχῳ ψυχρὴν. He was ordered to go to Tetric's habitation, in order to appease the soul of Archilochus. According to Suidas, he was ordered to go to Tænarium, where Tetric was buried, and there to offer a propitiatory sacrifice to the soul of the son of Telephus (2). Goriopius

Becanus (3), who consulted no other author but Suidas, falsely imagined that Tetric was Archilochus himself. If he had consulted Plutarch, he would have avoided that mistake, nor would he have made use of Archilochus's words (4) against a man, who had abused him, Τετρίῳ τῷ πρὸς συνείληφας; Cicadam ala apprehendisti. -- You have got a grasshopper by the wing. See the remark [C] of the article ARCHILOCHUS.

TEUCER, the son of Telamon and of Hecione sister of Priam (a), went with twelve ships to the siege of Troy (b), where he gave noble proofs of his courage; but he did not revenge the affront put upon his brother Ajax (c), nor prevent his killing himself (d). This made him so odious to Telamon [A], that he received an order from him

(c) Teucer non receptus à patre Telamone ob segnitiam non vindictæ fratris injuriæ, Cyprum appellus cognomine patris sue Salamina constituit. Vell. Paternus, init. (d) Ἐδύσθη ἀπὸ τῆς Σαλαμῖνος ὡς μὴ τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ Ἰάντῃ καλῶς ἐπαγορευόμενον ὄφ' αὐτοῦ. Ejectum Salamine eo quod Ajaxem fratrem manus sui illaturum minime prohibuisset. Schol. Æsch. in Perth.

(1) See in Servius, in Æneid, lib. i, ver. 619, all the reasons that are given for Telamon's anger.

(2) Agamemnon in the eighth book of the Iliad, ver. 284, tells him, that Telamon had carefully bred him up, though he was a bastard.

(3) De Oratore, lib. ii, fol. 80.

[A] This made him so odious to Telamon (1).] Sophocles brings in Teucer foretelling that misfortune, and foreseeing that his father would call him bastard (2) and coward, and even accuse him of having deceitfully contributed to the death of his brother, in hopes of being the only heir; and that he would turn him out of his house. He observes, that Telamon never laughed, no, not in a time of mirth; and that he would, with much more reason, be angry and peevish, hearing, in his old age, of the unhappy death of his son. Cicero, without doubt, admired the verses, wherein Pacuvius represents the reception Teucer met with from his father; for these are his words (3): 'Quid potest esse tam fictum quam verus, quam scena, quam fabulæ? Tamen in hoc genere sæpe ipse vidi quum ex persona mihi ardere oculi hominis Histrionis viderentur spondalia illa, dicentis,

VOL. V.

Segregare abs te ausus, aut sine illo Salamina ingredi, Neque paternum aspectum es veritus.

Nunquam illum aspectum dicebat, quin mihi Telamon iratus furere luctu filii videretur. Ut ille inflexa ad miserabilem sonum voce,

Quem ætate exacta indigem
Liberum lacerasti, orbasti, extinxisti, neque fratris necis, Neque gnati ejus parvi qui tibi in tutelam est traditus.

Flens ac lugens dicere videbatur? Quæ si ille Histrion quotidie cum ageret, tamen recte agere sine dolore non poterat, quid Pacuvium putabis in scribendo leni animo ac remisso fuisse?

L 111

Wbat

(6) Mélang. Historiq. pag. 91.

(7) In Novæ Bibliothecæ MSS. Supplementis.

(8) In Bibliothecæ Bibliothecarum.

(9) In Tractatu de Apollodorus.

(4) Compare this with the citation (B), of the first article APOLLODORUS.

(5) Ægidius Spolietinus, Notæ in Apollodorus, pag. 41, apud Nicodemum, Bibliotheca Neapolitana, pag. 228.

(1) De his qui ferò à nomine penitunt, pag. 560.

(2) He was Archilochus's father.

(3) Orig. Antwerp. lib. iv, apud Schottum, Bibliothecæ Hispan. pag. 378.

(4) Apud Lucianum, in Pseudolog.

(5) See the remark [D] of the article TELAMON.

(6) Hygin. cap. scvii.

him not to set foot in Salamina. Upon this he went to seek his fortune; and having landed in the isle of Cyprus, he there built a town to which he gave the name of his father's kingdom from whence he had been excluded, I mean he called it Salamina [B]. When he heard of Telamon's death, he went to take possession of his kingdom; but Euryfaces, Ajax's son, prevented him. This resistance raised in him a desire of turning adventurer: he sailed towards the coasts of Spain, and having landed in the place where new Carthage was built, he went as far as Gallicia, and there he settled. Justin affirms it (e), but it is more probable that Teucer settled in the isle of Cyprus [C]. He built a temple to Jupiter in Salamina, and instituted a human sacrifice to that deity [D]. That cruel sacrifice was not abolished till the time of the Emperor Hadrian. Teucer's posterity reigned there for several ages. Pausanias (f) says they reigned there till the time of Evagoras; but he is not exact, for they reigned there much longer [E]. They reigned also in Cilicia, as I have shewn in the article of Ajax, the son of Teucer. There is a passage in Pausanias (g) which gives room to believe, that Teucer married a daughter of Cinyras. He was assisted by the King of the Tyrians, to secure his new dominions. Virgil says so (h); and Servius, his commentator, does not deny that it was the opinion of several

(e) Justin. lib. xlvii, cap. iii.

(f) Lib. ii, pag. 71.

(g) Lib. i, p. 3.

(h) Æn. lib. i, ver. 620.

'What is so full of fiction as Poetry, and representations 'on the stage? Yet in some of these, I have seen the 'actors eyes all on fire at the pronouncing these lines;

How durst thou part from him, and thus without him
Return, and fearless view thy father's face?

'At the expressing these words, thy father's face, I never 'could forbear imagining I saw Telamon in a rage,
'storming for the loss of his son; then changing his tone to
'the piteous, at these lines;

Whose grey hairs thou in sorrow now hast steep'd,
By tearing from me thus my dear, dear son;
Whilst thou, inhuman, neither mourn'st thy brother,
Nor tho' thy ward, weep'st o'er his infant child.

'With what tears and heart-breaking did he seem to 'speak them? But if the player, who daily acted this 'part, could not act it without shewing so great a de'gree of concern, do you think Pacuvius could be unaf'fected and unmoved at the writing of it?

(4) Euripides in Helen mentions that oracle.

[B] I mean, he called it Salamina.] An oracle of Apollo (4) had promised him that the new Salamina, to be built by him, would be no less famous than the other:

Certus enim promissit Apollo
Ambiguum tellure nova Salamina futuram (5).

(c) Horat. Od.
VII, lib. i, ver.
28.

For by Apollo's oracle we're told,
A future Salamin shall match the old.

The place where Horace says this, is very well known, because it is part of a drinking song.

Teucer Salamina patremque
Cum fugeret, tamen uda Lyæo Tempora populea fertur vinxisse corona,
Sic tristes affatus amicos;
Quò nos cunque feret melior fortuna parente,
Ibimus o focii, comitesque:
Nil desperandum Teucro duce & auspice Teucro.

O fortes pejoraeque passi
Mecum sæpe viri, nunc vino pellite curas,
Cras ingens iterabimus æquor.

When Teucer from old dad and country fled,
He fill'd his glass, and to his comrades said,
Cheer up, brave boys, a touchy fire ne'er heed,
We'll go where kinder fortune's pleas'd to lead.
Teucer's companions no despair can seize:

We've seen, brave boys, much harder times than these.
A fart for care, let's drink about to day,
To-morrow we'll weigh anchor, and away.

Teucer does not say in Horace, where he would build the new Salamin; but he declares in Euripides that he would build it in the isle of Cyprus: and all the Historians observe that he built it there, except Meffala

Corvinus, who is reproved for it by Meursius.
'Itaque manifestus est error Meffala Corvini, qui in 'Sidonia conditam à Teucro dicit lib. de Augusti pro-
'genie. Teucer qui patria profugus in Sidonia alteram
'Salamina condidit (6). - - - Meffala Corvinus there'fore is manifestly in the wrong, who says in his book
'de Augusti Progenie, that Teucer built it in Sidonia.
'Teucer, who being banished his country, built an'other Salamina in Sidonia.'

[C] It is more probable that Teucer settled in the isle of Cyprus.] If he had fixed his quarters in Spain, Ascle-piades of Myrlea, who taught Grammar in that country, would not have forgot to say so in his description of the nations, who inhabited it, since he has been so careful to observe (7), that some of them who bore arms under Teucer, settled in Gallicia. His silence is, in this case, a very good proof.

[D] He instituted a human sacrifice to this deity.]
Tacitus, who mentions the construction of that temple, says nothing of that sacrifice: 'Et Jovi Salaminio (7) Apud Stra-
'Teucer, Telamonis patris ira profugus (8). - - - And bonem, lib. iii,
'to Salaminian Jupiter, Teucer, who was expelled his pag. 108.
'country by his enraged father.' It is Lactantius who (8) Tacitus, An-informs us of this. 'Apud Cypri, says he (9), Sala- nal. lib. iii.
'minem humanam hostiam Jovi Teucrus immolavit,
'idque sacrificium posteris tradidit, quod est nuper (9) Laet. Di-
'Hadriano imperante sublatum. - - - At Salamin, in vin. Inst. lib. i,
'Cyprus, Teucer offered a human sacrifice, to Jupiter, cap. xxi.
'and enjoined it to be observed by posterity; nor has 'it ceased till lately in the reign of Hadrian.' What puzzles me most in this matter, is, that Porphyrius
(10) De Absti-
(10), who owns that men were sacrificed in Salamin for nentia, lib. ii.
a long time, does not say that any men were sacrificed Eusebius, de to Jupiter; and that he tells us, this custom was sup- Præpar. Evang.
pressed under the reign of Diphilus, co-temporary with lib. iv, cap. xvi.
Seleucus the Theologian. That Prince ordered, that, St Cyril, in Jufor the time to come, an ox should be sacrificed instead lianum, lib. iv, of a man. This sacrifice was offered to Agraule, the quære the verbi-daughter of Cecrops, and of the Nymph Agraulis. passage of Porphy-[E] For they reigned there much longer.] It appears rius, i. c. Meurfrom one of Isocrates's orations, that it was not without sius, in Cypri, interruption; for he introduces Nicocles, who, after pag. 61.
having said that Teucer, the founder of their family, had built Salamina, adds, that his father Evagoras had recovered the kingdom which had been lost by others; and that he had so ordered things, that not only Salamina was no longer tyrannized by the Phœnicians, but also that this town had the same kings, to whom the kingdom did at first belong. Thus Teucer's posterity were upon the throne after the death of Evagoras. It is certain that his son Nicocles reigned at Salamina: some (11) say, that Demonius also reigned in that town, and that he was his son. Isocrates inscribes some orations to them. We find also one Nicocreon, the king of Salamina, a descendant of Teucer (12). The learned Meursius takes him to be the same man, to whom Ptolemy gave the government of Cyprus (13), in the first year of the CXVIIth Olympiad, sixty-two years after the death of Evagoras (14). He has no other authority for this than a passage of Antoninus Liberalis. An authority which must in consequence be a bad one, since the Greeks did not apply their Metamorphoses to an age so far distant from the fabulous times as that of Alexander's successors. The Nicocreon therefore mentioned by Antoninus Liberalis is not the same with that of Ptolemy. I omit taking notice that

(6) Meursius, in Cypri, pag. 58. In the foregoing page, he corrects Acron, who says upon the VIIIth Ode, of the first book of Horace, that one of the two Salamina's was in Thraciæ regione, (he should have said in Asiæ regione) and the other in the isle of Cyprus.

(7) Apud Stra- bonem, lib. iii, pag. 108.

(8) Tacitus, An- nal. lib. iii.

(9) Laet. Di- vin. Inst. lib. i, cap. xxi.

(10) De Absti- nentia, lib. ii. Eusebius, de Præpar. Evang. lib. iv, cap. xvi. St Cyril, in Ju- lianum, lib. iv, quære the verbi- passage of Porphy- rius, i. c. Meur- sius, in Cypri, pag. 61.

(11) See Meur- sius in Cypri, pag. 113.

(12) Antoninus Liberalis, Me- tamorphos. cap. xxxix.

(13) Diodorus Siculus, lib. xxi.

(14) See Meur- sius, in Cypri, lib. ii, cap. xxi, & xv.

several writers. Others said that Teucer made himself master of the country without any such assistance. Homer makes him the best archer in the Græcian army (i).

(i) Τροίης θ' ἔδ' ἀνέστη Τεγεόων, ἀνὰ δὲ δὲ καὶ ἐν γαλήνῃ δαίμων. Teucerque qui praestantissimus Achivorum arte sagittandi, strenuus autem & in saturni pugna. Homer. Iliad. lib. xiii, ver. 313. See also lib. viii, ver. 266, & seq. & Horat. Ode IX, lib. iv.

that Nicocreon reigned before the Olympiad, mentioned by Meurfius (15), notwithstanding which the King of Egypt might have given him the government in question.

(15) He acted a tragedy before Alexander, Plut. in Alexandr. pag. 681. Iocrates dined at his house, idem in Iocrate.

TEXERA (JOSEPH) a Portuguese Friar of the Dominican order in the XVIth century, was confessor to Don Antonio King of Portugal, and having followed him into France, he settled there and was made Almoner and Preacher to the king. He was confessor of Charlotte Catherine de la Trimoille Princess of Condé, and to the Prince of Condé her son. He published some books [A], and died in the year 1601 (a). He declared from the pulpit, that we are bound in duty to love all men of whatsoever religion, sect, or nation, they be, even the Castilians (b). This discovered his strong hatred against the prince (c) who had conquered Portugal from the unfortunate Don Antonio. One of his books was refuted by order of the King of Spain [B].

(a) König, Bibl. pag. 796.

(b) Traité Paroquetique par un Pelerin Espagnol, folio 114, Edit. of Aux, 1596.

(c) Philip II, King of Spain.

[A] He published some books.] His Compendium de Portugallia ortu, regni initii, rebusque à regibus gestis, was printed at Paris in the year 1582 in 4to. This book was refuted by Duardus Nonius Leo, a Portuguese Civilian, in reply to which Texera afterwards wrote, Consultatio nugarum Duardi Nonii Leonis & aliorum qui Portugallia regnum Philippo Castelle Regi jure hereditario obvenisse contendunt, & Antonii veri Portugallia Regis jus vellicare. This work was printed in the year 1592. I find in the catalogue of Thuanus's library (1), Jos. Texera, Suite d'un Discours intitulé, Adventure, &c. touchant Don Sebastien Roy de Portugal, 1602 in 8vo. There was printed at Paris in 1590, and at Leyden in 1592, Josephi Texera Exegetis genealogica arboris gentilitis Henrici IV Gallorum Regis. The author composed another work on the genealogy of the Prince of Condé in 1596, and published a second edition of it enlarged, in the year 1598, in 12mo. It was intitled, Rerum ab Henrico Borbonii Francie Protoprincipis majoribus gestarum, Epitome: ejusdemque Henrici Genealogie explicatio à divo Ludovico per Borbonios atque ab Imbaldo Trimollio ad utrumque dicti Henrici parentem repetita. He has added to it an account of the ceremonies observed by the Prince of Condé, upon her abjuring Calvinism before the Pope's Legate at Rouen the 28th of December 1596. He observes one thing which I am going to mention, because it may serve as a supplement to a fact which I have related in the article BOTERO (2), and which has afforded some mirth to Protestants.

(1) Pag. 336, of the 2d Part.

(2) See the remark [C], of the art. BOTERO, and the remark [K], of the article HENRY IV.

One of these ceremonies was, that the Prince being upon her knees, the Legate and Bishops who accompanied him repeated the Psalm Miserere, and after that the Psalm Deus miseretur nostri: they repeated them alternately, he one verse, and they another: at every verse the legate repeated, he softly touched her shoulders with his wand. The Constable's lady who was next the Prince not being able to turn away her head ever so little by reason of the crowd, was hit every time by the wand over the face. The Legate perceiving it broke off the end of his wand. Almost every body then present believed this to be part of the ceremonial: Joseph Texera was also of that opinion; but the Legate undeceived him. Interea vero dum illustrius Dominus Legatus suum versiculum recitaret, ad quemlibet leviter contingebat cum virgula spatulas Domine Principisse eam absolvendo. Hic animadvertendum est, quod, cum illustrissima Domina Comestabilis esset D. Principisse proxima, ita in angustias redacta fuerit, ut nec se movere loco, nec caput inclinare, aut avertere posset. Unde accidit, ut plus illic, quam alie omnes mereretur: quia scilicet, cum dicti psalmi recitarentur antiphanatim, ut dictum est, ab illustrissimo D. Legato & clero praesente, & ad quemque versiculum D. Legatus ipsam Principissam scipiunculo, vel virgula tangeret in humeris, juxta ritum & constitutionem Ecclesie cum in spatulam sinistram deflenderet, simul caput & vultum multis vicibus Domine Comestabilis contingebat. Quod advertens ipse D. Legatus, abruptis punctum virgulae versus cupidem: quod fere omnes putabamus hoc animadvertisse fuisse partem aliquam hujusce ceremonie. Sed ego rescivi ex ore ipsius Illustrissimi D. Legati veritatem rei. Hæc diximus, ne quis deinceps in eo ballucinetur ubi veritatem resciscat (3). No particular can more justly deserve to be set right than this; for it might easily deceive the spectators: they might well imagine that such a circumstance not being taken notice of in the Rubric, might signify something of a mystery, some new and very singular case. Men of speculation and wit might very well vie with one another in saying a thousand chimerical things upon this subject.

[B] One of his books was refuted by order of the King of Spain.] I have quoted a book which has been translated out of Spanish into French by one Dralymont, who subjoins some notes to the original. This is one of his notes. 'A Jew whose name was Duard Nonnes de Leon', contrary to the laws of Portugal, which shut the door of public honours and dignities, (that is to say, against all those who descend from the Jews) was preferred by the Catholic King to be a privy-counsellor, in recompence for his having written against Joseph Texera, a Portuguese preaching Fryar (a person at this day very much renowned all over Europe, and well known to all Princes in that part of the world, as well ecclesiastical as temporal; and particularly in France, where the greatest men in the kingdom, and all persons of quality esteem and regard him, on account of his polite conversation, his excellent morals, and extraordinary doctrine, as being one of the most accomplished masters in the knowledge of History, and Genealogy, that can be met with, as his writings and common conversation sufficiently testify) a book by way of answer, which is not only scurrilous, but also full of heretical and rash propositions. I am very much surprized at the patience of this Fryar, considering how deeply read and experienced he was in History, and how conversant in affairs of state, and jealous of his own reputation, that he should not, so far as I know, put pen to paper (4), and write not only against the errors and falsities of that Jew, but also against his Catholic Majesty: since it was he who commanded that false and scurrilous book to be written, (as his said Majesty confesses in the licence he gave for the printing it in the year 1590) and who authorized the said Jew to publish a piece of the genealogy of the Kings of Portugal, translated by him into Spanish, out of another in Latin, which he composed by his order: and which is the answer I have been just now mentioning (5).

(3) Texera, de Conversione Catholice Catharine Principisse Condæ, pag. 26, 27.

(4) Duard Nonnes, liv. des Censures, &c.

(5) I am surprized at this; for we have seen in the preceding remark, that a refutation of this Jew's book was published by Texera in the year 1592.

(6) Traité Paroquetique par un Pelerin Espagnol battu du temps & percuté de la fortune, fol. 51, verso, & 52, Edit. of Aux, 1597. Note this parenthetical treatise was reprinted in the year 1641, under the title of Fuora Villaco, ibat is to say, The liberty of Portugal, &c.

THAIS,

(a) See the remark [A], towards the end.

THAIS, a Greek courtesan, followed Alexander's army, and occasioned the destruction of Persepolis [A]. She was so well beloved by Ptolemy King of Egypt, that he married her (a). There is no good authority for saying, that Menander was one of her galants. This is what I am going to examine, in animadverting on Moreri's mistakes [B]. The name of that courtesan was commonly given in comedies, and other pieces

[A] She occasioned the destruction of Persepolis.] Mr Guillet rightly observes that Thais formed that design out of a principle of ambition. She proposed to burn the royal palace of Persepolis, and plainly told him that she longed to set fire to it first; that it might be said in time to come all the world over, that the Athenian women, who followed Alexander into Persia, had revenged the burning of Athens by Xerxes. Her beauty and eloquence gave success to her ambition, and the royal palace was burnt that very night (1). The thing is related more at large in the following words.

(1) Guillet, Athenes ancienne & nouvelle, pag. 291.

After this, as he was making preparation for a farther march after Darius, he one day resolved to make merry, and to divert himself with an entertainment, where his courtiers had prevailed with him so far as to permit every man to bring his mistress along with him, among whom, the most celebrated was Thais an Athenian, Ptolemy's mistress, who after the decease of Alexander, was King of Egypt. This Thais sometimes cunningly praised Alexander, sometimes joked with and rallied him, agreeably enough to the manner of her country, but much above her character or condition, telling him that she found herself that day fully recompensed for the pains she had taken in following his camp all over Asia, by the favour she then enjoyed of diverting herself at pleasure in the stately palace of the Persian monarchs: but that she should be much more delighted to burn by way of sport, and make a bonfire of the court of Xerxes, who had set fire to the city of Athens, by lighting it up with her own hand in his presence, and before the face of so brave a Prince as Alexander: that it might be recorded to posterity, that the women who followed Alexander's camp, had taken a sharper revenge on the Persians for the former sufferings and affronts of Greece, than all his commanders could do by sea or land. She had no sooner made the proposal, but she was seconded by Alexander's courtiers, with clapping of hands, and great acclamations of joy, commending what she said to the skies, and pressing the King to put it in execution. Alexander giving way to their persuasions, started from his seat, and with a chaplet of flowers on his head, and a lighted torch in his hand, led the way, and his courtiers followed him in the same manner, dancing, and making a great noise about the palace (2).

(2) Plutarch, in the Life of Alexander, pag. 687, of the Francfort edition 1620.

(3) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvii, cap. lxxii.

Diodorus Siculus observes (3) that Thais set fire to the royal palace, next to the King, and that all the houses round it were burnt down. He calls her εταίρα, a word that may be rendered a courtesan. Note that, according to Plutarch nothing was burnt but the royal palace: but according to Quintus Curtius, the whole city was consumed to ashes, and never afterwards rebuilt. I wonder he does not mention the finest passage of Thais's speech: he does not make her say any thing that discovers her ambition of having it said in future ages, that she and her companions had contributed more to revenge her country than their greatest Captains. 'De die inibat convivia (Alexander) quibus feminae intererant: non quidem quas violari nefas esset; quippe pellices licentius quam decebat cum armato vivere adfuetæ. Ex his una Thais & ipsa temulentia, maximam apud omnes Græcorum initium gratiam adfermat, si regiam Persarum jussisset incendi, expectare hoc eos, quorum urbes barbari deleverant. Ebrio scorto de tanta re ferente sententiam, unus & alter, & ipsi mero onerati, adfuerunt, rex quoque fuit avidior, quam patientior: quin igitur ulciscimur Græciam, & urbi faces subdimus. Omnes incalescent mero: itaque surgunt temulentum ad incendendam urbem; cui armati pepercerant. Primus rex ignem regie iniecit; tum convivæ & ministri pellicæque. Multa cedro ædificata erat regia: quæ celeriter igne concepto, late fudit incendium. Quod ubi exercitus, qui haud procul ab urbe tendebat, conspexit; fortuitum ratus, ad opem ferendam concurrunt. Sed ut ad vestibulum regie ventum est; vident regem ipsum adhuc adgrerentem faces. Omnia igitur, quam portaverant aqua, aridam materiam in incendium jacere ceperunt. Hunc exitum habuit regia totius Orientis... ac ne longa quidem ætate, quæ excidium ejus sequuta est, refurxerit (4). -- Alexander spent the day in feasting, to which the women were admitted, not modest ones, whom it was unlawful to violate, but courtesans who used to live after a licentious manner in the camp. One of those whose name was Thais, and she very much in drink, cried out to the King, that he would very greatly oblige all the Greeks if he would order the Persian palace to be burnt; that they expected this from him, since their cities had been so served by those Barbarians. This drunken courtesan, thus declaring her mind on so important an affair, was applauded first by one and then another, all of them overcharged with drink; and the King too with greater warmth than prudence replied; Well then let us revenge our country, and set fire to the city. They were all inflamed with wine; and therefore rose up to burn the city now they were in drink, which they had spared when they were in arms. The King first set fire to the palace, then the guests, the courtiers, and courtesans. Great part of the palace was built with cedar, which quickly taking fire, spread the flames all around. The army which was encamped not far from the city seeing the fire, thinking it to be accidental, came to give their assistance. But when they were advanced to the entrance into the palace, they found the King himself still holding out his torch. So that throwing away the water they had brought, they began to heap on dry fuel to increase the fire. Thus fell the palace of the whole East... and though it is so long a time since that destruction happened, it has not been rebuilt. Observe that not only it does not appear from those two accounts that Thais was at that entertainment in the quality of Alexander's mistress; but it appears on the contrary, that she had not that character. Quintus Curtius says only, that she was one of the concubines, who followed the army (5). (5) This last expresses the whole force of Quintus Curtius's words.

Yet it is a very common opinion, that she was one of Alexander's mistresses; but this opinion may be false, though it be favoured by a passage in Athenæus. This author says, that Alexander had that courtesan with him; and that after his death she married Ptolemy, King of Egypt, by whom she had two sons and one daughter, called Irene, who was the wife of Eunostus, King of Solis (6) in the isle of Cyprus. (6) Thus the Greek words of Athenæus Εὐνόστου ἡ βασιλίστις ἡ Εὐνοῦ βασιλίστις τῆς Κύπρου τῆς ἡμετέρας βασιλίστις ought to be translated, and not as Dilechamps renders them, Solonia Eunosti regis Cypriorum. -- Solis Eunosti, King of Cyprus. Cypriorum uxor fuit (7). -- Thais the Athenian, courtesan, went along with Alexander, and is said by Cleitarchus to have been the principal cause of his burning the palace of Persepolis. After the death of Alexander, she was married to Ptolemy, who first obtained the kingdom of Egypt; and had children by him, Leontiscus and Lagus, sons; and Eirene a daughter, who was married to Solon Eunostus King of Cyprus.

[B] In animadverting on Moreri's mistakes.] I. He says she was a native of Alexandria, and that going to Athens all the youth of that country flocked to her. This falsity is confuted in the following quotation (8): 'Do not suffer your selves to be led into an error by what is said in five or six sorry historical Dictionaries, that Thais

(8) Guillet, Athenes ancienne, pag. 291.

THAIS. THALES.

321

pieces of Poetry, to ladies of pleasure (b). It is said, that Paphnutius who flourished in the IVth century, converted in Alexandria, a famous courtesan, called THAIS [C].

(b) See Juvenal, Sat. III, ver. 93, where he says an melior cum Thaidia fuffinet? and Martial in several places.

Thais was a native of Alexandria. There was so short an interval between the time when Alexander laid the foundation of that city of Egypt, and the time when he burnt Persepolis, that Thais could not have seen the burning of that town, unless she had been quickly snatched away among the first-born of Alexandria, and transported in her cradle: For you know that after the battle of Arbela, fought in the same year that Alexandria was built, in Oriente victoris magis quam passibus omnia peragrabat Alexander. . . . In the east Alexander over-ran every place rather with victories than marches. But without refining upon Chronology, Plutarch and Athenæus say she was born at Athens (9). II. Moreri adds, that the Poet Menander had made her famous by his verses, which was the reason why she was called Menandrian. This is taken from Charles Stephens's Dictionary, and cannot be so well confuted as Guillet's paraphrase upon it. It was there, says he (10), speaking of Athens, that Thais had an intrigue with Menander, that famous Poet, who was so tender-hearted, and so much given to love, that he committed extraordinary follies for his mistress. I alledge against this what Plutarch tells us (11), that Thais was Ptolemy's concubine during Alexander's expedition, and what Athenæus observes, that she was married to the same Ptolemy after the death of that conqueror. This is a plain proof, that, if she had an intrigue with Menander, it was before this expedition. Nay, it is probable, that she was Ptolemy's mistress some time before the war of Asia: it is probable, I say, that this great Macedonian Lord had got her from Athens, and kept her in his house for some time, before the breaking out of the war against Darius. Now this expedition of Alexander began when Menander was not above eight years of age (12). It is impossible therefore that he should be in love with Thais before the Persian war. In what time then shall we place this amour, since after the death of Alexander, she married the King of Egypt, I mean the same Ptolemy whom she had followed every where, whilst that conqueror was subduing Asia? I have another argument to alledge against this amour. I believe there is no better proof for it than these verses of Propertius,

Turba Menandreæ fuerat nec Thaidos olim
Tanta, in qua populus lufit Erichthonius (13);

Not such a crowd Menander's Thais led,
Altho' all Athens sought her wanton bed.

THALES, one of the seven wise men of Greece. Moreri speaks of him at large. I add, that this Philosopher believed, that the world was the work of GOD, and that GOD knew the most secret thoughts of men [A]. Some say, that he was married; but others affirm this to be false, and that he got rid of the persecutions of his mother on this subject,

[A] Thales believed that the world was the work of GOD, and that GOD knew the most secret thoughts of men. I mention this as I find it in Diogenes Laërtius, without affirming, that it was really the opinion of that Philosopher. The three following Apophthegms are ascribed to him among others. 1. GOD is the most ancient thing of all, for he is uncreated. 2. The world is the finest thing of all, for it is GOD's work. Πρεσβύτατον τῶν ὄντων, θεός, ἀγίννητον γὰρ. καλλίστον, κόσμος. ποιῆμα γὰρ θεοῦ. Antiquissimum eorum omnium quæ sunt, deus; ingenitum enim. Pulcherrimum, mundus; à deo enim factus est (1). 3. So far are they who commit sin, from being able to conceal it from GOD, that they cannot so much as prevent his knowing their thoughts. Ἡρώτης τις αὐτὸν εἰ λήθοι θεὸς ἀνθρώπων ἀδικεῖν. Ἀλλ' ἐν δὲ διανομένῳ. εἶπεν. Interrogatus, latere ne deus homo male agens: Ne cogitans quidem, inquit (2). Valerius Maximus relates the same thing with regard to the third sentence. Mirifice etiam Thales. Nam interrogatus, an facta hominum Deos fallerent: Nec cogitata, inquit. Ut non solum manus, sed etiam mentes puras habere VOL. V. No. CXXVII.

(1) Diogenes Laërtius, lib. i, num. 35.

(2) Id. ibid. num. 36.

or these, wherein the same Poet has included some advices of a bawd,

Non te Medæ delectent probra sequacis,
Nempe tulit fastus ausa rogare prior:
Sed potius mundi Thais pretiosa Menandri,
Cum ferit astutus Comica mœcha Getas (14);

(14) Id. lib. iv, Eleg. V.

To shun Medea's fondness be advised,
For asking first she justly was despit'd,
Menander's Thais shows a wiser way,
When she cajoles her cullies in the play.

or upon this inscription of Martial, under Menander's Thais,

Hæc primum juvenum lascivos lufit amores,
Nec Glycere, vere Thais amica fuit (15).

(15) Martial. Epigr. clxxxvii, lib. xiv.

This play first draws the scenes of wanton loves,
Thais, not Glycera, the mistress proves.

But it is certain, that Menander's Thais, mentioned by those two Latin Poets, signifies a Comedy of Menander, intitled Thais, and not the Courtesan, who occasioned the burning of Persepolis. Consult the observations of Gronovius the father (16). I would not be understood to deny, that our Thais was, in the Poet's mind, the original of the comedy that went by her name; but this does not prove, that there was any love intrigue between Menander and the Courtesan who is the subject of this article.

(16) Upon the Ecclesiastical Writers, in the second chapter, pag. 25, & seq.

[C] It is said that Paphnutius . . . converted in Alexandria a . . . THAIS. Charles Stephens, and several Lexicographers after him, have mentioned this conversion: they all quote Volaterranus, who relates it in this manner. Paphnutius, says he (17), going incognito to Thais of Alexandria (18), was never satisfied that the place she carried him to was private enough; and at last being told by her, that none but GOD could know what passed between them in the place they were in, he took from thence an occasion to exhort her to fear GOD, who sees and punishes the most private actions. She was so sensibly moved with his exhortation, that she gave over her trade, and became a holy woman.

(17) Volaterr. lib. xx, circa init. pag. m. 718.

(18) Thaidis nomen nobilitatum in primis à Thaidæ Alexandria. Id. ibid.

vellemus; cum secretis cogitationibus nostris celeste numen adesse credidisset (3). . . . It was an admirable saying of Thales, who when he was asked, if the actions of men could escape the knowledge of GOD, replied, no not even their thoughts. So then we ought not only to have our hands pure, but also our minds; when we are satisfied that GOD is present even to our most secret thoughts. Valerius Maximus's interpretation of this saying, to wit, that it was intended to inculcate such a faith in the presence of GOD to our most secret thoughts, as might oblige men to preserve their hearts pure as well as their hands, does very well agree with a passage of Cicero, concerning the same Thales. If you carefully examine the sequel of Cicero's argument, you will find, that the ground of the maxim of this ancient Grecian sage, was the moral advantage that men might derive from it: Melius græci atque nostri, qui ut augerent pietatem in deos, easdem illos urbes quas nos incolere volunt. Affert enim hæc opinio religionem utilem civitatibus. Siquidem & illud bene dictum est à Pythagora doctissimo viro, tum maxime pietatem & religionem subject, by telling her when he was young, that it was too soon, and when he was growing old, that it was too late (a). Some will have it that he believed living and dying to be the same thing; and that being asked why then he did not dye, he returned an answer, which others ascribe to Pyrrho (b). An old woman bantered him very merrily, for going abroad with her to look at the stars, and falling into a ditch [B]. It is thought he lived above ninety years [C].

(3) Valerius Maximus, lib. vii, cap. ii, num. 8. Ext. pag. m. 602.

Those,

(a) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 26.
(b) See the article PYRRHO, citation (37).
(4) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. ii, fol. 334, B.
ligionem verari in animis, cum rebus divinis operam daremus: & quod Thales qui sapientissimus inter septem fuit, homines existimare oportere deos omnia cernere, deorum omnia esse plena: fore enim omnes castiores, veluti quo infans esset maxime religiofus (4). - - - It was a better thought both of the Grecians and Romans, to suppose the gods to inhabit the same cities with themselves, in order to promote piety towards them. For this opinion infers that religion is useful to cities. It was an excellent saying of that most learned Philosopher Pythagoras, that piety and religion were then the most impressed on our minds, when we were actually worshipping the gods; as also of Thales, who was the wisest of the seven, that we ought to believe the gods see every thing, that every thing is full of the Deity: for by this means all men would become more virtuous, and even an infant would grow religious. Here I desire you would observe the difference which appears between Cicero and Diogenes Laërtius. The latter says absolutely, that, according to Thales, the world was animated and full of Genii: τὸν κόσμον ἐμψυχον καὶ δαιμόνων πλήρη, animatum mundum ac demonibus plenum (5); but Cicero seems to restrain Thales's words; for he says, that, according to that Philosopher, it was proper or necessary for men to believe that every thing was full of gods. Aristotle thought, that perhaps Thales meant only what others understood by asserting, that all Beings have one soul: καὶ ἐν τῷ ὅλῳ δὲ τινες αὐτὴν (ψυχὴν) μεμικχάσαι φασίν. ὅθεν ἴσως καὶ Θαλῆς ὧνδεν πάντα πλήρη δέων εἶναι. Sunt & qui in toto universo permiscam ipsam (animam) inquit esse. Quocirca forsitan & Thales omnia plena deorum esse putavit (6). - - - And some say that the soul is infused throughout the whole Universe. From whence very probably Thales derived his opinion. That all things are full of gods. Here follow some other variations. Plutarch does not suppose that Thales alledged the reason abovementioned, why the world is the most beautiful of all things: he says, that Thales being to resolve this question, Which is the most beautiful of all Beings? Answered, the world; for every thing that is regular, is part of the world. Τὴν καλλίστην ἡ κόσμος πᾶν γὰρ τὸ κατὰ τάξιν, τότε μέγας ἐστίν. Quid pulcherrimum? Mundus. omnes enim ejus partes ordine aptæ sunt (7). As for the answer to the question, whether God knows the wicked actions of men, some ascribe it not to Thales, but to Pittacus. See Theon in the fifth chapter of his Progygnasmata, page 69 and 77, of the Leyden edition 1626.

one soul in all

(6) Aristot. de Anima, lib. i, cap. v.

(7) Plut. in Convivio septem Sapient. pag. 153, C.

(8) In the remark [D], of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(9) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 34.

cellor excuses him, and sometimes banters him, for not seeing in the stars his wife's gallantry.
Saturnus procul est, jamque olim cæcus, ut ajunt, Nec propè discernens à puero lapidem.
Luna verecundis formosa incedit ocellis,
Nec nisi virgineum virgo videre potest.
Jupiter Europam, Martem Venus, & Venerem Mars, Daphnen Sol, Herfen Mercurius recolit.
Hinc factum, Astrologe, est, tua cum caput uxor amantes, Sidera significent ut nihil inde tibi.
Saturn who blinks far off, is soon beguill'd, As when a stone was giv'n him for a child, The charming moon preserves so chaste a sight, She lends to no immodest all her light. Jove with Europa, Mars with Venus toys, Sol Daphne, Herfe Mercury employs. Hence when the conjurer's wife receives her lover, The stars, so taken up, can ne'er discover.
You see he alledges some reasons why the planets cannot discover to that Astrologer his domestic misfortune: but here are some other verses, wherein he pretends that since the stars see every thing, they ought to have acquainted their votary with his wife's unlawful amours.
Altra tibi æthereo pandunt sese omnia vati,
Omnes & quæ sint fata futura monent.
Omnibus ast uxor quod se tua publicat, id te Altra, licet videant omnia, nulla monent.
While all the stars their saw'rite prophet shew, Each future fact that passes here below. His wife's conjunction with each amorous spark, The stars, which all things see, ne'er once remark.
As there are some Astrologers every where, who are not more exempt from that misfortune, than men of other professions, a French author, who was acquainted with some of them, has presented them with a French translation of the first verses of Sir Thomas More. These are his words (10). Now if this man (10) De Verbis (11), intent upon a high contemplation, and pretending to great knowledge, did not see what was before him, you may be sure he is not the only faulty man in this respect. Several Astrologers are like him; for, though they pretend to foretel the fate of other men, they cannot foretel their own, witness some of that Profession in our whom he had time, who are extremely jealous, and something been saying, that more, you know what I mean, with due respect to the one day, as he Ladies. Upon these I formerly wrote the following epigram, in imitation of the Latin one of Sir Thomas fell into a ditch. More.

Tu cognois astrologue estoilles etherées,
Dont à chacun predis futures destinees;
Mais de ce que ta femme est à plusieurs commune,
Par les astres n'en peux cognoistre chose aucune,
Saturne est trop loingtain, aveugle est en apres,
Le blanc d'entre le noir ne discernant de pres.
Ayant les yeux honteux la Lune fait son cours,
Puis la vierge ne veut voir lascives amours.
Les autres affaire ont, Mars sa Venus regarde, Venus Mars, Jupiter à Europe prent garde.
Ainsi donc tu ne peux ta femme apercevoir,
Quand son amant l'embrasse, & moins tes cornes voir.

See what I quote out of the Menagiana (12).
[C] It is thought he lived above ninety years.] He was born in the first year of the XXXVth Olympiad, and

(12) They say of a man, who fell into a ditch, as he was gazing upon the stars, Qui fuit Astrologus, nunc Gometra fuit. - - - The Astrologer becomes a Gometra. Menagiana, pag. 33.

Those, who are not unacquainted with the doctrine of the most ancient Philosophers of Greece, cannot be ignorant that he asserted, that water was the principle of all bodies, which compose the Universe. A great many reflexions might be made on this supposition [D]. I shall cite a passage, which will inform us; that he made very fine discoveries

(13) Apollodorus, in Chronica, argues wrong when he says Τελευτήσαι γὰρ ἐπὶ τῆς πεντηκοντῆς ἐτῶν Ὀλυμπιάδου: quinquagesima QUINQUE & octava Olympiade esse defunctum (14);

(14) Diog. Laërt. ibid.

(15) In Notis ad hunc locum Laërtii.

(16) With this Observationum selectarum ad Rem Litterariam spectantium Tomus I. Mr. Thomasius proffer of the Civil-Law at Hall, was pleased to send me a copy of it; for which I express my acknowledgments in this place. He has a great share in the pieces which make up this collection.

(17) See above, citation (42), of the article OVID.

SEVERAL significations of the word Chaos.

and died in the LVIIIth Olympiad (13). This makes at least ninety two years. So that Diogenes Laërtius argues wrong when he says Τελευτήσαι γὰρ ἐπὶ τῆς πεντηκοντῆς ἐτῶν Ὀλυμπιάδου: quinquagesima QUINQUE & octava Olympiade esse defunctum (14); -- For that he died in the LVIIIth Olympiad; and yet Aldobrandinus (15) approves the computation of that author, and admits the 90 years assigned to the life of Thales by Diogenes Laërtius. Moreri is wrong in his calculation; he would have it, that Thales, who was born in the XXXVth Olympiad, died in the 58th about the year of Rome 209, in the 95th year of his age. The year of Rome 209, is the last of the LVIIIth Olympiad; but which way soever you reckon, you will never find ninety-five years in the hypothesis of that writer.

[D] He asserted that water was the principle of all bodies. . . . A great many reflexions might be made on this supposition. There is very good reason to believe, that he was not the first, who advanced this doctrine; and that he borrowed it from the Egyptians, or the most ancient Greek Poets. See the dissertation de dogmate Thaletis, quod aqua sit principium omnium rerum, printed with some others at Hall in Saxony in the year 1700 (16). Some authors say, that the chaos of Hesiod is, at the bottom, the same principle, which Thales called water: this I can hardly believe; for the water of Thales must needs have been considered as an homogeneous thing, whereas the chaos must have been considered as an odd mixture of all sorts of principles. Ovid gives us that notion of it, at the beginning of his Metamorphoses (17): and when the other Poets speak of a certain infernal chaos, they mean a dark and dreadful place, wholly destitute of the beauty that is to be seen in things well ordered, or altogether wanting the simplicity of a first principle.

Di, quibus imperium est animarum, umbræque silentes,
Et chaos, & Phlegethon, loca nocte tacentia late (18).

(18) Virgil. Æn. lib. vi, ver. 265.

Ye realms, yet unreveal'd to human sight
Ye gods, who rule the regions of the night.

DRYDEN.

The Commentator Servius understands by the word chaos in these two verses, the first principles as they were in the confusion of the elements. But perhaps he is too subtil, for it is likely Virgil intended to speak only of hell in general, or of part of it. These words of Ovid ought to be understood in the same sense:

Per ego hæc plena timoris,
Per chaos hoc ingens, vastique silentia regni
Eurydice oro, properata retexite fata (19).

(19) Ovidius, Metam. lib. x, ver. 29.

Now, by the horrors which these realms surround;
By the vast chaos of these depths profound;
By the sad silence which eternal reigns
O'er all the waste of these wide stretching plains
Let me again Eurydice receive,
Let fate her quick-spun thread of life re-weave.

CONGREVE.

It is Orpheus who addresses the prayer to Pluto and Proserpine. Consult Mr Grævius's notes upon Hesiod (20), wherein he proves, that the word chaos very frequently signifies hell. I know that another sense has been put upon the chaos, which was, according to Hesiod, the first of all Beings: It has been said, that this chaos signifies the place wherein all bodies lay placed. Simplicius (21) tells us, that this was a very common interpretation. It is mentioned by Sextus Empiricus: Εἶναι γὰρ φασὶ Χάος τὸν τόπον ἀπὸ τοῦ χαρητὶκὸν αὐτὸν εἶναι τῶν ἐν αὐτῷ γινομένων. Dicunt enim Chaos esse locum, eo quod comprehendat illa quæ in ipso sunt (22). -- For they say that chaos is place, because of its comprehending every thing contained in it. But, according to this sense, it is impossible that Thales should have taught the same doctrine with Hesiod; for water must necessarily require place no less than other bodies; and therefore place must have existed before water, and consequently water could not be the first principle. I do not believe that Hesiod ever dreamed of what is ascribed to him: And certainly, by the word chaos, he did not understand the space or the place which contains bodies. Doubtless, he meant by it the state of confusion all things were in, before the earth, the sea, the air, the heavens, &c. obtained their proper situation. He did not pretend therefore to speak of space, which, if it be distinguished from matter, is necessarily and intirely homogeneous, and incapable of being the subject of the formation of any element, or any mixed body. This shews, that the water of Thales was not space, though otherwise he must have regarded it as a whole perfectly homogeneous in actu, but heterogeneous in potentia. I make use of a distinction very famous in the schools of the Peripatetics; by which I mean, that, according to Thales, water considered in itself, and before the particular formation of all bodies, ought to be actually water in each of its parts, and yet capable of becoming air, fire, earth; and then a tree, metal, blood, wine, bone, &c. according to the several degrees of rarefaction and condensation through which it goes. They are in the wrong who object that there would be no difference in bodies, if there was but one sole material principle. This objection can be of no force but against those, who should suppose, that this sole principle is immutable: But if they suppose, that it is susceptible of several qualities successively, like the matter prima of Aristotle, there is no body but may arise from it. The objection proposed by Lactantius, either against Thales, or against Heraclitus, who admitted only fire for the principle of all things, is not a good one: Fire, says he (23), cannot be produced from water, nor can water proceed from fire. He is mistaken: Any particular body may proceed from fire, from water, or from earth, provided there be some causes that know how to modify matter according to its alterability, or mutability. But we must observe, by the by, that neither Thales, nor Heraclitus, nor any of the ancient Philosophers, who took only one of the four vulgar elements for the general principle of all bodies, have equalled Aristotle in penetration of mind: They did not consider that not one of the four elements is matter in general, and that they are a kind of determined matter. This is the reason why Aristotle, who was more judicious than all of them, has pitched upon matter, in general, for the first principle of all things.

(20) Pag. 115, of the Amsterd. edition 1701.

(21) Simplicius in Aristotel. Phys. lib. iv, Sc. Petit, Miscell. Observat. pag. 52.

(22) Sext. Empiricus, Pyrrh. Hypotypos. lib. iii, cap. xvi.

The great difficulty in Thales's Hypothesis is, that he has not said how water began to alter, and to put on the particular forms of air, fire, earth, &c. Was it rarified, was it condensed by its own virtue? Did that virtue arise all of a sudden in the beginning of the world, or did it always exist in water? One cannot apprehend how water could come by that virtue, if it had not been always in it; and how it could have been from all eternity without condensation and rarefaction, if that virtue had been always in it. Some are of opinion, that Thales supposed God to be the efficient cause, which produced all particular bodies out of water. They alledge two passages of Cicero (24), and one of Lactantius (25). But as to Lactantius he is no new evidence, but a copier only of Cicero: And as to Cicero, the reasons urged against him (26), are so strong, that his testimony cannot be depended upon. If any should alledge the words of Diogenes Laërtius, before quoted (27), I answer, that Plutarch does not make use of them, when he mentions the same answer made by Thales. If it be replied, that Plutarch and Diogenes Laërtius agree in another point, viz. that Thales giving a reason why God is the most ancient of all things, alledged that God was not made, or had no beginning; I answer, that this is not a positive proof that he ascribed to God the generation of the world. Have there not been Philosophers, who, tho' they acknowledged on the one hand the existence of the gods, (23) Heraclitus ex igne nata esse omnia dixit, Thales Milesius ex aqua. Uterque vidit aliquid: sed erravit tamen uterque: quod alterutrum si solum fuisset, neque aqua nasci ex igne potuisset, neque rursus ignis ex aqua. Lactant. lib. ii, cap. ix, pag. m. 122.

how was ign to alter

(24) You will find them above, citations (82), and (84), of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(25) Lactant. lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 14.

(26) See them in the remarks [D] and [F], of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(27) Citat. (1), yet

bodies transmutal

coveries in Astronomy, and that in particular he was so well pleased with having found out the proportion which the sun's diameter [E] bears to the circle it describes round the earth, that having communicated it to a person, who offered him any reward which he should

yet denied, on the other, that the gods had made the world? If it be further replied, that Thales attributed to the gods a knowledge of the most secret thoughts of men; I answer, I. That it is not certain he said so, since some writers ascribe that saying to Pittacus (28): II. That he might have believed, that the gods concern themselves with our affairs, and know our secret thoughts; but it does not follow from thence, that he ascribed to them the production of the world (29), or that he did not believe, that they themselves proceeded from water, as from their first cause and principle: III. That the true philosophical opinions of Thales, the Naturalist, ought not to be looked for in the conversation of Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece. He might have said a great many things under this last character, which he did not say in his school of Philosophy. He mentioned only water, when he explained the formation of the world, as a Naturalist; he did not add the power of God to that of water. But when he looked upon himself as a Sage, whose sententious discourses should tend to promote virtue, and would be spread among the people, he thought himself obliged to conform to Theological notions: Take notice, that the opinions of the Heathen Philosophers were so incoherent, and so little just, that from their hypothesis concerning the existence of God, it did not follow, that he had a share in the production and government of the world; and that, from their hypothesis concerning his Providence, it did not follow, that he had disentangled the chaos, or formed the universe. They were allowed to say, that the gods governed the world, tho' they had been produced and formed out of the chaos, as well as bodies. When a man believes, that human souls are formed of the most subtle parts of blood, he may say, that Jupiter, Venus, and Mercury, have been produced out of the most subtle parts of the chaos. Now, as the soul governs the body, which it has not made, and whereof it is but a kind of distilled water (30); and as we govern beasts, and even some men, who are not produced by us; so the gods govern the world which they have not made, and which has made them of it's most refined parts.

(28) See, above, the remark [A].

(29) See remark [G], of the article JUPITER.

(30) That is according to the hypothesis of the Heathens.

(31) See the first volume of Observations selectarum ad Rem Litterariam spectantium, printed at Hall, in the year 1700, pag. 445, & seq.

(32) In the remark [A].

(33) Observ. ad Rem Litterariam, Tom. I, pag. 448.

(34) Ibid. pag. 450.

St Augustin, who where, &c.' Anaxagoras, Aristotle, and the Stoics (35), are guilty of the third degree. Anaxagoram & duos ejus socios (Diogenem Apolloniatem & Archelaum) tametsi à Thaletico atheismo, qui Deo plane nihil vult esse cum fabricatione rerum negotii, adeo excuso, ut ejus comparatione religio ipse, qualem & vulgo habent quidam, videri queat, atheorum tamen catalogo minime expungendum statuo. Fuit autem atheismus ejus in eo gradu quem minimum vocavit (36). -- Alibi I so far excuse Anaxagoras and his two companions (Diogenes Apolloniatem, and Archelaum) from the Atheism of Thales, who will not allow GOD to have any concern in forming the world, that in comparison with him he may be esteemed religious, as some have usually filed him, yet I judge him by no means to be struck out of the Atheistical catalogue. However his Atheism was of that degree which I have called the least.

[E] A passage which will inform us, that he made very fine discoveries in Astronomy, and . . . the proportion of the sun's diameter.] Apuleius furnishes me with this passage. 'Thales Milesius, says he (37), ex seipso illis sapientia memoratis viris facile præcipuus: fuit enim geometricæ penes Grajos primus repertor, & astrorum naturæ rerum certissimus explorator, & astrorum peritissimus contemplator, maximas res parvis lineis reperit: temporum ambitus, ventorum flatus, stellarum meatus, tonitruum sonora miracula, siderum obliqua curricula, Solis annua reverticula: idem Lunæ vel nascentis incrementa, vel senescentis dispendia, vel delinquentis obstacula. Idem sane jam proclivi senectute divinam rationem de Sole commentus est: periundo comprobavit: quotiens Sol magnitudine sua circum quem permeat metiatur. Id à se recens inventum Thales memoratur edocuisse Mandratum Prienensem, qui nova & inopinata cognitione impendio delectatus, optare jussit quantam vellet mercedem sibi pro tanto documento rependi. Satis, inquit, mihi fuerit mercedis Thales sapiens, si id quod à me didicisti, cum proferre ad quospiam coeperis, tibi non adsciveris: sed ejus inventi me potius quam alium repertorem prædicaveris. -- Thales, the Milesian, the most eminent of the seven famous Sages; for he was the first inventor of Geometry among the Greeks, the most judicious inquirer into nature, and the most skillful observer of the stars: he made great discoveries by small Geometrical lines; the regulation of times and seasons, the theory of the winds, the course of the stars, the wonderful causes of thunder, the oblique motions of the planets, the annual revolutions of the sun, the reason of the increase, decrease, and eclipse of the moon. He also, in his old age, found out the most surprising proportion with regard to the sun; which he not only invented but confirmed also by experience, the proportion between the sun's magnitude and the circle it describes. Thales, as soon as he had found it out, is said to have communicated it to Mandratum Prienensem, who being exceedingly delighted by so new and unexpected a discovery, desired him to ask what reward he would have for it. The wise Thales replied, It will be a sufficient reward to me, if you do not publish what I have taught you as a discovery of your own, but fairly declare that I am the inventor.'

It seems to me that the true sense of these words, quotiens sol magnitudine sua circum quem permeat metiatur, is this which I have given to them, viz. that Thales found out the measure of the sun's diameter, and of the circle it appears to describe round the earth. We are told, that he computed how many times the whole body of the sun was to change it's situation to describe that circle; but we are not told how many times it was. The modern Astronomers suppose that the sun's diameter is about thirty minutes: from whence it follows, that, by changing it's place seven hundred and twenty times, according to the whole extent of it's globe, it describes the whole circumference of it's circle. Some infer from thence, that it's diurnal swiftness would not be very considerable, if it were true that it moves in the manner supposed in Tycho Brahe's system; that is, like an arrow

should ask for it; he only desired, that he would be so ingenuous as to declare, that the glory of that invention was his due (c). (c) See the remark [D].

arrow in the air, and not as the nails of a wheel. Can- not oxen, with a slow pace, go, in a few hours, through a space seven or eight times greater than they are. Observe, in the example of Thales, how very much pleased the inventors of things are with the glory of a first discovery. That wife man of Greece was now grown old, and in high reputation.

He was insensible as to lucre, pecuniary rewards, or any other advantage; but not as to the injustice of those, who should rob him of his discovery, or de- prive him of the glory of it, by a disobliging silence. See what Tacitus says, speaking of Helvidius Priscus, that the last thing even the wife man can part with, is the desire of glory (38).

(38) Opum con- temptor, recti parvix, confians aduersus metus. Erant quibus spe- tentior famae videretur, quan- do etiam sapien- tibus cupido glori- e novissima exultur. Tacit. Hist. lib. iv, cap. 5, 6.

THAMYRAS, who invented the science of the Haruspices in the island of Cyprus. See TAMIRAS.

THAMYRIS, a Poet, and one of the most excellent Musicians of his time, was born at Odrya in Thrace, whither his mother (a) retired to hide her shame. This was occasioned by her having the imprudence to lye with a man (b), who would not marry her. Without doubt she often desired it of him, as she found her big belly increase, which quickly followed their amorous commerce; but he gave no ear to it, and obliged her by this means to leave her country, which was Mount Parnassus [A]. The son, of whom she was delivered at Odrya, was called Thamyris, and was endowed with a great many perfections, which might have raised him to the highest pitch of glory, had not the vanity which was intermixed with them run him into a thousand extrava- gancies. He trod in his father's steps, for he learned Music so perfectly, that the Scythians made him their king, though he was a foreigner (c). He had the finest voice of any man in his time, if we believe Plutarch, who adds, that he composed a Poem concerning the war of the Titans with the gods (d). Some other Poems are ascribed to him; five thousand verses on the creation of the world, and a system of Theology con- sisting of three thousand verses (e), which was still extant when Suidas was writing his Dictionary. There is no great probability that those two Poems were entirely different. He was more antient than Homer by eight degrees according to some, or five according to others (f), and he was the third, who gained the prize of singing at the Pythic games (g). He is said to have been the first inventor of the sin against nature [B]. The challenge which he had the assurance to give to the Muses was full of scandalous insolence: proud of his beauty, and of his skill in musical instruments, he challenged them to a trial of skill, upon this condition, that if he got the victory, he should deprive them all nine of their virginity; and that if he was overcome, he would submit himself to their discretion. The Muses, in all probability very well assured of success, accepted the condition, and after their victory deprived him of his sight, and of his skill in Music. Homer, who has mentioned this challenge of Thamyris [C], and the punishment inflicted upon him on that account, says nothing of his pretension in case he had been conqueror; a pretension like that of male partridges, when they fight in the presence of their females (h); but Apollodorus, and the Scholiast upon Homer, are as express in this particular as possible (i). Natalis Comes would have done well to cite them [D]. It is surprising that Lucian did not show his bantering wit upon this head, and that he should content himself with representing Thamyris as an ungrateful

(a) Her name was Odyra, ac- cording to Sui- das; and Argiope, according to Pau- sanias and Apol- lodorus.

(b) His name was Philammon, and he was a good Musician; See Pausanias, lib. iv, p. 143, & lib. x, pag. 322, Plot. de Musica, pag. 1132.

(c) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186, pag. 428.

(d) Plutarch. de Musica, pag. 1132. Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. vi, cap. xiv, says that Plu- tarch values that poem more than all the others; but it is certain he neither praises nor dispraises it.

(e) Tzetzes, Chil. VII. Hæd. CVIII.

(f) Suidas.

(g) Pausan. lib. x, pag. 322.

(h) Tunc inter se dimicant ma- res desiderio fe- minarum, victum ajunt Venerem pati. Pliny, lib. x, cap. xxxiii.

(i) See the re- mark [D].

(1) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186, pag. 428.

(2) Apollodor. lib. i, pag. m. 11. See also Suidas, and the Scholiast upon Homer, in Iliad. lib. i, ver. 102.

(3) Apollod. lib. i, pag. m. 2.

[A] Which was mount Parnassus. Others (1) say she retired from Peloponnesus, and that Philammon, a handsome young man, who was too much beloved by her, and had received too great a share of her favours, was born at Thoricum in Attica.

[B] The first inventor of the sin against nature. That I may not advance this without proof, I shall cite these four Greek words, Πρωτος ἀρσεναίων ἐρῶν ὁρίσιν. Macula Venere primus usus discitur (2) - - - He first, introduced the love of males. The boy he fell in love with, was the same Hyacinthus, who was afterwards loved by Apollo, and killed by him accidentally with a quoit. He was the son of the Muse Clio, and of Pierus the son of Magnes (3). This is what we find in Apollodorus; but Suidas calls the boy Hymneus, and makes him the son of Calliope and Magnes. I have not read in any author what Lloyd and Hofman have copied from Charles Stephens, namely, that Thamyris, the most beautiful of all men, fell in love with boys at first, and afterwards changed his course, and loved the Muses. This is perverting and overturning every thing that is to be met with among the An- tients.

[C] Homer, who has mentioned this challenge. It is in the second book of the Iliad, in the catalogue of the Grecian fleet, on occasion of the town Dorion, near which he says, Thamyris was met by the Muses. It is evident, by what is said both before and after, that this town was not in Thrace, as Lloyd will have it, but in Peloponnesus. Lucian, who places it in The- VOL. V.

faly (4), was no better acquainted with it's situation. Beroaldus, who would prove from Lucan, that it was in Boetia, has committed two faults for one (5). Diodorus Siculus, in the third book, and Dion Chry- sostom, in his third oration de Fuga, have men- tioned that challenge of Thamyris, and how he was punished for it. Barthius has found in that oration, that Thamyris lost his sight, and his skill in Music, on account of his wealth (6). But this is not the author's meaning.

[D] Natalis Comes would have done well to cite them. He has given a just account (7) of that adven- ture; but he quotes only Asclepiades of Myrlea (8), which is a wrong way of quoting, and a remainder of the vain affectation of some learned men of Italy, upon the revival of learning. Some quoted a Greek author only in general; others called him by his name, but they took care not to say, that what they cited out of him, was only to be found quoted in some known authors. The scholastic Divines and Philoso- phers are not so unfair in their quotations - they do not scruple to refer the reader for a passage of an author, whose works are in every body's hands, to a modern writer who quotes it. Thus Father Terillus, in his book upon the Prima Regula Morum, does seldom quote the Fathers, or Thomas Aquinas, but upon the credit of Sanches, Vasques, and other Jesuits, as is observed by the author of the fourth Denunciation of the Philo- sophical Sin. I here give myself an example of such quotations. However it be, Natalis Comes should have told

(4) Quæ tetigit Phylax Pteleos- que & Dorion ira Fibile Pie- ridum. Lucan. Pharf. lib. vi, ver. 352.

(5) Beroald. in Propert. Eleg. XXII, lib. ii.

(6) Barth. Comm. in Sta- tium, Tom. ii, pag. 962.

(7) Nat. Comes, Mythol. lib. vi, cap. xiv.

(8) He is a fa- mous author. Myrlea, a town of Bithynia, was since called Apamea.

(k) Prodicus Phocæensis, apud Pausaniam, lib. iv, pag. 143.

(1) Pausan. ib.

(m) Ibid.

person [E], who turned against the Muses the talent he had received from them. Some authors have said, that the punishment of his presumption was put off till he should arrive in the infernal regions (k). Pausanias says, he believes that Thamyris should arrive in the infernal regions (k). Pausanias says, he believes that Thamyris lost his sight, not as Homer says, for having contended with the Muses, but through sickness (l). It is observed (m); that this Poet left off making verses after he lost his sight, and that he threw his lyre into a river [F]: hence it is, that when he was painted blind, he was represented with a broken lyre (n). Note he invented the Music called Doric [G]. Plato has feigned, according to the principles of the Metempsychosis, that the soul of Thamyris transmigrated into the body of a nightingale (o).

(*) Prodicus Pine-
cænsis, apud
Paufaniam, lib.
ix, pag. 304,
& lib. x, pag.
347.

(o) Plato, de Republ. lib. x,
pag. 765.

told us, that there are some authors extant, who may be consulted as to the conditions of the challenge. Συμβουλευοί, says Apollodorus, ἂν μὲν κρείττω ἐυρεθῇ, ἀλλοσιδαίον ἄσασσι. --- Making his bargain, if he be found come off conqueror, to lie with them all. The Scholiast upon Homer has the same expression upon the passage of the second book of the Iliads: Συμβέλει, ἂν μὲν κρείττω ἐυρεθῇ ἀλλοσιδαίον ἄσασσι.

[E] It is surprising that Lucian did not show his bantering wit upon this head, and that he should content himself with representing Thamyris as an ungrateful person.]

Ἐκτός ἐστι μὴ κατὰ τὸν Θάμειρον, ἢ τὸν Εὐρύτοιν, ἔτι τὴν φωνήν, ἢ τοὺς Μούσαις ἀντιδρῶν, πρὸς αὐτὴν ἀπαρτὴν τῆς φωνῆς, ἢ τῷ Ἀπόλλωνι ἐπαίδων, ἢ ἐπὶ τῶν τοῦτων, καὶ ταῦτα, δοτιὲς ὅντι τῇ ἐπιφύτῳ τοῦτων, καὶ ταῦτα, cujus Thamyris, vel Eurytus, ut musis occinat, at quibus canendi normam accepit, vel Apollinem, idque jactulationis præceptorum, jactulando provocet (9). . . . Unless of the same disposition with Thamyris, or Eurytus is the former of whom I presumed to sing with the Muses, who had taught him that art; the latter challenged Apollo to foot, notwithstanding he had been his master. Perhaps this merry writer forgot that circumstance, or never observed it in his reading. It is well he did not; for this, in all probability, is the true reason why he did not jest upon it in any of his books, by fallly and maliciously supposing, that the Muses did not sing well that day, either from a pretended cold, or one really caught in a very lucky season, or from some other artifice, like those made use of by courtiers and ambitious men.

(9) Lucian. in Reviviscentibus,
pag. 389, Tom. i.

when they play (10), and that therefore Thamyras, &c. But we must not forget, that, according to some authors (11), the prize annexed to the victory was not a transient favour, but an actual marriage to be contracted between him and the nine Muses : this was consequently a lasting business.

Connubio jungam stabili propriamque dicabo (12).

In Hymen's lasting bands I'll make her thine.

[F] It is observed . . . that he threw his lyre into a river. Cafeneuve, in his French Commentary upon some epistles of Philostratus, says, that Thamyris, after his punishment, threw his lyre against mount Parnassus, and that from the stroke of it there issued a brook, which was from thence called Balyra. This is a strange alteration of Pausanias's words, which inform us (13), that at the distance of thirty stadia from the gate of Messena in Peloponnesus, there was a river called Balyra, because Thamyris had thrown his lyre into it.

[G] He invented the Music called Doric.] He was too great a master in that art, to content himself with leaving it in the state he found it, and not to be ambitious to make some new improvements in it. 'Ly-
' dios modulus Amphion (invenit) Dorios Thamyras
' Thrax: Phrygius Marfyas Phrix (14). --- Amphion
' invented the Lydian mood in Music, Thamyras the Thra' cian the Doric mood, and Marfyas the Phrygian
' the Phrygian mood.'

(14) Pliny, lib.
viii, cap. lxi,
pag. m. 102.
See also Clemens
Alexandrinus,
lib. i, Strom.
pag. 307.

(11) Canon,
Y apud Photium.
S, num. 186, pag.
r. 428.

(12) Virgil. Æn.
lib. i, ver. 73.

ne (13) Pausan.
er lib. iv, pag.
re 143.

(14) Pliny, lib.
vii, cap. lvi,
pag. m. 102.
See also Clement
Alexandrinus,
lib. i, Strom.
pag. 307.

(a) Intituled, Προγυμνάσματα, Progymnas-mata.

THEON, a Greek Sophist, of whom we have still remaining a Rhetorical work (a), written with great politeness and judgment. His rules are clear and short, and he makes a good choice of common places for the furnishing of arguments. There is no subject wherein he has been more successful, than that concerning the Divine Providence [A]. He passes a right judgment upon the beauties as well as the faults of the most illustrious Orators and Historians. I shall prove, by an example, his great nicety in the placing

[A] There is no subject wherein he has been more successful than that concerning the Divine Providence. Read the twelfth chapter of his book, where you will find a very plentiful collection of the finest arguments that a Pagan could conceive; and which will convince you Theon was a man of great parts. You will there find, among other things, that mens being persuaded that the gods continually see every thing they do, makes them live in great safety, and practise their duty; and that those who think themselves under the care of the gods, spend their lives with the greatest pleasure imaginable. Let us hear his own words: ἔφη ὅτι ἀποφάσεις ἀπὸν τοῖς, καὶ περὶ τῶν ὅλων τὸν βίον διδόντες, τοιούτους ἔχειν ἐπισκόπους διὰ πᾶσιν τοῖς κατὰ τὸν βίον πράξεσιν. καὶ ὅτι μάλιστα ἡδυνάεω ζῶσιν, οἱ ἡνυμμένοι ἐπιμελητάς ἔχουσιν τὰς θεῶν. Quemadmodum et omnium tutissime ac diligentissime eos vivere confect, qui omnium suarum in vita actionum inspectores se habere existimant Deos. Sed et jucundissime aetatem agere, qui à Diis respici se credunt (1). It is certain, that if men know how to live according to their principles, the doctrine of God's presence would be the most effectual means to divert them from all evil, and to make them pursue good. The most profligate have the power to hold their hands and refrain their tongues, when they think they are seen or heard by some persons whom they fear or respect. With how much more reason should the persuasion, that God sees every thing, keep men constant to their duty (2)? It is upon this account, that the authors of pious books do so much inculcate the necessity of me-

(1) Theo, in Progymn. cap.
xii, pag. m.
135.

(2) Confer quæ supra in the remark [A], of the article THALES.

dictating upon God's preference. From hence comes also the custom of fixing up this sentence even at the corners of the streets, GOD SEES THEE, SINNER. It is also certain, that those who believe themselves under the protection of God, must enjoy an inexhaustible fund of comfort and pleasure. Some of the profane Poets were not ignorant of it; but they have given a just cause of scandal by making use of this maxim to obtain a mistress (3).

stress (3).
I shall here take notice of one thing, that is to be met with in a book, intituled, Pratiques de Piété pour le bonnetier le S. Sacrament. The author of it relates (4) 'this saying of Marthal de Gassion. 'If I believed the Real Presence, I would spend my whole life in a church-with my face prostrate to the ground; and I cannot persuade myself, that many Catholics believe what they say concerning that mystery, when I consider how little respect they express at church.' If that Marthal had believed the Real Presence, he would have done as others do: He would have been accustomed to that doctrine, and by habit he would have become insensible to it; that was already his case, as to the doctrine of God's presence throughout the whole universe. A visible presence of CHRIST's humanity would, without doubt, be more efficacious than God's presence; but a presence of CHRIST's human nature, will soon come to the same thing. Those who believe it are no more sensibly affected with it, than the Protestants are with the doctrine of God's presence.

(3) See the XVIIth Ode of the first book of Horace, and mind
these words,
Di me tuentur
Et Mæsa cordes
All seeing gods
my cause defend,
My pray'rs accept, my wife
besriend.

(4) See the Bibliothèque Universelle, Tom. i, 212.

[B] I shall

placing of words [B]. Here is another proof of his good taste. He would not have maxims or sentences to appear in relieve, or like embroidery, in narrations, but to be incorporated with them in an imperceptible manner [C]. His book was printed at Basil, with the Latin translation of Joachim Camerarius in the year 1541: but the best edition is that of Leyden 1626, in 8vo. Daniel Heinsius, who published it, carefully revised the Latin translation, and corrected it in a great many places.

[B] I shall prove by an example his great nicety in the placing of words. When he recommends perspicuity of expression (5), he points out several causes of obscurity which ought to be avoided. He says, among other things, that we should never leave our readers or hearers in an uncertainty where to refer a certain part of a period; and therefore he blames this expression: Δῖμον ἐρεχθίδος μεγαλήτορος, ὃν ποτ' ἀθήνη ἔρρεψε δι' ὅς θυγάτηρ, τέκε δὲ ζείδωρος ἀρετα. Populum præstantis Erechthei, Pallas quem Jove nata aluit, terra edidit alma (6). -- The people of the great Erechtheus, whom Pallas, Jove's daughter, bred, and earth produced. One cannot tell, says he, whether it be the people, or Erechtheus, whom Pallas bred, and the earth produced. He adds, that Heraclitus's books were grown very obscure, by such an order of words, so very frequently to be met with, whether it was owing to the author's carelessness or design. Παρε ταυτην δὲ τὴν ἀμφισβόλιαν, τὰ Ἑρακλείτη τὰ φιλοσοφία βιβλία σκοτίζον ὡς γόνο, κατακρύπτει αὐτῇ χρισμάνει, ἥτοι ἐξέπιδες, ἢ καὶ δὲ ἀγνοίαν. Ex hujusmodi ambiguis locutionibus Heracliti philosophi libri obscuritatem contraxere: qui ad fastidium illis, Jove gnarus fore ignarus, usus est (7). Since Theon appears to have been so very nice with regard to ambiguous expressions, I am at a loss to know where he met with any authors, who had writ in the manner he desired; for the greatest masters of the Greek and Latin tongue are full of such ambiguities. It is true, they are not so perplexing in a piece of History or Oratory as they are in a treatise of Physics; and that therefore the Philosopher, censured by Theon, was particularly obliged to avoid them. I have said, in another place (8), that the French language is not so subject to this defect as the Greek and Latin: but it must be confessed, that even some excellent writers too much neglect, in that respect, the strict rules of our Grammar. A new Theon would point out to them a great many faulty periods not to be justified.

[C] But to be incorporated with them in an imperceptible manner. This is, without doubt, the true sense of these words: Ὅταν μὲν τοι συνεχῶς ἐγκλαμινγνύη τις, καὶ λαμβάνη ταῦτα ὑποκρινά, ἐπιχαρὶς πῶς ἢ διήγησης γίνεταί. Quæ sententiola quidem quamvis sæpe inferantur, modo ne emineant, mirifice amœnam ac venustam efficiunt orationem (9). -- When these maxims are frequently intermixed, and yet at the same time concealed, the narration becomes surprisingly beautiful. Petronius was of the same taste. Read the following words of the preface to a book of Mr Corbinelli. Those, who have read Livy, will be surprized to find so many maxims in an Historian, who has but very few, or none, but of such a sort as those mentioned by an ancient author

which are incorporated with the body of the discourse, without having the turn or appearance of maxims. This is giving a fine encomium on that Historian. Moral and political sentences and reflexions, not interwoven with the thread of the discourse, do not deserve much commendation. It is no difficult thing to scatter them in that manner; but the inserting them, in the very body of the narration, requires a great deal of art. They ought to appear there like a flat painting, and not like a book embossed in relieve.

* Curandum est, ne sententiæ eminentes extra corpus orationis expresse, sed in textu verborum colore nitant. Petr. Satyr.

(8) Remark [C] of the first article ACHILLES.

(9) Theo, cap. iv, pag. 46, & 47.

(8) Remark [C] of the first article ACHILLES.

(9) Theo, cap. iv, pag. 63, & 64.

* Curandum est, ne sententiæ eminentes extra corpus orationis expresse, sed in textu verborum colore nitant. Petr. Satyr.

(a) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 444.

(b) Ἐπιφανέστατος πάντων ἱστορῶν Chirifimus omnium historiæ dicitur.

(c) Dionys. Halicarn. Epist. ad Pompeium, fol. 52. pag. m. 262.

(d) Photius, B. bl. Cod. 176, pag. 392.

(e) Id. ibid. See the end of the last remark.

(f) Aulus Gellius, lib. x, cap. xviii.

(g) Quintil. lib. m. 469.

(h) Ex clarissima Rhetoris officina duo præstantes ingenio Theopompus & Ephorus ab Iocrate magistro impulsu se ad historiam contulerunt: causas omnino nullas attulerunt. Cicero, de Orat. lib. ii, fol. 73, D.

(i) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. 514.

THEOPOMPU S, an Orator and an Historian, born in the isle of Chios (a), flourished in the time of Philip, King of Macedonia, father of Alexander the Great (b). He was the most famous of all the disciples of Isocrates (c), and carried the prize from all the Panegyristes sent for by Artemisia to praise Mausolus (c). There was no considerable town in Greece where he had not harangued with universal applause (d). This was one of the reasons he advanced, to justify the good opinion he had of his own merit; when having very much preferred the modern Orators to those of the preceding age, he instanced himself for one of the best of his time (e). After he had signalized himself as an Orator, he set himself about writing Histories [B], and made it appear, that the study

[A] He flourished in the time of Philip father of Alexander the Great. The anonymous writer, who has described the Olympiads, says, he flourished in the XCIIIId. It is a mistake, which has been followed by Suidas, and adopted by Meursius (1) and Vossius (2). Jonsius confutes it effectually (3). He quotes Diodorus Siculus, who has observed that the XLIIId, XLIIIId, and XLIIId books of Theopompus's History, contained what passed in Sicily from the third year of the XCIIIId Olympiad, to the second year of the CIXth

(4). Is it likely, that an author, who flourished in the XCIIIId Olympiad, should have been alive in the CXth Olympiad (5)? Here is a more solid proof. Theopompus published a letter, and some advices he had wrote to Alexander, who did not begin to reign till the CXth Olympiad. I pass by several other proofs alledged by Jonsius: they might be eluded, and after all they are of no more weight than those I have just now mentioned. We shall therefore take no farther notice of them, but observe that he might have found in Photius a much stronger argument than all he alledges; for, as I have said in the text of this article, we read in Photius, 1. That Theopompus was but forty-five years old when Alexander caused him to re-established at Chios. 2. That Ptolomy, King of Egypt had thoughts of putting him to death. This shews that he was so far from flourishing in the XCIIIId Olympiad, that he was not born till towards the hundredth at the soonest.

[B] After he had signalized himself, as an Orator, he set himself about writing Histories. Quintilian makes this observation: 'Theopompus ut in historia prædictis (Herodoto & Thucydide) minor, ita Oratori magis similis, ut qui antequam esset ad hoc opus sollicitatus, diu fuerit Orator (6). -- Theopompus as in History inferior to the former (Herodotus & Thucydides), so was he much more of the Orator, having distinguished himself in that character long before his being persuaded to write History.' Cicero does not contradict Quintilian, when he says, that Theopompus never pleaded any causes; for there were a great many Orators in Greece who never pleaded at all. In short, it was Isocrates, who advised Theopompus to apply himself to History (7). The passage I have quoted out of Cicero, might make one believe, that Theopompus and Ephorus were of much the same genius, since their master advised them to apply themselves to the same study; but do not let this deceive you. They had not the least resemblance; one wanted a curb, and the other a spur. Theopompus was too warm. Ephorus was not warm enough. This was the reason that Isocrates used different methods with them. 'Hoc doctoris intelligentis est, videre quod ferat natura sua quemque; & ea duce utentem sic instituire, ut Isocratem in acerrimo ingenio Theopompi, & lenissimo Ephori dixisse traditum est, alteri se calcaria adhibere, alteri frenos (8). -- This is the part of an able master to discover every particular genius of his scholars, and to teach them accordingly, as Isocrates is reported to have said with regard to the bold turn of Theopompus, and the mild one of Ephorus, that he would make use of the spur to the one, and the bridle to the other.' Cicero expresses this in another place better still for my purpose; for he declares, that these two

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. x, cap. xviii.

(d) Photius, B. bl. Cod. 176, pag. 392.

(e) Id. ibid. See the end of the last remark.

(6) Quintil. lib. m. 469.

(7) Ex clarissima Rhetoris officina duo præstantes ingenio Theopompus & Ephorus ab Iocrate magistro impulsu se ad historiam contulerunt: causas omnino nullas attulerunt. Cicero, de Orat. lib. ii, fol. 73, D.

(8) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. 514.

of Eloquence is a good preparative for it [C]; for he acquired the reputation of an able Historian. He was besides, very well qualified for this undertaking; for he boldly published scholars were never alike. 'Dicebat Iſocrates

'ſe calcaribus in Ephoro, contrā autem in Theopompo
'ſrenis uti ſolere: alterum enim exultantem verborum
'audacia reprimebat, alterum cunctantem, & quaſi
'verecundantem incitabat. Neque eos ſimiles effecit
'inter ſe, ſed tantum alteri affinxit, de altero limavit,
'ut id confirmaret in utroque, quod utriusque natura
'pateretur (9). Iſocrates ſaid that he uſed
'to treat Ephorus with a ſpur, and Theopompus, on the 'contrary, with a bridle: the great forwardneſs and af-
'ſurance of the former wanting to be reſſeſſed, and the 'great backwardneſs and modeſty of the latter to be en'courageſed. Nor did he make them in the leaſt alike, but 'only added to the one, and pruned off from the other,
'what they might confirm in each of them, what their re-
'ſpective genius would bear.' Quintilian relates the ſame fact (10). Others make a like obſervation concerning Plato, with reſpect to Ariſtotle and Xenocrates, and concerning Ariſtotle, with reſpect to Theopom-pus and Calliſthenes (11).

[C] The ſtudy of Eloquence is a good preparative to ſerious Hiſtory.] This was Cicero's opinion; for he is thus addreſſed by Pomponius Atticus: 'Potes tu proſecto
'ſatiſfacere in hiſtoria quippe cum ſit opus, ut tibi
'quidem videri ſolet, unum hoc oratorium maxime
'(12). You may be ſure of ſucceeding in Hiſtory,
'ſince it is a work, wherein you uſe to ſay Oration is the 'chief ingredient.' Nevertheless, it ſeems, that a man, who has been uſed to compoſe orations, is not very well qualified to obſerve, in his expreſſions, that grave ſimplicity, which becomes the character of an Hiſto-rian. It is to be feared, that his ſtile will be too lofty, and too full of metaphors. But this is a much ſtronger objection againſt thoſe, who ſay, that none can be a good Hiſtorian, without being a good Poet (13). This has been advanced by ſome very great men. However it be, Theopompus's ſtile was thought to favour more of an Orator, than of an Hiſtorian, and to be an imitation of that of Iſocrates. Vetrum hoc commune iudicium eſt dictionem ejus oratoriam ac imprimis ſocraticam ſimiliorem eſſe, quam hiſtoriam (14). Thoſe, who juſtify him by ſaying in general, that he came nearer the ſtrength of Demotheſenes, do not wholly remove the difficulty, for that very thing ſhews, that an oratorial eloquence prevailed in his hiſtorical writings. The beſt thing therefore that can be ſaid for him is what we find in Dionyſius Halicarſaſſeus. I ſhall give it in Latin: It will inform us, that Theopompus added to the character of Iſocrates the ſtrength which his ſubject required, and that his cenſures were as ſharp as thoſe of Demotheſenes. 'Ea forma quæ in 'elocutione cernitur, maxime ad ſimilitudinem Iſo-
'crateæ accedit. Pura enim dictio, vulgaris, ſimplex,
'perſpicua, ſublimis, magnifica, & ſummam pompam
'præ ſe fert, & quadam harmonia temperata eſt, ju-
'cunde & ſuaviter fluens. Differt autem ab elocutione
'Iſocratis in austeritate & vehementia in aliquibus;
'nimirum cum ſe in affectus concitandos dederit, &
'vel maxime cum urbibus & ducibus improba conſilia
'& res geſtas exprobat atque vitio dat. Multus
'enim eſt in iis, & à Demotheſenis acrimonia ne pau-
'lulum quidem abeſt (15). The form of his ſtile
'is moſt like that of Iſocrates, for his expreſſion is pure,
'familiar, plain, clear, ſublime, magnificent, pompous,
'tempered with certain harmony, very pleaſant and
'agreeably flowing. But it differs from that of Iſocrates, 'ſometimes by it's ſharpeſs and ſeverity; that is, when
'he deſigns to ſtir the paſſions, and eſpecially when he
'expoſes and laſhes the evil counſels and miſconduct
'of cities and generals. For he enlarges much upon
'theſe, and is not in the leaſt ſhort of Demotheſenes's
'ſeverity.' Cicero obſerves, that Theopompus eclipsed the glory of Philoſtus, and Thucydides, by the loſtineſs of his ſtile. 'Ut horum concii-
'ſis ſententiis, interdum etiam non ſatis apertis cum
'brevitae, tum nimio acumine, officiit Theopompus
'elatione atque altitudine orationis ſuæ, quod idem
'Lyſiæ Demotheſenes: ſic Catoſis luminibus obſtruxit
'hæc poſteriorum quaſi exaggerata altius oratio (16). . . .
'That their concife, and ſometimes not over-clear periods,
'were out-done by Theopompus not only in brevity and
'perſpicuity, but alſo in loſtineſs and magnificence;
'as Lyſias's was by Demotheſenes. So Cato's glory is 'eclipsed by the more improved ſtile of the Moderns.'

But there is one thing, in which he ſhewed himſelf too much an Orator: he carefully avoided the meeting of vowels, and was extremely fond of the turn and cadence of his periods, and of the correſpondence of grammatical figures. This is a fault, for which he is reproached by Dionyſius Halicarſaſſeus (17); and there is without doubt ſomething very mean in ſuch an affectation, when the grandeur and majeſty of the ſubject ought to engage the whole attention of the writer. We may ſay however, as to what concerns the meeting of vowels, that he did very right in avoiding it, and that he was only to blame for diſcovering that he avoided it too ſcrupuloſly. I obſerve, that when Cicero ſays, Theopompus was blamed upon that account, he does not ſay he was blamed juſtly: nay, he ſeems to ſay, that he was blamed unjuſtly. 'Ut

'in legendo, ſays he (18), ſic animus in dicendo pro-
'ſpiciet quid ſequatur, ne extremorum verborum cum
'inſequentibus primis concurſus, aut hiulcas voces
'efficiat, aut aſperas. Quamvis enim ſuaves, graveſque
'ſententiæ, tamen ſi inconditis verbis efferuntur, of-
'fendent aures, quarum eſt iudicium ſuperbiſſimum.
'Quod quidem latina lingua ſic obſervat, nemo ut
'tam ruſticus ſit, qui vocaleis nolit conjungere. In 'quo quidam etiam Theopompum reprehendunt, quod
'eas literas tantopere fugerit, & ſi id magiſter ejus
'Iſocrates, at non Thucydides. . . . In ea eſt crebra
'iſta vocum concurſio, quam magna ex parte, ut vi-
'tioſam, fugit Demotheſenes. . . . As in reading, ſo
'in ſpeaking the mind ought to regard what is to follow,
'that the meeting of each ſubſequent word with the fore-
'going may produce neither too open nor too rough a ſound.
'For altho' the ſentences are agreeable and grave, yet if 'they are expreſſed in improper words, they will offend
'the ear, whoſe judgment is very arbitrary. Which 'the Latin tongue obſerves in ſuch manner, that the 'greateſt clown of all takes care to join his vowels right.
'Some alſo find fault with Theopompus on this head, for 'avoiding ſo ſcrupuloſly theſe openings, which if his 'maſter Iſocrates minded, Thucydides did not. . . . With 'him the meeting of vowels is very frequent, which De-
'moſthenes in great meaſure has avoided as faulty.'

Duris Samius ſpoke of Theopompus's ſtile with great contempt; but, as Photius (19) obſerves, he was far from equalling him. Conſult Longinus in two places of his treatiſe on the Sublime. He commends and juſtifies him in the one, and cenſures him in the other.

'This may be further ſeen, ſays he (20), in a paſſage
'of Theopompus, which Cæcilius blames I know
'not why, and which I think on the contrary ought 'rather to be praized for its juſtneſs, and for being 'very expreſſive. Philoſtus, ſays that Hiſtorian, readily
'ſwallows all affronts, which the neceſſity of his affairs
'obliges him to ſuffer.' It is in the Greek δενδρὸν ἂν ἀναγκασθῶν ἀναγοράγῃς ἀπαγγεῖλαι. Tanaquillus Faber renders theſe words: Philippus rerum neceſſitatem devorare callidus. The other paſſage of Longinus begins thus (21): 'In like manner, the Hiſtorian
'Theopompus has given a deſcription of the King of 'Perſia's deſcent into Egypt, which is otherwiſe ſub-
'lime; but he has ſpoiled all by the mean expreſſions
'he has intermixed with it. Is there any city, and 'nation in Aſia, ſays that Hiſtorian, but what has ſent
'ambassadors to the King? &c.' Longinus, having repeated the remaining part of the deſcription, adds:
'From the higheſt elevation he falls into the loweſt
'meanneſs, in the very place where he ſhould have 'been moſt lofty. For the buſhels, raggo's, and ſacks,
'which he improperly mentions in the pompous de-
'ſcription of thoſe preparations, would make one
'think that he is deſcribing a kitchen.' The Jeſuit Cauſinus who was a good judge of Rhetoric, does not approve that cenſure. Theſe are his words: 'Dionyſ.
'Longinus, mordax Criticus, eum irridet, quod ubi
'dona Regi Perſarum ab Aſiaticis oblata commemorat,
'poſt ſtragulam veſtem, purpuram, tabernacula aurea,
'periſtromata, emblemata, carnes etiam victimarum
'falſas, regi oblata ad alendum exercitum, comme-
'moret. Debat, inquit, iſta minuta, aut omittere,
'aut initio collocare, ut à minoribus ad majora aſcen-
'deret: ſed in eo frigidus eſt, & fruſtra mordax Lon-
'ginus. Erat enim ideliſ hiſtorici, & prudentis, poſt
'opulenta principum dona, tenuiorum quoque in co-
'lendo rege ſtudia commemorare, & rem, ut geſta eſt

(9) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. iii,
ſol. 90, C.

(10) Quintil. lib.
ii, cap. viii, pag.
81.

(11) Diog. Laër-tius, in Xenocrate & Theophraſto.

(12) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. i,
circa init. ſol. m.
328, C. See alſo
Cicero, in I de Oratore.

(13) See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Comètes,
num. 5.

(14) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græciſ,
pag. 34.

(15) Dionyſ.
Halicarſaſſeus, Epit.
ad Pompeium,
in fine, pag. m.
264.

(16) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m.
114.

(17) Quod ſi in iis in quibus ſummum ſtudium poſuit, colliſionem vocum & numeroſas cir-cuſcriptiones ac
figuras ſimiles neglexiſſet, longe melior in elocutione ſe ipſo evaleſciſſet.

Dionyſ. Halicarſaſſeus, Epit. ad Pom-peium in fine,
pag. m. 264.

(18) Cicero, in Oratore, ſol.
124, B.

(19) Photius,
Bibl. num. 176,
pag. 393.

(20) Longinus,
chap. xxviii,
juxta Editionem
Tanaquil. Fabri.

(21) Id. ibid.
cap. xxxix,
juxta Editionem
Tanaquil. Fabri.

published disadvantageous truths, and was not sparing of his money when an exact enquiry into matters of fact required great expences [D]. He is blamed for his digressions [E], and it is very likely, the censure passed upon him on that account is very reasonable, though perhaps it is not in all respects so exact and equitable as it should be, nor has the plan he laid down been considered with due attention. If we had his preface, perhaps we should find something in it, which might justify him in some measure; but I do not think that any thing can fully excuse him, not even to such readers as have the greatest indulgence for Historical Episodes. With much more reason would he be condemned by those Critics, who cannot bear any thing in History that is foreign to the

* est, describere. Quod si tantopere petafonem aver-
* satur, quin Homerum, suum numen, reprehendit,
* qui tam simpliciter rem coquinariam à principibus
* obitam describit: & quid hoc est, nisi μαγείρεν.
* quod infestatur in Theopompo, φαντασία est (22) ?
* --- Longinus, a severe Critic, ridicules him, because
* in speaking of the presents made to the King of Persia
* by the Asiatic nations, after the carpets, the purple
* robes, the gilt tents, the tapestry, and inlaid work, he * mentions even the salted meats of the sacrifices which * had been presented to the King for the maintenance of * his army. These low matters, says he, ought either to * have been omitted, or to have been mentioned first,
* that there might be a natural rising from small to * great: but in this Longinus appears dull, and severe * without reason. For it was the duty of a faithful and * prudent Historian, after the magnificent presents of * Princes to take notice also of the respect paid to the King
* by the meaner sort, and to describe every thing in the * order it happened. But if he has such an extreme
* aversion to the kitchen, he must in course find fault
* with his divine Homer, who has described with so * much simplicity the cookery of Princes; and what is
* this but the describing a kitchen which he has objected * to Theopompus. This seems to me to be the most * plausible thing that can be said in Theopompus's vin-* dication; but if I was to chuse, I should rather side * with Longinus than with Father Caussin. For the * faithfulness of an Historian does not oblige him to * give a particular account of all the presents that have * been made to a King. But what is alleged against
* Longinus in the last part of Father Caussin's objection
* seems to me a home-thrust. You cannot, says he,
* find fault with Theopompus, without blaming Homer
* your great deity. It is certain, that Homer has fre* quently touched more particularly on the kitchen
* than Theopompus.

[D] He boldly published disadvantageous truths, and * was not sparing of his money when an exact inquiry . . .
* required great expences.] See, below, the remark [H].
I shall content myself here with those words of Athe-
* neus: Εἰ τις τούτοις ἀπιστεῖ, μαθήτω καὶ παρὰ
* Θεοπόμπου τὴν Χίον, ἀνδρὸς φιλαλήδους καὶ πολλὰ
* χρήματα καὶ ἀναλώσαντος εἰς τὴν περὶ τῆς ἱστορίας
* ἐξέτασιν ἀκρίβειαν. His fides si quis non adhibeat,
* dicat Theopompum Chium veritatis studiosum homi-
* nem, & qui historias exactè inquisitione, magno pe-
* cuniarum impendio, percrutatus est (23). --- If any * person doubts the truth of these things, let him learn them
* also from Theopompus the Chian, a person who was a * great lover of truth, and who spent large sums of money
* in strict inquiries after it.

[E] He is blamed for his digressions.] The Sophist
Theon (24) says they were so long, that it was im* possible to read them thorough without forgetting the * subject from which he digressed. It was necessary to
* recollect it, which is an unpleasant thing to those who * read a work of that nature. Photius, in order to
* shew how Theopompus launched into matters foreign * to his subject, gives us this instance. His history of
* Philip, King of Macedonia, contained fifty-eight books,
* which were reduced to sixteen, by retrenching every
* thing that had no relation to the actions of that Prince.
* You will see this with some circumstances of it in the
* following words: Πλείσταις μὲν ἐν παρεβάσει
* παραδομένης ἱστορίας, τὰς ἱστορίας αὐτῷ λίγους
* Θεοπόμπου παρατίθει. διὸ καὶ Φίλιππος ὁ πρὸς
* Ῥωμαίους πολέμους, ἐξελὼν ταύτας, καὶ τὰς φί-
* λππε συντάξας μὲν πρῶτος, αἱ σκοπὸς εἰσι
* Θεοπόμπου εἰς ἐκκαίδεκα βίβλους μόνας: μὴδὲν
* παρ' αὐτῷ περὶ τοῦ εἰς ἁφελῶν, πλὴν (ὡς εἰρηται)
* τὰν παρεκτεσθῶν τὰς πάσας ἀπὸ ἡμέτερας. Digres-
* sionibus itaque variae historiae quamplurimis, histori* cos suos implet libros Theopompus. Quamobrem &
* Philippus, ille qui cum Romanis bellum gessit, digresionibus hisce sublati, & Philippi rebus gestis, quas

* Theopompus scribendas potissimum susceperat, col-
* lectis, in sedecim eas dumtaxat libros (nihil de suo
* addens, aut præter digressiones, ut diximus, detra-
* hens) redegit (25). --- Theopompus therefore spins out * his various Histories with numerous digressions. For * which reason Philip, he who waged war with the Ro* mans, pruning off these digressions, and collecting the * actions of Philip of Macedon which Theopompus had prin* cipally undertaken to write, reduced the whole into six* teen books only, adding nothing of his own, nor retrench-
* ing any thing, as I said before, but mere digressions. If * you attend to the extracts, which the same author * gives us (26) of the twelfth book of this History of
* Theopompus, you need not be told how much he de* lighted in digressions. You may judge of it very * easily from this small specimen. For the rest, if any * thing can make us believe, that the Roman name was
* scarce known to the Greeks in Alexander's time, it * is the finding that Theopompus says nothing of Rome, * except, that it had been taken by the Gauls (27). This * city would have afforded him matter for a long
* digression, had it been ever so little known at that * time.

Perhaps we may justly fear, that Photius's account * is somewhat fallacious. Theopompus began his Hi* story with the reign of King Philip, and his principal
* design was to relate the actions of that Prince; but
* perhaps he proposed at the same time to give an ac* count of the most remarkable transactions in the other * parts of the world during that reign. Consequently
* in reality, and according to the intention of the au* thor, that work must have been an universal History
* of that time, and not that of Philip in particular.
* What was retrenched therefore, when it was reduced * to sixteen books, ought not to be looked upon as di-
* gressions, properly so called. The wars of Cyprus
* and of Sicily, and of many other places were retrench-
* ed, which perhaps he did not mention occasionally,
* and by way of digression only, but as an essential part * of his design. It is impossible to decide the matter,
* since we have neither his Preface, nor any other part * of his work to consult. However, I believe, that * Photius has carried the thing too far; and if I was to * complain of Theopompus's digressions, I would not * insist, as Theon (28) does, upon his relating many * things, wherein neither the King of Macedon, nor * any of his subjects, had any concern. Can it be * denied, that the main design of Thuanus was to write
* the History of France? And yet how many things
* does he relate, that have no relation to the French?
* I should therefore blame Theopompus for putting a * wrong title to his work (29): but if he had acquainted his readers that he proposed likewise to give the * History of other countries, I should not call his ac* count of the wars of Evagoras, and of the tyrants of * Syracuse, a digression. In order to pass a right judg* ment upon his Episodes, I would not compare them * with Philip or Macedon. I would go no further than

* this: his twelfth book, for instance (30), was design* ed for the wars of Cyprus. He there goes back as * far as the siege of Troy; he speaks of Agamemnon, * and Mopsus the soothsayer, &c. Does what he says
* of them carry me too far from Evagoras King of Cy* prus? If it be so, I blame him; but I see no reason * for any to complain, that Mopsus and Agamemnon
* carry them too far from the court of Macedon. I am * of opinion, that even this restriction would not be * sufficient to justify that Historian. Without doubt,
* he ran too frequently into Episodes, wherein he was
* apt to nod, and forget himself. That fault ought to * be a new reason for us to lament the loss of his Hi* story; for since the only design of his digressions was
* to explain antiquities, to relate the origin of things,
* and different traditions, how many curious things should

(22) Caussin, de
* Eloquentia Sacra
* & Humana, lib.
* i, cap. xx, pag.
* m. 19.

(25) Photius,
* Bibl. num. 176,
* pag. 363.

(26) Id. Ibid.
* pag. 390, 391.

(27) Theopom-
* pus ante quem
* nemo mentionem
* habuit (de Roma-
* ni) urbem duntaxat à Gallia
* captam dixit.
* Plinius, lib. iii,
* cap. v, pag. m.
* 324.

(28) Theo, in
* Prolegomena.
* iv, pag. 44, 45.

(29) It was in-
* titled, τὴν Φι-
* λιπποῦ. Ros
* Philippi.

(30) Photius,
* Bibl. num. 176,
* pag. 391.

(23) Athen, lib.
* iii, cap. viii,
* pag. 85. Diony-
* sius Halicarnas-
* sen, ubi supra,
* pag. 263, praises
* that author for
* the pains and
* charges he was
* at in collecting
* materials.

(24) Theon, in
* Prolegomena-
* tis: I have quoted
* his words in the
* remark [E] of
* the article PHI-
* LISTUS.

the subject [F]. He is also blamed for his many fabulous stories, and too long speeches [G], and for being too satirical [H]. He had a most terrible trick put upon should we find in it, that are now unknown to us, and which we could not have been informed of by a concise History?

[F] He would have been condemned by those critics, who cannot bear any thing in a History that is foreign to the subject. How could Theopompus appear before their tribunal, and expect any favour from them, when they have passed sentence upon Tacitus? They lay down, in the first place, these rules (31), That in the choice of Memoirs, an Historian ought to give himself up entirely to truth, and the distinguishing of facts; that he ought to renounce his own taste, and to neglect foreign ornaments, which neither contribute to make things clearer, nor to enlarge our knowledge as to matters concealed, nor to enlarge our knowledge as to matters concealed, his . . . that his narrations ought to be uninterrupted, his . . . that his reflections rare and always computations exact, and his reflections rare and always

(31) Anonimiana, pag. 13.

(32) This it relates to the word history, which is not to be found nearer than 5 or 6 periods before. This shows a great negligence of the rules of Grammar.

(33) Ibid. pag. 14, 15.

(34) It should have been said this.

(35) Anonimiana, pag. 22.

(36) Ibid. p. 23.

(37) Ibid. p. 24.

(38) There is here a solecism in the French original.

(39) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. i, circa init. fol. m. 328, C.

I believe this judgment upon Tacitus will appear unjust and extravagant to good judges; and it had been well for Theopompus, if all those, who criticized him, had been like the author of these passages in the Anonimiana. He would have been condemned without mercy, and in a very insulting manner; but he might have answered, that his Judges went upon strained maxims, and he might have come off by saying, that all Historians were involved in the same censure, as well as he, and that consequently it was false and over-nice.

[G] He is also blamed for his many fabulous stories, and too long speeches. As to the fables, which Theopompus inserted in his work, I shall alledge Cicero's testimony. 'Intelligo te alias in historia leges servandas putare, alias in poemate: quippe quum in illa ad veritatem quæque referantur, in hac ad delectationem pleræque: quamquam & apud Herodotum patrem historiarum & apud Theopompum sint innumera fabulæ (39). - I know you are of opinion that the rules to be observed in History, are quite different from those to be observed in Poetry: since truth is the end of the one, and pleasure the end of the other: alibi both Herodotus, the father of History, and Theopompus abound in fables.' Dionysius Halicarnæus mentions two absurd tales of that Historian. 'Multas ineptias præfert ex quo genere illa sunt quæ de Sileno commemorat qui in Macedonia apparuit, & quæ de dracone ad trirremum pugna navali tendente & alia nonnulla iis similia (40). - He is (40) Dionysius Halicarnæus ubi facit de Sileno, ubi facit de dracone, & alia nonnulla iis similia. - full of idle stories, of which kind are his accounts of Silenus's apparition in Macedonia, and of the dragon's engaging in a sea fight, and some others of the like stamp.' I cannot tell whether what is said of Silenus's apparition, is the same thing with the dialogue of Silenus and Midas. It is to be found in Ælian (41), as taken from Theopompus. This is an adventure, which appears so fabulous to Ælian, that he concludes the recital of it with these words: Καὶ ταῦτα εἰ τῷ πεισθῶν ὁ Χίος λέγων, πεπιστεύθη. ἐμοὶ δὲ δεινὸς εἶναι δοκεῖ μυθολογῶν, καὶ ἐν ἑστέροις, καὶ ἐν ἄλλοις δὲ. Hæc, si cui fide dignus videtur Chius, (i. e. Theopompus) credat. Mihi egregius fabulator tum in his, tum in aliis videtur (42). - And these may meet with credit among such as can trust the veracity of the Chian (that is, Theopompus) who relates them. But to me, he appears, both in these and other things, most notoriously fabulous. It may be doubted whether Dionysius had that dialogue in his view, for he speaks only of the fables inserted in Theopompus's History, and Servius informs us, that Theopompus had related that story in a book intitled, Thaumasia, Wonderful things (43). But this doubt is not very strongly founded; since that Historian might have repeated in his History what he had said in another book, or might have adorned his Thaumasia with some pieces of his History.

Note, we ought not to reckon among Theopompus's fables his Geographical mistakes, or the falsities grounded upon some relations, which it was difficult for him to rectify (44): in this last class ought to be placed, the falsities vented by him concerning the Egyptians (45).

Here is a touch upon the length of his harangues: But as for those long speeches, and tedious harangues, which Theopompus, Ephorus, and Anaximenes, put into the mouths of their Captains, at the head of their soldiers just ready to engage, we may say of them with the Poet,

They're fools who thus the tongue employ,
So very near the enemy (46).

[H] He is also blamed . . . for being too satirical. Vossius (47) quotes three authorities for it, that of Cornelius Nepos (48), Lucian, and Josephus. The latter observes, that Theopompus defamed the Athenians (49). The words of the second deserve to be set down. He says, that the Historians, who insert speeches in their Histories, ought to be sparing of their praises and censures, and to remember that they are not at the bar; or otherwise that they will be guilty of Theopompus's fault: Τὴν αὐτὴν Θεοπόμπῳ αἰτιαν ἔχεις, φιλαπεχθονίας κατηγοροῦντι τῶν πλείων, καὶ διατεβῶν ποιμὴν τὸ πᾶν, ὥς uno laudando κατηγορεῖν μάλλον, ἢ ἰσορροπῶν τὰ περὶ ἑκάστην. (Alciade) com- Alioqui in eadem eris culpa qua Theopompus, qui plurimos odiosè nimis accusat, & eam rem in studium quoddam vertit, ut accuset magis, quam res gestas historiarum tradat (50). - You will commit the same fault with Theopompus, who was too satirical on several, and made it his business rather to write satire than History. Vossius to these three might also have added the authority of Plutarch, who says, that Theopompus is more to be credited when he praises than when he censures. Ὡς μάλλον ἐπαίνῳ πιστεύειν αἰτιαν τῆς ἰσορροπίας. Cui celebranti credas magis quam obterenti (51). Dionysius Halicarnæus takes Theopompus's part on this head: he compares him with Physicians, who lance and cauterize the infected parts to the quick, but without hurting those that are sound. Proinde etiam obrectator videtur esse, dum nonnullos debitis convitiis afficit, & facta virorum illustrium non necessaria perstringit: simile quiddam faciens ac medici, qui corruptas corporis partes secant & urunt, quam profundissime cauteria & sectiones immittentes, non tamen sanas corporis partes & bene affectas attingunt (52). - He also seems given to scandal, while he loads some with deserved reproaches, and spares not the slips of the greatest persons:

(41) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. iii, cap. xviij, pag. m. 200.

(42) Id. lib. vii, pag. m. 112.

(43) Servius in Virgil. Eclog. VI, vers. 13, & 26.

(44) See Strabo, lib. vii, p. 219.

(45) See Diodorus Siculus, lib. i, cap. xxxvii.

(46) Plutarch. in Præceptis Reipublice, p. 803. Amynta's translation.

(47) Vossius, de Hist. Græc. pag. 33.

(48) Theopompus . . . & Timæus qui quidem duo malevolentissimi nemici quo modo in illo uno laudando

(49) Cornelius Nepos, in Alciade, cap. xi.

(50) Josephus, contra Apionem.

(51) Lucianus, vere Historie, lib. i, pag. m. 705, Tom. i.

(52) Plutarch. in Lyfandro, p. 64.

his name, and in a style altogether like his, a considerable republics of Greece [I]. We have great loss [K]; for the character which a great make us lament the loss of them. He says, causes of actions, and into the tempers and that he was very lucky in his conjecture (g), and under the appearance of virtues (b): so that his conduct was examined with all the exactness. I omit the other high encomiums bestowed on him in the remark [C], what judgment the. What has been quoted out of his works by them regretted. It has been observed, that there is in that author (i). All that I can say concerning Chio with his father, who was convicted of sins (k). He was re-established in his country by a letter, which Alexander wrote to procure his

(f) Dionys. Halicarn. Epist. ad Pompeium, pag. 263, 264. See also pag. 191.

(g) Idem, pag. 191.

(b) Idem, pag. 263.

(i) Plutarch. in Agesilao, pag. 614, C.

(k) Photius, in Biblioth. num. 176.

discourses of a Panegyrist should influence either his conversation, or the moral and historical books he writes. This distinction may be observed even at this day. One who on a solemn day, as for instance, when prizes are distributed, bestows noble and magnificent encomiums, will not spare his censures fitting by the fire-side; and even though he enjoys still his pension, he will say many unacceptable things, if he turns Historian. I do not say that every body acts in this manner. There are but too many, who prove as great flatterers under the character of an Historian, as under that of an Orator. But Theopompus and some others were not of this stamp.

[I] He had a most terrible trick put upon him, which was by publishing in his name, and in a style . . . a History, which reflected upon the most considerable republics of Greece.] Anaximenes, his enemy, put that trick upon him. It is related by Pausanias, who, if I am not mistaken, is the only author that mentions it. These are his words: φαίνεται δὲ καὶ ἀνδρῶν ὁ Ἀναξίμενης ἐχθρὸν ἐκ ἀμαθείας, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐπιφθονώτατα ἀμυνόμενος. Ἐπεφυκε μὲν αὐτῷ σοφιστῆς, καὶ σοφιστῶν λόγους μιμνῆσθαι. ὥς δὲ οἱ διάφοροι ἐς Θεόπομπον ἐγγράφοντες τὸν Δαμασίστρατον, γράφει βιβλίον ἐς Ἀθηναίους, καὶ ἐπὶ Λακεδαιμονίους ὁμῶς καὶ Θηβαίους συγγραφήν λοιδόρεν. ὥς δὲ ἦν ἐς τὸ ἀκρεβέστατον αὐτῷ μιμημένον, ἐπιγράψας τῷ Θεόπομπῳ τὸ ὄνομα τῷ βιβλίῳ, διέπεμψεν ἐς τὰς πόλεις. καὶ αὐτῷ τε συγγεγραμῶς ἦν, καὶ τῷ ἐχθρῷ τῷ ἐς Θεόπομπον ἀνὰ πᾶσαν τὴν Ἑλλάδα ἐσπύετο. Idem etiam Anaximenes inimicum suum non minus vafre quam invidiosus ultus dicitur. Nam qui ingenio sophista esset, quam sophistarum orationem aptissime imitaretur, suscepta cum Theopompo Damastirati filio similitate, e historiam conscripsit maledictorum in Athenienses, Lacedaemonios, & Thebanos plenissimam. Ad unguem vero quum Theopompi stylum expressisset, supposito ejus nomine, per Græciæ civitates librum divulgandum curavit: quæ res Theopompo magnam apud omnes plane Græcos invidiam concitavit (61). . . . But Anaximenes appears to have revenged himself on his enemy, not only very dextrously, but also very invidiously. For he was both a Sophist himself, and an excellent imitator of others. So that having a difference with Theopompus, the son of Damastiratus, he wrote a book which was a severe libel upon the Athenians, the Lacedaemonians, and the Thebans. And as he had imitated the style of Theopompus to the greatest exactness, he put Theopompus's name to it, and dispersed it through those cities. By this contrivance he raised a great resentment against Theopompus throughout all Greece.

(61) Pausan. lib. vi, pag. 496, Edit. 1696.

(62) Photius, in Biblioth. num. 170, pag. 392.

(63) Dionys. Halicarn. Epist. ad Pompeium, in fine.

(64) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 595.

(65) Id. ibid. pag. 586.

(66) Idem, lib. iii, pag. 230.

(67) Id. lib. xiii, pag. 604.

(68) Id. lib. xi, pag. 508.

(69) Schol. A. Arist. in Aves.

(70) Apollonius, Hist. comment. cap. x. Laër. tius, in Epimeneide & Pherecyde. Servius, ubi supra.

[K] We have none of his books remaining which is a great loss.] He published a great number of Orations (62), and several letters (63). He wrote one to Alexander (64), and another to the inhabitants of Chio (65), which are quoted by Athenæus. He also wrote some advices to that Prince (66). His treatise περὶ τῶν συληθέντων ἐκ Δελφῶν χρημάτων: de rebus quæ sacrilegio ex Delphis surreptæ sunt (67); and that κατὰ τὴν Ἰλιάδων διατεταγμένης: de exercitationibus Platonis (68), are quoted by the same author. His dissertation περὶ εὐσεβείας, de Pietate, is quoted by the scholiast upon Aristophanes (69). Others cite his θαυμάσια, admiranda (70); but he acquired his reputation principally by two Histories. One was that

(n) Strabo, lib.
xiv, pag. 444.
See also Athenæus, book vi,
pag. 230.

(m) Dionys. Halicarn. Epist. ad Pompeium, pag. 263.

(71) Anonym.
in Descript. Olymp apud Vof-fium, ubi supra
pag. 32.

(72) Photius,
Bibl. num. 176,
pag. 389.

(73) Diodorus
Siculus, lib. xvii
cap. iii.

(74) Jonsius, de Script. Hist.
Philos. pag. 46
raises it.

(75) Vossius, d.
Hist. Grecis,
pag. 31.

(76) See Mau-fac's Notes upon Harpocraton, voce ΚΑΤΑΤΛΕ

(77) Pag. m.
64. 65.

(78) Hugo Gr tius, in Anno tis ad Librum
de Veritate R.
lig. Christ. p.
m. 181.

(79) It is at
pag. 7, of the Amsterdam e
tion. 1602.

(80) Porphyrius,
lib. i, τῆς Φιλολογίας ἀκροάσεως de erudito auditu, apud Eusebiūm, Præpar.
Evangel. lib. x,
cap. iii, pag. m.
464.

rk (74).
Vossius is mistaken when he says, that Harpocration quotes a letter of Theopompus to Tifamenes (75). This is not true: Harpocration quotes a dramatic piece written by Theopompus, the comic Poet, and entitled Tifamenes (76).

[L] The title of a peripatetic Philosopher, bestowed on him by Grotius. The resurrection of a dead body,

101
 102
 103
 104
 105
 106
 107
 108
 109
 110
 111
 112 113
 114
 115
 116
 117
 118
 119
 120
 121 122
 123
 124 125
 126
 127 128
 129
 130
 131
 132
 133
 134
 135
 136
 137
 138
 139
 140
 141 142
 143
 144
 145
 146
 147
 148
 149
 150 151 152
 153
 154 155 156 157 158
 159
 160
 161
 162
 163
 164
 165
 166
 167
 168 169
 170
 171
 172 173
 174
 175
 176
 177
 178
 179
 180
 181
 182
 183
 184
 185
 186
 187
 188
 189
 190
 191
 192
 193
 194
 195
 196
 197
 198
 199 200 201
 202
 203
 204
 205
 206 207
 208
 209
 210 211
 212 213 214
 215
 216
 217
 218
 219
 220
 221
 222
 223
 224
 225
 226
 227
 228
 229
 230
 231
 232
 233 234 235
 236
 237 238 239
 240
 241
 242
 243 244
 245 246
 247
 248
 249
 250 251
 252
 253 254
 255
 256
 257
 258
 259
 260
 261
 262
 263 264
 265
 266
 267
 268 269
 270
 271
 272
 273
 274
 275
 276
 277
 278
 279 280
 281 282
 283 284
 285
 286
 287
 288
 289
 290
 291
 292
 293
 294
 295
 296
 297
 298
 299
 300
 301 302
 303
 304
 305
 306
 307
 308 309
 310
 311
 312
 313
 314 315
 316
 317
 318
 319
 320
 321 322
 323
 324 325
 326
 327
 328
 329
 330
 331
 332
 333
 334
 335
 336
 337 338
 339
 340
 341
 342
 343
 344 345
 346 347 348 349
 350 351
 352
 353
 354
 355
 356
 357
 358
 359 360
 361
 362
 363
 364 365
 366
 367
 368 369
 370
 371
 372
 373
 374
 375
 376
 377
 378
 379
 380
 381
 382
 383
 384
 385
 386
 387
 388
 389
 390
 391
 392
 393
 394
 395
 396
 397
 398 399
 400
 401
 402
 403
 404
 405
 406
 407
 408
 409
 410
 411 412
 413
 414
 415
 416
 417
 418
 419
 420
 421
 422
 423
 424
 425
 426 427
 428
 429
 430 431
 432 433
 434
 435
 436
 437
 438
 439
 440
 441
 442
 443
 444
 445
 446
 447
 448 449
 450
 451
 452
 453 454
 455
 456
 457 458
 459
 460
 461 462
 463
 464
 465
 466
 467
 468 469
 470
 471
 472
 473
 474
 475
 476
 477
 478
 479
 480
 481
 482 483
 484
 485
 486
 487
 488
 489
 490
 491
 492 493
 494
 495
 496 497
 498
 499 500 501 502
 503
 504
 505
 506
 507
 508
 509
 510
 511
 512
 513
 514
 515 516
 517
 518
 519
 520 521 522
 523
 524
 525
 526
 527
 528
 529
 530 531
 532
 533
 534 535
 536
 537
 538
 539
 540
 541
 542
 543 544
 545
 546
 547 548 549
 550
 551 552
 553
 554
 555
 556
 557
 558 559
 560
 561
 562
 563
 564
 565
 566
 567
 568 569
 570
 571
 572
 573 574
 575
 576
 577
 578
 579 580 581
 582
 583
 584 585
 586
 587
 588
 589
 590
 591
 592
 593
 594
 595
 596
 597
 598
 599
 600
 601
 602
 603
 604
 605
 606
 607
 608
 609
 610
 611 612 ominibus. -- And Theopompus in the eighth book of his Philippics, who says that, according to the Magi, men are to rise again, and become immortal, and that all things are to remain perpetually under the same denominations. He speaks here of Theopompus the Hierorian, who makes the subject of this article. Now I do not remember ever to have read, that he was placed in the number of Philosophers; and I think he was too proud to become the disciple of Aristotle at an age so far advanced. But even though the fault of Grotius could be excused, he would be liable to just censure upon another account. For what he quotes out of Diogenes Laërtius proves only that Theopompus mentioned in his History the opinion of the Magi, concerning the resurrection. Let us suppose Theopompus to have been a very illustrious Peripatetic, will it follow from his passage, alledged by Diogenes Laërtius, that a famous disciple of the great Aristotle believed, that men would rise again? I Historians believe whatever they relate? If Mr Cordemoi, who was a Cartesien, had inserted in his History of France a doctrine of the ancient Druids, might it be concluded from thence, that this doctrine was believed among the Cartesians? This is certainly a very weak passage in the learned commentary, which Grotius added to his excellent book concerning the truth of the Christian Religion.

[M] Theopompus was accused of being a Plagiarist. It is pretended (80), that he inserted word for word in the eleventh book of his $\Phi\iota\lambda\iota\pi\pi\iota\kappa\alpha$, a long sage out of an oration of Isocrates; that upon other occasions, in order to hide his robberies, he changed the scene and the names of the persons; that, for instance, he related, that Pherecydes having drunk of the water of a well in a town of Syria, foretold an earthquake which happened three days after; and that he took that course because he was sensible, that if he had mentioned that earthquake, as a thing foretold by Pythagoras, in the town of Metapontum, his Plagiarism might have been discovered, and his readers would have known that he had it from a book of Andron (81). It is added, that he stole several things from Xenophon, and spoiled them: for resolving to insert in the eleventh book of his History of Greece the conference of Pharnabazus and Agætiæus, which Xenophon had so well described, he deprived it of its beauty. He would not use the words of the author he stole it from, for two reasons, the one was with a view to conceal his theft, the other out of a desire to shew how well he could flourish upon so fine a subject; but he came off wretchedly: his narration was languid, and remarkable only for its heaviness and dullness, whereas that of Xenophon was full of vivacity. Τὰ γὰρ περὶ τῆς φαρναβάζου πρὸς Ἀγέτιαν συνόδου . . . εἰς τὴν ἐνδεκάτην τῶν Ἑλληνικῶν μεταθεῖς ὁ Θεοπόμπος, ἀργὰ τε καὶ ἀκίνητα πειστικῶς καὶ ἀπεσπῆτα λόγῳ γὰρ δύναμιν, καὶ διὰ τὴν κλοπὴν, ἔξερρασιαν ἐμβάλλειν, καὶ ἐπιδεικνύσθαι σπατάλῳ, βεβῶσι, καὶ μίλλον, καὶ ἀναβαλλομένῳ τοῖς αἰσινεταί, καὶ τὸ ἐμψυχον καὶ ἐνεργὸν τὸ ἑσπορῶν διὰ τὸ διαφθεῖραι. *Nam illum sane Pharnabazi cum Agætiao congressum . . . in Græcarum historiarum undecimum transfulit Theopompus: verum ita quidem, ut omnia sine vi, sine motu, habere prout ac jacere viderantur. Dum enim is, ut plagium dissimulet, dicendi facultatem ostentare gessit, et elaboratæ dictionis cultum affert, tardus, confusibundus: ac procrastinanti similis videtur, adeoque vivam illam a spirantem Xenophonis efficacitatem elidit (82). Lastly we are told (83) of a book intitled Ἰνquestαι, *In

We must observe, by the by, that if Theopompus falsified what he stole from Andron, it affords us an example of what is said, that falsehood makes a greater progress than truth. Many grave writers ascribe the prediction to Pherecydes (84).

We must not forget, that Porphyrius accuses him also of preferring himself to Iocrates, and of boasting that he had got the better of him in a trial of eloquence upon Mausolus's tomb. Καίτοι ὑπερβόησεν τὴν ἰσοκράτην καὶ νενικησάμην ὑφ' αὐτοῦ λέγει καὶ τὸν ἐπὶ Μουσουλῷ αἰῶνα, τὸν διδασκαλόν. Iocrotem interea deficit, eoque certamine, quod Mausoli honorem institutum est, victum ab sefe M. gifftrum gloriatur (85). --- And be despised Iocrotem and boasted that he had conquered his master at his orations at the tomb of Mausolus. Photius ought have mentioned this particular among those of the same nature related by him. I cannot tell why he has omitted it. He says, Theopompus himself declares, that Iocrates, Theodectus, Naucrates, and myself, were at that time the four greatest Orators in Greece (86), that Iocrates and Theodectus being poor, composed Orations for money, and kept schools for a livelihood, but that he and Naucrates, having wherewithal to live handsomely, spent all their spare time in study. Note, that the translator does not well exprefs the sense of these words: καὶ ὡς αὐτὸν εἰν αὐτῷ παράλογον, ἀντιποικίμενον τῶν πταιῶν (87). He pretends the meaning of it is, ought not to be thought strange that I should

(81) Who collected Pythagoras's predictions in a book intitled Tripot. Id. ibid.

(82) Porphyria,
ubi supra, pag.
465.

s (83) Id. ibid.
pag. 467.

(84) Cicero, El
i, ii, de Divinat Plinius, lib. ii
cap. lxxix. Apollonius Hist.
memor. lib. v
Diogen. Laërt.
lib. i, num. 116

es, (85) Porphyri
ubi supra, pag
to 464.

(36) Τύτρε
ἀμα αὐτῷ τῷ πρωτῷ τῇ ἐν λόγοις τῷ δαίσις ἔχιν
τοῖς Ἑλλαν Hos secum in dicendi facul principatum
Græcia tenui
Photius Bibl
num. 176, 1

place (87) Id. ibi self

(88) Neque vero tristis se aut preter rationem primas sibi vindicare.

myself in the first rank (88). Theopompus was not so proud; he only says, that he may reckon himself among the first without being guilty of rashness.

This is a sufficient piece of vanity, and needs not be increased by an unfaithful translation.

THERON (VITAL) a French Jesuit, was born at Limoux in Languedoc in the year 1572. He turned Jesuit in 1587. He taught Rhetoric, Philosophy, and Moral Divinity, and professed the fourth vow. He applied himself to preaching for the space of fifty years and this he did in the most considerable towns of France. He was rector of the college of Montauban, and provincial of the province of Toulouse (a). He published at several times a great many Latin verses, that were very much esteemed, and continued these compositions even in his old age, when it did not appear that his poetical vein was in the least impaired. Balzac commended him mightily for it [A]. He was mistaken as to the age he ascribed to him [B]. This Jesuit died at Toulouse the twenty-fifth of February 1657 (b).

The Chevalier Theron, his nephew, captain in the regiment of Lanoy, and son of a counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse (c), is a good French Poet. In the Mercur Galant (d) may be seen a small poem of his composing.

(a) Taken from Sotuel, in Bibl.
Scriptor. Societatis Jesu, pag.
784.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Merc. Galant, January 1703,
pag. 112.

(d) Ibid.

[A] When it did not appear that his poetical vein was in the least impaired. Balzac commended him mightily for it.] Here follow some thoughts of Balzac: they are taken from a letter written by him to Father Theron, the fourth of March 1643. The winters of Naples, full of light, and crowned with roses, give me a lively image of your old age. That of Massinissa was not so brisk and vigorous; and the child he got at four years of age was not a production comparable to the Poem you have composed at seventy-five. This shows, that the fire which descends from Heaven, by way of Inspiration, is not extinguished by the abatement of natural heat. And if art has attained the invention of inextinguishable lamps, the Master of Art may no doubt preserve in its full force the luminous part of our mind, and continue the ardour and vivacity of its fountains. . . . I find myself obliged to contradict a wrong saying, which I advanced formerly as an eternal truth. That there is no such thing as a fine old age. I beg pardon for this rash saying. I was not then acquainted with your Muse, which gives the lie to my proposition, and demolishes a proverb I expected to have made current. The old age of your Muse is not the decay, but the confirmation of her beauty. . . . Had I the courage of the authors of your country, I should say a great deal more upon it: I would say, at least, of this admirable old lady, that, at the age of Hecuba, she has as many lovers as Helena had in the flower of her youth. I could name an infinite number, who burn in Paris, and fight on this side of the Loire (1). In order to give some weight to those encomiums, I must observe, that Balzac praised Father Theron very much in the letters he addressed to his other correspondents. This is what he wrote to his friend Chapelain. 'Since you have the curiosity to know the character of Father Theron, whom I thought you had known much better than I do, I must tell you that he is a Poet above seventy-five years old. Soon after the King's birth he made two Poems in short verses, which I take to be Glyconick; and the late King, on the favourable character he had received of them, ordered

'Motin to translate them. They are intitled, The Crowns, and the Dauphins, and have been printed at Paris in Latin and French. They are two valuable pieces, and I am sure you will be pleased with them. I have seen some other things of his, where in I have observed an excellent genius; but I know at the same time that he is lazy, and cares the least of any man alive to employ his talent (2).'

Mr Baillet does not so much as mention this Poet. [B] Balzac . . . was mistaken as to the age he ascribed to him.] We have just now seen, that he said on the 15th of February 1641, that Father Theron was then above seventy-five years old. At this rate that Jesuit must have been born in 1566. But this is false; for Alegambe and Southwell make him but fifteen years of age when he was admitted among the Jesuits in the year 1587. Such mistakes are commonly disobliging; for few people like to be accounted older than they are. I do not except even those who do not intend to marry. I know very well that some old men, who, as it was said of the first Duke d'Epemon, have passed the age of dying, are as willing to make themselves five or six years older than they are, as they were formerly desirous to make themselves younger by so many years. Vanity finds its account in this, since it is a more wonderful thing that a man of ninety or a hundred years should still have some vigour, than if he enjoyed his health pretty well at eighty or eighty-five years of age. Other old men are well pleased with a right computation; they are afraid that a wrong reckoning, which brings them nearer than it ought to the end of their race, will make them less respected. However it be, Balzac's misreckoning was of another nature: it was not disobliging, but rather in compliment to Father Theron; a present of six years inspired a greater admiration of his Poetry; the older he was thought to be, the more he was admired for the sprightliness of his verses. However I am of opinion Balzac spoke as he thought.

(2) Idem, Lettres à Chapelain, book vi, Letter vi,
p. m. 283, 284.
It is dated the 15th of February
1641.

(1) Balzac, Lettres Choises,
Part. ii, book i,
Letter xviii, pag.
m. 313.

THESMOPHORIA. So they called the festivals celebrated in honour of Ceres, considered as a Law-giver [A]; for there were other festivals consecrated to her,

23

[A] Ceres considered as a Law-giver.] According to the opinion of the Antients, mankind was indebted to this goddess for two great benefactions. She taught them sowing and reaping, and gave them laws.

Prima Ceres unco glebam dimovit aratro:
Prima dedit fruges, alimenta que mitia terris:
Prima dedit leges. Ceresis sumus omnia munus (1).

(1) Ovid. Me-
tam. lib. v, Fab.
vi, ver. 341.

First Ceres taught the lab'ring bind to plow
The pregnant earth, and quick'ning seed to sow.
She first for man did wholesome food provide,
And with just laws the wicked world supply'd:
All good from her deriv'd. . . .

Consult the commentators on the words of Virgil;
VOL. V.

Maissant lesas de more bidentes Legifera Cereri (2). It is therefore very probable that two sorts of feasts were dedicated to her, and that the Thesmophoria were principally instituted with regard to her character of Law-giver (3). The word itself lead us to this opinion; for, according to Hesychius, θεσμός signifies a divine law, νόμος θεῶν. 'Sacra ipsius Thesmophoria,' id est, legum latio vocatur. . . . Her feast Thesmophoria, so called from her giving of laws. These are the words of Servius on the mentioned passage of Virgil; but this did not hinder the practice of some ceremonies relating to her character of inventress of reaping. Pausanias (4), and one of Gruterus's inscriptions (5) testify, that one of her epithets was θεσμοποιός. For the rest, the following passage may serve as a proof of what is advanced in the text of this article; that the sacred books were carried by virgins of unspotted reputation

(2) Virgil, Æn.
lib. iv, ver. 58.

(3) See Castella-nus de Festis
Græcor. p. 166.

(4) Pausan. lib.
x, pag. 352.

(5) Gruteri, In-script. pag. 309.

(a) See Aristophanes in Θεσμοφορίας.

(b) See the remark [A], at the end.

as inventress of the products of the earth. The men were not allowed to be present at the Thesmophoria; and only women of the better rank, who are free, were admitted to celebrate them (a). They went in a procession at Eleusis, carrying the sacred books to be publicly carried by virgins of unspotted reputation (b). This feast lasted three or four days, some say it continued nine, the women were not permitted to lie with their husbands till it was over. It is pretended, that to render this abstinence the more supportable, they lay upon certain leaves which had a refrigerating virtue [B]. But it is very strange, tation. Πάρθενος γυναῖκες, καὶ τὸν βίον σεμναί, κατὰ τὴν ἡμέραν τῆς τελετῆς, τὰς νομίμους βίβλους καὶ ἱερὰς ὑπὲρ τῶν κορυφῶν αὐτῶν ἀνέτιθεσαν καὶ ὥσανε λίσσανεσαι ἐπὶ ἄρχοντο εἰς Ἑλευσίναν. Virgines mulieres, vitæque honestæ; quæ per solennitatis diem legales libros & sacros vertice gestantes, tanquam supplicantes Eleusinem contendebant (6). -- Virgins of an upright life, during the ceremonies, carried the sacred books of laws upon their head, and came to Ceres in a praying posture.

(6) Schol. ad Idyll. iv, Theocritus.

(7) Compare with this the remark [B] of the article PHASIS.

[B] To render this abstinence the more supportable (7) . . . they lay upon certain leaves which had a refrigerating virtue. Ovid is silent as to this, and only mentions the custom of their separation from their husbands.

Festa pie Cereris celebrabant annua matres
Illa, quibus nivea velatæ corpora vestæ
Primitias frugum dant spicae ferta suarum:
Perque novem noctes Venerem tactusque viriles
In vetitis numerant (8).

(8) Ovid. Metam. lib. x, vers. 431.

To Ceres now drew nigh the annual feast,
At which the matrons in white stoles were dress'd.
Twisted in wreaths, they bring they yellow grain,
The first ripe products of the grateful plain;
And nine forbidden nights from nuptial joys abstain.

I am not at all surpris'd at his omission of this circumstance, because it was no way pertinent to his design. His silence here therefore is of no consequence. Of all the several authors I could alledge, I shall instance only Pliny and the Scholiast on Theocritus. 'Græci Lygon vocant, alii agnon, quoniam matronæ Thesmophoriis Atheniensium castitatem custodientes, his foliis cubitus sibi sternunt (9). -- The Greeks call it Lygos, others Agnos, because the matrons, in the Athenian festival, called Thesmophoria, in order to preserve themselves chaste, use to lie upon those leaves.' These are the words of Pliny, speaking of the vites, which our Botanists call Agnus Castus. Where, note, by the way, that they have changed an epithet into a proper name. The Greeks pretended, that those who eat or drank this plant, or laid it under them in their beds, would thereby be preserved from impurity; and therefore gave it the epithet of ἀγνός, from the word ἀγνός, which signifies chaste. This word is now become the proper name of the word vites, tho' not alone, but with the Latin word of the same signification. As to the scholiast on Theocritus, these are his words: Τὴν κορύζαν, κορύζαν εἶπεν. ἐστὶ φυτόν ἀνικτικώτατον. ἔρθεν καὶ ἐν τοῖς Θεσμοφορίοις ὑποστρωρῶσι τὸ φυτόν τὴν θερμότητα τὴν κατὰ τὰ Ἀρεδίσια ἐκλύποντες. Conyzam dixit Cnyzam. Planta refrigerandi summa vi pollens, quam propterea in Thesmophoriis lecto substernunt, calorem ad res venerens extirpantes (10). -- Conyza be called Cnyza. It is a most refrigerating plant. Hence, in the Thesmophoria, they laid this plant under them to prevent venereal inclinations. It ought to be observed, that he speaks of conyza or cunilago, a plant of a different species from that mentioned by Pliny. And also upon what occasion this remark was made; which was to explain a place in Theocritus, where a shepherd is introduced telling what he would do, in case his dear friend should make a prosperous voyage to Mitylene. 'I will place, says he, a crown of flowers on my head, I will drink of the best wine, and strew herbs on my bed up to my elbows.'

(9) Plinius, lib. xxv, cap. ix, pag. m. 327. Further Hardwin says on this passage, Hæc tamen verba. Dioscor. lib. i, cap. 137. & Galenus, lib. 6, de sic simp. med. pag. 148. Ælianus item, lib. 9. Hist. animal. cap. 26.

(10) Scholiast. Theocritus ad Idyll. VII. He says the same things on the 14th Idyll. Κούζα φυτόν χερμώδες, ὡς αἱ Θεσμοφορίοι εἰσι δὴ τὴν ἀγνὴν σβιδάσκειται. Cnyza, planta graminis forma qua Cereris sacra celebrantes feminae lecto ad fervendam castitatem inferunt.

Et iborus densatus erit ad cubitum usque
Cnyza, sphodelo & flexibili apio (11).

(11) Theocritus. Idyll. VII, pag. m. 53, 54.

This, recited by the scholiast, was one of the herbs strewed on the women's beds during the Thesmophorian rites in order to preserve them from incontinency. It will be granted me that those who by splendid feasting, and such other signs of joy on a festival, rejoice that their vows are accomplished, have no recourse to those remedies which stifle all amorous thoughts. It is not therefore likely that the cunilago had any such effect; and the scholiast of Theocritus advances a thing that is contradicted by the very text on which he comments. Perhaps he would not be in the wrong to affirm, that the strewing of leaves on the women's beds during the Thesmophoria, was only one of the ceremonies of that festival. It is no uncommon thing in great solemnities to strew the streets with flowers and leaves. Festoons are placed on the gates; and sometimes the chambers participate of these ornaments: nor is it unlikely that the Greeks might extend this custom to the beds of those who celebrated the festival of Ceres. In process of time some inquisitive persons, fond of discovering mysteries, at last imagined, that sage antiquity had found this to be a remedy against incontinency. Nay, I cannot tell whether the wits and satirists were not the inventors of this supposition, which others a long time after might deliver seriously, and as a real fact. It is certain, a more discrediting reason for this custom could not have been advanced; nor can I imagine the Grecian women were tame enough to submit to a remedy which would so publicly proclaim their lasciviousness. Their consent was not waited for, some will say: but I might answer, did Greece ever put the sex on such a foot, as to subject them to shameful customs. It is not easy to find in the whole map of the world, one corner of the earth, where things are established on this foot; and if we would find such a place, we ought not to look for it in Attica, Peloponnesus, or the isles of the Ægean sea. In order to make this probable, it should be said, that the honour of the women was not in the least concerned in these strewings of Agnus Castus. But who will believe it? Must not he have a very mean opinion of their virtue, who can imagine that married women could not lie alone five or six nights, (or put it nine, (12) if you please) without rendering themselves unworthy by temptations, and impure proceedings, to celebrate a festival where chastity was required? I expect to be answered, that all countries are not alike, and that in climates less hot than Greece, wine or strong liquors, tho' plentifully drank, would not produce the same venereal irritations that the meanest food would elsewhere occasion; and that consequently we ought not to judge of the ceremonies of the feasts of Ceres by the desires of the northern nations. But admit we do not stir out of Greece, I persist in my opinion, that these motives for the use of Agnus Castus are not at all probable: for if the women, of their own accord had recourse to this remedy, they must acknowledge a very great weakness, and proclaim a scandalous infirmity, and which neither modesty nor prudence would permit them to reveal. Prudence, I say, because such a confession might cruelly disturb and alarm their husbands. Some might by trading be obliged to several weeks absence. A law-suit might detain others as long. Several went to the wars, or engaged in foreign voyages. Those who never went from home, were not always in good health; and those who were could not tell how soon they might fall sick. What ground was there, in all these cases to rely on their wives chastity, who made profession of their incontinency, at the Thesmophorian feast? This was a very august festival, a solemn act of religion; the women held the principal functions of this holy ceremony. Chastity was necessary for their celebrating this solemnity, the ritual enjoined it. They had

(12) Ovid, m. may be seen above citation (8), makes this festival of Ceres last nine days.

Ἄ δ' εἰς αἶς ἐσσεῖται πεπυκασμένα ἐς τ' ἐπὶ παῦχον
Κορύζαν ἀσφοδιώπτε πολυγνάμπωπε σελίνω

strange, generally speaking, that they should want such a remedy; and yet more so that they should acknowledge the necessity of it. The principal object of their worship in this festival, was that part which distinguishes them from men [C]. You may very well had therefore the most powerful motives to continence: the divine worship, conscience, the public prosperity, the honour of Ceres, and the awfulness of her mysteries were all concerned in it: and nevertheless we are told, they owned themselves unable to contain during the short term of this festival. What was then to be expected from their virtue, when put to longer trials on other occasions? It is therefore certain, that by having recourse to Agnus Castus, they must have betrayed a great imprudence, in a voluntary manner, by filling their poor husbands with jealousies and uneasinesses. But what will you say, some may object, if their husbands established this custom? I answer, that if they were the authors of it, either by way of advice, or command, it is not in the least likely that the women would have submitted to it either as a necessary, or at least a very useful remedy; for in accepting of it, they must have confessed a natural infirmity, which would have done great injury to their honour, and rendered them suspected of infidelity in the absence or sickness of their husbands. All the husbands who had been so imprudent as to propose or approve of this counsel, would have exposed the reputation of their wives. The wits could not have failed to cry out, These good men know how matters stand, a dire experience has obliged them to hunt after expedients; they never have a night's quiet, except those which religion provides for them. But when they lie by whilst the Theismophorian rites are solemnized, the remembrance of what is past, makes them glad to rely on the virtue of Agnus Castus. I must repeat the observation I have made before. To what purpose would they have relied on that virtue during the festival? Would this have appeased the alarms of those who were gone a long voyage, or a long journey? Would it satisfy the minds of the sick? It may be affirmed, that whoever should have introduced this custom, would have deserved to pass for a disturber of the public peace.

A hundred other reasons convince me, that the use of the Agnus Castus in the beds of the women who celebrated the Theismophorian rites, was not founded on the motive which is alleged. The same reason which led to the enjoining this remedy to married women, during that festival, would have occasioned it's being prescribed to them during the absence or indisposition of their husbands, and to young widows and virgins all the year long. Since therefore the latter was not done, we ought not to give the least credit to the former. If both of them had been practised in the manner I have mentioned, we should find in some author or other, that no plant was more common than Agnus Castus all over Greece. Every person would have had a great many beds of them in his garden; whole forests had been filled with it, and expert planters employed on purpose to cultivate it; for the frequent stripping of it's leaves, would have required the greater care in keeping it alive. It would have been the first care of those, who, in their declining years, should have married women much younger than themselves, to make large plantations of Agnus Castus, that they might continually have a decent remedy to assuage those desires they could neither prevent nor satisfy. The leaves of this shrub would have been worshipped as the tutelary god of married men, and a Deus averruncus, or alexicaeus, with respect to cuckoldom. Some Juvenal would have congratulated Greece upon it (13): and it would have been observed of these leaves what another hath said of frogs (14). But we find no appearance of any such thing in the monuments of Antiquity.

Perhaps it may be objected, that the Theismophorian rites exacted an extraordinary purity, an imagination exempt from what the Casuists call unruly thoughts, an uninterrupted application to the excellency and sublimities of chastity; which was unnecessary at other times. All the answer I shall make to this, is, to ask what proof there are of this extraordinary peculiarity of the Theismophoria. I am sure such a notion of this festival is only imaginary (15). I would also add, that neither Agnus Castus, nor Canilago, nor willow-leaves (16), &c. are capable of inspiring such a purity, and moreover I reason thus: The Athenians were too sensible a people, to believe that a few leaves between the sheets were sufficient to mortify leudness. I will grant that there are some herbs, which, in length of time, may refrigerate those who eat them; but as to the external application of them, I cannot tell whether it may not justly be said of lust as of death, 'vires vim mortis non est medicamen in hortis.' -- Death's power is not subdued by herbs. I cannot forget the answer of Theano, Pythagoras's daughter, who, when asked, How many days respite, after having to do with a man, were requisite to qualify a woman to assist at the Theismophoria? replied, She was qualified the minute after, if she had to do with her husband, but never if with any other. Apud Theodoretum, lib. 12. Græcanicarum affectionum, Pythagorica Theano, rogata quoto demum die mulieri liceret à complexu viri Theismophoriis interesse? 'Απὸ μὲν τῆ ἰδίας περὶ ἡμέρας, ἐν ᾗ ἀπὸ δὲ ἀλλοτρίης ἐδέτοτο. Ei quæ à proprio viro surrexerit, statim licere respondit; quæ ab alieno nunquam (17). This moral decision of Theano doth not in the least favour of rigour. Such a lady as she would not, if now alive, condemn frequenting the communion under pretence of too short an interval after the conjugal duty. What may farther be inferred from her answer, is, that in order to a due performance of the Theismophorian functions, a preparation of some days continence was thought necessary. But as this prolonged the time of abstinence, it may be objected that I ought not to be surprized, that they should have had recourse to Agnus Castus. But this is indeed too weak an objection to make me alter my opinion. I refer the reader to what is said in my last remark but one.

It would be unjust to condemn my criticisms on this head, for equity will not permit us to sacrifice the reputation of an infinite number of Grecian women, to all the consequences which may be drawn from the testimony of Pliny and some others, if they have not deserved such an affront.

[C] The principal object of their worship in this festival, was that part which distinguishes them from men. Fasoldus, who has wrote a small tract on the Grecian festivals, cites Theodoret in relation to this circumstance. 'In hoc quoque festo pudenda muliebris mulieres illæ initiatæ honore divino afficiebant. -- In this festival also the women who were initiated paid divine honours to the pudenda muliebris.' Theodoretus, lib. 3. Græcan. Affection. (18). He doth not cite the words of Theodoret, tho' he found them in Castellanus in the manner following: Καὶ τὸν κτήνα τὸν γυναικῆιον (ἴσως δὲ τὸ γυναικῆιον ὀνομαζομένη) ἐν τοῖς Θεισμοφορίοις, παρὰ τῶν τελεσσομένων γυναικῶν θείας τιμῆς ἀξίωμεν. Nec minus muliebrem pestinem (sic enim pudenda mulieris vocant) in Cereris festo, mulieres initiatæ divino honore dignum habent (19). -- And the pesten muliebris also, (so they called the pudendum muliebre) was esteemed by Festus Græcorum the women initiated at the Theismophoria to be worthy of divine honour. Fasoldus also informs us, that at Syracuse they carried a representation of this part, formed with a sort of meal and honey, in a procession on the last day of the feast in honour of Ceres and Proserpine. This he grounds on the authority of Athenæus, lib. 14.

Athenæus, says he (20), refers muliebris pudenda, μύλλοι appellata, quæ ex sesamo & melle facta erant, ultimo die hujus festi apud Syracusanos, qui hæc sacra etiam observant, Cereri & Proserpinæ circumlata fuisse. -- Athenæus relates, that the pudenda muliebris, called μύλλοι, made of flour and honey, on the last day of this feast, which were observed by the Syracusians, were carried in honour of Ceres and Proserpine. Perhaps he hath not rendered the sense of Athenæus exactly, and instead of the last day of the festival, he ought to have translated it at the great Theismophoria. The Greek runs thus: Ἡγεκλειδῆς δὲ Συρακούσιος ἐν τῷ περὶ θεσμῶν, ἐν Συρακούσαις φησὶ τοῖς παντελείοις τῶν θεσμοφορίων ἐκ σπέρματος καὶ μέλιτος κατὰ σκευὴν ἀφ' ἧς αἱ γυναῖκες, ἀκαλεῖσθαι κατὰ πᾶσαν Σικελίαν μύλλους,

(16) Salicem habere vim permendi feminis, & libidinis extinguendæ. author est Theophrastus. Ἐπιανὸς Ἀφροδίτης μάλα μὲν πυνκτοῖ. Ἄλλοι δὲ γυναικῶν κατὰν ἀπαιτῶν. (17) Id. ibid. (18) Joh. Fasoldus, in Græcorum veterum Ἱερολογία, Dec. III, sum. 1, pag. m. 280. (19) Castell. de rum, pag. 173. (20) Fasoldus, in Græcorum veterum Ἱερολογία, Dec. III, sum. 1, pag. m. 280.

(13) O sanctas gentes quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina. Juven. Sat. XV, ver. 10.

(14) See the passage of Pliny cited in the remark [I], of the article DE MOCRITUS.

(15) See the following remark.

well imagine the ancient fathers did not spare the Heathens on the subject of such ceremonies. For the rest those who celebrated this festival were obliged to watch the whole night [D].

I shall

(21) Athen. lib. vii, pag. 647.

(22) The translation note is, Ceres Thesmophoria & mysteria, majora minoraque fuerunt. Vide Cysalodum.

(23) The translation note here, is, τὰς θεαῖς ἀλλοτρίαις θεαῖς, nempe Ceres & Proserpine. He falsely supposes, that τὰς θεαῖς, is put into the text.

(24) Montagne, Essays, lib. iii, cap. v, pag. 128, 129.

(25) To this may be referred what Daniel Heinfius saith in his answer to Balzac's Dissertation on Herodes infantia, pag. 112. Quem (Pana) eundem cum Priapo, quem pudenter nec pudendum modo sed pudendi fuit prope partem faciant. Arnobius, lib. vi, pag. 209, Jovis genitalibus propriis inferior Priapus.

(26) Sic effata, sine vestem contraxit ab imo, Obiecte oculis formatae inguinibus res: Quas cava succubitus Baubo manu, nam puerilis Ollis vultus erat, plaudebat, contrectat amice. Orpheus, apud Arnobium, lib. vi, pag. 175. See Clemens Alexandrinus, in Protrept. pag. 13.

(27) Arnob. lib. vi, pag. 174, 175.

campus renders it thus: Heraclides Syracusius libro de vetustis & sanctis moribus, scribit, apud Syracusios in Thesmophoriis (22), ex sismo & mille fingi pendenda muliebria, quæ per ludos & spectacula (23) circumdabantur & in tota Sicilia vocabantur Mylli. You will find in Montagne's Essays a great many such passages. I have not seen this in the place where he observes (24), that in the greatest part of the world this part of our bodies was desired and distinguished by the chief magistrates were revered and distinguished by this part; and that in several ceremonies, instituted in honour of divers deities, the representation of it was carried about in pomp. The Egyptian dames, in their Bacchanal feasts, wore a wooden one, finely covered, about their necks, proportioned in size and weight to their strength; besides that, the statue of their god was furnished with one far surpassing the other parts of his body (25). The married women in my neighbourhood, adjust the upper-part of their head-dress to that shape, in order to boast of the pleasure they received from it; and when they become widows, they turn it behind, and hide it under their head-dresses. It is probable that the reason why the part proper to the other sex had such honours paid to it in the Thesmophoria, was in remembrance of the good service it had done to Ceres. This goddess having made a strict search after Proserpine, who had been stolen away from her, without being able to find her, arrived very disconsolate at Eleusis. Here an old country-woman, named Baubo, used all endeavours to persuade her to take some refreshment, and to drive away melancholy. But all to no purpose. Ceres ultimately refused every thing, and would not admit of any consolation. Baubo changed the scene and endeavoured to divert the goddess with a new invented spectacle. She retired into another chamber, where she tricked up a certain thing which had been long neglected, as a piece of waste ground; after which she returned to the goddess, to whom she shewed her nudity, putting her body in the most extravagant postures she possibly could (26). Ceres fixing her eyes on this object could not help laughing, and soon after accepted of the proffered refreshments. I cannot describe this in our language so naturally as an ancient Father of the Church has done, whose words are these. Rogat illa (Baubo) atque hortatur contra, sicut mos est in hujusmodi casibus, ne fastidium suæ humanitatis assumat: obstinatissime durat Ceres, & rigoris indomiti pertinaciam retinet. Quod cum sæpius fieret, neque ullis quirit obsequiis ineluctabile propositum satigari, verit Baubo artes, & quam seris non quiebat allicere, ludibriorum statuit exilarare miraculis: partem illam corporis, per quam seculi femineum & subolem proderet, & nomen solet acquirere generi, tum longiore ab incuria liberat: facit sumere habitum puriorem, & in speciem levigari nondum duri atque striculi pusionis: redit ad Deam tristem, & inter illa communia, quibus moris est frangere ac temperare mærores, reteggit se ipsam, atque omnia illa pudoris loca revelatis monstrat inguinibus: atque ubi affigit oculos diva, & inauditi specie solaminis pascitur. Tum diffusor facta per risum, aspernatam sumit atque ebibit potionem: & quod diu nequivit verecundia Baubonis exprimere, propudiosi facinoris extorsit obscenitas (27). Hence with very good reason he vigorously attacks the Pagans on the ridiculous absurdity of their festivals; what, could this object afford so extremely diverting to Ceres, who could at all times see the same in herself? 'Ut animum com- modare alimoniis possint, victuique sumendo, non ratio, non tempus, non sermo aliquis adhibetur gravis, aut affabilitas seria, sed propudiosa corporum monstratur obscenitas, oblectanturque partes illæ, quas pudor communis abscondere atque naturalis verecundia lex jubet: quas inter aures castas sine veni- nosis est, ac sine honoribus appellare præfatis. Quid- nam, quæso, in spectu tali, quid in pudendis fuit verendique Baubonis, quod feminei sexus Deam, & consimili formatam membro, in admirationem converteret atque risum? quod obiectum lumini con- spectuique divino, & oblivionem miseriarum daret, & habitum in lætiorem repentina hilaritate traduce-

ret (28)? -- To induce her to eat, and take some (28) Id. ibid. 'refreshment, neither reason, nor time, nor any grave sag. 176. discourse, or serious complaisance were made use of, but obscene parts, are offered to her view, which com- mon decency and the natural laws of modesty require to be concealed: which to chaste ears without leave or due reverence, ought not so much as to be named. What now, I desire to know, in such a sight as this, what in the pudenda of old Baubo, could move the laughter and admiration of a goddess formed with the same parts herself? What an object was here to de- light the view of a goddess in such a manner, as to drown all thoughts of sorrow, and introduce so sudden an appearance of joy?' Is it not very probable that in commemoration of this adventure, divine honours were decreed to that object which had so opportunely diverted the goddess Ceres? Hence arises an objection against the assertion laid down in the precedent article: for, some will say, the Grecian women ought to be more than ordinarily fortified, when they not only lay alone, but were employed in the contemplation of a subject so apt to taint their imagination, and excite immodest thoughts. I confess, this may in some measure weaken my arguments; but all things well considered, they remain still strong enough to make me continue in my opinion.

[D] They were obliged to watch the noble night.] This might furnish my adversaries with another objection. The husbands, will they say, considering, 1. That their wives were separated from them, whilst they were employed in celebrating the memory of a tickling adventure, and in worshipping a tempting object, of which they were also obliged to make images in paste (29). 2. Their watching all night; might well give some disagreeable suspicions. For watchings have always afforded lucky opportunities. It is therefore not unlikely, that they had recourse to effectual preservatives, such as the leaves of Agnus Castus. These difficulties are very inconsiderable; for, besides that all men were absolutely excluded from the Thesmophoria, which might afford a plenary satisfaction to the jealous and distrustful husbands, is it possible to believe the Grecians foolish enough to rely on the feeble assistance of leaves, when they doubted their wives virtue, notwithstanding the engaging obligations laid on them by the necessary circumstances of the festival, such as the utter exclusion of men, the chastity enjoined, the watchings in the temple, &c. if it be asked on what authority I found the text of this remark, I alledge these words of Arnobius (30): 'Vultis enim consideremus mysteria & illa divina, quæ Thesmophoria nominantur à Græcis: quibus gente ab Attica sancta illa pervigilia consecrata sunt & pannychismi (31) graves. . . . Would you have us consider also those divine mysteries which the Greeks call Thesmophoria; in which the Athenians celebrated those holy watchings, and serious vigils.' I do not deny but several disorders were occasioned by these watchings. Plautus's Aulularia runs upon the marriage of a young woman who was got with child on such an occasion (32). The Romans never attempted the abolition of some nocturnal feasts, till they discovered their irregularities. Certain Grecian cities also abolished the same ceremonies: and the following words inform us how Aristophanes bantered those devotional watchings (33): 'Diligentissime sciendum est, ut mulierum famam multorum oculis lux clara custodiat, initienturque eo ritu Cereri, quo Romæ initiatur. Quo in genere severitatem majorum fenatus vetus auctoritas de Bacchanalibus; & consulum exercitu adhibito quæstio animadvertitque declarant. Atque omnia nocturna, ne nos duriores fortè videamur, in media Græcia Diagondas Thebanus lege perpetua sustulit. Novos vero Deos, & in his colendis nocturnas pervigiliones sic Aristophanes facetissimus poeta veteris comædiæ vexat, ut apud eum Sabazius, & quidam alii dii de peregrinis judicati è civitate ejiciantur. . . . It is most carefully to be enacted, that day-light and the public eye may guard the reputation of women; and that they be initiated to Ceres, as they are

(29) See, above, citation (21), the passage of Athenæus; but the argument grounded upon it is not very certain, for we do not find by whom these images were made.

(30) Arnobius, lib. vi, p. 173.

(31) That word signifies to watch the whole night, as appears by the glossaries, perovigilium, παννυχισμός, παννυχία.

(32) Is adulterant illius est avunculus. Qui illam stupravit nocte, Ceres vigilavit. He is the uncle: to the youth who dares with her during the vigils of Ceres. Plaut. in Prologo Aulularia.

(33) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. ii, fol. 335, A.

I shall observe, on this occasion, a mistake of Brantome; who has falsely asserted, that, according to Pliny, the Vestal virgins made use of beds of leaves to preserve their chastity [E].

'are initiated at Rome. How the customs of this kind formerly observed in the Bacchanalias are now approved, the debate of the Senate before the Consuls upon this question, sufficiently decided. All nocturnal ceremonies, that we may not seem less polite than others, have been abolished in the midst of Greece by a perpetual law of Diogenes the Theban. But the most facetious old comic Poet Aristophanes bantered the new Deities, and their nocturnal worship in so severe a manner, that Sabazius and some other gods mentioned by him, were judged foreigners and expelled the city.' Read also what is said by a certain Journalist in his extract of a dissertation of Mr Rainfant. The secular games were not only celebrated for three days, but also three nights together; for they assembled in the temples, where they watched, prayed, and performed their sacrifices: this was what they called Peruigilium; and to prevent all indecencies in these public assemblies, the youth of both sexes assisted at them under the conduct of their fathers and their mothers, or some of their elderly relations, who could answer for their deportment, as Augustus had decreed. The precaution was necessary and the law very wise; love is too diligent in quest of favourable opportunities, to forget its interests in these nocturnal assemblies. But it was somewhat late when the Emperor Augustus applied a remedy to it. Prefat sero quam nunquam. Better late than never. It is not to be doubted but before this, the three nights of the secular games were a very happy time for the amorous youth, and that they made the best use they could of it, since they knew it was impossible to enjoy it twice (34). The devotional watchings of the Primitive Church were not entirely free from abuses of this kind; for which reason St Jerom advises the young virgins when they assisted at these rites, not to stir so much as a finger's breadth from their mothers (35). This Father had done much better to acquiesce in the just complaints of Vigilantius, who condemned these nocturnal meetings on account of the impurities there committed (36). They were at last obliged to suppress this devotion, as Cardinal Bellarmine acknowledges. 'Quoniam occasione nocturnarum vigiliarum

'abusum quidem irreperere coperant, vel potius flagitia non raro committi, placuit Ecclesie nocturnos conventus, & vigilias proprie dictas intermittere, ac solum in iisdem diebus celebrare jejunia (37). . . . Because on occasion of the nocturnal watchings, abuses had crept in, or rather horrid vices were too frequently committed, the Church was pleased to forbid those night meetings, and vigils properly so called, and to celebrate fastings only on the same days.'

Without doubt the mandate of the Archbishop of Paris in the year 1697, against the custom of visiting Mont St Valerien in the holy week, was founded on like reasons.

[E] Brantome . . . has falsely asserted, that, according to Pliny, the vestal virgins made use of beds of leaves to preserve their chastity. These are the author's words at large (38): 'I have seen and read a foolish Italian pamphlet, which pretends to give receipts against concupiscence, of which sort it lays down thirty-two, but they are so ridiculous, that I would not advise the women to the use of them, lest they should bring their bodies into too low a condition. This is the reason why I would not here transcribe them. Pliny alledges one of them, which the Vestals and Athenian Ladies formerly made use of during the feasts of Ceres called Theismophoria, to refrigerate and extinguish every strong amorous desire, that by this means they might celebrate this festival with the utmost chastity; this was the making beds of the leaves of Agnus Castus. But you must imagine that they thus mortified themselves only during the rites; and that afterwards they threw away their beds. I have seen one of these trees at the house of a very fine and honourable lady in Guienne, which the often shewed for its rarity to strangers who came to visit her, and told them the virtue of it; but I could never observe or hear that any of the sex had stuffed the least corner of their bed with its leaves, or plucked so much as one branch, not even the Lady herself, who was the proprietor of the tree and place, and consequently could dispose of it at pleasure. See the margin (39).

(37) Bellarmine, de Ecclesia triumph. lib. iii, cap. ult.

(38) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. ii, pag. m. 163, 164.

(39) It is no wonder, because every woman who had gathered those leaves, must have confessed her infirmity.

(34) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, March 1685, Art. II, pag. 259, 260.

(35) Vigilantium dies & solennes pernoctationes sic virgineola nostra celebrat, ut ne transferantur quidem unquam a matre discant. Hieronymus ad Letam de Institut. Filiae.

(36) Vide Hieronymum adversus Vigilantium, cap. iv. Consult Mr Van Dale, de Oraculis, pag. 237, of the first edition, and pag. 60, of the second. See also remark [D], in the article VIGILANTIUS.

THIBAUT or THEOBALDUS, Earl of Champagne, the fifth of that name, rendered himself famous among other things by his passion for Queen Blanche [A], St Lewis's mother: and though he was unsuccessful in it, as most Historians believe, yet he exposed this great queen to censorious tongues [B]. Some (a) pretend that he discovered

(a) Varillas, Minorité de S. Louis, printed at the Hague 1685.

[A] His passion for Queen Blanche. Claudius Fauchet has not forgot our Earl of Champagne nor his Amours, when he treats of the ancient French Poets. 'Blanche, says he (1), who was a young, beautiful, and besides a Spanish Lady, managed Thibaut so artfully, that he abandoned the other Barons: and, what was yet more, he discovered the design to seize the King in his return from Orleans to Paris. But Thibaut's Amours displeasing several Lords, it happened (as I find in a certain authentic manuscript Chronicle which I have by me) that Thibaut one day entering the hall where Queen Blanche was, Robert Earl of Artois, the King's brother, threw a soft cheefe in his face, which the Earl of Champagne being affronted at, took occasion to retire from court, in order to avoid a greater disgrace. However the great Chronicle of France tells us, that the Earl again took up arms against the King; but being informed of the great preparations made against him, he sent some of the wisest of his council to desire a peace, which was agreed to. But as the King had been at a great expence on this account, therefore the Earl was obliged to quit Montereau-fault-yonne, and Bray on the Seine, with their appurtenances to him. On this occasion it was (says the great Chronicle) Queen Blanche told the Earl that he ought never to take up arms against the King her son; but should remember that he came even to his own country to assist him against the Barons when they attacked him. The Earl earnestly looking at the wife and charming Queen, and struck with her great beauty, replied, By my faith, Madam, my soul, my body, and all my lands

'are at your command. Nor is there any thing that I can please you which I would not freely undertake: nor will I ever by the grace of God, engage against you or yours. He departed very pensive, often reflecting on the Queen's winning looks and charming air. The tender passion soon seized his heart, but when he remembered that she was a Lady of so high a rank, and strict virtue, that he could never think of enjoying her, it was turned into despair. And because deep thoughts beget melancholy; to divert them he was advised by some wise men, to apply himself to Poetry and Music; in which he succeeded so well, that he composed the most melodious songs that ever were either sung or plaid on instruments, and caused them to be inscribed in the halls of Provins and Troyes. And they are called the King of Navarre's songs.

[B] He exposed this great Queen to censorious tongues (2). Several things gave occasion to it. Thibaut had rendered himself odious by his precipitate retreat from the camp at Avignon, and became more so on account of the suspicions he lay under of having poisoned Lewis the VIIIth; which were increased, when so good an understanding was observed betwixt him and the Queen-Dowager, that he disclosed to her all the designs of the confederate Princes; and all this at a time that several provocations had engaged him to declare himself as one of the chiefs of the league. This looked very like a reciprocal affection betwixt them (3). A widow without this would never come into any correspondence with a man, who is supposed to be her husband's murderer. Besides, the confederate Princes marching into Champagne, met Queen Blanche

(2) See other scandalous reports concerning this queen in the remark [D].

(3) The modern Historian of St Lewis, lib. ii, num. 6, pag. 11, tells us that the confederate which Blanche discovered to be reconciled to Thibaut, tho' she knew he passionately loved her, occasioned several ill reports.

(1) Des anciens Poëtes François, book ii, pag. 117.

V O L. V.

Q q q

discovered his passion, before that princess was a widow [C]: and they add that Lewis the VIIIth the husband of Blanche, was obliged to dissemble the affront, by reason of the wars in which he found himself engaged. That the earl brought this prince considerable forces, and behaved himself very bravely; but that he could not resolve to winter out of his own territories, and that he expressly declared he would return home. That the king imagining this impatience of the earl to proceed only from a desire of seeing the queen, and being also sensible of the great prejudice he should receive by this lord's retreat, used him ill, and threatened him. That Thibaut enraged at the affront, and meditating a terrible revenge caused the king to be poisoned. That finding the queen had the same indifference for him in her widow state as she had before, he confederated with the princes who designed to remove her from the regency; and that they met with no difficulty in engaging him in that affair, because he was easily persuaded that the queen's indifference proceeded from the passion she entertained for the Cardinal Legate [D], who had resided for some time at the Court of France. That it was equally easy for the queen to oblige him to abandon the confederates; for she only acquainted him that she should not be displeased to see him. That he had conceived great hopes of succeeding in his amours by this bare compliment. That he deserted the princes of the league, and discovered their designs to the queen, at a very favourable juncture. That turning their Blanche on the way; she was going to the Earl's assistance, and would not abandon him, tho' they pursued him as the poisoner of her husband. This conduct appeared so suspicious, that they laughed at the offers she made of punishing Thibaut, in case he was guilty. The following passage is taken from a modern author, who has consulted authentic manuscripts. The Queen sent a second order to the Princes of the League to quit Champagne; assuring them, that if they had any complaint against Thibaut, she was ready to do them justice. But all she could obtain from them, was that they had taken up arms to do themselves justice, and not to wait for it from a woman, who declared herself the protectress of her husband's murderer (4).

(4) Histoire de S. Louis, lib. ii, num. 21, pag. m. 84, ad ann. 1229.

As for the songs composed by the Earl, most Historians tell us they proved the ill success of his amours. The passage of Claudius Fauchet already cited, shews that this unfortunate gallant was advised to divert himself with songs, and by this means to expel the melancholy which preyed upon him. Common sense obliges us to believe, that if Blanche had favoured the Earl's passion, he would have better concealed his flame; and that the despair of obtaining any tender returns from the Queen, occasioned such repeated sighs and so many languishing verses as he recorded on the walls of his palace. We are told that it was a sort of folly and extravagance, which a proper compassion in the Queen would have entirely prevented. Let us hear a modern author. 'Whether his presumption equalled his love; or his passion degenerated into folly; or he was prepossessed that concealing would rather increase than cure his dislike; or the Queen's virtue had at last thrown him into despair: it is certain he was so little solicitous to conceal the consuming fire; that he affected to discover it by all means which the most wretched extravagance could suggest to a man of his quality. He composed several amorous songs, in which he discovered more wit than elegance: he found opportunities to hand them to the Queen; they were set to Music; they were fitted to all sorts of Instruments, and to keep up the idea of them when they should lose the grace of novelty, or to preserve the memory of them when the author and the Princess should be no more, he caused them to be engraved in brass, and exposed to the view of all the world in the galleries of his palaces at Troyes and Provins: as if he was afraid that future ages would not be sufficiently informed of his folly, or that the age he lived in was very barren of satirists (5).' Varillas is here mistaken in his Chronology; he supposes Thibaut guilty of all these extravagancies before the death of Lewis the VIIIth: but I chose to rely on the History cited by Fauchet (6), which dates all these songs after the loss of Montreuil and Bray. This agrees with the Chronology of one of our best Historians (7): this loss, says he, did not make him wiser; he still persisted in the foolish passion for the Queen which had ruined him, and retired to his castle of Provins to indulge his amorous extravagance, by making verses and songs. He was obliged to surrender these towns in the year 1235, according to Mezerai (8).

(5) Varillas, Mémoires de S. Louis, pag. 12.

(6) See, above, the remark [A].

(7) Mezerai, ubi infra.

(8) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. ii, p. 715.

I shall conclude this remark with the words of the modern Historian of St Louis, which are an exact recapitulation of what hath been said. 'The author who has collected most of these scandalous reports, and who perpetually praises Blanche to a degree of excess, speaks of these stories as meer rumours which he had picked up; adding of himself, tho' he was an Englishman, that it would be criminal to give credit to them. He also assures us, as well as another author who was born at Liege, while these reports were yet fresh, that they only proceeded from the animosity of the nobles against the regency and the steadiness of this Princess; and indeed every age furnishes examples enough of this kind. Besides, of the four authors who have related this story, not one has so much as insinuated that the Queen had the least inclination to favour the Earl of Champagne's passion, if it was true that he had any for her: but one of the four positively avers, that Thibaut only scribbled his ditties on the walls of the palaces of Troyes and Provins, to charm the despair into which Blanche's virtue had cast him. That if amongst the rest of those excellent works, some verses appear which seem liable to be wrested to this purpose; it is in truth a strange thing to alledge the evidence of such a one as Thibaut, a Poet transported by a warm imagination, who may as probably entertain the public with such adventures as never happened to him, as others of the same character tire the reader with the passions which they never felt (9).'

[C] Some pretend that he discovered his passion before that princess was a widow. It is very likely that his passion did not wait for the king's death. Nor is it at all less probable that such a vain, inconstant, courageous prince, might have had a sufficient command over his passions, to love the queen a long time, without giving any marks of it. Note, that she was at least forty, and perhaps older, when she lost her husband: for she was married to him in the year 1200, and he died in 1226. It is very rare for a man to see a fine woman of thirty years of age, without any concern, and to fall in love with her all of a sudden when she is forty, and after she has had above ten children. This was the case of Queen Blanche in the year 1226. One of our Historians imagines that there was a great deal more vanity than love in this action of Thibaut. The Earl of Champagne, says he (10), was the person who gave this advice to the queen. This young prince was touched with a sort of gallantry for her, rather owing to the vanity of a courtier, than to the charms of a woman above forty. He is thus far in the right, that vanity is capable of obliging a man to act the part of a lover: but he doth not in the least consider, that the earl's passion might have begun long before the queen was forty years old. And at that age it was much easier for her to keep alive a flame long since kindled, than to begin to kindle one.

[D] The passion she had entertained for the Cardinal Legate. An author whom I have often cited (11) observes that the Cardinal's person was very agreeable; that his charming mien was equalled by none; that he

(9) Histoire de S. Louis, lib. x, num. 14, pag. 126.

(10) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. ii, pag. 710, ad ann. 1227.

(11) Varillas, Minorité de St Louis, pag. 12.

whole rage against him, they entered into and ravaged Champagne. That the Queen-Regent assisted him, and so composed the difference, that they were deprived of all pretences for an invasion. That they fought another way to ruin him, by accusing him of the king's death. That the queen brought him off, obliging them to lay down their arms on condition that he should immediately serve in the wars against the Infidels, accompanied with a hundred knights to be maintained at his own expence (b). This whole relation mentions nothing of the crown of Navarre: which obliges me to take notice in this place, that Thibaut obtained that crown in the year 1234, after the death of Sanche (c), who left no children. Two years after, he undertook a Crusade against the Infidels, of which he was also the chief: but for the usual reason, I mean the misunderstanding of the princes engaged in that enterprise, the expedition came to nothing. He died in the year 1253 (d), leaving his dominions to Thibaut his son. In his latter days he was engaged in several broils with his clergy, and even drew an interdict on the kingdom of Navarre for the space of three years, for having banished the Bishop of Pampelona (e). We shall see in the remarks that he was a great Poet [E]. He was a man suspected on flight grounds of the greatest crimes. It was thought he poisoned Philip Earl of Boulogne [F], uncle to St Lewis.

(b) Id. 244.

(c) Father, or, according to others, uncle to Blanche of Navarre, Thibaut's mother.

(d) And not 1277, as La Croix du Maine says, pag. 465.

(e) See the History of St Lewis by Monf. de la Chaille, lib. xi, num. 4, pag. m. 172.

had a delicacy of wit which was extremely surprising, and that Europe never produced such a complete courtier. He adds that Blanche had a very particular esteem for him; that she consulted him on important affairs; that she sometimes preferred his advice to that of others, and that she never denied any of the little favours he asked for his friends. There needed no more, to kindle a jealousy in Thibaut, or to furnish detractors with a fair pretext, to spread injurious reports against the honour of the queen-regent. This they did not fail to do; and what was yet harder the men of letters were the chief promoters of those satires; for the students of the university of Paris, all of them of an age at that time so far advanced, that it would at present appear scandalous for a man of the same age, not to have his degree of doctor (12), being disgusted at the proceedings on occasion of their quarrel with the citizens (13), left the city, after having published licentious songs and verses to blacken the reputation of the Queen-Regent, and the Pope's cardinal legate who governed her (14).

[E] He was a great Poet. Prefident Fauchet speaks thus of him. The Italians formerly so well esteemed the songs of Thibaut King of Navarre, and other French poets, his contemporaries, that they imitated them, as Dante has shewn, who in his Book de Vulgari

Eloquentia, cites this king as an excellent master in Poetry. (15). You will meet with several fragments of this king's poetry in Fauchet's book (16).

[F] It was thought he poisoned Philip Earl of Boulogne. This earl was the son of Philip Augustus, and he was the chief of the league formed against the Regent Blanche, soon after the death of Lewis the VIIIth. 'As his death was very sudden, the people, always prone to calumny, were very willing to ascribe it to a violent cause, and by dark hints charged it on the queen her self. But to Thibaut, Earl of Champagne, attempt to vindicate her would be to injure her: and in reality they fell upon Thibaut in quite another manner, either because he had been the greatest gainer by it, or because being persuaded that he had already made a bloody essay on Lewis the VIIIth, they did not think that he would make any scruple of this second murder. But the truth is, no proof was ever given of his being guilty of either, tho' the manner in which he took the death of the latter, was like enough to make him suspected of having been the cause of it (17). Thus we see how Queen Blanche was made to have a share in every bad action. So hard it is to have a great reputation, and not be exposed to the malice of censorious tongues.

(15) Fauchet, des anciens Poëtes François, book ii, p. 118.

(16) Du Verdier Vau-Privas has inserted in his Bibliothèque Française, what Fauchet says of Thibaut, Earl of Champagne.

(17) Hist. de S. Louis, lib. iii, num. 20, pag. 140.

(12) Hist. de S. Louis, lib. ii, num. 16, p. 71.

(13) These quarrels began in the year 1229. See a short deduction of them in the Hist. de S. Louis, ubi supra.

(14) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. ii, pag. 715.

(6) Epirota patre Venetis genitus. Paulus Jovius, Eleg. cap. xci.

THOMÆUS (NICOLAS LEONICUS) was a famous professor at Padua in the XVIth century. He was a Venetian, originally of Albania (a). He studied the Greek literature at Florence under Demetrius Chalcondylas; and was the first among the Latins who explained in Greek at Padua the works of Aristotle. He resolved to have recourse to the fountain-head, in order to re-establish Philosophy, which he found miserably disfigured by the vain subtilties of the schoolmen, and the speculations of the Arabian Commentators [A]. As he was a great Humanist, we have no reason to be surprised at his dislike of the manner of philosophizing which was practised at that time, nor at his courage in undertaking to explain the Greek text of Aristotle. His manner of living was truly philosophical: he was fond of a studious repose, without giving way to the commotions which emulation and ambition usually inspire (b). He was content with a moderate fortune. He lived frugally and never married [B]. He took the death

(b) Vita ejus procul a contentione ambitione in studio mollique otio versabatur. Jovius, ibid. Præter virtutem bonaque artes tota in vita nullius rei appetens. Petrus Bembus, in Epitaphio Leon Thomæ, apud Chytræum Delic. literar. pag. m. 152.

[A] Philosophy which he found miserably disfigured by . . . the schoolmen, and . . . the Arabians. Paul Jovius happily expresses the sad condition to which the schoolmen had reduced Philosophy. They never enquired after truth; but studied the art of raising objections, and answering them by the help of a hundred new-fangled terms, which they did not themselves understand. 'Philosophiam ex purissimis fontibus, non ex lotulentis rivulis salubriter hauriendam esse perdocebat, explosa penitus sophistarum disciplina, quæ tum inter imperitos, & barbaros principatum in scholis obtinebat, quum doctores excogitatis barbara subtilitate Dialecticorum figmentis, Physicas quæstiones non ad veritatis lucem, sed ad inanem disputandi garrulitatem revocarent; & juvenis in gymnasio Aratum, & Barbarorum commentationes secuta, à recto, munifico itinere in confragosas ignorantie crepidines duceretur (1). . . . He taught that philosophy ought to be derived from the pure source itself, and not from the muddy rivulets, and that they should banish the sophistical learning, which then obtained the ascendant in the schools among the ignorant, when the professors by the invention of logical fictions, and barbarous subtilties reduced all philosophical questions not to the light of truth, but to the vain humour of disputing, and the youth in the university by following the comments of the Arabians and Barbarians were led from truth, and fortified in the craggy precipices of ignorance.'

[B] He was content with a moderate fortune . . . and never married. His chaste and innocent life, is very well expressed in the following citation. 'Pervenit veneranda barbe canitie ad septuagesimum tertium ætatis annum (2), mediocri substantia, ipsaque civili frugalitate, & cælebs & felix, quod nemo vel innocentia, & doctrinæ conscientia, vel munditia coram poris, vel anima nitere, beatior ætate nostra fuerit (3). . . . He arrived to the seventy-third year of his age, with a venerable aspect, a moderate

(2) Spondan. ad ann. 1533, num. 20, makes him live till he was 75 years old. (3) Jovius, Elogiot. cap. xci, pag. 213, a fortune

(1) Paulus Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. xci, pag. m. 213.

(c) Petrus Bem-bus, ibid.

(d) Spondan. ad
ann. 1533, num.
20.

of a crane which he had kept forty years for a preface of his own approaching end [C]. Considering the age he lived to, any thing might have furnished him with such a thought. He succeeded very well in Poetry (c). He died at Padua, in the year 1533, aged seventy-five years (d). I shall speak of his writings in one of my remarks [D]. He had a brother whom Pierius Valerianus ranks amongst the unfortunate learned men [E].

'fortune, great frugality, in a single and happy state, so that no person in our time has been more distinguished, either for the innocency of his life, the sanctity of his doctrine, the neatness of his person, or the brightness of his mind.'

[C] He took the death of a crane which he had kept forty years for a preface of his own approaching end.] For this the same Paul Jovius is also my authority. Aluerat domi gruem, de manus ipsius fenili oblectamento cibaria capientem, per quadraginta annos. Is senio tabefactus quum perisset, & ejus desiderio triste omen concepit, prædixitque nullo laceffitus morbo, se non multo post adamati gruis fatum, maturo vitæ exitu secuturum. --- He had kept in his house for forty years a crane, which in his old age he took a pleasure to feed with his own hand. The crane happening to die of old age, he took the death of it to be ominous, and though he was in good health, foretold that without any distemper, he should follow his favourite bird, and die, at his crane had done, of old age.

[D] I shall speak of his writings in one of my remarks.] He composed, in imitation of the Academics, ten dialogues on curious or important subjects, as de divinatione, de nominum inventionibus, de ludo lalaris, de precibus, de animorum immortalitate, &c. He translated or paraphrased some tracts of Aristotle and Galen (4), and published a miscellany of very fine collections, under the title of Varia Historia, wherein according to the custom of the age he lived in, he never cited those ancient authors who furnished him with materials. As to his translations Huëtius gives him the following good character. 'Emendatus in terpes, ad auctoris nutum totum se fingens (5). --- An exact interpreter, perfectly representing his author.' There is another observation to be made concerning his work intituled de Varia Historia libri tres, that he wrote it when young, but did not publish it till he was very old in the year 1531. This is what he himself says in his epistle dedicatory to Cuthbert Tonstal, Bishop of Durham. 'Commentariolos de Varia Historia quos alias juvenis admodum multiplici cum Græcorum tum Latinorum lectione confeceram seposueramque nunc edendos excudendosve curavi: ut quando maturioris ætatis pleraque jam à me de omnimoda philosophia exierunt opera ex academicorum peripateticorumque fontibus hausta, hæc quoque juvenilia studia nostra sua aliquando mercede non defraudarentur. --- My commentaries on various history, which I composed while very young, with great pains in examining both Latin and Greek authors, and at that time laid by, I do now publish, that since the greatest part of the works of my maturer years on all sorts of philosophical subjects, derived from the fountains of the Academics and Peripatetics have been made public, these studies of my youth also may at last meet with their due reward.'

OBSERVATION concerning juvenile works.

Here is an author who had the prudence not to publish his juvenile productions before he had acquired a great reputation by his works composed in his riper years. This is a very wise conduct; for there are few authors who do not repent the precipitation with which they hurry their first essays into the world, even before the dawn begins to appear on their chin. Grotius, who perhaps had the least reason of any body, to repent of it, was in extreme confusion on this account. 'This is the confession he makes in a letter, wherein he praises Scriverius for the contrary conduct. 'Quo rependam non habeo, ex quo tandem resipiscere cœpi ab ea insaniam, quæ mihi cum aliis nonnullis communis fuit, ut cœca quadam innocentie libidine nihil nisi insaniam meam publicarem, daremque ea mundo spectanda, quæ nunc ne solus quidem apud me sine magno pudore & acridoloris sensu conspicio. Tu vero (dicam non ut blandiar, sed ut raram animi fortitudinem, quam, si possum, imitari velim, sane, quod possum, probem atque commendem) in annos non doctrinæ tantum, sed & sapientiæ capaces, tibi te & publico servasti; & quò nullum maturæ mentis certius esse signum potest, ausus es ita utilitati aliorum studere, ut appareret priorem tibi hujus esse quam gloriæ tuæ rationem (6). --- I am incapable of making any amendment, since I have begun to recover from that madness which was common to me with some others, of publishing, out of a blind ambition of being known, my own disgrace, and of presenting those pieces to the world which now I cannot read my self without great confusion and concern. While you (I do not speak it out of flattery, but that your rare fortitude of mind, which should be imitated by me if it were possible) approved and commended by me since that is possible) have reserved the publication of your self and works, to years, that are capable not only of learning but also of wisdom: and which is the most certain sign of a mature understanding, you have ventured to study the public good in such a manner, that it should appear that you had a much greater regard to this than your own glory.' Those authors who are not quite so hasty in a greater risk; because the world is more inclined to excuse the faults of writers of 15 than those of 20, or 25 years of age. These therefore ought to take special care of their first book; for if it be worth nothing they will find a thousand difficulties to retrieve their reputation, and cure the public of their prejudices. If they with Thomæus keep their juvenile compositions by them till they have established a good reputation, they may then easily pass an indifferent piece upon the world. They must not follow the Italian fashion, where the lacqueys go before their masters; but place the finest of their equipage in the van, to prepossess the spectators in favour of them, and the remainder will follow in time. They would not lose the recompence of their first labours, if they believed with Thomæus that these ought also to meet with their reward. It is undeniable, that at a certain pitch of reputation, authors may put off indifferent performances with success, which would be laughed at, if published by persons not known. But those who make an ill use of this prepossession of the public are very often deceived. They collect all their papers, they go back even to their most trifling manuscripts, written when they were just come from the university; or even while they were students, and send them to the Printer. They at last disgust all their readers, and sometimes are more blamed for their last books, than they were praised for their first.

[E] He had a brother whom Pierius Valerianus ranks amongst the unfortunate learned men.] He would not have been at all inferior to our Thomæus, if he had lived as long: but he died young, and yet he lived long enough to suffer a great deal of misery: short and evil were his days. Let us relate what Valerianus says of him, 'Bartolomæum Leonicum cognomento Fuscum agnovistis, cujus ingenium, & absolutissimam eruditionem omnes admirabamur. Is cum Patavinum bellum, & totius ejus regionis desolationem, incendiaque devitasset, Romæ aliquandiu fuit, sed, cum neque hic otium, quod sibi proposuerat, reperisset, in Cassinatem recessit solitudinem, facta illi a loci illius monachis, quiescendi copia; sed, dum hic sperat scripta sua luculentissima maturare, & immortalæ sibi gloriæ comparare, paucis postquam illuc secesserat diebus, rapidissima correptus febri, cum ægrotaffet gravissimè, valetudinis ejus violentia sublatus est: futurus dubio procul Leonico Thomeo germano fratri non inferior, si fata eum diutius in vita esse voluissent (7). --- You knew Bartolomew Leonicus, surnamed Brown, whose genius and complete erudition we all admired. This man after he had escaped from the Paduan war, and the desolation and the burning of all that country, made some stay at Rome, but when he could not there find the leisure which he wanted, he retired into the solitude of mount Cassin, the Monks of that place giving him a retirement; but whilst he was in hopes of completing his excellent writings and of gaining immortal glory, a few days after he retired thither, he was suddenly

(6) Grotius's letter, in which he thanks Scriverius for a copy of the authors, de Re Militari, dated June 8, 1607, in my edition it is at the beginning. To this example of Grotius, add those alleged by Mr Baillet, in the first Tome des Savans, Part. ii. ch. ii.

(7) Pier. Valerianus, de Literariorum Infelicitate, lib. ii. p. 24.

'suddenly seized with a fever, and the violence of his
'dysenter carried him off. Had he lived longer, he | 'Thomas.'

T H O M A S (PAUL) Sieur de Girac, son of Paul Thomas Sieur de Maisfonette [A], was a very learned man, a good neighbour, and hearty friend to Balzac. The fame of his wit and learning had never perhaps extended beyond the walls of Engoulême his native place, if he had not criticised the works of Voiture: but this critical piece, though a small dissertation, occasioned a long controversy which made a great noise in the world. Costar, Voiture's friend, had no sooner seen this dissertation, but he undertook to refute it. This design, which he executed very slowly, and with abundance of artifice, as it is said, succeeded to his wish [B]. He published a defence of Voiture which was very much esteemed [C]. Girac thought himself obliged to reply; and he did not make use of Latin, as he had done in his first dissertation, but defended himself in French, the language in which Costar had published the apology for his friend. The design of Girac's answer (a) was not only to defend his criticism on Voiture's letters, but also to censure some faults of Costar. For this reason the latter replied in two pieces, one of which was an apology for himself, and the other the sequel of his defence of Voiture. His adversary returned to the charge, and published a large volume against that Sequel. The controversy went no further; and indeed it had been carried to the greatest extremities which the French language is capable of bearing on serious subjects. Costar was a rallying wit, who when he began to strike, gave heavy blows. He made both Balzac and Girac feel the weight of them in his first defence. An author, when he is piqued, commonly imagines that he does not take sufficient revenge, unless the strokes he returns are heavier than those he has received. Girac followed this principle in his answer, as did Costar likewise in his new defences; and Girac answering them in the same strain, carried the invective to the highest pitch. To meet with books more abusive than this reply, we must have recourse either to those who write in Latin, or to those who have written in French not long ago in some towns of Holland, which I will not name. Girac had the advantage of striking the first and the last blow. There was another thing which evidently proved that the victory was on his side, and this was

Costar's

(a) He published it in the year 1655, and joined with it his Latin dissertation, which had been already printed in the second edition of his Defence of Voiture. I have an edition of this defence printed at Paris in the year 1664, wherein it is said in the advertisement that this was the first time Mr Girac's Latin Dissertation was published. How ridiculous it is to affirm this in the year 1664!

[A] The son of Paul Thomas Sieur de Maisfonette.]

(1) Colomessus, Gallie Oriental. pag. 183.

Mr de Girac's father was born at Jarnac (1), but lived at Engoulême; he understood Hebrew very well, as appears by these words of Jarrige: Father Beaufés having last year received from one of our ministers a letter in Hebrew, travelled all night from Ruffec to Angoulême, to get it translated and answered by Mr Thomas de Maisfonette, a learned man, who is perfectly acquainted with that language. This honest gentleman cannot deny the truth of what I say (2). Mr Colomies (3) cites this passage of Jarrige, and says (4), that he had read Mr de Maisfonette's poems with pleasure, and that Balzac praised him in his Latin letters (5), as did also

(2) Réponse aux colonnes de Jacques Beaufés, chap. ii.

(3) Colom. Gallie Oriental. pag. 184.

[B] This design, which he executed very slowly, and with abundance of artifice, as it is said, succeeded to his wish.] A little after the impression of Voiture's works, Balzac, who, perhaps could not see the good reception they met with, without chagrin, desired Mr Girac to give him his opinion of them. Mr Girac, in compliance to his friend, wrote a Latin dissertation on that subject, and Balzac communicated it to Costar, to have his sentiment of it. Costar thought this a favourable opportunity of signalizing himself, and as he believed that Balzac was not displeased that some faults had been found in Voiture, he resolved to make such an apology for the latter, as might indirectly reflect upon the former. But in order to take the surer measures, He at first excused himself as not being able to give his opinion on Girac's remarks, alledging a thousand affairs, which deprived him of all leisure for it. At last, some years after, and when it was least expected, he sent his defence in manuscript to Mr Balzac, conjuring him, that if he found any lines in it which displeased him, to blot them out, to commit them to the flames, or throw them into the water, for he absolutely abandoned them to him. In the mean time this book, which is nothing but a satire, attacking the reputation of the person to whom it is addressed, notwithstanding all the professions of loving and honouring him, was printed, and in every body's hands, before the manuscript reached him (6). A passage in the Menagiana makes me doubt whether the last part of Girac's relation is true. I do not believe that the defence of Voiture was printed before the author sent the manuscript copy to Mr de Balzac. For I find this in the Menagiana (7): 'Mr de Balzac, . . . after having obliged Mr de Girac to write in Latin

(6) Girac, Préface de la Réponse à la Défense de Voiture.

(7) Pag. 166, of the first Dutch edition.

against Voiture's Letters, engaged also Mr Costar to undertake the defence of them, and to write against Girac; this was to make sure of the praises of both parties. I was going through Mans in my return to Paris, when the Defence was finished. Mr Costar gave me two copies of it, one to be sent to Mr Pinchessne, Mr de Voiture's nephew, and the other, to Mr Conrart. He told me he freely submitted it to all the alterations which his friends would propose, whether it were by adding or retrenching. One of the copies was communicated to Mr de Balzac, who sent his corrections. In the mean while the work was printed, and his corrections not coming till the impression was finished, he was informed that they came too late; and the book appeared as such as it was, which gave him some uneasiness. Compare this with Mr Costar's account (8); and with a letter of Balzac to Conrart (9), and you will plainly see that Balzac received the manuscript, before the book was printed. This will not hinder several people from believing that Balzac was imposed upon, and that all the excuses grounded upon Voiture's nephew, causing the book to be printed without Costar's knowledge, are but so many insults. The wars of authors have their stratagems, as well as those of princes; and it is probable that this was a stratagem of the pen-combatants, which was practised on this occasion against Balzac. The impression went on, and was finished in spite of the strong opposition he made by means of Mr Conrart (10).

[C] Costar . . . published a Defence of Voiture, which was very much esteemed.] It may be said that this book made him known to the world; after this, his name was spread every where, and, what is much better, by means of this book, he obtained a pension of five hundred crowns. He could not help, says Mr Girac (11), expressing on all occasions, his satisfaction and joy, that he had been acquainted with me. And, indeed, in what corner of France has he not published, that he was infinitely obliged to me for having given him an opportunity of making himself known to the world; and that by my means the eyes of all the learned and polite were fixed on him, and that to me he owed the glory and applause which he received from all parts, and what he esteemed yet much more, that I have been the cause of his having gained five hundred crowns? I have seen several of his letters, which are all in the same tone, and I have not met with one of

(8) Suite de la Défense, pag. 20, & seq.

(9) The xvth of the ivth book, dated the 15th of June 1653.

(10) Ubi supra.

(11) Réplique à Costar, pag. 3, 4, Dutch edition. See also the Menagiana, pag. 368, 369.

VOL. V.

R r r r

Costar's using all his interest to obtain of the magistrates that his antagonist's reply should be suppressed [D]. The reason he alledged that his morals were attacked is, generally speaking, somewhat specious; nevertheless in this case it was of no force [E]; for he was

* Epist. Dedic. to the Suite de la Deff.

of his friends who has not thanked me in his name, for having occasioned this happy book, which his Eminence had thought worthy of his liberality *. These are his own words in his Epistle Dedicatory.

[D] Costar used all his interest to obtain of the magistrates, that his antagonist's Reply should be suppressed. It is less shameful for a Logician to be guilty of the fault which they call υσταχθισις εις αλλο γινος, to slip, to run from the question, to ramble out of the way, in order to catch at another difficulty, than it is for a man of wit, after having for some time combated with his pen, to quit that weapon, and have recourse to the arms of the civil magistrate. This is visibly giving ground, quitting the field of battle, and throwing away his sword and buckler, in order the sooner to reach a place of refuge, and hide himself behind an altar. I am surprized that Costar, who was a person of wit and penetration, did not foresee that his conduct would meet with this construction, and be compared to that of a Gentleman who, in a quarrel, where his honour is concerned, should apply himself to the civil magistrate, instead of having recourse to his sword. He answered, and replied to the criticism on Voiture, he treated his adversary as ill as he pleased, he charged him with a thousand faults, and after having taken the greatest liberty which the Republic of Letters allowed him, he betook himself to the Lieutenant-Civil, to hinder his adversary from making his defence, and using the same liberty. This was a loud injustice; but the fear which such a conduct betrayed was yet more apparent than the injustice of it. Girac was not silent on this head; he sufficiently insulted his adversary. 'What is become, says he (12),

(12) In his first letter to Mr de Montausier at the beginning of his reply, fol. 3 verso.

† Sequel of the defence, pag. 12, L. 366.

(13) Girac, ibid.

‡ Sequel. pag. 424.

§ L. 334.

(14) Girac, ubi supra, fol. 5 verso.

'of the generous sentiments of this bravo, who, not long ago, styled himself a gentleman of Pomerania, and Orondates junior †; who boasted of his feats, and of always having the sacred larus of antient civility, so deeply engraven in his mind, that it was impossible for him to violate or infringe them. If these frivolous and ridiculous imaginations are evaporated, and Mr Costar's brain is no longer troubled with such visions, does he not see, (to express myself in plainer terms), to what confusion and scandal a man of letters, as he is, exposes himself, who, when accused of a thousand instances of ignorance, a thousand blunders, and a thousand absurdities, recurs to the civil magistrate, and to his interest, to suppress the books which convict him, instead of defending his opinions, or owning his errors?' He made another advantage of the great confusion and disorder which appeared in the conduct of his adversary. This disorder, says he (13), appeared very plainly through the whole course of his proceeding, but nothing published it more effectually, than the protestation he made so publicly ‡, never to read, while he lived, any thing which went under my name. For if his hatred or contempt of me was so great, that he would never look on any of my books, why does he give himself so much trouble to hinder their publication? Why does he so loudly protest §, that in the pursuit of so vast a design which he proposed, he will not be diverted by the way; that the stones which I shall throw at him will not be able to stop him; that he should have a heap of them to denote his victory, and that tho' I should continue to sling at him, he would not so much as turn his head. However, neither the sacred obligation of an oath, nor such a solemn protestation could hinder him from reading my book, nay, from bribing my Printer, in order to get all the sheets of my book, as fast as printed off. But, to continue his allegory, I had scarce taken this fatal sling into my hand, but this intrepid, this terrible and haughty Goliath was so shamefully struck with fear, that he fled out for help, and implored the assistance of the civil magistrate. Yet this hope will be in vain, and I desire no other proofs of his flight and of victory, if I may so call the defeat of so cowardly an enemy, than the pains he takes to avoid me.'

[E] The reason he alledged . . . was nevertheless of no force. Let us hear Girac a little farther (14). 'By what authority therefore does he presume to proscribe authors, and act the tyrant in an empire, which hath always maintained the possession of an entire and perfect liberty? It is, indeed, an unprecedented attempt, and worthy of the arrogance of my adversary. For though he covered his design with a more specious pretext, and took other measures to obtain that sentence, in which he now triumphs, it is imposing on the judge and the world, to persuade them that he was forced to take those measures, by the pretended calumnies cast on his religion and morals. And he must surely be a very nice man to complain of two or three short letters which I have made use of, when he cannot deny that he wrote them, and at the same time must own that what he himself has printed on these matters is much more shameful and scandalous. Besides, they were in the hands of all the curious, and publicly read in every province where Mr Costar is known.'

After having alledged some other reasons to justify the use he made of these letters, he goes on in this manner (15): 'It must therefore be, because he blushes

'to see his fraud, insincerity, false learning, and misunderstanding of authors detected. He is concerned to find himself disturbed in that fine, general, and long enjoyed reputation, which he fancies he possessed without any interruption, and that the enchantments and illusions by which he made a bad cause appear good, will no longer prove effectual. He knows very well that his fine language, the only thing that has any charm in his writings, will no longer impose upon the credulous. He is apprehensive that instead of lofty epithets of illustrious, the ornament of France, and the glory of our age, he should be taken for an ignominious ramus, a giddy-headed man, and a plagiarist. These are the genuine motives which made him take the resolution of having recourse to chicanery, as the last refuge of a desperate cause, amidst the trouble, confusion and disorder to which he is reduced.'

Some, perhaps, may say, that Costar was not so unjust as certain persons, to desire that he might be allowed to write against his adversary, but his adversary not allowed to answer him (16). He was willing that the Lieutenant-Civil should include him in the prohibition, and make an order that neither Mr Costar nor Mr Girac should, for the future, write against one another: but this is saying very little in favour of Costar; for having published all he had to say, he could be very little affected by a prohibition of writing any more. His advantage was to have his adversaries hands tied up. 'Truly, says Mr Girac (17), it is not an easy matter to conceive what could oblige the Lieutenant-Civil, to order that Mr Costar and I should not, for the future, write against one another; when I had not yet begun to defend myself (18), and my adversary had published three large volumes, in which he had treated me in so opprobrious a manner, and loaded me with so much calumny, that I must of necessity either refute him, or suffer very greatly in my reputation. I must allow a school-master, who scarce knows the first elements and principles of Science, to raise himself on my ruins, and procure himself an esteem at my expense. So that whatever resolution I may have taken to stifle my just complaints against the injury which has been done me; I cannot help saying of this sentence of the Lieutenant-Civil what an excellent person  said long ago of that of a certain Emperor. This sentence destroys itself, it confounds and overturns all things, and, under the pretext of a fallacious humanity, covers an extreme and unprecedented rigour. It binds the hands of the accused, in order to deliver him up a prey to his enemies; it robs oppressed innocence of what the severest laws never refused to the most guilty criminal, as it takes away all possible means of justification, by imposing silence on the person accused. It forbids Mr Costar to say any thing more to me, after he has so long worn out my patience, and tired his own cruelty and rage with abusing me. Was there ever a more capacious, more unjust, or more deceitful contrivance?' I must observe to my reader, that Girac does not forget the passage of Tacitus concerning Crematius Cordus. Thus

(15) Ibid.

(16) See the book intitled La Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam démontrée, pag. 63, of the preface.

(17) Girac, ubi supra.

(18) This must be understood of the sequel of the defence of Voiture and of Costar's apology. The Lieutenant's sentence preceded Girac's reply in this respect, but before this sentence, Girac had answered the defence of Voiture. Wherefore he does not express himself exactly.

 Tertullian, in his apology.

was not accused without proof [F], and that ought rather to have engaged the judges to he shews, in the conduct of his adversary, not only a great deal of injustice, but also a great deal of imprudence; for Tacitus observes, that the prohibition of a book gains it a reputation.

A REFLEXION on the conduct of authors, who procure the prohibition of the books of their adversaries.

It is evident, that an author who employs the authority of the civil magistrate, for the prohibition of books written against him, manifestly betrays his defeat and inability to answer, while he increases the curiosity of the public after those very books. Why then do so many authors recur to this method, when they have interest enough to make it effectual. Is it a very agreeable thing, to declare to all the world that they are not able to resist an author who is their adversary? Can self-love find it's account in raising a desire to read those books in several people, who would otherwise never hear of them, and who buy them on no other account but because they are informed that those books are prohibited? Can self-love, I say, which is so angry at the contents of them, and so eager to stifle the memory of them, find it's account in putting the public upon enquiring more curiously into the particulars contained in them? What charm can there be in publishing a sentence of prohibition of certain books in the Gazettes? Is not this the way to proclaim to all Europe the shameful necessity a man lies under of imploring that assistance of the civil magistrate, which he ought only to seek from his pen (19)? I think it may be said, in answer to these questions, that the authors who take such measures, find no great satisfaction in them at the bottom. It is only a last shift, to which they give the most comfortable turn they possibly can. They endeavour to regain, by their own interest, what they have lost by the pen of their adversaries. They would keep the populace on their side; the populace, I say, who are always prone to judge the strongest party in the right: they would prevent the attacks of other adversaries; for how many persons are there who are silent on the injustice of a man, only in proportion to the good or ill he is able to do by his interest? Not to say that they hope a great many unwary readers will conclude that a book which is prohibited, must be stuffed with fallacies. It is true, that several people are guilty of this wretched reasoning; for they do not consider that the civil magistrates, even when they suppress a book for prudential reasons, and agreeably to their regulations, do not pretend to prejudice the public against the facts contained in it, for they take no cognizance of them, nor do they pretend to be judges of them. This seems to me one of the principle motives which engages certain authors to hold the same conduct with Coftar; a conduct far from being honourable, to say no worse of it, and entirely sophistical. Is it not a meer sophistry to change the state of the question? Was the dispute between Coftar and Girac any way concerning their greater or less credit with the Judges of the Chatelet? Did Mr Girac, confined within his province, pretend to have more friends, or greater interest than his adversary in the capital city, in order to solicit a process? The question was, whether Voiture's thoughts were right or wrong, whether he had been strongly censured, and weakly defended, or the reverse. What does it avail in this question, to have interest enough with the Lieutenant-Civil to get a book suppressed?

[F] He was not accused without proof. It ill becomes a pastor, a priest, a minister, to employ his pen on subjects of gallantry and pleantry. For which reason Mr Coftar, who was a priest, had the cure of souls, and was an Arch-deacon (20), forgot his character, and all the rules of decency, when he employed his wit in being waggish with the fair sex, and interperfed his letters with a great many wanton stories. His adversary cruelly persecuted him on this head; if a war so justly founded deserves the name of persecution. On this passage, in a letter of Coftar to a maid, Your nimble feet dance in perfidion, they help you to fly top over tail, to shew the forked tree, and represent a thou and other fine figs. Girac says (21), that when the Arch-deacon saw this young lady in so pleasant a posture, he was not so hard-hearted as that hermit (22), who turned the hair of some young girls perfectly grey, because they laughed at his not daring to see them naked. Mr Coftar (says he) is too gallant a man to impose such severe penances on the ladies; and if such an adventure should happen to him, I dare swear for him, he would sooner wish that he had not a grey hair himself, than cover the heads of those poor wretches with them (23). (23) Ubi supra, He will not pardon this Arch-deacon for saying in a letter to a lady, where he represents himself at the point of death. I cannot tell where I shall undergo my purgatory; it would be a most agreeable consolation, if I might be permitted to undergo it in your chamber. I should have so much pleasure to see you so charming, &c (24). (24) Coftar, Letter cxxxviii. Tom. i. Nor will he pardon the pity which Coftar expresses for one of the Graces on account of her husband's impotence. He rails against the Poets for their cruelty, and even impertinence in marrying one of the Graces to Vulcan, and another to Sleep. However, continues he, the first was not awfully disconsolate, if what a Queen of the Amazons said be true, that lame men kiss best, ἀϊσα χαλκός οἶσσι. But he deploras the miserable condition of the second, since Virgil has told us, that sleep is soft, & somno mollior herba. What an excellent quality is this in the husband of a goddess everlastingly young! It was a great happiness for him that Pasithea (so she is called) was soluta zonâ, as were all the Graces, & solutis Gratiz Zonis, or else

Quærendum aliunde foret (nervosius illud) Quod posset zonam solvere virginem (25).

(25) Girac, ubi supra, pag. 22.

He will not forgive Coftar the explication he had given of these words in Horace (26), Bacchum in remotis carminibus rupibus Vide docentem. I have recited it in the article SICYONE. He is charged with yet grosser impurities, extracted from his printed works (27); he is even censured for a letter he wrote to his Physician. This indeed was not printed; but as he distributed copies of it every where (28), his adversary made no scruple to charge him publicly with it. He had still some remains of a fever on him, and finding two nights successively that nature revived, he wrote this agreeable news to his Physician (29), desiring to be informed whether he might rely on an old proverb, which represents this symptom as a sign of recovery. As this letter is short, and in Latin, I shall make no difficulty to print it at large: Febbris mea longè remissior fuit quàm fuerat hæctenus, hac nocte placidissimè quievi, haud scio an usquam melius. Sub ortum Solis (neque enim tibi & medico & amicissimo viro quicquam reticere æquum est) valida tentigine, & satis diuturna & non insuavi, quod & heri acciderat, correptus sum. Lufit animus aliquantulum in umbra voluptatis, sed ne de Theologo malè sentias, dormiebam. Vides, mi colendissime seu potius mi jucundissime senex, nondum in me fuerat esse eam partem corporis, cui apodixin defunctoriam scribere paratus eram. Vetus verbum est, id jam jam reditura sanitatis argumentum indubitatum esse. Verum uni tibi plus credo quàm univervis adagiis. Si commodum est ad me scribas velim hac de re quid sentias, hoc est quid sentire debeam. Ride, vale, & me ama, alioquin nec ridebo, nec valebo (30). - - - My fever is very much abated, and I do not remember that I ever had a better night in my life than the last. About sun-rise (for I ought to conceal nothing from you, who are my Physician and intimate friend) I was seized with a strong tension, which was of some continuance as well as pleasure; and I met with the same symptom yesterday. My mind sported a little in the shadow of pleasure, but that you may suspect nothing amiss in a Divine, I assure you I slept. You find, my worthy, or rather my merry old friend, that I have not yet buried that part of the body, for which I was preparing to write an epitaph. The old proverb makes it an undoubted sign of returning health. But I rely more upon your opinion than all the proverbs in the world. I beg you would write to me, if you conveniently can, and let me know what you think of this matter, that is, what I ought to think of it myself. Laugh, farewell, and love me, otherwise I shall neither laugh, nor farewell. Balzac having read this letter, wrote to Coftar, among other things, as follows. Now, that I see by your's to Mr le Gouff, that you are not content with health alone, but pretend to vigour, and look rather like a stout wrestler than a man who is barely well, I do not know, &c (31). It must be owned that these reproaches regarded Mr Coftar's morals; but this was no reason why

(19) Between author and author, the weapons ought to be equal, each ought to have recourse to his pen alone. He may be allowed to lay dextra mihi Deus & firram quod misile libo: (Virgil. Æn. lib. x. ver. 773.) If he says, I will have recourse to the civil magistrate and to my interest with the gods of the earth, he is like a champion who arms himself against a naked man.

(20) Girac's Reply, iii, pag. 25.

(21) Ibid. pag. 29.

(22) He cites Theodoret's Hist. Relig.

(23) See the Entretien de Coftar & de Voiture, pag. 200. Girac's Reply, pag. 23, 24, and the New Letters against Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, pag. 743.

(24) Girac, pag. 21.

(25) His name was Mr le Gouff, a Physician of Niort.

(30) Girac, ibid.

(31) Balzac, Lettres Choieses, Part. ii, Lett. iii, pag. 562, cited by Girac, ibid.

to license than to prohibit Girac's book [G]. Patin has not spoken very exactly of this dispute [H]. One cannot sufficiently wonder at the nicety of Voiture's friends; they pretended that Girac for daring to criticise upon him, deserved Military execution [I]. The passage which proves this, informs us that this author was rich. The same thing is affirmed in a passage of Balzac [K]. What I have said concerning Mr de Girac in why the Chatelet ought to suppress Mr Girac's Reply, since it could not pass for a libel; for the author puts his name to it, and proved his accusations.

[G] And that ought rather to have engaged the Judges to license than to prohibit Girac's book! A critical book, which strongly represents to a Priest, the ill use he makes of his time and wit, is no unprofitable work. On the contrary, the public good seems to require that there should be men bold enough to censure those Ecclesiastics whose life is not conformable to their profession. Now it is leading a life very inconsistent with the duty of a Priest, who had the cure of souls, and was an Arch-deacon, as Mr Costar was, to set up for a wit, and to spend the best part of his time in reading books of gallantry, and writing, what they call fine things, to ladies and gentlemen. This ought to be left to the Voitures and the Sarrazins, and, in general, to those who are not of a profession which forbids their meddling with trifles. Or if the inclination be strongly bent, and the person have a happy talent that way, he ought to keep in a lay-station; and then he is free to make as many verses, and write as many letters of gallantry as he pleases. He may jest and trifle in his books at discretion, and laugh at the four censurer who is displeased with it. But if he enters upon an ecclesiastical life, and takes on him the charge of souls, or is only in orders, he ought not to play the galant, either with his tongue, or his pen. Nay, methinks it were to be wished that the rewards which the Voitures, the Sarrazins, and other fine wits, have a just claim to, were not assigned them out of the revenues of the Church, as they are very frequently

(32) See the article BENSERADE, remark [E], and the article RONSARD, remark [O].

(33) The Ménagiana, pag. 90, of the first Dutch edition, says this of Mr Costar.

(34) In a letter dated October 25, 1658, being the lxxiv of the first edition, and the cxxii, of the second.

(35) This does not agree with Girac's letter to Mr de Montausier, dated March the 1st, 1659. (It is at the beginning of his Reply) where he says. Having all my life professed my hatred of law-suits, and that I would, as much as possible, seek for that tranquillity and ease of mind, which are incompatible with the fatigues, the tricks and quirks of the bar; I heartily renounce the prosecution of injuries which I have received. See also his Reply, §. xii, pag. 93.

(36) Biblioth. François, ch. viii, last section.

and does not forget to tell us that Mr Girac's last reply, though the impression of it was stopped, had lately been published (37). Some are of opinion, adds he, that Mr Girac is in the right to defend himself; others say, he ought not to have continued this quarrel after the death of Costar, who cannot reply. These last words are liable to censure. Sorel speaks of Girac as of a man who was living in the year 1667, when he had been dead four years. He speaks of his Reply as of a work just published; and yet there had been an edition of it (38) in the year 1660. He ought to have blamed those who censured Girac for continuing this war after Costar's death. Such censurers were very unreasonable, since Girac's reply was printed in Costar's life-time; and if it was not sold, this was because Costar had interest enough to hinder it. Was it therefore just, under pretence that he was dead, that is to say, that he could no longer oppress his adversary by his interest with the Chatelet, to deprive the author of his right of publishing his vindication, and the Bookseller of the means of recovering the money laid out in the impression?

[I] Voiture's friends . . . pretended . . . that Girac . . . deserved military execution.] Costar informs us of it (39). 'To speak truth, a man of this humour is very liable to be beaten (I mean with the tongue and pen) for we do not live in an age so licentious as that, when the Roman young gentlemen walked in the streets the whole day, with long rods concealed under their robes, to chastise the insolence of those who did not approve of the Poet Lucilius, if such people were so unhappy as to fall in their way (40). Nevertheless Mr Girac is in danger of quartering some Gens d'Armes, if they pass through Angoulême; and I wonder that he who is not very neglectful of his interest, and is very careful of his affairs, should forget the Captain who told him two or three years ago: out of respect to the Marquis de Montausier I will prevent my company quartering upon you: he is a Lord to whom I owe every thing; but it is on condition that you do not pretend to write any more against Voiture (41). I can hardly imagine what could make Mr Girac so little afraid of those menaces, unless he fancied that being a celebrated author, he had no occasion for the recommendation of any body, and that his book alone would prove an inviolable safe-guard against the soldiers.' He afterwards alleges the regard Alexander had for Pindar's house, and that of Alphonfus King of Arragon for a seat of Cicero, and concludes with these words. I know all this, and something more; and yet if Mr de Girac was my friend, I would not advise him to depend on these great examples, but to take better securities against the Captain, Protector, and Avenger of the Wits. Can any thing be more extravagant than this Captain's pretension? He would have all the world approve Voiture; and no fault to be found in the works of that author, and he threatened to quarter his company upon the village of him who should dare to criticize upon this fine genius. Is not this a fine way of revenging a friend? Is not this introducing a military government into the Republic of Letters, the most free state in the world? Behold the effects of prepossession! Voiture's relations and friends had a mind to set him up for the Pope of Wit, and to constitute him in all matters which came within that province, an infallible rule of Orthodoxy. They ought at least to have been contented with the excommunications of Parnassus against those who should dispute the infallibility of such a Pontif. But they threatened them with the quartering of soldiers. A strange way of converting Heretics in wit! Does not this resemble the French dragooning?

[K] The same thing is affirmed in a passage of Balzac.] Girac answering his adversary on the threats of this Captain revenger of the wits, declares, That he had hitherto been so happy as to have no soldiers quartered in his village (42). He was therefore Lord of a village (43). By what follows, it appears that his

(37) Ibid. pag. 142, edition of 1667.

(38) At Leyden, in 8vo.

(39) Sequel of the Defence, pag. 40, 41.

(40) See the remark LUCILIUS, remark [P].

(41) Girac answers this in §. xii, pag. 93.

(42) Replique, §. xii, pag. 93.

(43) This village was near Engouland.

the project of this Dictionary, shall be one of the remarks of this article [L]. You will find in it the time of his death, and with what restriction we are to understand an encomium bestowed on him on account of his knowledge in the oriental languages.

The judgment of Mr Chevreau concerning these two celebrated combatants, Girac and Costar, gives all the advantage to the former [M]. I doubt not but that the most intelligent judges would agree with Chevreau, if they would take the pains to examine all the pieces of this controversy: Those who should search to the bottom of this dispute, would probably find a new reason to pass sentence against Costar, for using Mr Balzac very ill. He is severely censured for it in the preface to Balzac's Entretiens. Mr du Rondel, who from his youth has been a great admirer of Balzac, and does yet continue so as much as ever [N], was so incensed at this conduct of Costar, that he hardly forbore writing against him.

(44) Balzac's Dissertation to Dom Andr. de St Denys, at the end of his Socrate Chrétien, pag. 201, 202.

(45) In his Dissertation against Voiture, he says, Qui enim ego medius in filvis occupat a rusticis que plemus & in-juriam judicem de homine.

(46) Balzac, ubi supra, pag. 203, says, My friend, though a great Poet, and as elevated a genius as the greatest Poets, is at present employed in more earthly, and meaner thoughts. For a trifle of six thousand crowns, or thereabouts, he has made no conscience of clearing the shades, &c.

(47) Biblioth. Choiseul, pag. 9.

(48) Gallia Orientalis, p. 217.

(49) In a discourse printed with the Socrate Chrétien, pag. m. 298, and the following pages.

(50) Dictionary, French and Latin, printed at Limoges, 1664.

(51) Chap. vii, last section.

(52) Continuation of the Defence of Voiture, pag. 77.

(53) Balzac, Epist. Select. t. pag. m. 294.

lands were very well wooded. (44) The passage in the Dissertation which you desire should be cleared, is a piece of his History. Those Silvæ which now employ Mr de Girac (45), are not metaphorical, and of the same nature with those of Statius or Politian. But in the common language, it is a wood which he has filled, and sold for 1500 Pistoles (46). But what will Diana and the nymphs, the Dryads and Hamadryads, Pan and the Sylvans, say of all this? If the whole train of petty gods could but find a Poet at their devotion, what Elegiac complaints, what Iambic imprecations would be levelled against another Poet, who so cruelly drives them from their ancient abode, who wounds and murders the nymphs with the hard blow of the ax, and gives them the last fatal stroke, by felling the sacred trees in which they inhabited?

Non sine Hamadryadis fato, prostrata bipenni
Alta cadit quercus: clausam sub cortice Nympham Mors eadem plantamque manet.

*When the sharp ax falls down a lofty oak,
Some Hamadryad feels the fatal stroke:
The nymph who lives within the bark conceal'd
Meets the same death to which the tree must yield.*

[L] What I have said . . . in the project of this Dictionary shall be one of the remarks of this article. I declared very freely that I thought Mr Girac was in the wrong to blame Costar on account of the marrow of the lions, wherewith several authors say that Achilles was fed: and thereupon I made the following remark. By this we do not pretend to derogate from his merit, or adjudge the victory to his adversary. If, on the one side, Costar's thoughts seem more shining and brightened by the sun of the capital city, as Mr Balzac would say, it appears, on the other side, that Monsieur de Girac had more learning. It was a great loss that he died so young. In a word, I very readily subscribe with Mr Colomies (47), but with the restriction hereafter mentioned, to the fine elegy which Mr de Balzac bestows on Mr de Girac in one of his Latin letters, and which Mr Colomies cites (48), as well as to the praises which Balzac gives him in French (49), and to those which Father Gaudin has bestowed on him in the Preface to his Dictionary (50). According to that Preface Mr de Girac died the second of January 1663. Mr Colomies, says he, died in April following. However his death should not have been wholly unknown, as it was to Sorel, when he published his Bibliothèque Française, in the year 1664, and when he renewed and enlarged it in 1667, where he treats (51) very fully of the controversy betwixt Costar and Girac; on this head see also Guy Patin's seventy-fourth letter. The difference amongst authors concerning the death of illustrious men is incredible. And yet this subject does not seem liable to many variations.

The restriction I promised is as follows. Mr de Balzac writing to Scipio le Gaillard (to Mr Costar (52) explains Balzac's Scipionis jucundo) says that Mr Girac understood Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, beyond what is possible to conceive. 'Habeo jam certe quicum non solum suavitissimo sermone horas confuso, sed etiam a quo recedo semper & melior & doctior. Paulum Thomam à Giraco, paternâ virtute, sua virtute clarissimum; rerum divinarum & humanarum cognitione instructum, à prima adolescentia: litteris Latinis, Græcis, Hebræicis supra quam credibile est, ornatum; omnibus denique & naturæ & artis præfidiis ad dicendum, ad scribendum paratum (53).--- I now have one with whom I not only spend my hours in the most agreeable manner, but also from whom I always depart both wiser and better. Paul Thomas de Girac, famous both for his family's virtues and his own; instructed from his infancy in all sort of learning both divine and human; skilled in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, above what can be imagined; and qualified both for speaking and writing with all accomplishments both natural and acquired.' Mr Costar taking occasion from this character to rally his adversary, represented (54) him deeply engaged in the bulky volumes of the Latins, Greeks, Hebrews, Arabians, &c. less sensible of the beauties of modern authors, than of those that appear in some dead or oriental language, and spending the best of his time on a scholiast on Lycophron, or perhaps on Rabbi Nephthali; whereupon Mr Girac makes this fair confession to him: You think perhaps, says he (55), to reproach me with an odious thing, which, if it were true, I should take for a great honour; but as I always act with sincerity and truth, you may if you please be satisfied, that my studies are scarce yet advanced beyond the Greek and Latin tongues; that I scarce understand the principles of the Hebrew tongue, and am entirely ignorant of the Arabic and Oriental languages, which you mention to cry me down. This was acting like a man of honour who would not take advantage of the flatteries of his friend, to impose on the public; he does not deserve to have these words of Horace applied to him,

Sed vereor ne cui de te plus quam tibi credas (56). I fear, when you shou'd to yourself be known, You'll trust another's thoughts more than your own.

This is properly making a good use of this distich of Cato:

Cum te aliquis laudat, judex tuus esse memento:
Plus aliis de te quam tu tibi credere noli.

*When others praise, you your own judge should be,
Nor credit more than in yourself you see.*

If Mr Colomies had observed Girac's answer, he had not placed him in his Gallia Orientalis.

[M] The judgment of Mr Chevreau . . . gives all the advantage to Girac. The particulars of this judgment are these. 'I dare aver to you . . . that there is a very considerable difference betwixt Mr de Girac and Mr Costar: The first pushes with all his force; and the other shuffles and does not parry at all: or, to speak plainer, Mr Costar does his utmost to resist truth and reason by dint of common-places; and contents himself with denying what the other proves. To re-assume the former figure. The one charges home and overthrows whatever resists him. The other rallies as well as he can, and disputes what he is assured never to obtain. The victor is astonished at the weakness of his enemy; and the vanquished rallies with no ill grace (57).'

[N] Mr du Rondel is as much as ever an admirer of Balzac. This is what he wrote to me, on his reading the first tome of the Mélanges of Vigneul Marville: 'Several other things please me in this Miscellany (58); but there are two or three which I do not like; particularly amongst the rest what he says of Balzac. Such a man should not be mentioned without respect and veneration. Without him our language at this time would be wavering and uncertain; and we are obliged to him for knowing how to speak and write. It is true that in the examples

(54) Costar's Defence of Voiture.

(55) Girac's answer to the defence of Voiture, pag. 47.

(56) Horat. lib. i, Epist. xvi. ver. 19.

(57) Chevreau, Oeuvres mêlées, pag. 350.

(58) He pointed out to me several places which he liked in that book.

'he has left us he seems to brave rather than instruct us. His elevation is so lofty, so nervous, so majestic, and he maintains himself so well in his height and sphere, that he is perfectly inaccessible; but this is not his fault at the bottom. If no body has followed him, this cannot prejudice either the uncommonness of his merit, the vigour of his motion, or the beauty of his flight; they rather make him the more remarkable. Let the Voitures be allowed to write prettily, naturally, and in the plain common stile; this suits very well with them, and they cannot do better. But let us not be angry with Balzac, for being exalted above mankind, by the most charming, most noble, and most glorious attempt that was ever made. Before him the sublime stile was unknown in France, and our language was thought incapable of it. But he has plainly evinced the contrary; and because in opening our eyes he has displayed his address and courage, we cannot pardon him the discovering our stupidity and sloth. This is the consequence of conversing with insensible wretches; we awake them to our prejudice, and because they cannot despise us, they will not fail to hate us (59).

If you find here some lively marks of the admiration of Balzac, you may also observe the fertile effect of so just an admiration. Mr du Rondel clearly discovers that he is able to imitate what he so much values in this great model of majestic eloquence.

(59) Mém. du Rondel's Letter from Maastricht, dated July 10, 1700.

(a) See Colomesti Opuscula, pag. m. 162.

THORIUS (RAPHAEL) a Physician and Latin Poet, flourished in England under the reign of King James the I, (a). He wrote a letter which was printed de causa morbi & mortis Isaaci Casauboni. His elegy on Casaubon's death was also published. His Poem on Tobacco is very much esteem'd [A]. I am of opinion that he did not in the least doubt the truth of the maxim, that water drinkers never make good verses (b). Perhaps he was never so put to it in all his life, as when Mr de Peirefc obliged him to drink a large glass of water [B]. King James desired to hear the story, which is very diverting.

(b) Nulla place-re diu nec vivere carmina possunt, Quae scribuntur aequae potioribus. Horatius, Epig. xix, lib. 2, v. 2.

(1) Pag. 475, of the second edition, which is that of Leipzig, 1700.

(2) König, Bibl. pag. 805.

[A] His Poem on Tobacco is very much esteemed. The Oxford catalogue, mentions an English and Latin edition of it at London 1651 in 8vo. Hymnus Tabaci, or a Poem in honour of Tobacco. Mr Pasch, Philosophy Professor at Kiel, cites an edition of Utrecht 1644, in 12mo, in the sixth chapter of his treatise de Inventis novis antiquis (1). Mr König speaks of an edition of 1628 in 4to at Leyden (2). But this is not the first; for Mr de Zuylichem in the year 1625, wrote some verses in Petologiam Raphaelis Thorii. You will find them at the end of Momenta defloria. With some Latin verses composed by the same author and Thorius, one against the other by way of an amicable combat.

[B] Mr de Peirefc obliged him to drink a large glass of water. Mr Peirefc dining at London with several learned men, could by no means be excused from drinking a health which Dr Thorius drank to him. The glass was of a monstrous size, for which reason Mr Peirefc excused himself a long while, and alledged a thousand reasons; but he was forced to drink it: Before he did it, he made this bargain that Thorius should drink a health to be proposed by him in his turn. After he had drank the wine, he filled the same glass with water, and took it off, first naming the health to the Doctor. Thorius had like to have sunk, as if he had been struck with thunder, but finding no way to avoid it, he fetched several profound sighs (3), he put his mouth a thousand times to the brim of the glass, and as often withdrew it. He called to his assistance all the fine sayings of the Greek and Latin Poets, and was almost the whole day in emptying by repeated trials this accursed cup. You will find this more agreeably related by Gassendus, in the following words. Contigit ut in quodam virorum doctorum convivio, Doctor Thorius ipse Peirefcio ingenti Scypho praeberet: Ac ille quidem se excusare, ob vastitatem patet; ob merum insolitum; ob imbecillum stomachum; ob computandi infrequentiam: verum cum nihil admitteretur, petiit, ut saltem sibi liceret, postquam Thorio fecisset satis, suo arbitrio praeberet. Annuerunt omnes, ac tum assumptis, quasi adigente necessitate animis, secundum hausit calicem, eodemque mox aqua op-pleto, Thorio intentans praeberet, totumque rursus (tanquam injectum temperaturus merum) absorpsit. Ille quasi fulmine ictus, delapsusque nubibus, vix tandem ad se rediit, & quia ex condito agebatur, neque resiliere fas erat, tam longa suspiria e pectore duxit, toties admovit, removitque ora, tot interea carmina ex omnibus Graecis, Latinisque Poetis profudit, ut diem penè contriverit instillandae aquae in insuetum guttur. Atque id ipsum est, quod Rex cum audisset ex aliis, ex Peirefcii ore accipere voluit (4).

(3) Some believe he was pensive enough, as Poets sometimes are in the heat of their liquor to apply the words of the Evangelist, St. Matth. xxvi, 39.

(4) Gassendus, in Vita Peirefcii, lib. ii, ad ann. 1606, Oper. Tom. v, pag. 263, col. 2.

(a) Stephanus Byzant. voce Τιβαρηνία.

TIBARENIANS, a people of Asia bordering upon the Euxine Sea (a). They were famous for two very remarkable customs, the latter of which seems the consequence of the former. They were extremely addicted to sporting, and laughing, in which they placed their summum bonum (b); and as soon as their wives were delivered of their children the husbands kept their beds, played the part of sick persons, and received from their wives all the nursing which in other places is bestowed on child-bed women. It is plain this custom was only owing to this buffooning humour, which led them to make a jest of every thing. Several authors speak of this last custom [A], which was also used in the isle of Corfica (c). Lancelotti of Perugia has unjustly insulted

(c) Diodes. Siculus, lib. v, cap. xiv.

(b) Εὐφρος ἐν πύπτῳ φησὶν, ὅτι Τιβαρηνοὶ καὶ τὸ παιῖον καὶ τὸ γαλῶν εἶναι ἐν γαλῶν καὶ μνηστῆρ ἀνδραμονίαν ἔχοντες. Εὐφροῖ, lib. v, inquit Tibarenes studio ludendi & ridendi teneti & maximam felicitatem hoc judicare. Id. ibid. See also Pomponius Mela, lib. i, cap. xix, ubi says Tibareni Chalybas attingunt quibus in risu lusque summum bonum est.

[A] Several authors speak of this custom. I shall content myself with citing these verses of Apollonius.

Σώοντο πάρεξ Τιβαρηνίδα γαῖαν.
Ἐνδ' ἐπεὶ ἄρ κε τέκονται ὑπ' ἀνδράσι τέκνα γυναικες,
αὐτοὶ μὲν στενάχουσιν ἐν λεχέεσσιν πεσόντες,
κράτα δ' ὀσάμενοι τὰ δ' ἐν κομέεσσιν ἐδωδ' ἄνιεραι,
ἡδὲ λαστρά λεχέα τοῖσι πίνονται.

Eruperunt ad Tibarenorum terram.

3

Ibi, cum è viris gravidæ mulieres reddiderunt fœtum, Ipse versantur in gemitu, & puerperio cubant, Caputibus circumvinctis: illæ rursus molliter curant escis Præbitis viros, & puerpera ipsi lavacra calfaciant (1).

Among the Tibarenians they retire.
Here, when the teeming wives are brought to bed,
The men cry out, and lie in in their stead;
Bind up their heads, and make their wives take care
To nurse them well, and child-bed baths prepare.

(1) Apollonius, Argonaut. lib. ii, v. 1013, 14, m. 241.

Valerius

insulted Diodorus Siculus on this subject [B]. Theodoret observes that after the Tibarenians had received the Gospel, they abrogated a cruel law which had been observed amongst them, which obliged them to throw their old people head-long from a Precipice (d).

(d) Theodoretus, de Græc. Affect. Sermon. ix, pag. 615.

(2) Valer. Flaccus, Argonaut. lib. v, vers. 143.

Valerius Flaccus says the same thing (2), and if the testimony of two Poets be insufficient, the reader may besides find that of an Historian, in the remark [A] of the article NYMPHODORUS.

[B] Lancelotti of Perugia unjustly insulted Diodorus Siculus on this subject. He published a treatise intitled, Farfalloni de gli antichi Historici, where he abuses 'Diodorus Siculus, because in the fourteenth chapter of his fifth book, he affirms that the Corfican women as soon as delivered, quitted their beds to their husbands who lay-in in their stead. And yet nothing is more common in the greatest part of America; or else what is reported of Canada, and several other places, ought to be looked upon as mere cheats; which is not at all likely, considering the condition of those who inform us concerning that part of the world, and the impossibility of their entering unanimously into any agreement to deceive us (3). I wonder that le Mothe le Vayer takes no notice of the Tibarenians nor of the antient Spaniards. Γαργήσαι γὰρ αὐταί, τεκῆσαι τε διακοναί τοῖς ἀνδράσιν ἐκείνης ἀνδ' αὐτῶν κατακλίνεσθαι. Mulieres enim agros colunt, & cum pepererunt, suo loco viros decumbere jubent, iisque ministrant (4). ----- For the women till the ground, and when they are delivered of their children, nurse their husbands, who are put to bed in their room. Mr Colomiés believed that this merry custom which formerly was observed in Berne, viz. that as soon as a woman was delivered she got up, and put her husband to bed, who acted the sick wife, was derived from the Spaniards (5). He adds, that this was practised by the Tartars, according to the testimony of Marcus Paulus Venetus, chap. 41 of the second book of his travels. Note, that various causes might engage these nations to observe this custom; for it is not probable that the humour of turning human life into ridicule, in order to attain the felicity which they placed in laughter, engaged the antient Corficans, and the American nations, to agree with the Tibarenians in this practice. I should be glad to be informed what reasons prevailed with the nations of Canada, &c. who put the husband to bed instead of the woman who was delivered. Would they by this means encourage him to get more children; would they induce him to it by the hopes of a good nursing bout? Or do they fear that if the husband were to have the trouble of acting the nurse, he would be the less willing to make his wife sick? But perhaps it would be found very difficult to account for so ridiculous a custom.

(5) Colomiés Mélanges Historiques, pag. 25.

(3) La Mothe le Vayer, Observations sur la composition des Livres, Tom. xv, of his works, pag. 30, Edit. of Paris, 1681, in 12mo, he cites the ixth Farfalloni.

(4) Strabo, lib. iii, pag. m. 114.

TIBUR, a city of Italy near to, and older than, Rome, called at present Tivoli. It was built on the river Ania (a), either by the Aborigines, according to Dionysius Halicarnassensis (b), or by a company of Greeks from Peloponnesus (c), according to several other authors. It was already in a very flourishing condition, when Æneas landed in Italy [A], if we may believe Virgil, and we find that it made a very long and vigorous

(b) Dionys. Halicarn. Antiq. Roman. lib. i, cap. xvi, pag. m. 14.

(c) See the remark [A].

(a) Now called Teverose.

[A] It was in a very flourishing condition when Æneas landed in Italy. Virgil reckons it amongst the great cities which armed against the Trojans.

Quinque adeo magnæ, positis incudibus, urbes
Tela novant, Atina potens, Tiburque superbum, Ardea, Crustumericque & turrigeræ Antemnæ (1).

(1) Virgil. Æn. lib. vii, vers. 639.

Five cities forge their arms: th' Atinian powers,
Antemnæ, Tybur with her lofty towers,
Ardea the proud, the Crustumarian town.

DRYDEN.

Leandro Alberti so ill understood this place, that he says, Tibur was one of the cities which forged arms for Æneas. 'N'e fatto anche memoria, says he (2), d'essa città da Vergilio nel settimo libro annoverandola fra quelle cinque città che fabricarono l'armi ad Enea così,

(2) Leandro Alberti, Descritt. di tutta l'Italia, fol. 147, verso, Edit. Venet. 1561.

Quinque adeo, &c.

This city is also recorded by Virgil, in his seventh book among those which forged arms for Æneas;

Five cities, &c.

Virgil in the same book mentions the names of the two Tiburine chiefs who went to the war against Æneas:

Tum gemini fratres Tiburtia moenia linquunt,
Fratris Tiburti dictam cognomine gentem, Catillusque, acerque Coras, Argiva juvenus (3).

(3) Virgil. ubi supra, vers. 670.

Then two twin brothers from fair Tybur came,
(Which from their brother Tyburs took the name,) Fierce Coras, and Catillus void of fear, Young Argive champions, in the front appear.

DRYDEN.

Lloyd makes use of this passage to prove that Catillus and Coras built Tybur; but he falsifies the text, by reading maria condunt instead of moenia linquunt. This is a way to find every where proofs for what ever we please, this is a way to make the honest reader believe any thing. But we ought not to look for an authority for the building of this city in these words of Virgil, but in those of his commentator Servius. 'De Græcia, says he (4), tres fratres venerunt ad Italiam: Catillus, Coras, Tybur vel Tyburnus. Hi simul omnes unam fecere civitatem & eam de fratris majoris nomine Tybur appellaverunt: licet & alias fecerint singuli. --- From Greece came into Italy three brothers; Catillus, Coras, Tybur or Tyburnus. These all in conjunction founded a city, and called it Tybur from the name of their elder brother: tho' they each of them singly built others.' Pliny ascribes the foundation of this city only to one of these three mentioned in these words of Servius, he speaks, I say, only of Tyburtus, who he pretends was the son of Amphiraus. I have elsewhere (5) cited his words, which, containing something very particular, I would advise the reader to turn to them. Others pretend that the three brothers mentioned by Servius were Amphiraus's grandsons, and the sons of Catillus. Tybur, sicut Cato facit testimonium, à Catillo Arcade præfecto classis Evandri; sicut Sextius, ab Argiva juventute. Catillus enim Amphirai filius post prodigalem patris apud Thebas interitum Oeclei avi iussu (6), cum omni fœtu ver sacrum missus tres liberos in Italia procreavit, Tiburtum, Coram, Catillum, qui depulsus ex oppido Siciliæ veteribus Sicanis, à nomine Tiburti fratris natu maximi urbem vocaverunt (7). --- Tybur, as Cato witnesses, from Catillus the Arcadian Admiral of Evander's fleet; as Sextius, from the Argive youth. For Catillus the son of Amphiraus after the extraordinary death of his father at Thebes, by the command of his grandfather Oeclaus, was sent with all his family under a vow to Italy, where he begot three children, Tyburtus, Coras, and Catillus, who, expelling the antient Sicanians from a city of Sicily, called it Tybur from the name of their elder brother. Salmastius's censure on this passage of Solinus is very unjust. He strangely exclaims against this author. 'Sanum putamus fuisse Solinum cum hæc scriberet? Quis Siciliam pro Italia sanus dixit? . . . Scio Sicanos Italiam olim tenuisse. . . Sed Italiam dictam fuisse Siciliam, nemo, quod sciam, prodidit; falsissimum igitur, & absurdissimum est, quod hec narrat Solinus (8). --- Can we believe Solinus in his wits when he writes this? Who in his

(4) Servius, in Virgil. Æn. VII, vers. 670.

(5) In the remark [M], of the article AMPHIRAUS.

(6) Leandro Alberti, Descritt. d'Italia, fol. 147, batb committed a fault, per comandamento del suo avolo Tideo. By command of his grandfather Tydeus, faith he. His translator is guilty of another in expressing it hortatu Tydei patris. --- By the advice of his uncle Tydeus.

(7) Solin. cap. ii, pag. m. 13.

(8) Salmast. Exercit. Plin. in Solin. pag. 61.

(d) See Livy, lib. vii.
(e) According to Calpurnius, pag. m. 195. Accord- ing to Sigonius, in Faltis, in the year 399.

resistance against the Roman arms (d), before it submitted to that victorious Republic. But it was at last obliged to submit, in the year of Rome 403 (e). It is pretended that this city, once so haughtily upbraided the Romans with its services to that republic, that its deputies could obtain no other answer than these words, you are proud (f). The inhabitants had a particular devotion for Hercules, in honour of whom they built a most magnificent temple [B]. They also worshipped with no small zeal the god

(f) See the re- mark [d] at the end.

Tiburnus

'his senses ever called Italy Sicily. . . . I know the Sicilians formerly inhabited Italy. . . . But that Italy was ever called Sicily, no body, that I know of, has ever advanced; and therefore what Solinus says here, is most false and absurd.' But presently after he grows somewhat cooler, he supposes the fault is owing to some wretched Pedant who foisted a gloss on the text of this author. 'Sed fortasse ita scrip- serat: qui depulsi veteribus Sicani, à nomine Tiburti fratris natu maximi urbem vocaverunt, cum sciolus aliquis heic Sicanos legeret, ad oram videtur addi- disse, ex oppido Sicilia quia scilicet putaret Sicanos non alibi quam in Sicilia fuisse (9). . . . But per- haps he wrote thus: who, expelling the antient Sica- nians, built a town, which they called Tybur, after the name of their elder brother, which some pretender reading, seems to have added in the margin, from a city of Sicily, as thinking that there were no other Sicilians but in Sicily.' He did not observe that what he cites nine or ten lines after confounds all his criticism. 'Quinimo Siculos illos veteres Tibur op- tidum tenuisse scribit Dionysius lib. i. παρ' οἷς, inquit, καὶ ἐς τὸδε χρόνον, μέγα τι τῆς πόλεως ἐνομάζετο Σικελίων (10). . . . For that the antient Sicilians inhabited the city of Tybur, Dionysius writes book i. From whom, says he, even to this time one part of this city is called Sicilia.' That is, part of the city Tibur is yet called Sicilia or Siculum. Is not this a manifest evidence that this place was so called before Tiburtus and his brothers drove out the Sica- nians? Why then is this trifling used either against Solinus himself or the present text of his book? Note that Catillus passed for the principal founder of Tibur. Hinc Tibur Catille tuum (11). . . . Catillus hence your Tybur; as Silius Italicus hath it: To which we may add these two verses of Horace:

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Silius Ita- licus, lib. viii, pag. m. 345.

(12) Horat. Od. xviii, lib. i.

(13) Id. Od. vi, lib. ii.

(14) Ovidius, lib. iv, Fasto- rum, ver. 71.

(15) Strabo, lib. v, pag. 165.

(16) Mart. Epig. viii, lib. iv.

(17) Steph. By- zant. voce Ti- buris.

(18) Servius, in Virgil. Æn. VII, ver. 630.

Nullam, Vare, sacra vite prius severis arborem Circæ mite solum Tiburis, & mœnia Catili (12).

Vare, to plant the vine, suits best of all Tybur's mild soil, and Catillus's wall.

For the rest, that this city was of Greek original, is unanimously confirmed by an infinite number of au- thors.

Tibur Argeo positum colono
Sit mæx sedes utinam fenestæ (13)!

May Tibur, where Greeks built a seat,
In my old age be my retreat.

Ovid expresses it no less clearly:

Jam mœnia Tiburis udi
Stabant, Argolicæ quæ posuere manus (14).

Most Tybur's walls were standing in those days,
Which Argive hands of old were known to raise.

See also Strabo (15), Martial (16), and Artemidorus cited by Stephanus Byzantinus (17).

We must not forget Servius's commentary on these words, 'Tiburque superbum in the seventh of the Æneid, aut nobile, says he (18), aut per transitum tetigit illud, quod cum aliquando à Senatu auxilia poscerent Tyburtes sub commemoratione beneficiorum, hoc tantum à Senatu responsum acceperunt, superbi estis. . . . This epithet proud, either means its magnificence, or alludes obliquely to its behaviour, when requiring on a certain occasion some assistance from the Senate which it claimed as due in regard to former services, all the answer the Senate gave was, Ye are proud.'

[B] The inhabitants had a particular devotion for Hercules, in honour of whom they built a most magnificent temple.] Statius ranks Tibur amongst the four places where this deity was principally worshipped.

Nec mihi plus Nemeæ, priscumque habitabit Argos, Nec Tiburna domus, Solique cubilia Gades (19).

Nor Nemea, nor old Argos will I own
More favourite abodes, nor Tybur's town,
Nor farthest Gades where the sun goes down.

This temple of Hercules was one of those repositories where the richest treasures were secured. Augustus when he had occasion, drew large sums from thence as well as from the capital, the temple of Antium, and that of Lanuvium. He promised to pay interest for them. Appian who relates this, adds, that in his time very considerable sacred treasures were secured in those places (20). The following lines witness that the Oracles were frequently consulted in the temple of Tibur:

Quod ni templa darent alias Tirynthia fortes,
Et Præneste poterant migrare fores (21).

If the Herculean temples silent were,
Præneste's sisters quickly wou'd be there.

These verses are to be met with in one of Statius's Sylvæ, which was composed by him in compliment to Manlius Vopiscus's country-seat near Tibur. The Oracle of Præneste faith Statius, would gladly quit its residence, and remove to this charming place, if the temples of Hercules were not already occupied by other Oracles. The commentators on this place are very much puzzled. Sabellicus owns (22) that he never met with any thing relating to this Oracle of Her- cules of Tibur, and is inclined to believe that this passage rather regards the Oracle of Albunea, a deity, worshipped in conjunction with Hercules by the in- habitants of Tybur. To this purpose are cited the following words, 'Quodque Albuna sacras Tiberis per flumina fortes, portarit (23): . . . And that Al- buna shall extend her Oracles over Tiber's stream: but with very little reason; for this passage has no re- lation to an Oracle which was to be consulted at Ty- bur, but to the books which a Sybil brought to Rome. Another commentator imagines that the fol- lowing passages of Propertius affords an authentic te- stimony:

Nam quid Præneste dubias, ô Cynthia, fortes,
Quid petis Aezæ mœnia Telegoni?
Curve te in Herculeum deportant effeda Tibur?
Appia cur toties te via ducit anum (24)?

Why to Præneste her dark fate to know;
Why thus to Tusculum, does Cynthia go?
Why to Herculean Tybur does she stray?
Why thus grow old upon the Appian way?

You see plainly, says Barthius (25), that Cynthia went to Tibur to consult the Oracle there, and was not this the Oracle of Hercules? I answer that Pro- pertius does not say this voyage to Tibur was founded on that motive. What he observes about consulting the Oracle extends no farther than the first verse: Tibur is no more concerned in it, than the walls of Telegonus, that is Tusculum. The only thing we can learn from this passage of Propertius, with re- gard to Tibur is, that this city enjoyed the epithet of Herculeum. This we may also be informed of from these words of Silius Italicus,

Quosque sub Herculeis taciturno flumine muris Pomifera arva creant Anienicolæque Catilli (26);

(19) Statius, Sylva i, lib. iii, sub fin. pag. m. 55.

(20) Appianus, lib. v, de Bell. Civilibus, pag. m. 399.

(21) Statius, Sylva III, lib. i, ver. 79, pag. m. 15.

(22) See Barthius in Statium, Sylva III, lib. i, pag. 107.

(23) Tibullus, Eleg. v, lib. ii.

(24) Propert. lib. ii, Eleg. xxxii, pag. m. 476.

(25) Vides clare & Tibur penitus Cynthia ad ca- piendas fores: quæ autem illæ cum hujus præ- cipue nomen hic jungitur, Barth. ibid. pag. 108.

(26) Silius Ita- licus, lib. iv, pag. m. 171.

Tiburinus [C]. The Romans built several country-houses in the territories of this city [D]. This has also been customary in later ages. The inhabitants of Tibur were put to the sword by Totila's soldiers, in the year 545, as Procopius informs us. The German wars ruined this city: Frederic Barbarossa caused the walls to be re-built, and enlarged it. Pope Pius II ordered a fortress to be built there, at the entrance of which is the following inscription of Giovanni Antonio Campani (g).

Grata bonis, invisa malis, inimica superbis Sum tibi Tibur enim sic Pius instituit (b).

The good to save, the bad and proud to bow, Tibur, to Pius I my building owe.

Lloyd is extremely mistaken when he speaks of the mountain of Tibur, as of a place famous

*And Tybur's race o'er fruitful regions own,
Where Anio's waves wash the Herculean town.*

*Cetronius does high costly villas raise
With Grecian marble, which the fight amaze;
Some stand upon Caieta's winding shore,
At Tibur's tow'r, and at Præneste more.
The dome of Hercules and Fortune show
To his tall fabrics like small cots below.*

DRYDEN.

Shall we forget Horace, who had a house there which he frequently resided at, and so earnestly desired might be the fixed retreat of his old age (37)? 'Vixit plurimum in secessu ruri sui Sabini aut Tiburtini: domusque ejus ostenditur circa Tiburtini lucum (38). . . . He spent great part of his time in his Sabine or Tibur retirement: and his house is shown near the grove of Tybur.' He tells us that Munatius Plancus had a very beautiful house there (39). What I advanced in the beginning of this remark might be proved by a crowd of witnesses, but I shall content myself with a few.

Cum Tiburtinas damnet Curvatus auras
Inter laudatas ad Styga missus aquas.
Nullo fata loco possis excludere: cum mors
Venerit, in medio Tibure Sardinia est (40).

*Since against Tibur's air Curvatus raves,
Sent from its pleasant streams to Stygian waves.
No place can save you: when death leads the way,
Tybur's as fatal as Sardinia.*

These are verses made upon the death of a man, who could not save his life by breathing the fine air of Tibur: and the following were by the same author addressed to Faustinus, who enjoyed the refreshment of this place, during the heats of the dog-days.

Herculeos colles gelida vos vincite bruma,
Nunc Tiburtinis cedite frigoribus (41).

*In winter you th' Herculean hills excel
But now in their cool shade we chuse to dwell.*

I have already cited Silius Italicus, who calls the adjacent lands pomifera arva, - - - fruitful in apples; to which may be added these verses of Horace.

Et praeceps Anio, & Tiburni lucus, & uda Mobilibus pomaria ravis (42).

*And Anio's Cai'ra'st, and Tiburnus's grove,
Where thro' moist orchards winding rivi'lets rove.*

Christian Rome hath not been less charmed with the pleasures of Tivoli; for Leandro Alberti relates that the Prelates of the court of Rome, antiently passed the summer in this refreshing air (43). Cardinal Hippolyto d'Este, as Moreri observes, built a very fine palace there, with the most magnificent gardens in the world. Uberto Folietta published a description of it which deserves reading. See also the Itineraries of Italy, particularly those of Andreas Schottus, and Geronimo Capugnani.

(g) Leandro Alberti, Descritt. di tutta l'Italia, fol. m. 248.

(b) Ex eodem, ibid.

(37) See the remark [A], citation (13).

(38) Sueton. in Vita Horatii.

(39) Sen te fulgentia signis Castra tenent, seu densa tenebrae Tiburis umbra tui. Whether in shining camps you stay, Or to your Tyber haste away. Horat. Od. VII. lib. i.

(40) Martial, Epig. ix, lib. iv.

(41) Idem, Epig. vii, lib. iv.

(42) Horat. Od. VII, lib. i.

(43) Leandro Alberti, Descrizione d'Italia, fol. 148.

(27) Martial. Epig. xiii, lib. i, and Epig. lxii, lib. iv, &c.

(28) Leandro Alberti, ubi supra.

(29) Strabo, lib. v, pag. 164.

(30) Aul. Gellius, lib. xix, cap. v.

(31) Horat. Ode VII, lib. i.

(32) Sueton. in Aug. cap. lxvii.

(33) See the remark [I], of the article HADRIAN.

(34) See the remark [C], of the article ZENOBIA.

(35) Stat. Silva III, lib. i.

(36) Juven. Sat. XIV, ver. 86.

VOL. V.

T t t t

[E] Lloyd

TIBUR.

350

famous for the ivory found there [E]. He had better have been silent on this head, and have mentioned the fine quarries with which those parts abounded [F]. We must not forget the fountain and the goddesses Albunea [G], one of the most memorable things in the [E] Lloyd is extremely mistaken when he speaks of the mountain of Tibur as of a place famous for the ivory found there. He may justly be accused of two gross faults. Tiburinus mons, saith he, locus eboræ notissimus; and immediately after he cites two verses of Martial, one out of the twelfth epigram of the seventh book

(44) De Tiburtinis albescere collibus audit. Sibi bears that Tibur's bill can bleach. Mart. Epig. xii, lib. vii.

(45) Et Tiburtino monte quod albet ebur. The ivory whitening on Tibur's bill. Id. Epig. xxxviii, lib. viii.

(46) Theophrastus auctor est & ebur fossilis candido & nigro colore inveniri. Pliny, lib. xxxvi, cap. xxviii.

(47) Martial. Epig. xii, lib. vii.

Dum Tiburtinis albescere collibus audit
Antiqui dentis fusca Lycoris ebur,
Venit in Herculeos colles: quid Tiburis alti
Aura valet? parvo tempore nigra redit (47).

*Swarthy Lycoris bears with great delight,
That Tibur's bills can make old ivory white:
Thither she goes, to bleach in Tibur's air;
And soon returns, but black instead of fair.*

Martial's thought is, that Lycoris having heard that old ivory whitened on the mountain of Tibur, went thither; but instead of bleaching her tawny complexion, she turned black in a small space of time. He had made use of the same raillery before.

Tibur in Herculeum migravit nigra Lycoris
Omnia dum fieri candida credit ibi (48).

(48) Idem, Epig. lxii, lib. x.

*Herculean Tibur black Lycoris's seeks,
In hopes its bleaching pow'r might reach her cheeks.*

Ramirez de Prado affirms that Pliny says, the cool air of Tibur gives ivory a greater degree of whiteness (49). He cites also Propertius and Silius Italicus, one of whom says (50).

(49) Lycoris irridet quæ cum sciret ebur candidius fieri frigidissima Tiburis aura ut Plinius testatur. Laus Ramirez de Prado in Mart. Epig. lxii, lib. x.

Rampis Anio qua pomifer incubat arvis
Et nunquam Herculeo numine pallet ebur;

*Where Anio thro' fruitful orchards flows,
And ivory its unchanged whiteness shows,
Which to th' Herculean deity it owes.*

And the other (51):

(50) Propert. Eleg. vii, lib. iv, sub fin.

(51) Silius Italicus, lib. xii, pag. m. 490.

(52) Pafcit dixit pro sustentat & conservat. Ramirez de Prado, ubi supra.

Quale micat semperque novum est, quod Tiburis aura
Pascit ebur (52).

As the pure ivory, which in Tibur's air, Appears for ever new, for ever fair.

Thus it plainly appears that Mr Lloyd hath improperly cited the second passage of Martial, since it doth not signify that the Tiburtine mountain furnished ivory; but only that the air there had the virtue to preserve the purity and brightness of ivory, and even to repair them.

[F] The fine quarries with which those parts abounded. Strabo speaks of them, and observes that they furnished stone for the greatest part of the edifices of Rome (53). The stones of Tibur were in great esteem; (53) Strabo, lib. They were so hard, as to be proof against all heavy burdens and injuries of the weather; but the fire soon destroyed them. 'Tiburtini (lapides) ad reliqua

'fortes, vapore diffiliunt (54). -- The Tiburtine stones (54) Pliny, lib. 'bear every thing else, but fly with heat.' These words of Pliny will become more intelligible by comparing them with the following: 'Tiburtina vero & quæ

'eodem genere sunt omnia, sufferunt & ab oneribus & à tempestatibus injurias: fed ab igni non possunt esse tuta: simulque ut sunt ab eo tacta, diffiliunt & dissipantur, ideo quod temperatura naturali parvo

'sunt humore (55). -- Those of Tibur, and all of that kind, bear all injuries from weights and weather; but are not at all secure from fire: for as soon as they are affected with that, they split and fly in pieces, because of their having so very little moisture in their 'natural temperature.' Pliny relates as a witty repartee what Cicero said to the people of Chios, who out of ostentation shewed him the walls of their houses built with speckled marble. I should admire them much more, said Cicero, if they had been built with Tiburtine stone. Primum, ut arbitror, versicolores istas maculas Chiorum lapidinae offenderunt, cum exstruerent muros, facito in id M. Ciceronis fide: omnibus enim ostentabant ut magnificum. Multo, inquit, magis mirarer, si Tiburtino lapide fecissetis (56). A very learned man pretends that if these stones had been transported to the isle of Chios, they would perhaps have been more esteemed, because far fetched (57). This is not unlikely: but I do not believe that Cicero's raillery was grounded upon this foundation; he seems rather to have meant only this: you buy your marble very cheap, your island produces it, do not brag therefore of the sumptuousness of your buildings. Your riches and expences would appear more magnificent, if the materials of your buildings were brought from Tibur. (56) Plinius, lib. xxxvi, cap. vi, pag. 237. (57) Rome vulgaris in eam ad vectus infamem acceptisset fortassis ab loci underetur intercedine pretium. Herdian. in Plin. lib. d.

[G] We must not forget the fountain and the goddesses Albunea.] Let us begin this note with a passage of Virgil.

At rex follicitus monftris, oracula Fauni
Fatidici genitoris adit, lucosque sub altâ
Consult Albunea: nemorum quæ maxima sacro Fonte sonat, sævumque exhalat opaca mephitis.
Hinc Italæ gentes, omnique Oenotria tellus,
In dubiis responsa petunt (58).

*Latinus, frighted with this dire oment,
For counsel to his father Faunus went.
And sought the shades renown'd for prophecy,
Which near Albunea's sulphurous fountain lie.
To those the Latian, and the Sabine land
Fly, when distress'd, and thence relief demand.*

I omit the remainder of this passage, and only observe that it informs us, that those who consulted this Oracle slept on the skins of their victims, and received their answer during their sleep. It doth not appear certainly from these words of Virgil, whether the god Faunus resided in the Albunean grove; for the laws of Grammar allow us to believe that King Latinus consulted the Oracle of Faunus, and the sacred Albunean groves, that is to say, that he informed himself of the pleasure of the gods in two different places: but yet the most reasonable meaning of these words seems to be, that the King consulted the Oracle of Faunus in the sacred Albunean grove. There is one small difficulty to get over, which is, that no person, that I know of, informs us that there was any Oracle of the god Faunus at Tibur. This city adored Hercules as their grand Divinity: their other deities were Tiburnus and Albunea. Faunus is not mentioned. Will any one say that Virgil was not here concerned to accommodate his fictions to tradition? This may perhaps be more true than probable. However it be, we may observe that Albunea was at the same time the neighbourhood of Tibur.

(58) Virgil. Æn. lib. vii, ver. 41.

(59) Sciendum sine unum nomen esse fontis & silvæ. Servius, in Virgil. Æn.
lib. vii, ver. 82.

(60) In Tibur-tino alfidium montibus. Id. ib.

(61) Horat. Ode
VII, lib. i.

(62) Lactant.
lib. i, Divin.
Instit. cap. vi,
pag. m. 19.

(63) Strabo, lib.
v, pag. 164.

(64) Juxta Ro-mam Albule æque vulneribus medentur. Plin.
lib. xxvi, cap.
ii, p. 779.

(65) Sueton. in Augusto, cap.
lxxxi.

(66) Cluver.
Ital. antiq. lib.
ii, cap. x.

(67) Virgil. Æn.
lib. vii, ver. 82.

(68) Martial.
lib. i, Epig. xiii.
See also Epig. iv,
lib. iv, and Statius Silva iii,
lib. i, ver. 75.

(a) Engolismenfi agro oriundus.
Thuanus, lib.
xviii, circa fin.
pag. m. 974.
Sammarthanus,
Elogior. lib. ii,
pag. m. 80,
expressis himself
thus: Ducebant Tilli genus suum ab Engolisma.
La Croix du Maine is mistaken in filling the brother of this person a gentleman of Paris.

time the name of a grove, of a fountain (59), and of a deity of the mountain of Tibur (60). She only appears under the notion of a fountain in these words of Horace, ' & domus Albunæ resonantis (61): - And Albunæ's murmuring fountain.' In the words of Virgil before quoted, she appears under the notion of a grove as well as of a fountain; but the following passage of Lactantius elevates her to a goddess: Decimam Tiburtini, nomine Albunam, quæ Tiburi colitur, ut dea, juxta ripas amnis Anienis: Cujus in gurgite Stimulacrum ejus inventum esse dicitur, tenens in manu librum. Cujus sacra Senatus in Capitolium transfulerit (62). That is, Albunea was the tenth of the Sibyls and worshipped at Tibur as a goddess; and her image was reported to have been found with a book in her hand in the gulph of Anio. Note that some are of opinion that the fountain Albunea was only another name for those mineral waters called Albula or Albule. Strabo says they were cold, that they arose from several springs, and either drank or bathed in, cured several diseases (63). Pliny ascribes to them only the virtue of healing wounds (64): but Suetonius (65) does not speak of them with this restriction. Cluverius (66), who believes them to be the fountain Albunea, may allege this reason for it: this fountain according to Virgil trunk, Sævumque exhalat opaca Mephitim (67).

And shaded o'er emits a sulph'rous smell.

But according to Martial and several others this quality belonged to the mineral waters called Albula or Albule.

Canaque sulfureis Albula fumat aquis (68).

And sulph'rous steams rise from pale Albula.

Therefore, &c. Note, that Albula was a small river which discharged itself into the Anio, whose principal spring according to Cluverius was the fountain Albunea. This author believes that the image of the Tiburtine Sibyl or Albunea was reported to be found in this fountain. He adds that the ancients made a deity of this spring, and consecrated to it a grove, a Temple and an Oracle (69), and that it appears from an epigram of Martial that there was a grove consecrated to the Muses in this place (70). But the last is utterly false, and Cluverius read too hastily the following words of Martial.

Itur ad Herculei gelidas quæ Tiburis arces,
Canaque sulfureis Albula fumat aquis.
Rura, nemusque sacrum, dilectaque jugera Musis
Signat vicina quartus ab urbe lapis:
Hic rudis æstivas præfabat porticus umbras,
Heu quam, &c (71).

To Tibur's airy towers where leads the way
And sulph'rous steams rise from pale Albula:
The fourth mile stone points out the sacred grove,
And pleasant fields, seats which the Muses love.
Here the rude porch yielded a summer shade,
Alas how, &c.

If he had considered them with the least attention, he would have found that they did not in the least concern Tibur but another place in the road thither, four miles from Rome. It is not even certain that there was in this place a grove consecrated to the Muses: it may be supposed that Martial meant nothing more, than that Regulus's lands were beloved by these goddesses (72). We ought to take notice that Martial has placed a distance of twenty miles between Rome and Tibur (73).

(69) That is, the Oracle of Faunus.

(70) Sed & Camenarum fons Musarum ibidem fuisse nemus ex Martialis Epig. xiii, lib. i, colligere datur. Epitome Cluverii, per Bunonem Ital. antiq. lib. ii, cap. x, pag. 431.

(71) Mart. Epig. xiii, lib. i.

(72) So Farnaby understands that verse of Martial.

(73) Mart. Epig. lvi, lib. iv.

TILLET (JOHN DU) in Latin Tilius, Protonotary, and Secretary to the king, and Register to the Parliament of Paris, was born in Angoumois (a), and flourished in the XVIth century. He applied himself with surprising diligence to illustrate the History of France; and it may be said, that no body has ever yet treated this great subject according to the plan which he laid down. He not only proposes to give a particular account of the wars, and general events which are to met with in the meanest Chroniclers; but he likewise inquired into (b) whatever related to the domains of the crown, the laws and ordinances, the ancient form of government, the person and household of the king, the officers of the crown, the grandes of the realm, the creation of their offices, ranks, duties, and undertook to explain all this by authentic records, whereof he gave catalogues which were very curious and instructive. He would have carried on his work much farther, if the court had furnished the necessary expences; but he complains that he was obliged to put a stop to it, because he was not assisted in the great charges which his inquiries made unavoidable [A.]

A small

[A] He complains that he was obliged to put a stop to it, because he was not assisted in the great charges . . . unavoidable.] This particular, which will without doubt be agreeable to curious readers, is to be met with in the epistle dedicatory of his work. I shall cite a long passage of it, since it will acquaint us with several circumstances of this author's undertaking. It must be remembered that he addresses himself to Charles IX. ' Having with very great labour and expence searched, since my institution in my office, an infinite number of registers of your parliament, examined the libraries and charters of several churches in your kingdom, and, by the permission of the late King, your father, (whom God absolve) had access to your treasury of charters, and inspected them all by his command, and upon his declaration that he would bear the charge, and recompence my assistants, (who must necessarily be very many in works of this kind), I undertook to compile in an historical form, and according to the order of reigns, all the differences of this third line now reigning with its neighbours, the domains of the crown by provinces, the laws and ordinances from the Salic law by volumes, and reigns, and, in a particular collection, what relates to the persons and families of our kings, the ancient form of government of the three estates, and the course of justice in the said kingdom, together with the changes which have happened therein. Pliny relates, that King Alexander the Great expended eighty thousand talents, which amount to forty eight thousand crowns, in voyages, and other charges which were necessary to attain the knowledge of the properties of animals, whereof Aristotle by his command composed fifty books. The eighth part would have served to compleat my said works, which I began to apply myself to with great diligence, and presented to his Majesty six volumes of them: four relating to the said differences, one to the said ordinances, and one to the persons and families royal: but it happened to me as Mr Girard de Mountagu, Secretary and Treasurer of the Charters to King Charles V, writes in the prefatory epistle to the Repertory-General, and Register of the said Treasury marked A. A. that some of his predecessors in the said office had begun a work relating to the said Treasury, but left it imperfect, for want of being able to bear the expence, and so have I been forced to do. For however, the said King, and the Queen your mother declared their pleasure, and even frequently gave their command, for the furnishing the charges, and recompence for my assistants, and in order to perfect the said works, they produced no effect, and

I was

A small part only of his vast collections has been published [B]. If he acquired a great reputation by this exact knowledge of the constitution of the kingdom, he on the other hand amassed great riches [C], by his great assiduity in the particular functions of his office. The book which he published in the year 1560, concerning the king's majority, rendered him odious to the Protestants. They refuted it, and he reproaches one of their Historians for supposing that he never made them any reply [D]. They published some disadvantageous things of him, as the motives to his work,

'I was abandoned, and even reproached by my said assistants, whom I had entertained a long time, partly at my own expence, and partly fed with the hopes of the said recompence. This, I say, in my excuse, and to testify the infinite regret which I have upon being disabled from doing that service to your crown which I wished, not ascribing to others that misfortune, (if it be one), yet notwithstanding this accordance, to my duty I have upon my own sole bottom, as far as I was able continued part of my undertaking. . . . I have enlarged by one half the collection concerning the persons and families Royal, and, if I live, I will pursue and perfect what relates to the three estates, and to the course of justice in your said kingdom (1)'.
(1) Du Tillet, Epistle to King Charles IX, before his collection of the Kings of France, &c.

[B] A small part only of his vast collections has been published. We have just now seen that they consisted of six volumes, and that while he was waiting for assistance to put the finishing hand to the five first, he prepared the sixth, and dedicated it to Charles IX. It was printed under this title, Recueil des Rois de France, leurs Couronne & Maison: but I would not warrant that it had the same title upon the first publication; for Du Verdier Vau-Privas (2), and La Croix du Maine (3), mention only this Title, Memoires & Recherches touchant plusieurs choses memorables pour l'intelligence de l'Etat & des Affaires de France. La Croix du Maine adds that this book first printed at Rouen in the year 1577 for Philip de Tours, was reprinted at Paris by James du Puis, and that this second edition is much more full and correct, and was revised by the author's manuscript, with several figures and portraits of the Kings of France, their coins, and other remarkable things, which were not in the first edition. After this he particularises the works not printed, and places in this list the collection relating to the persons and families royal, and the treatise on the King's majority. This is a mistake, since it is certain that the latter of those two books had already been published in 1560, and perhaps also the former is the same with that just now mentioned by La Croix du Maine to have passed two editions. Note, that soon after there was published a work of du Tillet in Latin concerning the history of France: it was printed at Frankfurt in the year 1579, under the Title Commentarii de Rebus Gallicis.

(4) In the Advertisement to the Reader.

The Bookseller who published the Collection of the Kings of France, their crown and family, gave hopes that the heirs of du Tillet would not stop there. Now let the name, says he (4), the praise, and the memory of the said Sieur du Tillet be perpetuated in this kingdom, let them be perpetuated every where else. . . . And to the gentlemen, his sons, in like manner, let thanks be given in the name of us all, whom they have not only obliged with the impression and publication of this work: but also promise us others too of the same hand, and of the like matter, having a great regard and zeal for the grandeur of our nation, and the singular pleasure and satisfaction of every one, who is desirous to be informed in things of this kind, no less than their late Father. Reader, Having solicited and obtained from them this considerable promise for your use and benefit, I also take upon my self, and engage to remind them of it continually, out of the desire I have to procure and communicate to you, by my impression, something which may confirm and preserve you in the opinion you may have already conceived of me, that I do and shall always make it my business to publish such books as may prove very greatly to your advantage. Adieu. I think that after the first edition of this collection, the sons of John du Tillet furnished the Booksellers successively with the following additions. I. A collection of the ranks of the greatees of France. II. An account of every family of the kings and greatees of France. III. A collection of the wars and treaties of peace, truces, and alliances, between the kings of France and England. IV. A memoir and admonition concerning the liberties of the Gallican Church. These four pieces are to be met with in my edition, which is that of Paris (5) 1618 in 4to, with a chronicle, by way of (6) By Peter abridgment, of the kings of France, composed by Metayer. John du Tillet, Bishop of Meaux, brother to the Register.

La Croix du Maine did not know that our John du Tillet was the author of an Institution of a Christian father to his children, which was printed at Paris in the year 1563 in 4to. I find in the catalogue of the Archbishop of Rheims's library (6), Sommaire de l'Histoire de la guerre faite contre les Albigeois, extraite du Tresor des Chartres par Jean du Tillet, à Paris chez Robert Nivelles 1590 in 8vo. Mr Teissier observes that there is also a book intitled Pontificum aliquot Romanorum exempla cum Ethnicorum Principum gestis comparata, printed in the year 1576, composed by John Tilius (7). He knows not which of the two brothers is the author of it. I do not know it neither: I only know that this work was printed at Amberg, in the year 1610 in 8vo.

[C] If he acquired a great reputation . . . he amassed . . . great riches.] Thuanus furnishes me with this circumstance, tho' he does not express it in the same manner as I have done. I shall give the words of this great Historian. 'Qui (Jo. Tilius) cura, diligentia, & summa in suo munere assidue, non solum ingentes opes, sed veram gloriam, & quæ majorem nemo nostrorum antea meruit, exacta Juris nostri & Franco-Galliæ omnis antiquitatis cognitione sibi comparavit (8). . . . John du Tillet, by his care, diligence, and extreme application in his office, not only acquired great riches, but also true glory, to which none of our countrymen were more entitled, by his exact knowledge of all the laws and antiquities of France.'

[D] He reproaches one of their Historians for supposing that he never made them any reply.] Whenever we mention the disputes of authors, we ought not to neglect observing what was the first occasion of them, and what was the subject of their writings. We must not therefore be under any concern, if some readers should think the following quotations too long. Charles V had passed at the wood of Vincennes in the year 1374, an ordinance concerning the Kings of France, attaining their majority on their entering into the fourteenth year, which was approved, and published in parliament, the King being present, and holding his bed of justice, the twentieth of May, one thousand three hundred and seventy five. Notwithstanding, after the death of the said King Henry II, when his eldest son King Francis II, took the crown at the age of fifteen years, five months, and twenty one days, and being also married, some desiring to change the religion in that kingdom, resorted, by audacious writings, upon the administration of the said King, and of the Queen his mother as unlawful: to whom I presented at that time a piece intitled, Pour la Majorité du Roy tres-Chrestien contre les rebelles. . . . For the majority of the most Christian King against the rebels. Their Majesties having seen it, and found that the authority of the said King was therein asserted and proved, commanded that it should be printed and published. I remonstrated that it was not drawn up with any other view than for instruction and advice, in order that the said authority might not be suffered to be infringed, which might be preserved and secured without the printing that piece. However to inform every one of the right of the said King, their said Majesties persisted in ordering the said impression. Which being finished, there came out soon after an answer to it, under the title of Legitime Conseil, --- Lawful Advice, to which I replied by another piece, intitled, Pour l'entière Majorité du Roy tres-Chrestien, contre le Legitime Conseil malicieusement intitulé par les rebelles. . . . For the full majority of the most Christian King, in answer to the Lawful Advice so intitled by the rebels, which put a full stop to them. This answer was passed over without the least notice by that impostor in his commentaries on the state of religion, and

(7) Teissier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 345.

(8) Thuanus, lib. xlviii, pag. m. 974, col. 2.

work, and went so far back as to relate the facts which they pretended were the cause of his aversion for Renaudie, the chief of the conspiracy of Amboise [E]. I shall recite (c) (c) In the remark [E]. what

(9) Du Tillet, Recueil des Rois de France, pag. m. 277, 278.

(10) Commentaires de l'Etat de la Religion & Republ. liv. ii, fol. 38, verso.

(11) Ibid. fol. 43.

(12) Ibid. folio 44.

(13) Ibid. folio 45.

of the republic published without any name. But the said piece itself still extant is sufficient to convict him of an impudent calumny both in this and other particulars (9). The person he calls an impostor was the President de la Place, who has given but a very indifferent character of him in his history. We shall take a short view of this scene. La Place gives at first (10) a particular account of the several books and libels published against the house of Guise in the reign of Francis II. He says afterwards that they were answered by John du Tillet by a piece intitled the Majority of the King (11). He gives a very short abstract of this work, and concludes it in these words (12): 'And lastly, he addresses himself to those who declare that they make profession of the gospel, telling them that their assertion was false, and that what they professed was rather a novel opinion, calling their preachers mutinous and seditious: and concluding that God would bless the arms that should be made use of against them.' He adds, that almost as soon as this book was published there was an answer made to it, of which he gives an exact summary, and does not forget to enlarge upon the personal reflexions therein used. 'It was added, says he (13), that the author of the said book, being advanced to honour and dignity by the liberality of the Kings of France, (whose pen ought to have been consecrated and dedicated only to maintain equity, the states, and policy of this kingdom, and the authority of justice) had very much forgot himself, by endeavouring to confirm the authority of those who have never ceased to pervert all orders whatsoever hitherto observed in this kingdom, without returning any answer, deliberately, and with design, to what had been alledged, that those of the house of Guise were absolutely incapable of the places they held. And appearing as if he had no regard to this, he fell foul upon those who were no way to blame, and who in proper time and place would not be backward in their own defence: but this author at last painted himself to the life in the colours of Achitophel, whom he exactly resembled in the counsel he gave at the conclusion of his book. For as the former advised the pursuing the loyal party who were for supporting their King against the usurper Absalom: so the latter advises the putting them all to the sword, declaring himself by this a rebel, and traitor, and desiring nothing but cruelty, confusion, and the destruction of the kingdom.' Here the scene ends: and, to speak freely of it, we must allow it to be either too short or too long. For if the Historian had a mind to say nothing of du Tillet's reply, he ought to have passed over the answer of the Protestants; and since he did not think proper to suppress the latter, he ought not to have suppressed the former. We shall see presently that he is not the only person who has been guilty of this small sin of omission, and that others have been guilty of something worse.

[E] They published some disadvantageous things of him, as the motives to his work, and went so far back as to relate the facts . . . the cause of his aversion for . . . the chief of the conspiracy of Amboise.] Louis de Regnier, Sieur de la Planchette, having given almost word for word the same account with the President de la Place, stopped short all at once, without saying one word of John du Tillet's reply. He did even much worse; for he affirmed that this author being pressed to reply, answered, that it was much better not to make any reply. 'There were several other persons who took pen in hand in answer to du Tillet's book, but if I was to give an account of them all, it might give the reader too much trouble. These answers falling into the hands of the Cardinal, he sent for du Tillet, and his brother the Bishop of St Brien, and desired them in the presence of his most intimate and familiar friends to write a reply. For, said he, I am afraid these pieces will make their way into Germany, and break the King's measures, since the princes, namely the Protestants with whom we would keep friendship, are very great readers of such books: and whence once they have made an impression on their heavy brains, it is not easy for the secret agents we have among them to find means to deface them. On the contrary, this greatly opens the way for the Huguenots to procure audience, in such sort that we cannot so readily play upon these princes as we could wish, and we are the more frequently defeated in our designs. It is said that du Tillet excused himself very earnestly, because the subject was difficult, and too much cleared up by the histories of France: so that this would be only furnishing fresh matter for the Huguenots, to write on and over-load the Cardinal and his family with abuse. That among those desperate persons, there were some of surprising parts, who had no other way of maintaining their credit, or supporting their cause, but by their writings. So far ought we to be from giving them the least handle of this kind, that instead of writing we ought to employ against their persons and effects all the severities that can be contrived; in order to take from them all firm footing, and to discourage their writings: which was judged the best expedient by all the company, and that the Cardinal might write particular letters to the German princes, which would serve as an ample vindication against all calumnies that might be charged upon him, and not being published in print would not be contradicted. And this he promised to do as what was most advisable (14).

VOL. V. No. CXXVIII.

The history from which I take this passage is a book which it would be very hard for an infinite number of persons to meet with: the bare citing it therefore will be of little or no service to them; the only true way to satisfy them is to relate here at full length the account we there find concerning the motives of du Tillet. It is an account full of very curious and remarkable matters. I shall therefore give it here, without being afraid of tiring the reader with the prolixity of the quotation.

(15) Du Tillet, . . . rummaging the ancient registers and records of the Parliament of Paris, began to look into them; and finding several memorable pieces which had been quite forgot by our Historiographers, either through carelessness or ignorance, he proposed to make a collection of them for the service of posterity. This being intimated to the King (16), he found it would be very proper and useful in regard to his own interest, and that of the kingdom. And therefore commanded him to pursue it with diligence; and as it was a work of great expence, money was given him for the undertaking, with the promise of a reward. Because also it was proper for him to be assisted with registers and informations from the chamber of accounts, from the treasury of charters, and other places, he had letters containing very express command, to give him admittance to them, and to let him take whatever he should have occasion for. In which he used an extreme diligence. But having advanced the work, the king died, without du Tillet's receiving the reward he expected. And what surprized him more was, that after the death of the king, all his friends found themselves estranged or banished from the court, so that his place of Register was in great danger by reason of its value, and because those of the house of Guise had at that time begun a method of distributing among their friends all the offices, and places of advantage which they could lay their hands on. Du Tillet had then only access to the Constable, whom he made acquainted with the command he had received from the late king, and the service that France ought to expect from it. In which he did not forget the pains he had taken, requesting in recompence for those and for his services, that at least his post of Register to the Parliament might be continued and confirmed to him. The Constable, who had received some services from du Tillet, promised to present him to the king, have him confirmed in his place, and to use his interest for him. But with respect to his book, not being a man of letters, he did not concern himself about it. It happened that as he was speaking of it to the king, and du Tillet had his books lying before him on the table, the Cardinal of Lorraine came in, and cast his eye upon them. And believing that this work would be very proper to instruct him in state-affairs,

U u u

(14) La Planchette, Histoire de François II, pag. 370, & seq.

(15) Ibid. pag. 372, & seq.

(16) The author speaks of Francis I.

(d) In the remark [C].

what they advanced: The reader may judge of it as he pleases. We shall see in the following article (d), that he was said to have been a pupil of Calvin. He died at Paris on the 11th of November 1570 (e). His place of Register to the Parliament of Paris was enjoyed by his descendants for above a century [F]. It ought not to be forgot, that he was and to compleat the designs he had already formed, he began to find fault with, and to cast an odium upon this excellent undertaking of du Tillet, and even to accuse him before his majesty of disloyalty, in designing to publish the secrets of the kingdom, and those things which our kings ought with the greatest care to conceal, that they may be inspected only by very few persons. The Constable did not insist much in favour of du Tillet. For he was of opinion that learning effeminated the gentry, and made them degenerate from their predecessors, and even that it had engendered heresies, and increased the Lutherans to such a number as they were then arrived to in the kingdom, so that he had very little esteem for learned men, and their books; which was the reason that du Tillet did not find so much countenance and support from this quarter as he expected. However, finding himself thus rebuked, he alledged the command he had received from the late king, and desired that his books might be read and examined, by which it would be found that he had not exceeded the bounds of his instructions. Upon this the Cardinal procured an order from the king to take these books to peruse them, and to make his report to the council. This he accordingly did, and sent them home to his house, where he ordered du Tillet to attend him to give him an account of what he had done, and to wait the king's pleasure. Thus was this affair at a stand, and du Tillet, instead of receiving a recompence for his long labours, had enough to do to make all the friends he could to appease the Cardinal: so that he was afraid of losing his goods, estates, and life. The cardinal on his part having caused these books to be perused by some learned persons whom he kept in his family, to instruct him in such affairs as he was to propose to the council, to which he was then very much a stranger, by reason of his youth, and want of experience, he found by their report, that these labours might be of great use and assistance to him: but that to publish them in print, there were things of too great importance, and which might even prejudice the rights which his family claimed to some duchies and lordships of France. He never thought he ought not to treat the author so roughly, but to caress, and receive him kindly, and to procure for him the confirmation of his place. Which being done, would lay him under so great an obligation, that it would be easy to get him to suppress whatever these books contained in derogation to his rights. Besides, that the gaining such a servant to the parliament, would be no small conquest: for by his means it would be easy to learn all the secrets of that court. All which they engaged to bring him to comply with, and to think himself very happy also in meeting with such good fortune. The Cardinal approved of this advice, and knew so well how to put it in practice, that he gained the point he aimed at, in such manner as we have before related. Du Tillet also esteeming it no small matter, to be received into the good graces of the Cardinal, and to have the confirmation of his office by his favour, became his affectionate servant: and, in order to find means to inform him of every thing with greater certainty, he recommended to him his own brother for Protonotary. By this means, as the Cardinal increased in favour, fortune, honours, and grandeur, the affection of this Register for his service increased in proportion; so that no law-suit was ever carried on so secretly, with regard to fine duchies, counties, or lordships of consideration, but that he was advertised of it, so as to find means to recover them. The said Cardinal, therefore, having afterwards attained the highest post under the reign of Francis II, whose history we are writing; du Tillet voluntarily took in hand the defence of the house of Guise, knowing that if any harm should happen to them, his life might one day be in danger: as, on the contrary, it was to be imagined that this piece having strengthened their cause, must entitle him to greater favour, as in truth the Protonotary, who had also found means to be employed by the Queen-mother, received for recompence the Bishopric of S. Brieu. The court of parliament induced by the like respect, and willing to oblige these governors, gave a licence to this book of the Majority, using all their power to suppress the pieces on the other side, and making enquiry after the Printers who were suspected of publishing them, in order to punish them as guilty of high-treason. Moreover, there was another consideration which put this Register upon writing against those of the enterprize of Amboise, namely, the mortal enmity he bore to la Renaudie, on account of a law-suit between them for matters of forgery, wherein the honour of du Tillet was greatly concerned. And though he obtained a verdict in his favour (17), yet Renaudie publicly and expressly declared, that it was by his interest that he had succeeded in all the courts of France, and in regard to his place, which gave him such great opportunities of serving his friends: but that he hoped, that if ever justice should be open to him, he should make the iniquity of the judgments appear, and convict du Tillet of forgery, as in fact he did obtain a reversal, and letters of rehearing some time before the death of King Henry. He reproached also du Tillet, that after he and his family had been maintained and educated in the house of la Renaudie, he had been sent to Paris very young to solicit their law-suits, and there entertained so curiously and closely in his studies, that by their favour and interest he was at last preferred to this post of Register to the parliament; which finding himself possessed of, instead of rendering his loyal service to that house for the favours he had received from it, he had, by forgeries all very manifest, procured for his brothers four or five thousand livres a year in benefices, which were held by one of the uncles of the said Renaudie: and farther, sought all means to appropriate to himself the remaining part of their estate, because he had got possession of all the deeds and titles to it. But all this was superseded by the death of la Renaudie, who while living had kept du Tillet in the greatest anxiety.

(e) Peter de St Romuald, Journ. Chron. Tom. ii, pag. 540. La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. pag. 269, and Sammarth. Elogior. lib. ii, pag. m. 80, mention only the month of November. Corret Marci, who places his death in the month of December.

I believe the history of the Sieur de la Planche was not printed till after the death of John du Tillet.

[F] His office of Register . . . was enjoyed by his descendants for above a century.] This is what we find in the True State of France, printed in 1657. There is in the Parliament of Paris a Register in chief, who is now Jary, but Mr du Tillet, whose ancestors enjoyed this office for three hundred years past, which is one of the most profitable in all France (18). Here is, in my opinion, an error in Chronology: for I believe that before our John du Tillet, not one of his family (19) had ever been Register in chief to the Parliament of Paris. And note, that the State of France, printed in 1680 (20), names Philip-James as Register at that time.

Here follows a fine encomium on the grandson of John du Tillet. On the 29th of December, 1646, Monsieur du Tillet, Register in chief to the Parliament almost during sixty years, died after a tedious distemper, which he underwent with very great patience. He is commended in a most particular manner for having given in his life-time above a million of gold in charities, alms, and liberalities, and yet not left either the name or arms of John du Tillet, Baron de Buffiere, any way recorded on that account. He lived seventy-eight years and six days (21) (§ a).

(§ a) It is not true, as Mr Bayle very justly observes, that the office of Register in chief to the Parliament was for 300 years successively in the family of du Tillet, neither is it true that John du Tillet was the first of his family who was preferred to it. This will appear by the following extract from a memoir communicated

(17) Compare with this the words of Parlat, pag. 102, of the History of Francis II. La Renaudie had a long law-suit with John du Tillet, Register in Chief to the Parliament of Paris. It was for the ecclesiastical benefice of Champignolle in Angoumois, of six thousand livres a year; and la Renaudie after having prosecuted him through all the supreme jurisdictions of the kingdom, under pretext that his adversary had relations there, obtained at last an evocation to the Parliament of Dijon, where he was legally convicted of forgery. Parlat adds that du Tillet caused la Renaudie to be imprisoned, who could not prevent being condemned to death; but that the Prince of Joinville, loved the life of this prisoner, and obtained letters of rehearing, which re-established him in his estate and reputation. Tottel's Register, 220, pag. m. Renaudie was condemned only to pay a large fine, and to be banished for some time.

(18) Véritable Etat de la France, pag. 453, Edit. of 1657.

(19) That is to say, father, grandfather, and grandfathers, which is the meaning of the author whom I have cited.

(20) At pag. 430, of Tom. II.

(21) Peter de St Romuald, Journ. Chron. Tom. ii, p. 70.

was either the author or promoter of the edict (f) which prohibits the remitting money to Rome for the dispatching of benefices (g).

(f) Made in September 1551.

(g) Thuanus, lib. viii, pag. 168.

communicated by Mr Francis Janicon, Advocate to his Majesty's privy-council, and Deputy-General of the Reformed Churches in Guienne.

ELIAS DU TILLET, whose father was Secretary to Louisa de Savoy, Countess of Angoulême, the mother of Francis I, was ennobled in April 1434, and was, in 1514, President of the Accounts in Angoulême, and Vice-president of the Chamber of Accounts in Paris. In regard to him, Francis I gave to his son SERAPHIN DU TILLET, knight, Valet de chambre to the King, the office of Register in chief to the Parliament of Paris, in which he succeeded Nicholas Pichon his father-in-law. The Letters-patent of this grant are dated at Claye the fifth of November 1518, and he was sworn in the fourth of February 1519, new stile. From that time, this office has not been out of the family. JOHN, his brother, obtained it, on the seventh of September 1530; JOHN, his son, the twenty-fourth of July 1552; JAMES, his brother, on the second of January 1578; JOHN, called the Younger, on the fourth of March 1588; FRANCIS, in 1638; and JOHN-FRANCIS, in 1674. This year the king divided the office into four parts, whereof a person named Philip-James had one, which he enjoyed till 1689, when JOHN-FRANCIS DU TILLET re-entred upon it. John du Tillet, brother to the first John, and son of Elias, was made Bishop of St Brieux, in 1553, and Bishop of Meaux the 16th of December 1565. He died in the month of December 1570.

It appears from hence, 1. That Seraphin du Tillet was the first of this family who was Register in chief to the Parliament of Paris. 2. That this Philip-James was not of the family of du Tillet, as this passage, related by Mr Bayle, implies, and as Mr Bayle himself appears to have believed. 3. That this Philip-James seems to have discharged this office only till such time as J. Fr. du Tillet should come of age, or be qualified to discharge it himself. REM. CRIT.]

TILLET (JOHN DU) younger brother of the foregoing, was an Ecclesiastic, and became a very learned man (a). He was a perfect master of languages, the ancient Roman law, and Ecclesiastical Antiquity. He searched, by the permission of Francis I, the most celebrated libraries in the kingdom, and took from those libraries a great many books, which enabled him to publish several valuable ancient pieces, both Ecclesiastical and Civil (b) [A], and particularly an old manuscript, that goes under the name of Charlemagne [B], and which did not much please the Roman Catholics. He was preferred successively to two bishoprics; some say he was first Bishop of Meaux, and afterwards of St Brieux (c), others that he was first Bishop of St Brieux and afterwards of Meaux (d). He composed some controversial treatises, and yet was suspected of inclining to Calvinism [C]. The public very much esteemed a short chronicle of the Kings of France (e), which he published in Latin (f), and in French (g), and continued from Pharamond

(c) Sammarthan. Elog. lib. ii, pag. 79.

(d) Thuan. lib. xliii, pag. m. 974.

(e) Sammarthan. Elog. lib. ii, pag. m. 30. La Croix du Maine, pag. 268.

(f) In the year 1551.

(g) In the year 1553.

[A] He published several valuable ancient pieces, both Ecclesiastical and Civil. He printed at Paris, in 1538, some treatises of Pacianus, Bishop of Barcelona, and in 1540 Apostolorum Canonum & Concilia XIII; and in 1550, Codicis Theodosiani Libri priores octo emendati, & posteriores octo integri primum; and in 1555, Evangelium Matthæi Hebraicè & Latinè; and in 1567, the works of Luciferus, Bishop of Cagliari.

[B] and . . . an old manuscript, which goes under the name of Charlemagne. He published it at Paris, in the year 1549; but no notice is taken in the title-page, either of the name of the Printer, or of the place where the book was printed, and in the preface, which he added to it, he took the fictitious name of Eliphilus. It has been thought, with a great deal of probability, that by the former part of this word he intended to signify, that being animated with the spirit of Elias, he had a design to destroy images; and that by the latter part he described his own name Tilius, for Tilia in Latin, is the name of a tree, which the Greeks call them, that this notion of theirs is false; and that this piece was at least approved and adopted by Charlemagne. See the proofs alledged by Mr Daillé, and his answers to the chicaneries of Bellarmin (3). Father Maimbourg ingeniously confesses that, this book was written under the Emperor Charlemagne. It remained in obscurity, continues he (4), till the year 1549, when a Lutheran having found it in an ancient manuscript, published it with a preface of his own, under the borrowed name of Eli Phil, in which he inveighs terribly against the worship of images. It cannot, however, be denied, that this book was the very work ascribed to Charlemagne, as appears by the answers which Pope Adrian made to the objections contained in it. He pretends, that those who composed it had nothing of the spirit of that Prince, who would not have written in that manner. This remark has been invincibly refuted in the Entretiens d'Eudoxe & d'Euchariste (5), the author of which confesses, that there is room to believe that Charlemagne was the author of those four books which go under his name. I am surprised that no body has censured that Jesuit, for asserting that they were published by a Lutheran. Could he be ignorant, that all the world has long since acknowledged, that the editor of them was a Bishop?

(3) Daillé, Traité des Images, lib. iv, ch. iii. See also Mr du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. vi, pag. 120, Dutch edition.

(4) Maimbourg, Hist. des Iconoclastes, lib. iv, pag. m. 23.

(5) Pag. 273, Dutch edition.

(1) Taisnier, Adit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, p. 344. ex Vossio de Hist. Lat. lib. ii, cap. xxx, pag. 290.

(2) See among others Alanus Copus, Dial. IV, cap. viii, xix; & Dial. V, cap. xii, & seq. Surin, in Admon. de Syn. Francof. in the third Tome of the Councils, Part. i, pag. 159.

Phibra (1). It is certain that his Preface is not conformable to the principles of the Roman Catholics upon the worship of images; but rather to a book he published, which condemned the divisions of the second Council of Nice. This is the title under which he published it: Opus illustrissimi Caroli Magni, nutu Dei, Regis Francorum, Gallias, Germaniam, Italianque, fruebatur finitimas Provincias, Domino opulante, regentis, contra Synodum, que in partibus Græciæ pro adorandis imaginibus stolidè sive arroganter gesta est. Item: Paulini Aquileiensis Episcopi adversus Felicem Urgellitanum, & Eliphandum Tolitanum Episcopos Libellus. Quæ nunc primum in lucem resuscitantur. Anno Salutis MDXLIX. A second edition of this book was printed at Cologne in the year 1555, and it has been inserted by Goldast in the collection of Imperial Decrees de Cultu Imaginum, on the worship of images, published at Francfort in the year 1608, in 8vo. Several controversial writers of the Romish communion (2) have maintained, that this is a supposititious piece, that Charlemagne was not the author of it, and that it was not composed in the time of that emperor, but rather by the Heretics of the XVIth century. It has been demonstrated to [C] He composed some controversial treatises, and yet was suspected of inclining to Calvinism. Here follows the titles of them: A treatise on the Antiquity and Solemnity of the Mass, on the Apostles Creed, and on the XII Articles of our Faith; at Paris, 1566, in 8vo. The Answer of a Bishop to the Ministers of the New Churches; at Paris, 1566, in 8vo (6). He published it also in Latin. Advice to the Gentlemen seduced by the Stratagems of the Ministers of the New Churches; at Paris, 1567, in 8vo. A treatise on the Christian Religion.

What follows is a proof of his being suspected: Cardinal Perron accused him of having some ill design against the Romish Religion, in publishing the treatise of Charlemagne. It is Monsieur du Tillet, says he (7), who caused it to be printed studio nocendi, out of a design to do mischief, rather than on any other account; and he who had been a pupil of Calvin, could have no other

(6) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 757, 758.

(7) Perroniana, who caused it to be printed studio nocendi, out of a design to do mischief, rather than on any other account; and he who had been a pupil of Calvin, could have no other ramond down to the year 1550. He died in the same month and year with his brother the Register (b). Some say that LEWIS DU TILLET, Archdeacon of Angoulême was their brother [D].

(b) That is to say, in the month of November, 1570. Sammarth. Elog. lib. ii, pag. 80, and La Croix du Maine, pag. 269.

(8) Ibid. at the word Calvin.

other opinion of images than this. Calvin, says he, in another place (8), was very much perplexed on the subject of the Eucharist. It is said, that Messieurs du Tillet have still in their hands some letters of his own writing on that subject of the Eucharist, which discover more clearly the opinion he had of it, than any of his other writings. It is not to be wondered at, if these Messieurs du Tillet have been a little suspected, as they had Calvin for their master. It cannot be thought strange, that the Preface which John du Tillet, the Bishop, prefixed to the book of Charlemagne, should render him suspected; for he expressed himself in the strongest terms against the abuse of images, and did not contain himself within the bounds that have been fixed by some Catholic Doctors (9). Perhaps he wrote afterwards against the Huguenots, for no other reason but to clear himself of all suspicion. What I have cited from the Perroniana proves, that his brother, the Register, was not esteemed truly orthodox, and that it was pretended he had been a disciple of Calvin. He purged himself however so entirely, that the Protestants looked upon him as their persecutor (10). And, by the way, I shall here correct a mistake in the Index to the second volume of the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches in the kingdom of France. We there find under the letter T du Tillet, the Register, and his cruelty, 7. 501; but when we consult this page 501 of the VIIth book, we meet with nothing there which can necessarily be imputed to this du Tillet. We read there only that some Protestant soldiers, who went out of Bourges in 1563, in order to go to Orleans, took a private road, by which some of them found their way very well, but the rest lost themselves: among whom there were thirty or forty, who being tired, and having very little powder left to defend themselves, were surprised and cruelly massacred by the persons who were kept by John du Tillet, Register to the court of Parliament of Paris, in his house of la Buissière near Chabillon on the Loin (11). If the author had said that du Tillet, residing at that time at la Buissière, had ordered this massacre, the Index of the book had been correct; but he leaves us at liberty to imagine that du Tillet might have no hand in it: for is it not allowable, in civil wars, for any one to guard his castles in the best manner he can? If the soldiers made use of commit any disorder, the owner of the castle, who is often at an hundred leagues distance, having given no orders in particular, can never be answerable for it. Those who make Indexes to books frequently commit mistakes of this kind.

(9) Mr du Pin, for example. See page 153, of his Nouvelle Bibliothèque, Dutch edition.

(10) See the remarks [D] and [E], of the article foregoing.

(11) Beze, Hist. Eccles. des Eglises, Vol. ii, livr. vii, pag. 501.

(12) Florimond de Remond, Hist. de l'Hérésie, lib. vii, ch. ix, pag. m. 383.

[D] Some say that LEWIS DU TILLET, Archdeacon of Angoulême, was their brother. Florimond de Remond shall be my author. He affirms (12), that Calvin having retired into the city of Angoulême, was entertained there for the space of three years, at the expense of Lewis du Tillet, Curate of Clairs, and Canon of Angoulême, whom he taught the little Greek he knew. He was brother to the Bishop of Meaux, and to John du Tillet, Register to the Parliament of Paris. This author adds (13), that Lewis du Tillet, having his head full of the opinions which Calvin had imprinted on him, and being desirous to see all those great men who had declared war against the Catholic Church, made a journey into Germany (14). . . . Du Tillet on his return having recovered his reason, renounced forever the doctrine of his master. Thus Calvin quickly lost the first of his conquests; for this was the first foul which was ever believed to be seduced by him. He shews very strongly the repentment he had against this man in his Preface to the Psalms. For it is of him he speaks, where he mentions a certain person, who after wildly revolting, and returning back to the Papists, discovered him passing to Geneva. He means du Tillet, whom he never mentions without re- flexion. Du Tillet, after his return to Angoulême, having, by letter, bid his last adieu to the novel opinions of Calvin, and made public abjuration of his Heresy, ascended the pulpit, (for he was a man of learning) preached, and declaimed against Lutheranism as zealously as he had before desired to promote it. The name of Calvinism was not yet in use. He was elected Archdeacon, which dignity he long disputed with la Renaudie (15). According to this account, it would be false that du Tillet, the Register, had been the disciple of Calvin: the Perroniana would confound things.

(13) Id. cl. x, pag. 889, 890.

(14) See the remark [A A], of the article CALVIN.

(15) Thuanus, lib. xxvii, pag. 488, says that la Renaudie

Note, that Papyrius Masso's brother, affirms, that Lewis de Tillet was not brother, but nephew to the Register of the parliament. 'Is (Ludovicus Tillius) erat filius H. lix in privato Coniutorio Regio Confessarii & Vicepresidis Rationalium, Aloisii & Sabaudia Francisci primi, matris, fratrisque Joannis Tillii Senatus Parisiensis exceptoris, cujus scripta extant (16). . . . Lewis du Tillet was the son of Elias, Privy-counsellor to the King, and Vice-president of accounts to Louisa of Savoy, Francis the first's mother, and the brother of John du Tillet, Register to the Parliament of Paris, whose writings are extant.' He does not say that the Register had no share in the return of this disciple of Calvin. You may observe, if you please, that this brother of Papyrius Masso got the best information he was able of all these things during his residence at Angoulême, where he had a canonship (17). Peter de St Romuald (18) observes, that this Canon du Tillet was named Lewis or Seraphin: he relates some facts advanced by Florimond de Remond, but instead of quoting this Florimond, he quotes Papyrius Masso, who has said nothing of them.

He went to law for a benefice which his uncle by the mother's side, had in Augoumois, and to which du Tillet the Register claimed a right. See, in the remark [E], of the preceding article, the words of la Planche, and of Varillas.

(16) Addit. to chap. iv, of the Life of Calvin. pag. 457. Elog. Pap. Massonis.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 456.

(18) In Continuatione Chronici Adami, pag. 297.

I find, in the Mercure Galant for the month of May, 1705 (19), one SERAPHIN DU TILLET, who was lately dead, a Counsellor in the grand-chamber, and an Abbot DU TILLET, who was still living; and that the mother of the late Count d'Entremont, Lieutenant-General of Bresse, and grand-mother of the Marchioness de l'Hôpital, was descended from the Register John du Tillet.

(19) Pag. 181.

TILLI or THILLI, a lordship in Brabant [A] which gave a title to John Count de Tilly, who was born there, and has been one of the greatest captains of the XVIIth century. He is mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary, under the word Tzerclas, which was the

[A] A lordship in Brabant. Gramaie informs us that it had belonged to the house of Warfuzé, and that Robert de Warfuzé transferred it to Gerard Marbais in the year 1389. It was afterwards possessed by John de Limiette, and then by Sanfon de Lalain, who, on the twenty-fifth of June, 1448, conferred the Dominium altum & bassum, on John Serclaes, descended from one of the most noble Patrician families of Brussels (1). The lordship of Tilly was then entirely independent; but afterwards became a fife to the Dukes of Brabant, by virtue of the following instrument: 'John, Lord of Thilly, transfers into the hands of my Lord Duke, his house and lordship of Tilly, with all its rights and appurtenances as by him enjoyed, and our said Lord the Duke hath again transferred the said house and lordship, and all the lands thereto appertaining to the said John, his heirs and successors, to hold it in perpetual fief of our said lord and his heirs and his successors the Dukes and Duchesses of Brabant. And the said John held his said house and lordship of Thilly of our said lord, and therefore did his fealty, and homage, and took the oath of allegiance, as customary in the court of the fiefs of Brabant. And our said lord received his homage with a salvo to his highness and lordship, and to the rights of every one. Done the 16th day of May, in the year 1449 (2). This John Serclaes was the father of James t'Serclaes, who was the father of Martin t'Serclaes father of John t'Serclaes, member of the council of war to the Emperor, who married a daughter of the Count of Friesland (3). (1) Id. ibid. (2) Id. ibid. (3) Ex eod. ibid. From the family name of this famous General. He had an elder brother, whose grandsons at this present time (a) make a very considerable figure. There are three brothers of them, all called Counts de Tilly. One is Canon of Liege; the two other bear arms. One of whom is General of the troops of Liege, and has been raised to the dignity of a prince by the King of Spain [B]. The other by his long services has been advanced to the chief posts in the Dutch army (b). He married a sister of the Count of Reckheim, Bishop of Coire or Chur, and Canon of Cologne and Saltzburgh, a lord who by his great merit and exalted genius supports the illustrious nobility of his house.

(1) Patricia imprimique nobili apud Bruxellam stirpe edito. Le Roy, in Topographia Gallo-Brabantia, pag. 99.

(a) That is, in the year 1696. The Gazettees are continually mentioning them.

There are some mistakes in Moreri's article Tzerclas [C], which is that of John Count de Tilly. I do not know whether he is not mistaken, when he says that this General was made a count at the Diet of Ratisbon, in the year 1623: I shall only say, that according to Father Labbe, John and James de Tilly were created Counts of the Empire by the Emperor at Vienna the 3d of September 1622 (c). The Sieur Blanc observes that Count Werner, nephew of Count de Tilly, was wounded at the battle of Statlo in the year 1623 (d).

(b) Lieutenant-General of Horse, and Governor of Arnheim, in 1701. See the Lettres Historiques, of November 1701, pag. 607.

(c) Labbe, Chron. Franc. Tom. v, pag. 846.

(d) Blanc, Hist. de Baviere, Tom. iv, pag. 190.

(4) Id. ibid.

From this marriage proceeded John t'Serclaes, created count by the Emperor Ferdinand II (4), and one of the greatest Generals of the XVIIth century.

[B] One . . . raised to the dignity of a Prince by the King of Spain.] This is the tenor of the Letters-patents, as abridged and published by the Baron le Roy. They are dated at Madrid the twenty-second of December 1693. 'Charles, by the Grace of God, King of Castile, &c. Being informed, that several ancestors of our most dear and royal Lord Albert T'Serclaes de Thilly, Count of the holy Roman empire, Gentleman of our bed-chamber, Serjeant-General of battalia in our armies in the Low-countries, and, at present, by our permission and consent, General of the troops of the Prince and Bishop of Liege, our ally, and others of his family have, with the utmost bravery and resolution, done several important services to the Emperors, Kings, and Princes, our august predecessors. As also that the said Albert T'Serclaes de Thilly, hath served in our armies from the year one thousand six hundred and sixty six, as Captain, Lieutenant-Colonel, Colonel of horse, and Serjeant-general of battalia, and that on all occasions which have offered in our service, he hath neither spared his life nor estate, of which we have received the utmost satisfaction which we can desire. As well as of the services he continues at present to perform in the quality of General of the forces of the Prince and Bishop of Liege, for the common cause, with a zeal, bravery, and experience so well known to all the world. Knowing moreover, that the said Albert T'Serclaes de Thilly is descended from a very illustrious and ancient family, which has always been supported by several great, high, and very considerable alliances, and that besides he possesses several lands, lordships, and estates, sufficient to maintain his honour, as those of Montigny, Farciennes, Preme, and others; and being willing, for this reason, to raise, advance him, and distinguish with greater honours, rights, prerogatives, and pre-eminencies; we have of our certain knowledge, &c. made and created, and we do by these presents make and create, Albert Count de T'Serclaes de Thilly, Prince of T'Serclaes, conferring and granting that he may bestow the said title of Prince upon the seat and lordship, which he shall name, under our obedience and jurisdiction in our said Low-countries: which seat and lordship we have to that end erected, and do by these presents erect into the dignity, title, name, style, and pre-eminence of Principality of T'Serclaes, &c (5).'

[C] There are some faults in Moreri's Article Tzerclas. I. He has forgot to set down the surname of this General of the troops of the Catholic league. II. The name of the town which he took after the battle of Prague, is Ellenbogen and not Elbogen. III. It should have been observed that Ellenbogen was a town of Bohemia. IV. The defeat of the Margrave of Baden at Wimphen did not follow, but preceded the taking of Heidelberg. V. What happened at Mansfeld near Darmstadt (6) was not a defeat, but only a check, and likewise preceded the conquest of Heidelberg; therefore these words of Moreri, Tilly had formerly . . . taken Heidelberg, contain an anachorism. VI. These words are not intelligible. He had formerly aided the Arch- duke Leopold in the taking of Breda. This, perhaps, is an error of the press, and should have been corrected. Bretta, the Latin name of Bretten, a small town in the Palatinate. This Arch- duke Leopold was Bishop of Stralsbourg, and joined his troops with those of Count Tilly at the siege of Heidelberg (7). VII. Instead of saying that the Duke of Weimar, and the Duke of Alkenburg (8) were made prisoners at the battle of Statlo, he ought to have said Duke William Saxe-Weimar, and Frederic Duke of Saxe-Altemburgh. For want of this particular distinction of names, said Altemburgh which the Sieur Blanc has used (9), there arise many in the Dutch ambiguities, which are disagreeable to the accurate reader. VIII. To say that there were among the prisoners several other Princes, is advancing an untruth; for the Sieur Blanc, who names the principal prisoners, only names these two who were princes. Observe that in the edition of France, in 1698, they gave the right title of the book of Julius Bellus Laurea Austriaca; but in that of 1699, they called it, agreeably to the Dutch editions, Maurea instead of Laurea.

(5) Idem, Erection de toutes les Terres, Seigneuries, & Familles titrées de Brabant, pag. 106.

(6) Thus it must be called, and not d'Armstadt, as Moreri has it. In the Paris edition, 1699, this fault is corrected.

(7) See Blanc, History of Bavaria, Tom. iv, pag. 153.

(8) They have for want of this particular distinction of names, said Altemburgh which the Sieur Blanc has used (9), there arise many in the Dutch ambiguities, which are disagreeable to the accurate reader.

(9) History of Bavaria, Tom. iv, pag. 190.

TIMÆUS, a Greek Historian, the son of an illustrious father [A], was of Tauro-menium in Sicily, and flourished in the time of Agathocles, who died in the fourth year of the CXIIIth Olympiad (a). He wrote several books [B], and among others, the history

(a) Athen. lib. ii, pag. 37, & alibi.

(1) Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. vii.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Id. lib. xiv, cap. xvi.

(4) Taken from Plutarch, in the Life of Timoleon, pag. 240.

[A] The son of an illustrious father.] He was the son of Andromachus, who was very famous for his riches and excellent qualities, and may be esteemed the founder of one of the most considerable towns in Sicily; for he assembled all the fugitives of Naxos, a city which Dionysius the tyrant had ruined, and settled them on a hill called Taurus. This gave rise to Tauro-menium (1). This he did in the second year of the CVIth Olympiad (2). It was long before this time that Dionysius had destroyed Naxos (3). Note, that Andromachus reigned with very great lenity in his new city, and shewed himself an enemy to all tyrants. He received Timoleon's troops, and animated his subjects to assist them, in order to deliver all Sicily from the yoke of tyranny (4).

VOL. V.

[B] He wrote several books.] Three of Syria: sixty-eight of Argumentis Rhetoricæ: ΟΛΥΜΠΙΟΝΙΚΑΣ ἢ ΧΕΡΟΝΙΚΑ ΠΕΡΕΣΙΔΙΑ, Olympionicas seu ælia Chronica. ἸΤΑΛΙΚΑ ΚΑΙ ΣΙΚΕΛΙΚΑ libris 8. ΕΛΛΗΝΙΚΑ ΚΑΙ ΣΙΚΕΛΙΚΑ. In the first of these two last works, he gave the History of Sicily, so far as it was concerned with the Roman History; and in the other he did the same, so far as it is concerned with the Grecian History (5). He wrote the History of Pyrrhus, by itself, as we are informed by Dionysius Halicarnassæus (6), and by these words of Cicero: 'Deesse mihi nolui quin te admonerem ut cogitares conjunctene malles cum reliquis rebus nostra contexere, an, ut multi Græci fecerunt, Callisthenes Troicum bellum, Timæus Pyrrhi, Polybius Numantinum: qui omnes à perpetuis fuis

(5) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 82. See Suidas.

(6) Dionys. Halic. lib. i, cap. vii.

(7) Cicero, Epist. lib. vi. ad Familiāres, pag. m. 255. suis historiis ea quæ dixi bella separaverunt (7). - I would not be so far wanting to myself, as not to advise you to consider, whether you had rather incorporate the history of my affairs with that of others; or, as many Greeks have done, Callisthenes the war of Troy, Timæus that of Pyrrhus, and Polybius those of Numantia; who have all of them separated those wars I have mentioned, from their general Histories. We have already seen that Timæus's History consisted of two parts, and they say that the first contained eight books, without taking any notice of the number contained in the second. But it is necessary to add, that several cite it without observing this division; they mention in general such or such a book of his Histories. The highest number, quoted by Athenæus, is the twenty-eighth (8). Diogenes Laërtius does not go beyond the eighteenth (9).

(8) Athen. lib. eighth (8). Diogenes Laertius does not go beyond this xi, cap. vi, pag. eighteenth (9).
471. [C] He was very much addicted to detraction.] This

(9) Diogen.
Laërtius, in Em-
peocle, lib. viii,
num. 6a.

(10) Diodorus Siculus, lib. vi, circa init.

(11) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 440.

(12) Polybius, lib. xii, p. 659. propter infinitam acerbiteratem (12). --- Therefore v
now may justly seem to condemn those things whic meus has thrown out against Demochares. For v pears neither worthy of pardon, nor of credit fr body, because of his deviating so notoriously from t into calumny, out of his natural malicioſneſſe. Clemens Alexandrinus gives us Timæus and Theopompus for a couple of ſatirical and fabulous Hiſtorians. Ἰστορίαι ἀπὸ Θεοπόμπου καὶ Τιμαίου μύθος καὶ βλαπτικὰ καὶ φημίβηλα. See Theopompus quidem & Timæo qui fabulas & maleſticiſa component (13). Cornelius Nepos does much the ſame thing (14). Note that Athenæus obſerves, that ſfter writing againſt Timæus, called him Epitimæus (15). He was perhaps the firſt inventor of this pun. Note alſo that Ariſtotele was one of thoſe abuſed by Timæus (16), and we muſt not forget this circumſtance, viz. that this Hiſtorian vented all his spleen againſt perſons, even when they were not in the wrong. Thus he exclaimed againſt thoſe who mentioned Phalaris's Bull. He loudly proclaimed them fabulous writers; and with the utmoſt heat maintained that there was never any ſuch thing (17); when it was he himſelf who was miſtaken, for this Bull was ſtill in being in the time of Diodorus Siculus (18). It had been tranſported to Carthage, when Imilcar ſacked Agrigentum, and was reſtored to the Agrigentines two hundred and ſixty years after, when Scipio Africanus deſtroyed Carthage. Theſe particulars are related by Diodorus Siculus (19), as affording a favourable opportunity to censure our Timæus, and to ſhew the conjunctures wherein we ought to excuſe or not excuſe the errors of Hiſtorians. We ought to excuſe them, when the facts lie ſo obſcure that even with very great diligence they cannot be diſcovered: but we ought never to excuſe them, when either negligence, or an inclination to flatter or calumniate any perſon, carry them out of the right way. The author's words in the original will ſufficiently ſhew that he was not ſatisfied with the way. The author's words in the original better please those who are capable of understanding (19) ἴδω them. It is on their account I have transcribed them :

 other readers ought not to be displeased, they may pass them by without the trouble of reading them, and yet understand in general the thought of the Historian. Περὶ δὲ τῶν φιλοτιμύσεων εἰπεῖν συγ-γράβην, διότι τὴν Τιμαῖον ὁ τῶν πρὸ αὐτῆς συγ[γρα-φῶν πικρότατα κατηγοροῦν, καὶ συγνύων ὑβρίαν τοῖς ιστοριογράφοις ἀποτίνας. αὐτὸς ἐπι-κτάται σχεδὸν ὅλῳν, ἐν οἷς μάλιστα αὐτὸν ἀποτί-σκειν ἀκαθολογούμενον. δεῖ γὰρ, οἷμαι, τὸς συγγράφεις ἐν μὲν τοῖς ἀνέκδοτοις τυγχάνειν συγ-γνύων, ὥς ἐν ἀνθρώποις, καὶ τοῖς ἐν τοῖς πεποιημένοις χρόνοις ἀληθείας ὅσας δύνασθαι τὸς μύθοις κατὰ περὶ αἰρέσειν ὁ τυγχάνοντας τὸ ἀκριβὲς προσκινῶντος κατηγορίας τυγχάνειν, ὅταν κολλασκόντες τινας ἢ δι' ἐχθρῶν πικρότητα περὶβάλλουσιν, ἀποφαλλάντων τὴς ἀληθείας (20) :
 Quā de re studiosius differre mihi libuit ; quia Timus, cum magnā acerbitate scriptores ætatem suam antece-dentes reprehendat, nullumque historicos veritatis studium relinquat ; ipse tamen, ubi diligentissimum veritatis studium profuturum, nugari & alucinari deprehendatur.
 Scriptores enim in iis, quæ non assequuntur, veniam (meo quidem iudicio) tribui æquum est, quippe, cū homines sint, & temporum præterlapsum veritas dif-ficulter & caligine eruat. Contrā verō, qui dat operā exactam inquisitionem negligunt, hos merito accusan-dos, arbitror, & quando nimirum nonnullis adulando, vel per odium virulentius alios impugmando, à regiā veritatis viā exorbitant & aberrant. - - - I have chosen to speak of this the more zealously ; because Timæus tho' be condemned most bitterly the writers who preceded him, and leaves no excuse at all for Historians, yet is himself found defective in those very things where he most of all values himself for his accuracy. For it is but reasonable, I think, that authors should be intitled to pardon in those things which are unknown to them, as they are men, and as truth is difficult to be discovered in ages that are past.
 But, on the contrary, that those should be deservedly condemned, who purposely are inaccurate, when in flattering or abusing others, they deviate from truth.

[D] Great doubt has been made of his veracity.] See the passage of Polybius cited in the preceding remark, and that which shall be quoted below (211). ⁽²¹⁾ In the remark [8].

[E] To

the spirit of revenge [E]. Several other faults have been discovered in his History [F]; but some excellent judges allow him to have been very learned, and very eloquent [G].

[E] To pursue Agathocles with so little justice. . . . He lifted too much to the spirit of revenge.] Agathocles had forced him to fly out of Sicily: this indeed cost him nothing during his life, but after his death he paid for it. Agathocles, when living, was out of the reach of Timæus's resentment: the latter was obliged to defer his vengeance until Agathocles was in his grave. Then he discharged the torrent of his rage against him: this tyrant was not only defamed by a description of his crimes and ill qualities, but also by fabulous calumnies. He robbed him of all the glory of his successful enterprises, and laid to his charge all the misfortunes which befel him, not excepting the most fortuitous: he represented him as a coward, tho' it was evident enough that this General had given a thousand proofs of his courage and valour. If it had not been so, was it possible for him, only a potter's son, as he was, to have subdued all Italy, and a great part of Italy and Libya? Doth not Timæus contradict himself? In all the rest of his book he exalts the valour of the Syracusans to the skies, and yet he pretends that Agathocles, who subdued them, was the greatest of cowards. Παρ' ἄλλην γὰρ τὴν γράβην ἐγκωμιάζων τὴν τῶν Συρακοσίων ἀνδρείαν τὸν τῶν κρατήσαντα θηλία φησὶ διεμνοχέειν τὰς ἀπαντας ἀνδρείας. Cum per totam historiam Syracusanorum fortitudinem laudet illum qui subegit ipsos omnes mortales ignavia longe superasse dicit (22). He betrays therefore too plainly his passion and hatred. The five last books of his history, which treat of the actions of Agathocles, do not deserve any praise. Suidas, to whom I am obliged for all this (23), allows that in all the other parts of his history, he took extraordinary care to speak the truth. Οὐτὸς δὲ Τίμαιος τὰς ἀμαρτίας τῶν πρὸ ἐαυτοῦ συγγράβων περὶ τὰ ἐξελύχας, κατὰ μὲν ἄλλα μέρη τῆς γράβης πλείστην πρῶτον εἶχε τῆς ἀληθείας. ἐν δὲ ταῖς Ἀγαθοκλέους, πρᾶξι, τὰ πολλὰ κατὰ τὴν ψυχὴν τὴν δυνάμειν, διὰ τὴν πρὸς αὐτὸν ἐχθρὰν: Timæus isti qui veterum historicorum peccata gravissime redarguit, in aliis quidem scripti partibus maximam veritatis curam provide fecit. In Agathoclis vero rebus pleraque ementitus est in principem illum propter odium quo prosequatur eum (24).

(22) Suidas, ubi infia.

(23) Suidas, id. Timæus, pag. 911.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Polyb. lib. xii, pag. 659, Edit. 1619, in folio. Add to this the words of Justin, lib. xxii, cap. 4. In Sicilia patre figulo natus (Agathocles) non honestiorem pueritiam, quam principis originis habuit. Siquidem forma, & corporis pulcritudine egregius, diu vitam stupri patientia exhibuit. Annos deinde pubertatis egresus, libidinem à viris ad feminas transiit. Post hæc apud utrumque scævum famofus, vitam locrocinis mutavit.

(26) Id. ibid. See Justin. Variorum, of Mr. Gravina, lib. xii, init. and Suidas, in Tpl. 911.

(27) Πάντων γένων ἀρετῆς. Fuit ille sane omnium maxime impius, Polyb. lib. xii, pag. 659.

ill-nature been hyperbolic, in the relation of whatever was to be blamed in Agathocles's conduct, and intirely suppressed whatever would admit of praise. Ὁ δὲ περισκοτισμένῳ ὑπὸ τῆς ἰδίας πικρίας τὰ μὲν ἐλαττώματα δυσμενικῶς καὶ μετ' ἀνζησεως ἡμῖν ἐξηγήσατο, τὰ δὲ κατορθώματα συλλυβδῶν παραλείπει: Egregius hic scriptor maledicendi studio occæcatus minus recte facta cum quadam animi malignitate solitus narrare, & simul omnia in majus extollere, præclara facinora simul cuncta prætermittit (28). . . . But being blinded by his ill-nature, he has related the worst things with malice and exaggeration, and omitted by the lump those that are right. Nothing can be more judicious than this whole discourse of Polybius.

[F] Several other faults have been found in his history.] We learn from Suidas (29), that Timæus was called a rhapsodical old woman γρασοσυλλέκτης, because whatever came in his way he inserted in his history. This is the same thing as if they had called him a compiler of old wives tales. Polybius charges him with speaking very ignorantly of Italy (30), and that in his description of Africa, besides being guilty of the same fault, he betrayed a trifling genius, a want of judgment, and a great deal of credulity with regard to obsolete traditions. Τὸν δὲ Τίμαιος εἰποι τις ἂν ὁ μόνον ἀνείρητον γεγονέναι περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὴν Λιβύην, ἀλλὰ καὶ παιδαριώδη καὶ τολμῶς ἀσυλλόγιστον καὶ ταῖς ἀρχαίαις φημίαις ἀκμήν ἐνδεδεμένον: Timæum jure pronuntiet aliquis non solum imperitum rerum Africae, sed etiam puerili ingenio virum, ac proflus infirmo judicio & qui antiquitus traditis opinionibus supra modum fuerit deditus (31). . . . But it may be said that Timæus, was not only an ignorant Historian, as to the affairs of Libya, but also trifling, extremely injudicious, and too much addicted to old stories. He blames him for writing on hearsay, and having shewn little judgment περὶ τὰς ἀναιρέσεις παλαιῶν ἀνέκδοτων. In judicandis iis quæ sibi narrarentur negligens fuit (32). This was undoubtedly the cause of the contradictions which were laid to his charge (33). To these may be added the passage of Longinus, which I shall cite in the remark [J], and those of Plutarch quoted hereafter: and observe, by the way, that he was not so bigotted a follower of the ancient traditions, as not to refute some of them: but he was not very happy in his choice; since, for instance, he wrongfully rejected the tradition of Phalaris's Bull (34), and that of the colony of the Locrians (35); nor did he probably go upon a better foundation, when he denied that Zaleucus gave laws to that people (36). Nay, he denied, that there ever was such a person as Zaleucus (37).

[G] But some excellent judges allow him to be very learned and very eloquent.] The passage of Diodorus Siculus above cited (38), may serve me here for a commentary; but I find my account much better in the following words of Cicero. 'Minimus natus horum omnium Timæus, quantum autem judicare possum longe eruditissimus, & rerum copia ac sententiarum varietate abundantissimus, & ipsa compositione verborum non impolitus magnam eloquentiam ad scribendum attulit, sed nullum ufum forentem (39). . . . Timæus, later than all these, but, as far as I am able to judge, by far the most learned, and most abounding both in the copiousness of his materials, and in the variety of his maxims, and not without politeness in the composition of his words, discovered a great deal of eloquence in his writing, but no forms of oratory.' He had been naming Herodotus, Thucydides, Philistus, Theopompus, Ephorus, Xenophon, and Calisthenes. I mention this only to shew what place Timæus possessed in Cicero's esteem. All these great historians were inferior to him in point of knowledge, as well as in fertility of subject and thought. This is saying a great deal. He has not ranked him disadvantageously with regard to his eloquence: you will apprehend this yet better by the following words. Genera Asiaticæ dictionis duo sunt, unum sententiosum & argutum, sententis non tam gravibus & severis quam concinnis & venustis qualis in historiæ Timæus (40). . . . The Asiatic way of speaking is of two kinds, the one sententious

(28) Id. ibid. Edit. 1619, in folio.

(29) Suidas, in Timæus, pag. 911.

(30) Polybius, lib. ii, pag. 105.

(31) Id. lib. xii, init. pag. 653.

(32) Id. ibid. pag. 668.

(33) Athenæus, lib. vi, p. 272.

(34) See the remark [C], citation (17).

(35) Polyb. lib. xii, pag. 656.

(36) Cicero, de Legibus, folio 333, C.

(37) Id. lib. ii, de Legibus, folio 333, C.

(38) Citation (10).

(39) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. ii, fol. 73, D.

(40) Idem, in Bruto, circa fin. pag. m. 451.

(c) That is, at Athens, if we believe Corradus in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 115.

(d) Polybius, lib. xii, p. 670.

(e) Id. ibid.

(41) Plutarch.
in Nicia, initio
pag. 523.

Fat, and stuffed out with dull Sicilian grease.

(42) You will find this in the remark [C], of the article FONTARABIA.

(43) Μαίζω τους Τιμονα-ντας των ἱπ-Πανασάτων
 Θιῶν. Timo-leontem illustris-simis Diis majorem facere. Sui-das, in Τίμαιος,
pag. 910.

(45) Longinus,
de Sublimi ge-nere, cap. iii.

Alexander spent less time in the conquest of all Asia, than Isocrates in finishing his panegyric. Longinus censures him for comparing a great prince to a sopsit; and maintains that by the same reason, we might believe, that the Lacedæmonians were less valiant (47) than Isocrates, since he was but ten years in composing his panegyric,
 when they spent thirty in the conquest of Melina.
 What consequence is here? did Timæus speak of the valour of Isocrates? Is it comparing an orator with a conqueror; to compare the time in which one writes, with that in which the other conquers? Tho' there is no proportion betwixt actions entirely different, does it follow that there is none between the long and short space of their duration? May we not say, that the great Gustavus Adolphus rendered himself master of part of Germany, in less time than Mr Vaugelas spent in translating Quintus Curtius, or Father Strada in finishing his history, or Scriverius in publishing his Martial? *

* Scaliger calls him somewhere in his Epistulae, Lentulum Martialis editorem.

This censurer of Timeus hath not considered the design of comparisons. They are intended to express, in a lively manner, the greatness or smallness of objects. There is nothing therefore more proper to be compared to certain things, than what most apparently enlarges the idea of them. So to render the rapidity of Alexander's victories the more conspicuous, they may be very well opposed to the slowness of a panegyrist. Consider, on one hand, the obstacles of war, the great number of enemies which Alexander engaged, and the vast extent of land which he subdued; consider on the other, the facility of writing a discourse which may be recited in an hour: and it is impossible but that you must be struck with the incredible swiftness of this conqueror, if you imagine that he spent no more years in his conquest than the Rhetorician in composing an oration. Another conqueror who had not subdued so many provinces in 30 years as Alexander in ten, would not have served so well in this comparison as Socrates; for we are naturally inclined to imagine almost an infinite disproportion betwixt the labour of a Rhetorician, and that of a conqueror. We think it infinitely more easy to range words, than subdue kingdoms. We must allow therefore that Timeus was very happy in his choice. He took what might strike the imagination of his readers in the most lively manner. I have read in a modern author (48) that the Duke of Candale, and Cardinal de la Valette, Generals of the French army, in the year 1637, took Landrecies almost in seven days than Charles V. formerly employed months in the not taking it, being forced, after six months time, shamefully to raise the siege. This is without doubt a beautiful, lofty, and noble idea; but I am sure that we should be yet more sensibly touched with the expedition of a conquest, if it should be said, A famous Engineer formerly spent as much time in drawing a plan of this place, as the General in taking it. The precedents of the best authors declare as strongly in favour of Timeus as these reasons. The greatest Roman Orator said, that Pompey had finished more wars than others had read, and (48) Girard Vie du Duc d'Esperoon.

and (48) Girard, Vie du Duc
my, d'Epemnon.

Plutarch has condemned him justly on account of his puerility with relation to a composition place, and that travellers never went through so many countries in so little time, as he subdued them by his victories. ' Qui sæpius cum hoste confligit quam quicquam cum inimico concertavit: plura bella gessit quam cæteri legerunt: plures provincias confecit quam alii concupiverunt (49). . . . Quis unquam aut obeundi negotii aut consequendi quæstus studio tam brevi tempore tot loca adire, tantos cursus conficere potuit quam celeriter Cn. Pompeio ducis belli impetus navigavit (50) ? . . . Who has often engaged in a pitched battle, than any other person has done in an ordinary quarrel: waged more wars than others have read; conquered more countries than others ever coveted. . . . Who could ever go to so many places, and perform so many expeditions in the way of business or trade, in so little time, and with so great dispatch, as Pompey employed in carrying on his wars ?' Is not this comparing Pompey with the meanest man who is but just able to read, and with a merchant, whose thirst for gain transports him from place to place (51). If the comparison betwixt Alexander and a Rhetorician so much blamed by Longinus is not good; ought we not to condemn this, which notwithstanding is really admirable, and the most proper thing in the world to excite those ideas in the mind, which the orator proposed to excite? But to come to modern examples. I shall not alledge what was said of Charles VIII, that he run through Italy swifter than a quarter-master with chalk in hand, and without stopping. I shall come directly to Mr Boileau, one of the greatest masters. He assigns two reasons in excuse for not fingering the victories of 1672. The first is, that the names of the towns which the king conquered in Holland, were harsh and barbarous, affording only such whimsical fillables as were subject to no measure (52). The second reason is, that the conqueror marched too fast for the Muses to keep pace with him.

(49) Cicero, pro Lege Manilia, fol. 104, B.

(50) Id. ibid. D.

(51) Impiger extremos curis mercator ad Indes, Per mare pauperem fugiens, per fax, per ignem. Horat. Epist. i, lib. i, ver. 45.

(52) This puts me in mind of these two verses, Rhon & Tenedos, Simoïsque & Xantos & Ide Nomina sunt ipso pœne timenda sono. They are Lædæmia's words, in her letter to Protyllus, apud Ovidium Heroid. Epist. xiii, ver. 53.

(53) Despreux, Epitre IV, ver. 20.

Encor si Tes exploits moins grands & moins rapides
Laissoient prendre courage à nos Muses timides,
Peut-être avec le temps, à force d'y rêver,
Par quelque coup de l'Art nous pourrions nous sauver.
Mais dès qu'on veut tenter cette vaste carrière,
Pégase s'effarouche & recule en arrière :
Mon Apollon s'étonne, & Némégue est à Toy,
Que ma Muse est encore au camp devant Orfroy (53).

Were your exploits left rapid, or left grand,
My tim'rous Muse might take her pen in hand;
Perhaps by force of thought, and length of time,
Attempt some tolerable work in rhyme.
But at the sight of such a vast career,
Pegasus trembles, and starts back with fear.
Apollo wond'ring sees Nimegean yield,
Before my lagging Muse can take the field.

Mr Pellifson made use of this thought in his invocation to Pegasus, a piece of poetry which was extremely admired; the whole design of which is to express that the king's conquests were so incredibly swift, that the Poets could not follow the rapid torrent. Since Mr Pellifson's choice of this image, so many authors have used it, that it is become a common-place. I remember to have seen it in the Paris Gazette, and this was, if I am not mistaken, when Mr de Guilleragues had the direction of that paper. He declares that he is forced to take advantage, that is, to anticipate his majesty's victories, that he may in some measure keep pace with his rapid expeditions. Mr Pavillon, who knows how to manage a subject with so much dexterity, has very agreeably turned this thought in his ode on the taking of Namur in the year 1693. Note, that this manner of complementing the king, is very well approved by an excellent judge of the justness and delicacy of thoughts: Perhaps you have not heard, says he (54), of another madrigal with which I am infinitely pleased.

(54) Bouhours, Manière de bien penser dans les Ouvrages d'Esprit, pag. 199, 200. Dutch edition.

Louis plus digne du trône
Qu'aucun Roy que l'on ait vû, Enseigne l'art à Bellone
VOL. V.

De faire des impromptu.
C'est une chose facile
Aux disciples d'Apollon :
Mais ce Conquerant habile
A plutôt pris une ville
Qu'ils n'ont fait une Chançon.

Lewis more worthy of a throne,
Than any monarch we have known,
Infracts Bellona in his fight,
Impromptu with the sword to write.
Apollo's scholars with their quill,
Here easily display their skill;
Yet this great conqueror's not so long
About a town, as they a song.

All these thoughts are ingenious, continues Eudoxus; but the elegy here appears very wisely, and these authors profess their design of praising, whereas he wbo said,

Croit que l'on fait les vers comme l'on prend les villes,

Believes that Rhymes are made, as towns are won,

seems not to think of praise: he seems to be in an angry mood, and to think only of coming off; and by this means the praise, that he bestows by the by, is so much the more nice. The exact conformity betwixt these thoughts and Longinus's parallel will not allow us to doubt that this passage carries in it Father Bouhours's approbation of Timæus. But to prevent all scruples on this head we ought to have recourse to the express words of this Jesuit (55): ' I am not of Longinus's side; his criticism went too far in charging Timæus with puerility as to his praise of Alexander. He that should say of Lewis le Grand, that he conquered the first time Franche-Comté in fewer days than it was possible to write his Panegyric, do you think he would say any thing ridiculous? And if, at his return from a campaign so short and so glorious, it had been said that those who on that account were obliged to compliment his majesty, had occasion for more time to prepare their speeches than he employed in the conquest: would you ensure the thought? I do not believe I should, replied Eudoxus; and yet I take Timæus's thought to be ill founded, because the speeches which you mention relate to the King and his conquests; but Iocrates's Panegyric did not concern Alexander or his victories.' With all due deference to this Eudoxus, I believe it would have been better for him to have given his approbation without any reserve, I agree, the Greek author's thought would have been more perfect, if Iocrates's Oration had been a Panegyric on Alexander. This would have given it an additional beauty: but I cannot allow that the want of this circumstance vitiates the comparison. Without this, it still retains a lively image of the rapidity of Alexander's conquests.

(55) Id. ibid. pag. 81, Dutch edition.

I ought not to forget that Mr Racine must needs be for Timæus against Longinus. Read this passage in Madam de Sevigni's letter to the Count de Buffly, dated the 3d of November 1677. ' What you say of Racine and Boileau is indeed very just. The King said to them four days ago: I am sorry that you did not come to the last campaign, you would have seen the war, and your journey would not have been long. Racine answered: Sir, we had only dressed cloaths; we indeed bespoke riding cloaths, but the places you attacked were taken before they were made. This compliment was very agreeably received (56). I cannot tell whether any body has yet made use of a thought of Martial. It concerns the Amanuenses, who wrote faster than the words were dictated to them.

(56) Lettres du Comte de Buffly Rabutin, Tom. i, pag. 226, Dutch edition.

Currant verba licet, manus est velocior illis,
Nondum lingua, suum dextra peregit opus (57).

Before the words, the writer runs along,
And the quick hand quite distances the tongue.
Y y y y

(57) Martial. lib. viii, Epig. cxxviii.

Why

place, very much used in antient History. That is, the compiling of good or ill presages [K]. From the character of Timeus, it is easy to conclude, that he was very unfit to be an Historian; and that he ought especially to have avoided exercising his pen on the actions of Agathocles [L].

Why might we not say, that the arm of a Conqueror finishes a war with greater expedition, than the tongue of an Orator does a speech?

[K] Plutarch has condemned him justly on account . . . of the common-place . . . of presages. He falls in to the foolish conceits of Xenarchus in several places, as where he says, that he took it for an ill boding Omen for the Athenians, that the Captain Nicias, having his name derived from the word Niké, which signifies victory, should oppose the Sicilian enterprise; and that by the mutilation of the Hermes's, that is, the images of Mercury, the gods advertised them, that in this war they should suffer a great deal of mischief from the Syracusan General, whose name was Hermocrates the son of Hermon: and besides, that it was probable Hercules would support the Syracusians on account of the goddess Proserpina, who was the protectress of the city of Syracuse, in return for the favour done him, in rendering to him the infernal dog Cerberus; and on the contrary, that he would oppose the Athenians, because they defended the Ægeïtz, who were descended from the Trojans, his mortal enemies, by reason he destroyed their city, in revenge of the violated faith, and of the injury done him by King Laomedon. But perhaps his judgment was just as remarkable in writing these fine stories, as in censuring Philistus's style, or railing at Plato and Aristotle (58). We may here, observe by the way, what false notions the Pagans had of God. The Dialogue teaches us that the iniquity of the Fathers are visited on the children no farther than to the fourth generation. And here is a Pagan Historian who imagined that the Trojans drew on their Protectors the hatred of Hercules, eight hundred years after the differences which had happened between this demi-god and a Trojan prince.

[L] Timeus . . . was very unfit for an Historian; and he ought especially to have avoided exercising his pen on the actions of Agathocles. His favourite talent was the imprinting a satirical character on his writings: he naturally loved to criticize and censure. For this reason it was impossible that an History written by him should be good, even tho' he had possessed all the other talents necessary for an Historian (59). This satirical spirit prompts a writer to suppress all laudable actions, and only to present to the reader the weak or the ill side of things. It exerts itself principally when we are representing the actions of a man who has injured us. There was no History therefore which our Timeus was so little capable of writing well as that of Agathocles, for he wrote it in a town, where he was in exile, having been banished his own country by Agathocles. The memory of that injury was every moment before his eyes, and cried aloud for vengeance in the ears of the writer. I leave it to you to determine whether an author naturally satirical, could in these circumstances preserve an exact neutrality betwixt the good and ill qualities of the tyrant who had banished him. Those who are fond of railing, would find without doubt, if they would give themselves the trouble of a narrow search, that their satirical humour is the product of a choleric and arrogant temper. Now as this temper excites strong desires of revenge, even on account of the smallest offence, it is reasonable to conclude that Timeus found in himself a violent passion to be revenged on Agathocles. For which reason he ought not to have mentioned him in his History, because he must be sure that if he mentioned him he could not avoid violating the laws of History. The most modest and moderate should distrust their own virtue, when describing the actions of a persecutor. They ought very justly to apprehend, that the injuries of banishment may raise those clouds, which will conceal from them the true state of affairs, and thereby hinder their discharging the duties of an Historian (60). With much more reason ought such a man as Timeus to be apprehensive of the illusions of resentment. I am of opinion that there are some men so considerate, that they would rather choose not to write at all, than to set up for Historians in such circumstances as expose them to these misrepresentations: they would not content themselves with calming the first commotions of the mind, and staying till time had closed up the wound; but they would for ever renounce writing on a subject which would infallibly open it again. But Timeus was not of this temper; and I dare affirm that the sole desire of revenging himself on Agathocles, would have determined him to take pen in hand immediately to compose a History of Sicily. Every age can furnish us with examples of authors, who had never thought of writing Histories, if personal resentments and modish passions had not been their motive. They have not patience to stay till their passion is over, which is the least they ought to do; but they write from the first beginning of their resentment. They should remember this fine precept,

Ne frena animo permitte calenti,
Da spatium tenuemque moram: male cuncta minifrat Impetus

*Cool first, nor give your angry mind the rein,
For violence your end will ne'er obtain.*

But perhaps they are afraid they should not be able to write, if they should stay till their minds are composed. Perhaps they fancy that anger gives them a talent which they had not before.

Si natura negat facit indignatio verum (61).

If nature does not, anger makes us write.

Hence we find their Histories to be so very partial, and that they add their own comments on every action which they relate. One would be apt to take them for Judges of the Inquisition: they give sentence on every fact; they pronounce it weak and base, &c. why do they not give the reader leave to form this judgment? They ought to confine themselves to a narration which only contains the principles or the premises of reasoning; the reader would draw the conclusion himself, whether it tends to censure or to commend. It is enough therefore to represent facts: sentences of this kind ought to be managed in the same manner as those called maxims: they ought not to shew themselves in Relievo; but ought to be incorporated in the narration, as has been already observed (62). There are a great many modern Histories, in whose titles the epithet Critical is wanting; for the authors of them do nothing else but criticize, and sometimes engage in a regular dispute. They relate and then refute alternately.

(60) See the remark [B], of the article HALL (RICHARD).

* Stat. Theob. lib. 2, ver. 697.

(61) Juven. Sat. 1, ver. 79.

(62) In the remark [C] of the article THEON.

(58) Plutarch. in Nicias, pag. 523. Note that Longinus on the Sublime, ch. iii, laughed at the reason taken from Hermocrates's name.

(59) Compare with this the remark [D], of the article REMOND.

TIMESIUS, [A] was a very considerable man in Clazomenæ, the place of his birth. He there enjoyed so great an authority, that he did whatever he pleased; and as the public was obliged to him for several services, he did not apprehend that he should become odious by his greatness. But he was satisfied to the contrary, when passing by a place where some little children were playing at cockals, he listened to their talk. One of them was busied in making a cockal fly out of a hole: The thing appeared so very difficult, that most of the children believed he would not be able to do it: But he who was to play being of another opinion, I wish to God, said he, that I could make Timesius's brains fly out, as I will do this cockal. Timesius no longer doubted but that he was extremely hated in the city; and as soon as he came home, he told what he had heard to his wife, ordered her to pack up her things and follow him, and departed from Clazomenæ (a). I am ready to believe it was after this time that he undertook to conduct a colony into Thrace, and to rebuild Abdera. We have seen elsewhere (b) that his design did not succeed, and that he was driven out by the Thracians before he had regulated his new establishment. The Teians who in the LIXth Olympiad abandoned their city, succeeded much better in the design of building Abdera. They retained such a vast respect for him, that they honoured him as a hero (c). He experienced the truth of the answer, which the oracle gave, when consulted concerning the conducting of a colony, which was; Look for swarms of bees, and you will find abundance of wasps (d). The misfortune was, that instead of ejecting the drones like the bees in Virgil (e), the wasps constrained him to give over his enterprise.

(a) Plutarch. Præc. Reip. ger. pag. 812.

(b) In the article ABDERA.

(c) Herodot. lib. i. cap. cxcviii.

(d) Plut. de Amicor. multitud. pag. 96.

(e) Ignavum fucos pecus a præsepibus arcent. Virgil. Georg. lib. iv. ver. 168.

[A] Timesius. I call him by the name which Herodotus has given him, and not by that of Timesias given him by Plutarch. I have elsewhere observed (1), that a very learned man has called him Tifamenes, and probably by a typographical error has ascribed to him the driving out the Thracians (2). Another has said that he was expelled by the Teians; I have also taken notice of this mistake (3).

(2) Ibid. remark [B].

(3) Ibid. remark [C].

TIMOLEON, the General of the Corinthians, was one of the greatest men of ancient Greece. He might have been called the scourge of tyrants; for his strongest inclination and principal employment was to punish the usurpers of sovereign power, and to maintain or re-establish liberty. If he fought against tyrants, it was not to rid himself of competitors, but to seize the unlawful authority of which he would deprive them. We find but too many such enemies of usurpers. As to him, all his undertakings were in favour of the people. He carried his zeal for the interest of his country so far, that he caused his eldest brother Timophanes to be killed [A], after having found that all his remonstrances and intreaties were not capable of converting him. We ought to know that Timophanes set up for a tyrant in the city of Corinth. His death drew after it consequences very disagreeable to Timoleon. Some people reproached him with it as an execrable parricide, and his mother loaded him with curses [B]. This threw him into [A] He caused his elder brother Timophanes to be killed. He did not stain his own hands with his brother's blood; but he was however one of the real authors of his murder, which happened in the following manner. Timoleon confederated himself with two persons, one of whom, named Æschylus was Timophanes's wife's brother, the other was a Soothsayer named Satyrus (1). They all three went to the tyrant, and endeavoured to persuade him for the last time to restore liberty to the people. He at first laughed at them, and afterwards grew very much enraged. Upon this Timoleon stepped a little aside, covered his face and wept whilst the other two killed Timophanes (2). This is Plutarch's relation, which generally speaking agrees with that of Cornelius Nepos (3). But Diodorus Siculus says that Timoleon himself killed his brother (4). There is one difference observable betwixt Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch. The first says that Timoleon joined with his brother-in-law; the other tells us that it was with Timophanes's brother-in-law. Let us express this more clearly. This associate, according to Plutarch, was Timophanes's wife's brother (5); but, according to Cornelius Nepos, he had married a sister of Timophanes and of Timoleon. Per aruspem communemque affinem cui foror ex iisdem parentibus nata, nupta erat, fratrem tyrannum interficiendum curavit (6). - - - He procured his brother to be killed by a Soothsayer, and a relation in common to both brothers, having married their own sister. Mr Morel is here guilty of an error. Timoleon, says he, consented that Satyrus, who had married their sister should kill this upstart tyrant. He cites Diodorus Siculus, and Plutarch: the first does not mention him; and the other does not say that Satyrus was any way related to Timoleon; he only calls him a Soothsayer. And as to the other accomplice, he calls him Æschylus, and makes him Timophanes's wife's brother. It is not impossible that this Æschylus might have married Timophanes's sister, and yet be Timophanes's wife's brother. Upon this foot Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch would both be in the right, tho' each must have omitted a part of his relation to that family.

[B] Reproached him with it as an execrable parricide, and his mother loaded him with curses. Let us take this fact in its full extent as related by Plutarch. Those who could not bear popular liberty, or who had been long accustomed to be near the persons of great men and to make their court, made a show of being very well pleased with the tyrant's death; and yet by continually reproaching Timoleon for having committed a parricide execrable and abominable both to the gods and men, they made so great an impression upon him, as occasioned his repenting that he had any concern in it: and besides being informed that his mother bore it very impatiently, and that she was continually uttering against him the most terrible expressions and horrid maledictions, he went to her, with a design to comfort her: but she ordered the door to be shut upon him and would not see him. Being thus overwhelmed with grief, and troubled in mind, he took a sudden resolution to starve himself to death: but his friends who did not abandon him in this desperate melancholy, continued to urge him by persuasions and earnest intreaties, till they forced him to eat. After this he resolved to retire for the remainder of his life to a country solitude, and to quit all concern in the government of public affairs. He at first led so rigorous a life, that he not only abstained from ever coming to the city, but avoided all company, and did nothing else but wander up and down from place to place, in the most remote and solitary parts of the country he could find, and consume himself with melancholy (7). . . . Whether it was his regret for the death of his brother, or his being ashamed to appear before his mother, which forever it was, it so broke his

(1) So Theopompus calls him: but Ephorus and Timæus call him Oribasus. Plut. ubi supra.

(2) Taken from Plutarch, in the Life of Timoleon, pag. 237.

(3) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleonis. cap. i.

(4) Diodor. Siculus, lib. xvi. cap. lxxi.

(5) Ἀδελφὸν ἔσχε τῆς Τιμοφάνους γυναῖκος. Plutarch ubi supra.

(6) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleonis, cap. i.

(7) Plutarch in the Life of Timoleon, pag. 238.

into a despairing melancholy; he designed to put an end to his life; and when at last his friends had engaged him to alter his resolution, he renounced all public affairs, and confined himself to an obscure solitude. Here he spent twenty years, as in all probability he would have done his whole life, if an opportunity had not offered of restoring Syracuse to its liberty. This city oppressed by the tyranny of Dionysius, had recourse to the Corinthians. They resolved to assist them, and gave Timoleon the command of the troops designed for that service. That voyage was accompanied with very favourable omens [C]; but he met with many difficulties to be surmounted in order to his landing in Sicily; for Ictes the tyrant of Leontium, who had pretended to join with the Corinthians in the recovery of the liberty of Syracuse, but at the bottom aimed at dethroning Dionysius, for no other end, but in order to render himself master of that city, had joined with the Carthaginians, and possessed all the passes. He kept Dionysius besieged in the fortresses of Syracuse, having already taken the rest of the town. Notwithstanding these obstacles, Timoleon by stratagem landed in Sicily, defeated Ictes's army, and in a little time after became master of the citadel of Syracuse, and afterwards of the whole city. The citadel fell into his hands, by means of Dionysius the tyrant surrendering it together with his person into his hands (a); and he took the city by storm, without having so much as one of his soldiers either killed or wounded. He caused the fortresses to be razed, in order to ascertain to the inhabitants the duration of that liberty which he had recovered, and after having been successful in his endeavours to re-establish good order in this place, he applied himself to the restoring of the ancient liberty of all the cities in Sicily, which then groaned under tyrants. He forced Ictes to renounce his alliance with the Carthaginians, and to content himself with living in a private capacity in the city of Leontium. He obliged Leptines the tyrant of Apollonia to surrender himself, and sent him to Corinth. He obtained a signal victory over the Carthaginians. He punished the treachery of Ictes who entered into new alliances with them [D]. He defeated

(a) He was sent to Corinth: but it cannot be said, as it is in Moreri, that he was sent thither, after he had been overcome by Timoleon; for Dionysius did not oppose Timoleon.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Hoc præclarissimum ejus factum non parum modo probatum est ab omnibus. Nonnulli enim læsam ab eo pietatem putabant: & invidiam laudem virtutis obtebant. Mater vero post id factum, neque domum ad se filium admisit, neque aspexit, quin eum fratricidam impiissime detestans compellaret. Quibus rebus ille adeo est commotus, ut nonnunquam vitæ finem facere voluerit, atque ex ingratorum hominum conspectu morte decedere. Cornel. Nepos, ubi supra.

(10) Diodorus Siculus, ubi supra.

(11) Plutarch. ubi supra, pag. 238, 239.

his spirit and disheartened him, that for twenty years after he did not in the least intermeddle in any honourable or public affair (8). Cornelius Nepos says much of the same thing (9): But Diodorus Siculus says nothing of this long melancholy of Timoleon; but, on the contrary, gives us to understand, that there was only a small distance of time between the death of Timophanes, and the expedition of Syracuse (10). He says, that as soon as Timoleon had killed his brother there arose a great tumult: one part of the inhabitants demanded justice on the murderer, and others requested that those elegies should be bestowed on him, which were due to the destroyers of tyrants. This dispute was referred to the decision of the senate; the cause was pleaded on both sides by the counsel for and against Timoleon: The judges had not pronounced their sentence, when the Syracusan ambassadors came to request the assistance of the Corinthians. The senate ordered that Timoleon should be sent to Syracuse, and that if he discharged that trust well, he should be treated as the killer of a tyrant; but if the contrary, as a parricide. I shall once more cite Plutarch, to evince, by an unquestionable example, how much the best Historians can wrest the most essential characters of a fact. Here is Diodorus Siculus, who assures us that the Corinthian senate did not intrust Timoleon with the command of their forces, otherwise than under a disagreeable condition, namely, that his criminal process should end in his abolition or condemnation, according as he should behave himself well or ill in that post. But Plutarch's relation is quite different: he says that Timoleon was elected General absolutely, and without any condition, by the voice of the people: After which Teleclides, who was then a person of the greatest authority in the Corinthian affairs, rising up, made a speech to Timoleon, in which he exhorted him to behave himself like a good man and brave commander in this charge: for, said he, if you do this we shall pronounce sentence on you, that you have killed a tyrant; but if you do not discharge this trust well, we shall condemn you for murdering your brother (11). These are no trifling variations, but essential differences, and, to use a Latin phrase, toto cælo diverſi; — diametrically opposite. We cannot possibly excuse both these Historians; one of them must necessarily have fallen into a very great mistake.

[C] With very favourable omens. I shall not mention the happy preface he met with at Delphi: Moreri hath already done it. But here are others: When the fleet was ready, and the forces completely equipped for their departure, the priestesses of the goddess Proserpine declared, that in their sleep the night before, the goddesses Ceres and Proserpine appeared to them in travelling dresses, and told them they would go with Timoleon to Sicily. On this account the Corinthians fitted out a galley, called the galley of Ceres and Proserpine (12). . . . When Timoleon was on the main sea, having the wind astern, in the night he thought that on a sudden the heavens opened, and displayed a large quantity of bright and visible fire, expanding itself over his ship, and appearing in the form of a burning torch, like those used in religious ceremonies. This torch accompanied and conducted them throughout their voyage, and at last dispersed and vanished at a place near the coast of Italy, where the pilots had consulted to land. The Soothsayers being asked the signification of this presage, answered, this miraculous apparition confirmed the dream of the priestesses of Ceres, and that the goddesses favouring the enterprise, had sent this light from heaven to shew them the way; the island of Sicily being sacred and dedicated to Proserpine, the rape on which goddess was also said to be there committed, and the sovereignty of it given her as a nuptial gift on her wedding-day (13). (12) Id. ^{ibid.} This relation of Plutarch might have been more accurately stated; but nevertheless, all circumstances duly weighed, it clearly enough appears that this was only a dream, and that there was no such thing as a real conducting fire which went as a guide before the fleet. So that this cannot reasonably be compared with the pillar of fire which went before the Israelites, or with the star which led the wise-men to Bethlehem.

[D] He punished the treachery of Ictes, who entered into new alliances with the Carthaginians. Timoleon's glory was by this somewhat eclipsed; for he permitted vengeance to be carried too far, and cruelty to be exercised upon those persons whom he had much better have exempted from punishment. Plutarch's words are these: 'A few days after, Timoleon bringing his army before Leontium, took Ictes, his son Eupolemus, and the General of his horse, alive, they being delivered up into his hands by their own soldiers. Ictes and his son were punished with death, as traitors and tyrants; and Euthydemus, tho' a valiant man and brave warrior, met with no more mercy, for some reflecting expression he was accused of having uttered against the Corinthians. For it was affirmed, that in a speech he made to the Leontines, on occasion of the Corinthians first arrival in Sicily to wage war against the tyrants, he said, amongst other things, that they ought not to be surprized or affrighted, if Corinthian dames were gossiping abroad*.

* Thus we see most men are very frequently more enraged at reflecting words than injurious actions; they more patiently suffer a real injury than a reflection

* It is the beginning of Euripides's Medea.

defeated Mamercus the tyrant of Catana, and pursued him to Messina, where the tyrant Hippo had given him shelter. He besieged that place, and had the satisfaction to get both those tyrants into his hands [E]. So many glorious actions did not inspire him with the least inclination for supreme power: But, on the contrary, he rejoiced that there were some persons in Syracuse who publicly accused him [F]. He spent the rest of his life in this city [G], where he received all the marks of gratitude which he deserved: He really enjoyed there all the advantages of supreme power [H], without losing the glory of having never acted for any other end than the liberty of the people, and without

‘reflexion, and pardon their enemies, when they have revenged themselves as to the fact, because they can do no less: but provoking expressions seem to proceed from too great an excess of hatred and malignity. After this, Timoleon returning to Syracuse, the Syracusians tried, condemned, and executed the wives and daughters of Ictes and his son. This seems the harshest action of Timoleon’s life: for if he had pleaded he could easily have saved the lives of these unhappy women: but he was not at all solicitous about it, he entirely abandoned them to the fury of the citizens, who were resolved to revenge on them the injuries done to Dion after he had expelled the tyrant Dionysius: for Ictes had caused Dion’s wife, Arete, his sister Aristomacha, and his son, who was but a child, to be drowned in the sea, as we have related in the life of Dion (14).’ Plutarch’s reflexion on human weakness, which pardons injurious actions easier than reflecting words, is very judicious.

(14) Plut. ubi
supra, pag. 253.

[E] He had the satisfaction to get both those tyrants into his hands. They both came to an unhappy end. Hippo, finding Messina besieged by sea and land, embarked on board a ship in order to escape: but he was taken before he got out of the harbour; and the Messinians having got him into their hands, caused the children to come from the school to the theatre to see one of the finest spectacles in the world, which was the punishment of a tyrant, who was publicly whipped, and afterwards executed. As to Mamercus he surrendered himself to Timoleon to be tried by the Syracusians, on condition that Timoleon should not be his accuser. He was brought to Syracuse, where he endeavoured to pronounce a studied oration which he had composed for that end: but finding that the people cried out, and made a great noise, to prevent the hearing of him, and consequently that it was not very likely they would pardon him, run cross the theatre, and struck his head with all his force against one of the steps on which the people sat, designing, by dashing out his brains to dispatch himself immediately; but he had the misfortune to miss his aim, for he was taken up yet alive and suffered the same punishment which was usually inflicted on thieves and robbers.

(15) Id. p. 253.

(16) Id. ibid.
pag. 251.

(15). We must not forget that Mamercus was a Poet, and had irritated the Syracusians by his satirical verses. Let us hear Plutarch on this head (16). ‘The common people of Syracuse bore very impatiently the jests which their tyrants made and said of them: for Mamercus, among others, valuing himself extremely on his talent in poetry and tragedy, having, in some engagements, gotten some advantage over the strangers which were in the Syracusan pay, gloried in his success, and dedicating the bucklers he had taken from them in the temple of the gods, added the following galling verses, in raillery and contempt of the conquered.

*These spacious shields shining with Tyrian dye,
And richly wrought with gold and ivory,
We by the dint of valour did obtain,
Altho’ our bucklers were but small and plain.*

Here is a Poet not mentioned by Vossius. Hieronymo Ragusa, the Jesuit, does not forget him in his eulogies of the ancient Sicilians (17); but instead of referring us to Plutarch he only cites Giovanni Vintimiglia.

(17) Mamercus quoque poetarum Siculorum gloria effulsit. Ex Joanne Vintimiglia in Tabula Poetarum Siculorum. Hier. Ragusa, in Elogiis Siculorum, pag. 178.

[F] He rejoiced that there were some persons in Syracuse who publicly accused him. This seems to me the most shining part of his life: we shall relate it without retrenching any of Plutarch’s words: But since it is, as we may say, necessary that not only all laws which the Latins call Castitæ, should have crests on their heads, as Simonides proverbially expresses it; so in all cities governed by democracy, there will be detractors. There were two of these at Syracuse, who being accustomed to harangue the people, impeached Timoleon, one of them named Laphystius, the other Demaretus. Upon the appointing a certain day by the former of these, for Timoleon to appear before the people to answer to a crime of which he pretended to convict him, the citizens mutinied, and would not allow the authority of the summons. But he appeased them by remonstrating to them that he had run through so many fatigues, and exposed himself to so many dangers, to the end that every Syracusan might freely enjoy the full benefit and privilege of the laws. Another time Demaretus in a full assembly of the people having reprehended and censured several of his actions, during the time that he was General, Timoleon made no answer to it; but only told the people that he heartily thanked the gods for having granted what he had so often requested and desired in his prayers: which was, that he might once see the Syracusians enjoy the perfect freedom and privilege of saying whatever they pleased (18). Those who shall prefer the Latin of Cornelius Nepos, may read it here. Huic quidam Laphystius homo petulantius et ingratus, vadimonium cum vellet imponere, quod cum illo se lege agere diceret, et complures concurrissent, qui procacitatem hominis manibus coercere conarentur: Timoleon oravit omnes, ne id facerent, namque id ut Laphystio ceterisque liceret, se maximos labores summaque adiisse pericula. Hanc enim speciem libertatis esse, si omnibus quod quisque vellet, legibus experiri liceret. Idem, cum quidam Laphystii similis, nomine Demaretus in concione populi, de rebus gestis eius detrachere capisset, ac nonnulla invehiret in Timoleonem: dixit, nunc demum se voti esse damnatum: namque hæc à diis immortalibus semper precatum, ut talem libertatem restituerint Syracusanis, in qua cuivis liceret, de quo vellet, impune dicere (19).

(18) Plut. ubi
supra, pag. 253.

(19) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleonis, cap. iv.

[G] He spent the rest of his life in Syracuse. There is nothing more extraordinary than a great man, who knows how to enjoy his glory in quiet, without aspiring after new dignities. Most of those who arrive to a great height of reputation and an extensive authority, imprudently aim at mounting yet higher, and by this means expose themselves to some mortifying oppositions, and especially in popular states. Timoleon was wiser: He never afterwards returned to Corinth, but obliged his wife and children to come to him: he never intermeddled with those troubles which afterwards arose among the Greeks, nor exposed himself to the envy of his fellow-citizens, which most governors and generals have raised by their too great and insatiable desire of honours and authority. He spent the remainder of his days in Sicily, in the happy enjoyment of the fruits of his own labours, the greatest of which was to see so many cities, and so many thousands of men obliged to him for their happiness (20).

(20) Plut. in Vita Timoleonis, pag. 253.

[H] He really enjoyed there all the advantages of supreme power. If we may believe Cornelius Nepos, Timoleon’s conduct was that of a very wise man; he voluntarily quitted all authority, and by this means acquired a power more secure than that of kings: ‘Quum tantis esset opibus, ut etiam invitis imperare posset, tantum autem haberet amorem omnium Siculorum, ut nullo recusante regnum obtineret: maluit se diligere, quam metui. Itaque cum primum potuit, imperium deposuit, & privatus Syracusis, quod reliquum vitæ fuit, vixit. Neque verò id imperitæ fecit. Nam quod ceteri reges imperio potuerunt, hic benevolentia tenuit. Nullus honos huic defuit: neque postea Syracusis res ulla gesta est publica, de qua prius sit decretum, quam Timoleonis sententia cognita. Nullius unquam consilium non modò antelatum, sed ne comparatum quidem est. Neque id magis benevolentia factum est, quam prudentia (21).’ - - - Altho’ he was so very wealthy as to be able even to take the government by force, and also so universally beloved by the Sicilians, that he might have obtained it with their consent, yet he rather chose to be the object of their affection, than of their fear. Therefore as soon as

(21) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleonis, cap. iii.

Z z z

out exposing himself to the envy of republican spirits. His funeral solemnities were very magnificent. I must not forget his acknowledging that all his great exploits were the work of the gods [1], a favour of fortune, a good luck, and not the effect of his own prudence

'be possibly could, he laid down his command, and spent the remainder of his life at Syracuse in a private capacity. Nor was this ill judged. For what other sovereignty held by power, he enjoyed by benevolence. No honour was unpaid to him: nor was any step ever after taken by the Syracusians without first consulting Timoleon. The opinions of others were not only not preferred, but even not put in competition with his. Nor was this more owing to his goodness, than to his prudence.' This Historian adds, that tho' Timoleon became blind he did not give over being serviceable to the public. He caused himself to be carried in a litter to the assembly, and gave his opinion without stirring out of it. We shall relate this a little more particularly from Plutarch. 'It was a great pleasure to see how highly he was honoured in their councils. For if the affair in debate was of small consequence, they dispatched it themselves without him: but if it were of importance, and required mature deliberation, they called him to their assistance: he was carried in his litter across the public place to the theatre, where the assembly of the people was held, which he also entered in his litter: the people unanimously saluted him, and he returned their salutations; and after the praises and benedictions of the whole assembly were bestowed on him, the business in debate was proposed to him, and he gave his opinion; which being approved by the voices and suffrages of the people, his servants carried him back across the theatre in his litter, and the citizens received him with clapping of hands and loud acclamations of joy. After which the council proceeded to dispatch the remainder of their public affairs by themselves (22).'

(22) Plut. in Vita Timoleon. pag. 254.

(23) Ibid. pag. 253.

(24) Cornel. Nepos, ubi supra, pag. 344.

A REFLEXION on this acknowledgment of Timoleon.

(25) Plutarch. in Præceptis Reip. gerendæ, pag. 816, where he expressly mentions Timoleon.

(26) The Abbot de Saint Real, de l'Usage de l'Histoire, Discours vii, p. m. 223.

[1] I must not forget his acknowledging that all his great exploits were the work of the gods. And in his familiar letters written to his friends at Corinth, as well as in several speeches made to the people of Syracuse, he often said, that he rendered thanks to God for having been pleased to make him the glorious instrument, in his gracious purpose of saving and delivering Sicily from slavery. And having built a temple in his house, he dedicated it to Fortune, and there sacrificed to her: and, which is more, he consecrated and dedicated his whole house to holy Fortune (23). Cornelius Nepos relates the same thing. 'Nihil unquam neque insolens, neque gloriosum, ex ore ejus exiit: qui quidem, cum suas laudes audiret prædicari, nunquam aliud dixit, quam se eâ re maximas diis gratias agere atque habere, quod, cum Siciliam recreare constituissent, tum se potissimum duces esse voluissent. Nihil enim rerum humanarum sine deorum numine agi putabat. Itaque fuit domi sacellum Æτοματίας constituerat, idque sanctissimè colebat (24). -- Nothing that was presuming or boasting ever came out of his mouth: who even when he heard himself praised, never made any other reply, than that he was and ought to be extremely thankful to the gods, that when they had resolved on the relief of Sicily, they had made choice of him to be the General. For it was his opinion that no human affairs are transacted without the direction of the gods. In consequence of which he built a temple in his house to Fortune, and paid his devotions there with great zeal.'

This chapel which he caused to be built in his house to Fortune, and the strict worship which he paid to this divinity, give us reason to believe that he spoke as he thought, when he attributed his happy success not to his own prudence, but to the favour of heaven. Otherwise it is very probable that all those who made these acknowledgments, had not always in view the duties of religion, I mean the gratitude with which we ought to attribute our success to divine providence, and not to our own wisdom. Several have talked in this manner only for a political end; either with a design to appease the envious, or to create a greater confidence in their friends (25). Let us quote an author, who knew how to make very judicious reflexions. The greatest obstacle, says he (26), which the founders of sects and empires have met with in their designs, is the natural aversion all men have to submit one to another, to acknowledge a superiority of merit and understanding. It has always been a certain rule among them to exclude from all manner of pre-eminence, those who discover any pretension to it, or a belief of their deserving it. And therefore all great men have with the utmost care avoided ever mentioning the extraordinary qualities which they had received from the liberal hand of nature. They have always exerted them with so much circumspection, that while every body else admired them, they themselves only might seem ignorant of them. . . . (27) But the most successful artifice they ever made use of to avoid irritating the pride and natural independence of men while they were enslaving them, was, that these illustrious impostors encouraged the people to ascribe all their excellent and superior qualifications to some secret communication which they had with the gods: by means of this address whatever was great in them ceased to offend any person, because it was no longer looked upon as any personal merit, which men are naturally averse to acknowledge, but only as an effect of good fortune, chance, or the favour of heaven which extends itself equally to the worthy, and unworthy, and does not debase the one or the other. . . . (28) It is upon this foundation that Cicero when obliged to particularize all his conduct against Catiline, in order to justify one who was accused of being concerned in his conspiracy; this great Orator very well knowing that a recital so glorious for him, would in his own mouth rather alienate than engage the minds of his auditors; to render this the less odious he very artfully, in the entrance of his Oration, ascribes all his great actions on this occasion to a divine inspiration. 'O dii immortales (vobis enim tribuam quæ vestra sunt, nec vero possum meo tantum ingenio dare, ut tot res, tantas, tam varias, tam repentinas, in illa turbulentissima tempestate Reipub. mea sponte dispenserim) vos profecto animum meum tunc concessistis, vobis patriæ cupiditate incendistis, vos me ab omnibus cæteris cogitationibus ad unam salutem Reipub. contulistis, vos denique in tantis tenebris erroris & inficentiæ clarissimum lumen prætulistis menti meæ.' -- O ye gods, cries he, at first setting out with this view, Immortal gods, (for to you I will render what is intirely yours, nor can I indeed presume so much on my capacity, as to believe that I could ever by myself have provided against so many accidents, so great, so different, and so unexpected, and in so turbulent a state of the common-wealth) yes, it is you who have inspired my soul with this ardent zeal for the preservation of my country; you who have taken me from all other cares to apply me solely to the prosperity of the republic: it is you, in short, who have introduced this shining light into my mind, before overshadowed by error and ignorance.'

If these reflexions of the Abbot de St Real are judicious, those of Mr Costar are not less so, when he is enquiring into the reasons why Sylla thought fit to assume the surname of Fortunate. He disapproves Mr Girac's opinion who says: 'It was indeed an instance of moderation in so illustrious a commander to ascribe to Fortune so many signal victories, which he might have attributed to his own valour. Nevertheless it was out of a consummate prudence, and a refined policy, that he yielded to the envy which ordinarily attends those who raise themselves above others. The ancient Sages always feared the goddess Nemesis, who diverted herself with debasing and destroying those too highly exalted (29).' Let us see Costar's reflexions on this passage of his adversary: As for Sylla it was not the defeat of Mithridates, which engaged him to assume the name of Fortunate. After having oppressed all the enemies of his greatness and person, and becoming Dictator by dint of his own authority, he made an ample recital of all the felicities which had attended both his military and civil actions: after which he declared that, in acknowledgment of those favours which heaven had heaped upon him, he had resolved for the future to add to his other names the title of Fortunate. That this was out of moderation and in order to avoid envy, as Mr Girac believes, is what I cannot persuade myself. I rather imagine that it was to give a greater assurance to those of his party, and greater terror to those who opposed him. In effect, we are more apprehensive of the fortune of a great man than (29) Girac, Remarques sur les Entretien de Costar, p. 255.

† Plut. in Sylla.

† Pag. 255.

prudence (b). This gives me an opportunity to make some extracts concerning what the ancients have said on the influence of Fortune [K], and particularly to refute those who affirm of his virtue, because virtue is a cause purely human, of which we know pretty nearly the measure, and extent; whereas Fortune is a divine cause whose power is unlimited. It is for this reason also, that we more readily rely on the protection of the fortunate, than on that of the virtuous; and the Lord Chancellor Bacon is of opinion, that Cæsar had not so effectually encouraged the Pilot frightened with the tempest, if he had said, Fear nothing, thou carriest Cæsar and his virtue, as he did by this encouraging expression, Fear nothing, thou carriest Cæsar and his Fortune (30). It is better in my opinion to ascribe to Sylla both these motives, that alleged by Girac and opposed by Costar, as well as that advanced by the latter; for it is certain, that in the Pagan times, they very much feared the goddess Nemesis, and firmly believed her an enemy to the proud. It was thought, that the General Timotheus's reverse of Fortune was owing to his refusing to acknowledge his obligations to his stars. Let us hear what Plutarch says on this head: Timotheus, the Athenian, the son of Canon, whose malicious enemies attributed all his great actions to the favour of Fortune, to express which they represented in pictures, Fortune bringing towns to him already taken in her net, whilst he was asleep; very warmly resented it, and was very much incensed against them on that account, urging that they robbed him of his just glory: on which occasion once upon his return from a successful war, after having given an account to the people, and publicly recited the particulars of his expedition, he added, Athenian Lords, Fortune has no hand in what I have related. The gods were so enraged at this ridiculous ambition of Timotheus, that he was never afterward successful; they thwarted him in all his actions to that degree, that he became so odious to the people that he was at last banished and expelled Athens (31). To this may be added what Plutarch tells us of Sylla's affecting the contrary. The facts are curious. Sylla not only patiently acquiesced with those who cried him up as a particular favourite of Fortune, but backed their opinion, and glorying in it as a special favour of the gods, he ascribed the glory of all his actions to Fortune (32), either out of a sort of vain glory, or a real imagination that of the gods conducted him in all his affairs; for he himself informs us in his commentaries, that of the enterprizes which seemed to have been well concerted, those that he boldly hazarded according as opportunity offered, tho' directly opposite to his former thoughts and resolutions in council, were such as succeeded best. Besides when he said that he was rather born for fortune than war, he seems to acknowledge his successes rather owing to his fortune than to his valour. In short, he appears [on all occasions entirely to submit to, and own his whole dependence on Fortune; since he even owns it as a singular favour of the gods, that he preserved such an union and amity with his father-in-law Metellus, who was a person in equal authority with himself (33).] See in Plutarch (34) some other facts which he has extracted from the commentaries of this Roman General; and observe that he supposes it possible to ascribe to Fortune by way of rodomontade, whatever great actions have been performed. Εἰς κόμπαν χάριμεν, εἰς ὅτι τῶς ἐχὼν τὴν δόξαν πρὸς τὸ θεῖον, whether, says he (35), Sylla spoke thus out of a bravado, or from his having this real opinion of providence. To me the justness of this disjunctive does not clearly appear: for if this great Captain had not really believed that God had favoured him, I own he might yet have said so for some political reasons already mentioned: but I cannot see that vanity or vain-glory could induce him to it, since he was not one of those nonsensical romancers, who ground their bravadoes on extravagancies, and are sufficiently satisfied if they do but talk. Such a man as he could not be ignorant, that he diminished the merit of his prudence and valour, in proportion as he acknowledged that Fortune was the cause of his victories. How therefore could he make this acknowledgment out of a principle of vanity, supposing him to be guilty of a lie? I add this, because Plutarch's disjunctive supposes, that Sylla could not have spoke thus from a motive of vain-glory, if he had been persuaded of the truth of what he said. In my opinion therefore the Historian ought to have joined these two particulars, which he hath separated. He ought to have said that Sylla being persuaded that providence had heaped on him its most surprising blessings, affected to boast of it, and from thence was supplied with matter for his vanity; for as all things are liable to be abused, it is certain, that if, on the one side, wise men humble themselves, by acknowledging that they are only the instruments of providence; on the other hand, haughty men pride themselves, by imagining that God has been pleased to make use of them for the execution of his designs. They look upon themselves as his favourites, and from that time believe themselves above all the rest of mankind. Consider that St Paul himself had occasion for a strong check, and severe mortification, to prevent his being puffed up with pride, by the excellency of those Revelations which God by his special grace had communicated to him. But to say something in defence of Plutarch: those persons who believe nothing of what they say concerning Fortune, may nevertheless ascribe their greatest actions to her out of vanity and presumption. They may govern themselves by the general opinion; and imagine that those who believe God to be the sovereign director of all things, will admire and firmly rely on his favourites. A modern author pretends that a certain boast of Tiberius (36) was rather political than vain. For it is of great importance for a Prince to be fortunate or to be thought so. And this passes among his subjects for merit and virtue, and the more so as they believe their felicity depends on his. So Tiberius who perfectly understood all the maxims of government, loudly proclaimed the prosperity of his house, declaring that such a fortunate incident had never before happened to a Roman Prince. From whence he thought to render himself more venerable to the people, by making them believe him to be the favourite of the gods (37).

(b) Taken from Plutarch, in the life of Timoleon.

[K] What the ancients have said on the influence of Fortune. If I would here collect all that they have said on this subject, I should be obliged to write a whole book on that head. I only propose to glean a few ears in this spacious field. It may be affirmed that no hypothesis is better established in the writings of the ancients, than that human industry and prudence have a much less share in events, than our good or ill fortune, or in other words, an unforeseen concurrence or disposition of circumstances not in the least depending upon us. 'Sunt in his quidem virtutis opera magna, sed majora Fortuna.' -- Among these indeed the actions of virtue are great, but those of Fortune yet greater. Pliny speaks this (38), after having related several events: but who doubts that he might have said the same of an infinite number of other particular occurrences? He lays down a little farther the same maxim, tho' somewhat more obscurely. 'Plurimum refert in quæ cuiusque virtus tem-pora inciderit.' -- The times in which each person's virtue happens to appear are of very great importance. Tho' Quintus Curtius should not expressly tell us (39), that Alexander's conquests were less owing to valour than to fortune; his History alone would have sufficiently declared it. Cornelius Nepos affirms that in the division of military glory, fortune has always the greatest share: 'Jure suo nonnulla ab Imperatore miles, plurima vero Fortuna vindicat, sequæ his in potestate habuit. Q. Curtius, prædicare (40). -- The soldier justly claims some share with the General, but fortune much more than either, since her assistance may truly be said to be of greater consequence than his conduct.' Mr Spanheim (41) conjectures that these words are only an imitation of the following: 'Nam bellicas laudes solent quidam extenuare verbis, easque detrudere ducibus, communicare cum militibus. . . . maximam vero partem quasi suo jure Fortuna sibi vindicat, & quidquid est prospere gestum id pene omne ducit suum (42). -- For some are accustomed to extenuate military successes, and deprive the Generals of them sharing them among the soldiers. . . . but the greatest part of all is claimed as it were of right by Fortune, who seems every thing her own which is performed with success.'

(30) Costar. A-polos. pag. 317, 318.

(31) Plut. in Vita Syllæ, pag. m. 454.

(32) And yet Salust tells us, Atque illi (Sullæ) felicissimo omnium ante civilem victoriam nunquam super industriam fortuna fuit, multique dubitavere fortior an felicitior esset. Salust. de Bell. Jugurth. pag. m. 362.

(33) Plut. in Syllæ, pag. 454.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Ibid.

(36) The wife of Drusus, the son of Tiberius, being delivered of two boys, Tiberius said in a full senate, that since the beginning of the empire, no man of his rank had been blessed with the like good fortune. Tacit. Ann. lib. ii.

† Quibusdam fortuna pro virtutibus fuit. Hist. 2.

* Cælestis favor, & quædam inclinatio numinum ostenderetur. Hist. iv.

(37) Amelot de la Houffaye in his Tiberius, chap. lxxxiii, pag. 106, Edit. 1683, in 4to.

(38) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. xxviii, p. m. 49.

(39) Fatendum est quum plurimum virtuti debuerit plus debuisse fortune quam solus omnium mortalium buit. Q. Curtius, prædicare (40). -- The soldier justly claims some share with the General, but fortune much more than either, since her assistance may truly be said to be of greater consequence than his conduct. Mr Spanheim (41) conjectures that these words are only an imitation of the following: 'Nam bellicas laudes solent quidam extenuare verbis, easque detrudere ducibus, communicare cum militibus. . . . maximam vero partem quasi suo jure Fortuna sibi vindicat, & quidquid est prospere gestum id pene omne ducit suum (42). -- For some are accustomed to extenuate military successes, and deprive the Generals of them sharing them among the soldiers. . . . but the greatest part of all is claimed as it were of right by Fortune, who seems every thing her own which is performed with success.'

(40) Cornel. Nepos, in Thrasibulo, cap. i.

(41) Spanheim sur les Césars de Julien, p. 428.

(42) Ciceron, O. rat. pro Marcello.

affirm that there is no other cause of prosperity than prudence, nor of adversity than imprudence.

'success.' Cicero who spoke this to Cæsar, had no reason to fear that he should be offended at it; for no person more expressly acknowledged the empire of Fortune than Cæsar (43). You may see in Mr Spanheim (44) what Livy, Diodorus Siculus, and others, have acknowledged concerning this Empire, either in express words, or by declaring that we ought not to judge of personal merit by the success of actions, which is entirely subject to Fortune, but by the means that are used. Scarce any one of the Poets has expressed himself so nervously on this subject as Juvenal.

(43) See the article CÆSAR, remark [H].

(44) Spanheim sur les Cæsars de Julien, pag. 428, & 255.

Si fortuna volet, fies de rhetore consul;
Si volet hæc eadem, fies de consule rhetor.
Vintidius quid enim? quid Tullius? anne aliud quam
Sidus & occulti miranda potentia fati (45)?

(45) Juven. Sat. VII, ver. 197.

'*Tis fate that flings the dice; and as she flings,
Of kings makes pedants, and of pedants kings.
What made Ventidius rise, and Tullius great,
But their kind stars, and bidden power of fate?*

Juvenal also says,

Plus etenim fati valet hora benigni
Quam si nos Veneris commendet epistola Marti, Et Samia genitrix quæ delectatur arena *.

* Juven. Sat. XVI, ver. 4.

For one lucky hour is of more consequence to a soldier, than a recommendation to Mars, either from his mistress or his mother.

The sentiment of princes being here of greater force than that of a poet; I shall cite the answer of Dionysius the younger, when he was asked this question by Philip King of Macedon: Wherefore did you not maintain yourself in the kingdom which your father left you? Do not be surprised at that, replied he, for my father, who left me all his other effects, did not leave me his fortune by which he acquired them (46).

(46) Ælian. Div. Hist. lib. III, cap. lx.

I might subjoin to these quotations the thoughts of several modern authors; but shall content my self with a passage in Montagne. 'It is commonly observable in human affairs, that Fortune, in order to convince us of the great power she bears over all things, and of the pleasure she takes in checking our presumption, not being able to make fools wise, makes them fortunate in spite of virtue. And she is most inclined to favour those executions, where the design is more especially her own. Hence we daily see the most simple among us defeat the greatest enterprizes, both public and private. And as Siranæz the Persian answered those, who were very much surprised at the ill success of his affairs, considering that his designs were so well laid; that he alone was master of his designs, but as to the success that was in the breast of fortune: So these may answer in the same manner, but in a different sense. The greatest part of the affairs of the world are done of themselves.

* Fata viam inveniunt.

* Fate finds the way.

'The event frequently authorizes a very foolish conduct. Our interposition is only a thing of course, and more commonly in consideration of custom and example than reason. When I have been astonished at the greatness of an action, and upon enquiry of those who have accomplished it, have been let into the motives and management; I have found their counsels very common, and the most vulgar and customary are perhaps also the most secure and best adapted to practice, if not for shew. . . . Good luck and ill luck are in my opinion two sovereign powers. It is ridiculous to think that human prudence is able to act the same part as fortune will do. And his enterprize is very vain, who presumes to secure both the causes and consequences, and lead as it were by the hand the progress of his undertaking. Vain more particularly in martial councils (47).'

(47) Montagne, Essays, Tom. IV, lib. III, ch. viii, pag. 198, 199. of the Hague edition 1727.

Notwithstanding all the authorities just now cited; it is certain that several good writers have maintained that every one is the author of his own fortune, and is either miserable or happy as he acts imprudently. Plautus has laid down this maxim.

LY. Ne opprobria, pater. Multa eveniunt homini quæ volt quæ nevolt.

PH. Mentire edepol, gnate: atque id nunc facis haut consuetudine,

Nam sapiens quidem pol ipse fingit fortunam sibi.

Eo ne multa quæ nevolt eveniunt nifi actor malu'it (48).

LY. Sir, blame me not. We can't command events.

PH. Son, you're mistaken: that's a vulgar error.

A wise man always cuts out his own fortune.

Nothing proves cross but from an ill contriver.

(48) Plautus, in Trinummio, Act II, Sc. ii, ver. 30, pag. n. 741.

It is also to be found as cited from an ancient poet, in a discourse (49) attributed to Sallust. 'Res docuit id verum esse quod in carminibus Appius ait fabrum esse suæ quemque Fortunæ. . . . Experience teaches the truth of what Appius says in his verses, That every man is the maker of his own fortune.' Cornelius Nepos, alludes it twice in his life of Pomponius Atticus. 'Itaque hic fecit ut vere dictum videatur sui cuique mores pingunt fortunam. . . . NAM (50) . . . quantum poterimus rerum exemplis lectores docebimus, sicut supra significavimus, suos cuique mores plerumque conciliant. ARE FORTUNAM (51). . . So that from this example it appears true, That the conduct of every person makes his fortune. . . . We shall convince the readers as far as we can by experience, as we have before hinted, That every person's fortune is generally owing to his conduct. Those who have exclaimed to much against Theophrastus (52) for praising that maxim, that fortune and not wisdom is the directress of life, have come very near to Plautus's assertion. And what shall we say of Juvenal, who after having, in his 7th satire, preached up the omnipotence of fate tells us in his 10th satire that all depends on prudence?

(50) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Pomp. Attici, cap. xi.

(51) Id. ibid. cap. xix.

(52) Venerit idem Theophrastus & libri & scholia omnium philosophorum, quod in Callistene suo laudat illam sententiam. Vitam regit fortuna non sapientia. Cicero, Tusculan. lib. v, folio 273, B.

Nullum numen abest, si sit prudentia: sed te Nos facimus, fortuna, deam cæloque locamus (53).

Fortune was never worshipp'd by the wise:
But, set aloft by fools, usurps the skies. DRYDEN.

(53) Juven. Sat. X, ver. 565. See also Sat. XIV, ver. 315.

Some Moderns have approved Plautus's opinion. Galeotto de gli Oddi pronounced an oration on this subject in the academy of the Insensati at Perugia (54). Regnier declares for the same opinion in one of his satires:

(54) See Des Seccado Luciolotti, in the book intitled Chi l'indovina è felice, pag. 231.

Nous sommes du bonheur de nous même artisans,
Et fabriquons nos jours ou fâcheux ou plaisans.
La fortune est à nous, & n'est mauvaise ou bonne,
Que selon qu'on la forme ou bien qu'on se la donne (55).

(55) Regnier, Sat. XIV, fol. m. 96, verso.

Prosperity's the work of our own hand,
And life is white, or black, as we command.
Fortune is but the creature of our will,
As we are pleas'd to form her, good, or ill.

Mr de Cailliere, in his book of the Fortune of persons of quality maintains: That our good or ill fortune depends on our conduct (56). He declares in his Epistle Dedicatory, that he designs to destroy the idols of Fortune, to demolish her temples and altars, and to rob her of the founder part of her adorers. Tho' Mr de Silhon says, that Fortune is a fantome which religion hath abolished, and whose invention was not useful since the unhappy and imprudent attribute to her the causes of their misery, and the effects of their ill conduct (57), yet I do not reckon him as one of the favourers of Plautus's maxim; for he did not pretend, that, in order to succeed in our undertakings, it is sufficient to comport ourselves in them according to the rules of prudence, and to have a good (56) It is the title of the first chapter.

(57) Silhon, Mémoire d'Etat, book I, ch. I, at the beginning.

imprudence. But it ought not to be expected that I should do it by incontestable reasons. It a good cause. He owns a prosperity and adversity, dispensed by the providence of God, without any necessary regard to our intentions and measures. There appeared some time ago a very good book, intitled, Reflections on what is called Good or Ill Luck in Lotteries (58). The author is undoubtedly of Plautus's opinion; or, to speak plainer, he does not believe that the fortunate lots run for or against certain persons with any sort of distinction. It is not therefore a general opinion, that there is some unknown cause which favours or crosses certain persons without any regard to their good or ill qualities, or the measures they take to attain their ends. But we must own, that the greatest number of suffrages is for the affirmative; however as that is no manner of proof of the truth of an opinion, I wish that some able pen would examine this subject to the bottom, and discuss what could be said on each side. I hope there will be some persons found to undertake this task; in the mean time I will here offer a few reflexions.

I. I observe first of all, that we ought not to imagine that the Pagans represented fortune, as a being which blindly distributed good and evil, without knowing what she did. They called her blind (59), I own; but that was not in order to deprive her absolutely of all knowledge; it was only to signify that she did not act with a just discernment. So we say a Prince is blind in the distribution of his favours, when he bestows and takes them away by caprice, and without any respect to the merit of his subjects. We do not pretend to say, that he does good or ill to such and such, without knowing that he gives or takes away the respective place from the respective person. We only mean, that he doth not govern himself according to the rules of reason and justice, and that he is determined rashly by the instigation of his inconstant passions. This is the idea which the Heathens formed of fortune. They were all persuaded, except a few Philosophers, that the Divine Nature was a sort of being divided into several individuals. They attributed to every god a large share of power; but did not exempt them from the imperfections of our nature; they believed them susceptible of anger and jealousy, literally speaking; they made no scruple to affirm, in their most serious writings, that a malignant and ferret envy of the gods opposed their prosperity (60). They more particularly attributed to the god which they called Fortune, a conduct which was inconstant, rash, and capricious to the last degree. It was for this reason that an infinite number of temples were built to her, and that she was worshipped in a particular manner, in order to prevent the ill effects of her caprices. They did not therefore believe that she wanted either eyes, or ears, or thought. Those Philosophers who acknowledged the unity of the deity, called that divine being Fortune, when they considered it only as a distributor of good and evil things, which did not conform itself in the least to what we call merit, constancy, or reason. But the wisest of them always owned that it never acted contrary to absolute justice, or without good reasons, which it understood very well. After all, God himself says, That his ways are not our ways, and his thoughts are not our thoughts.

II. My second reflexion is, that under the gospel dispensation we attribute, to earthly goods, all the defects which the Pagans ascribed to the goddess Fortune. We say, that the possession of them is no sign of merit, that they are very fleeting and perishable, and that they miserably deceive those who rely on them, &c. It is easy to observe the reason of this diversity of language. The Christians acknowledge only one God, and by that word they understand a nature infinitely perfect, which governs all things, and dispenses all events; but the Pagans lavished the name of God into an infinity of limited beings, imperfect, full of faults and vicious passions. For which reason they made no scruple to charge on them the irregularities of human life, when they could not discover the cause of them amongst the free actions of men. The Christians, on the contrary, impute to the creature whatever infirmity they meet with in the universe; they ascribe to the nature of the benefit what the Pagans placed to the account of the benefactor.

III. I say, in the third place, that it can scarce be denied, that there are fortunate and unfortunate people, that is, according to the Pagan language, that there are some people who are made the sport of fortune in the whole course of their affairs, whilst there are others, whose way she smooths, and takes care to shew them numberless instances of her favour. Merchandise, gaming, and the court, have always furnished examples of these two things; but nothing so manifestly confirms this as the military life. It is there Fortune rules more than any where else: our Timoleon, Alexander (61), Sylla, Cæsar, and several other ancient warriors, have acknowledged it in the most authentic manner: the moderns confess it also both in their memoirs and conversations. I have been told by a person of quality, that the Constable Wrangel assured him, that nothing was more rash than to hazard a battle, which was liable to be lost by a thousand unforeseen accidents; tho' at the same time the most exact measures have been taken, which the most consummate military prudence can suggest. Girard, Secretary to the Duke of Epemon, has shewn, in the long life he has written of that famous favourite, so many happy events independent on precaution, that it is hardly possible to deny the truth of the popular opinion concerning the fortune of some people. After this, says the Historian, we ought not to wonder if the Duke never complained of Fortune in the adversity of his old age: on the contrary, some of his friends once talking on that subject, he told them that he should be very ungrateful for the benefits with which Fortune had constantly favoured him for above sixty years, if he should be disgusted at her leaving him for the small time he had then to live; that he had scarce ever observed an entire life fortunate, tho' much shorter than his; and that in the inconstant state of human affairs, it was no small advantage, that his disgraces were referred to a time, when he was hardly any longer capable of relishing prosperity.

VOL. V.

IV. My fourth reflexion is, that it seems very false, that what we call good fortune depends only on prudence; and that what we name ill fortune, is only the result of imprudence. I freely own, that the assertion of the author (62) above cited does not appear to me well grounded. It is not true that the winning gamester always plays better than the loser. It is not true that the Merchant who grows rich, always surpasses in the knowledge of trade, or industry, and circumspection, those who do not grow rich. No person is ignorant, that in those games which depend on chance, there is somewhat which contributes more to losing or winning, than whatever depends on the skill of the gamblers. There are days when a man wins large sums: this is not owing to his playing with greater application, or with a more ignorant gamester; but he has a good game, the very cards are dealt him which he wants, or the dice turn up according to his wishes. On other days he experiences the quite contrary. In the very same sitting, he finds sometimes the turn of fortune; he is lucky in the beginning, and unlucky at the end; he loses in the last hour, more than he won in all the foregoing. There are men who immediately after they begin to play, perceive their good or ill luck, and finding that the day does not favour them, they are so wise as not to push any farther, and give out in good time. Not that they distrust their address and capacity, but they distrust what doth not depend on their skill. This somewhat is not so apparent in trade; it is nevertheless certain, that persons of mean capacity, and of very little judgment, sometimes gain immense sums by such sort of dealings, as those of better understanding and greater experience would not run the hazard of engaging in. It may be affirmed in general, that those who acquire the most riches by trade, are neither more intelligent, nor more industrious, than several others whose gain is less considerable. The latter therefore are not so much the favourites of Fortune as the former. Consequently there is a good or ill fortune in human life, independent on prudence or imprudence. I do not believe the author I am at present examining, will deny this, so far as relates to play and commerce: he only had in view the fortune which people of quality may make in the service of their prince. If he only intended to advise a gentleman to chuse the prudent part, I have nothing to say against his opinion; but he goes much farther: he would persuade us, that

5 A

(58) Printed at Amsterdam, 1696.

(59) Spargitque manu munera cæca peiora focum. Seneca.

(60) Hinc five invidia Deum, five fato rapidissimas procurentis imperii cursum parumper Gallorum Senonum incursumque supprimitur. Florus, lib. 1, cap. xiii. Indignantium voces exaudiebant tam viridem & in flore ætatis fortunæque invidia Deum eripit esse rebus humanis (Alexandrum.) Q. Curtius, lib. 2, cap. v.

(61) Rex jussit confidere felicitati suæ remissè, sibi enim ad aliam gloriam concedere Deos. Q. Curtius, lib. vii, cap. vii. Rex fortuna sua & consiliis suorum se utrumque esse respondet, nam & fortunam cui confidat & consilium suum. Quid temere & audacter faciat sequitur. Id. ibid. cap. ix.

(62) Mr. de Cailliere in his book de la Fortune des Gens de Qualité.

It is not possible in a subject of this nature to lead the reader to evidence, or demonstration.

that those who succeed, owe their advancement to their wife conduct only, and that those who do not make their fortune, ought to impute it to their imprudence. This is what I cannot believe. I will allow him to call it wife conduct, whatever a man does to conform himself to the present circumstances, as to be a braggadocio, a debauchee, a wag, a buffoon, &c. whenever it is the certain way to please; or to pretend to be mad, when without it he cannot escape imminent dangers (63). I allow every thing to be called imprudence, which is contrary to the humour of the present times; as to be a very honest man in a depraved court, where there is nothing to be got by any but rascals. Notwithstanding all this, I cannot help maintaining my assertion, that the rise and fall of great men are not commonly the meer effects of prudence or imprudence. Chance, precarious accidents, and fortune, justly claim a large share. Some occurrences which we neither contrived nor forelaw, discover the way, and make us hasten our pace. A caprice, a jealousy, which it was impossible to foresee, stops us short all of a sudden, and throws us entirely out of the way.

V. The better to refute Mr de Cailliere, I must add here a fifth reflexion. We must not affirm, that all events being connected with a determinate cause, fortune is a chimerical being, and so that we are no otherwise fortunate or unfortunate, but as we foresee, or do not foresee the chain of natural causes and effects. To shew the nullity of this objection, I will suppose a fact not only very possible, but which may also be proved by some examples. A Prince causes a town to be besieged in the middle of winter: if rain, snow, or ice, come upon him, he is not likely to take it; but if the weather be dry, and the cold moderate, he will take it. There follows several successive weeks of fine weather; no rain, no snow: the siege advances daily, and the town capitulates before the frost comes. Another Prince besieges a place in the middle of summer, and is likely to take it if the season keeps its ordinary course; but if it rains hard for several days, if the nights are cold, if this occasions several distempers in the camp, he will not be able to take it. There happens a reverse of seasons, the summer is cold and rainy, the trenches advance but slowly, the army grows weaker daily by the diseases which this unseasonable weather produces, he finds himself forced to raise the siege. Can you possibly ascribe the happy success of the first siege to prudence, or the ill success of the second to imprudence? This would be asserting two absurdities; for in the first case, there was no foreseeing the fine weather, nor the ill weather in the latter; and consequently there was no prudence in attempting the first siege, nor imprudence in undertaking the latter. It is therefore purely owing to good fortune that the first succeeded, as it is to be ascribed to ill luck that the latter miscarried. I know very well, that if men could foresee rain and fair weather, it would have been an act of imprudence to have formed the latter siege. The ill success in that case would have been a great fault, and not a misfortune; but human foresight does not extend so far, and if we are ignorant that the summer will prove rainy, it is not owing to imprudence. There are a hundred fortuitous accidents, which we can no more foresee than these, that are equally capable of disappointing the best concerted military enterprises. Now as some Generals are much more frequently perplexed with these cross occurrences than others, we may reasonably acquiesce in the popular opinion, that there are fortunate and unfortunate Generals. But we must not hence infer, that the fortunate are always, or almost always, as prudent as the unfortunate. On the contrary, we must believe that the latter sometimes surpass the former both in prudence and valour (64). Consult Porfiterus, in his notes on a passage of Tacitus, wherein that Historian assures us, that all human affairs are a continual sport (65). This commentator will give several illustrious examples, which prove that the best concerted designs in this world are confounded by an invisible force, which human prudence cannot guard against: this is particularly observable in the conclaves (66). And as for those who pretend that every person is the author of his own fortune, you may find them solidly and amply confuted in a book of Don Lancelotti (67).

Observe carefully what I am going to say. Princes commonly judge of things by the success. A General stands very well in their favour who succeeds in a military enterprise; but if the contrary happens, he forfeits their esteem and friendship. Even when they are sensible, that the victory was barely a piece of good fortune, and the defeat was not in the least owing to any fault of the General, they are always more disposed to prefer the victor than the vanquished; for with them to be fortunate is a commendatory character, as, on the other side, an unfortunate, tho' shining merit, is but a disagreeable quality. Since therefore battles are lost and won by unforeseen accidents, it is clear that misfortunes happen independently on imprudence, and that some make their fortune independently on prudence. A lucky rafhness, you will tell me doth not deserve the name of temerity; for since it has succeeded, it is a sign that it was proper to produce it's wished effect. Now where does prudence consist? Is it not in making use of proper means to accomplish our designs? My answer is, that to act prudently, we ought to know that the means we use are proportioned to the end. A rash fortunate man is unacquainted with this proportion; he is hurried on by an impetuous fury; there appears nothing in his conduct but what is to be met with in that of the rash unfortunate; and therefore the success of the enterprise ought not to be ascribed to prudence but to fortune. Observe also another thing; it is no manner of imprudence not to be precautioned against those things which human capacity cannot discover, and consequently if a person doth not succeed at court, or if he loses the fortune he has already made, it is not always to be attributed to imprudence. Is it possible for him to discover all the caprices, dis gusts and jealousies that arise in the mind either of a monarch, or of his mistresses or favourites? Can he discover all the grimaces of false friends, obviate their calumnies, and prevent their lies and false reports which wound without threatening. This was the confession of a great minister, whose genius was not less than his authority. In the post which you are in, said Cardinal Richelieu to a Captain of the guards (68), it is easy for you to know your friends and your enemies. No disguise can conceal them from your discernment; but with respect to mine, in the post which I hold, I cannot penetrate into their sentiments, they all speak to me in the same language. They all make the same earnest court to me, and those who would ruin me, give me as great marks of amity, as those who are sincerely attached to my interests (69); Regnier, in the satire already cited, tells us:

La faveur est bizarre, à traicter indocile,
Sans arrest, inconstante & d'humeur difficile,
Avecq' discretion il la faut caresser,
L'un la perd bien souvent pour la trop embrasser,
Ou pour s'y fier trop, l'autre par insolence,
Ou pour avoir trop peu ou trop de violence,
Ou pour se la promettre ou se la denier,
Enfin c'est un caprice étrange à manier,
Son amour est fragile & se rompt comme verre,
Et fait aux plus matois donner du nez en terre (70).

Most fickle is the favour of the great,
Unsteady, whimsical, and strange to treat.
Men ne'er can be enough upon their guard,
Some lose her by caressing her too hard;
Some by dependence; some by insolence;
Some by too much, or little violence;
Some by presumption, some by self-denial;
In short, she'll balk your skill on ev'ry trial.
Brittle as glass itself, she's quickly broke;
Nor can the wisest ward the fatal stroke.

VI. Let us then take it for granted, which is my sixth reflexion, that the prudence of a man is not the sole nor even the principal cause of his fortune. There

(63) Inspiciens esto, quum tempus postulat, aut res: Stultitiam simulare loco, prudentia summa est. Cato, Dist. xix, lib. ii. David, and Brutus, and several others have been the better for such a conduct. See Cornelius à La-pide in lib. i, Regum, cap. xxi.

(64) One may say of several great captains, what Florus said of Sertorius, lib. iii, cap. xxii, vir summe, quidem sed calamitose virtutis.

(65) Mibi quanto plura recentium seu veterum revolvam, tanto magis ludibria rerum mortalium cunctis in negotiis observantur. Tacit., Annal. lib. iii, cap. xxviii.

(66) See the Mélanges de Vignieu Marville, Vol. ii, pag. 330, 331, of the Dutch edition. See above citation (16), of the article ANTONI-ANO.

(67) It is intitled Chi l'indovina e Savio, ovvero la Prudentia humana fallacissima: The author refutes in the third Discurso of the second book the Oratum of Galotto degli Oddi.

(68) Mr de Fabert, who was Marshal of France.

(69) Histoire du Maréchal de Fabert, pag. 55.

(70) Regnier, Satire XIV, fol. 96.

tion. We find at most only strong probabilities in it; and it is no small objection against

There are some fortunate people, whose conduct is very imprudent: and others unfortunate, tho' their conduct is prudent. The difficulty is to know what this fortune is, which favours some people and persecutes others, without regard to their merit or the measures they take. To recur to God, is not to remove the difficulty; for acknowledging him the general cause of all things, it will be asked whether he directs immediately, and by particular acts of his will, all those unforeseen occurrences which cause the designs of one man to succeed, and confound the enterprizes of another. If you answer in the affirmative you will bring all the philosophers, especially the Cartesians on your back, who will maintain that you attribute such a conduct to the Supreme Being, as is inconsistent with an infinite agent. He ought, they will tell you, to establish a few general laws, and by this means produce an infinite variety of events, without recurring every moment to exceptions, or particular acts, which must needs be miracles, tho' we should not call them so, by reason they would be so frequent (71). You may indeed reply to them, that the occurrences favourable to the fortunate, and contrary to the unfortunate, are a natural consequence of general laws; but they will not easily believe you. You will never be able to persuade me, that chance can produce what I am about to say. Let an hundred tickets well sealed be ranged in order on a table; Let ten of them be blanks, and ten of them marked with the letter A, and write a sentence on all the rest; then let ten men be called in, and one of them directed to take up the 1, the 15, the 21, the 37, the 44, the 68, the 80, the 83, the 90, and the 99. Let another be ordered to take the 3, the 6, the 13, the 25, the 50, the 73, the 88, the 89, the 95, and the 100. Tell me, I pray, if the first of these men draws the ten blank tickets, and the other the ten marked A, can you ever hope to persuade me that this was the result of the general laws of the communication of motion? Do you not perceive your self that these twenty tickets were placed in such an order, that one half of them by a premeditated design, should fall entirely into the hands of the first of these ten men, and the other into the hands of the second? I say also, that supposing certain gamesters had always, or almost always the best cards, (72) or in general, that certain persons are almost always favoured by accidental occurrences; this would require something besides the natural result of the communication of motion, this must proceed from a particular direction and determination; and I should rather choose with several learned men to deny the distinction of good or ill fortune, than to explain it only by the general laws of nature. But we argue here on the hypothesis, that there are fortunate and unfortunate people.

Cannot we recur to occasional causes, I mean, to the desires of some created spirits? Platonism might easily be brought to favour such an explication; but it is opposed by strong arguments, according to the idea which Theology gives us of the angelical nature. This teaches us that the angels are some of them perfectly good, and others extremely wicked, and both endowed with an almost unlimited knowledge, under the general direction of God. This idea cannot easily be reconciled to the particular train of fortunate or unfortunate occurrences. But confining our selves to hypotheses purely philosophical, we shall be better able to answer these objections, if we suppose for example, that the invisible spirits (73) are more different from one another, than men are amongst themselves; that there is a great subordination amongst these spirits; that there are some who are sometimes good and sometimes evil, sometimes in a good humour, and sometimes in an ill one; that they are fantastical, inconstant, jealous, envious, that they thwart one another, that their power is very much limited in certain respects, and that if they can perform a thing which is very difficult, it does not hence follow that they can accomplish a thing which is much easier. Do not we see country-women ignorant of the alphabet, who know a thousand excellent secrets to cure diseases? Archimedes who invented such admirable engines, could he sow? could he spin? However it be, there is no fortune without the direction of an intelligent cause, and I cannot be sufficiently surprized that a learned man should venture to say, that Fortune was neither God, nor nature, nor understanding, or reason, but a certain natural and irrational impulse (74). (74) Jovianus Licet disputatum sit, fortunam à natura prorsus esse aliam, non desuere tamen, qui assererent, etsi à natura moribus, institutisque longe plurimum fortuna abhorreat, sitque ipsa inconstans admodum, & lubrica, non continua, non eadem ubique, non eorundem semper effectrix, non simileis sibi retinens progressionem, non discriminata servans tempora, denique improvida sit, repentina, inordinata, temeraria, qui sive mores, sive impulsus, neque naturæ convenient, neque rationi, quarum utriusque propria sit constantia, maturitas, ordo, mensura, regula, discriminatio item rerum, temporum effectuum, non inquam desuere, fortunam qui asserant, irrationalem quandam esse naturam, nec aliud illam denique, quam naturæ impetum quandam, hoc est ratione carentem agitationem naturæ quandam, in iis ipsis videlicet, quæ nec rationi subjiciantur naturæ, neque hominum electionibus, ac consiliis. Impetum itaque esse eam censent, quod sit absque ratione, feraturque suo sponte tantum agitata, atque impulsu, quodque ubi impetus dominetur; illic rationi nullus omnino relictus sit locus, nulla prorsus autoritas, aut pensatio earum quæ gerantur rerum (75). - - - Though it is disputed, that fortune is entirely distinct from nature, yet there have been some who assert, that notwithstanding fortune is very far from being reconcilable to the methods and laws of nature, being so remarkably inconstant, fickle, unsteady, various, producing different effects, never observing the same measures, or any certain seasons; lastly improvident, sudden, impetuous, rash, which whether they be rules or impulses, are neither agreeable to nature nor reason, to both of which belong constancy, perfection, order, measure, regularity, and a distinction of things, seasons, and effects; there have been some, I say, who assert that fortune is a certain irrational nature, and nothing else but a certain impulse of nature, that is, a certain natural agitation void of reason, namely in those things that are neither subject to natural reason, nor to human choice or design. They hold therefore that it is an impulse, that it is exerted without reason, and carried by its own spontaneous directions and power, and that where this impulse prevails there can be no room left for reason, no influence at all, nor consideration about what is to be done. Perhaps you would gladly be informed for what reasons he deprives God and nature of the acts of Fortune: wherefore, since his works are somewhat scarce, I will here insert what he has said on this head. 'Fortunam non esse Deum, - - - That fortune is not God,' is the title of one of his chapters: and this is what he says in that chapter. 'Quomodo enim Deus erit, si hæc tam sæpe, tam inconsiderate, tam etiam inique, atque ex inopinato extollit ignavos, locupletat immeritos, vexat, atque affligit, infantes, bonos in calamitatem adducit, ac servitutum, pravos statuit in solio, liberat à periculis perverfos, moderatos, & honestos viros laboribus periculis ærumnis, ac miseriis conficit? Tyrannorum hæc sunt non Dei, cujus est summa bonitas, aboluta justitia, rectissimum judicium, æquissima rerum omnium dispensatio (76). - - - For how can she be God, when she so frequently, so inconsiderately, and so unjustly, and suddenly advances the lazy, enriches the undeserving, vexes and afflicts the innocent, brings the good into calamity and slavery, fixes the wicked on a throne, delivers the perverse from perils, and throws the temperate and just into difficulties, dangers, troubles, and miseries? These are the acts of tyrants, not of God, whose goodness is infinite, justice absolute, judgment impartial, and dispensation of all things most equitable.' The following chapter intitled 'Fortunam non esse naturam, - - - That fortune is not nature,' amongst other things contains the following words: 'Naturam quoque non esse eam hæc ipsa liquido satis docent, quod fortuna ipsa quidem inconstans est, inordinata, varia, repentina, incerta. Contra vero quid natura ipsa ordinatius, constantius, certius? cujus est ordo, ea lex, ac regula, ut non, nisi certis, constitutisque à principis suo tempore, suis progressionibus, mensurisque tum universa proveniant, tum etiam singula quarumcunque ipsa re-rum, effectuum, operum author est & causa. Pergit

(71) There are some other objections taken from morality which may be seen hereafter in Pontanus's words. See also the Reflexions sur le Bonheur & Malheur de L'homme, ch. viii, pag. 93, & seq.

(72) Take notice of this clause; for even if there was no providence, but only a fortuitous effusion of good and evil throughout the universe, it must happen that some men would find themselves in happy circumstances, and others the contrary. See the article MA. HOMET II, remark [F].

(73) I call them so in opposition to human souls, which are spirits united to sensible bodies.

against the opinion I defend, that Cardinal Richelieu, whose abilities were surprising, would

(77) Id. ibid.
 'Pergit natura ordine suo, graditur suis passibus,
 'dispensat actiones suas cum temporibus, viribus,
 'opibusque suis utitur cum mensura, & penso, non
 'fluitat, non nutat, stabilis est in officio suo, sibi que
 'semper constat (77.) . . . That she is not nature will 'also appear from hence, that fortune is inconstant, in'ordinate, various, sudden, uncertain. On the con'trary, what is more orderly, constant, and certain 'than nature? Since she observes such order, law, and 'rule, that not only universals but particulars also,
 'among all the things, effects, and works, whereof she 'is the author, are produced from certain principles, in 'certain seasons, and by certain progressions, and mea'sures. Nature proceeds in her own method, pursues her 'own steps, dispenses her own acts with regard to sea'sons, exerts her powers and faculties with weight
 'and measure, she never fluctuates, she never nods, she
 'is steady in her duty, and always consistent with her 'self.' See the margin (78).

(78) Jerome Garimberto, who lived in the XVth century, wrote in Italian a treatise della Fortuna, where in the tenth chapter of the first book he la fortuna è un impeto naturale privo di ragione negli huomini; - That Fortune is a natural impulse void of reason, and in the next chapter, that a man is happy, when he is led by a natural instinct to a thing, which he does not foresee, and without any shew of reason.

(79) Aulus Gellius, lib. vi, cap. ii, pag. m. 171.

(80) Homer. Odyss. lib. i, ver. 32.

Therefore Chryseides denied that there was an encouragement to be given to those men, whether worthless and idle, or wicked and impudent, who, being found guilty of a fault or crime, fly immediately to the necessity of fate, as to some asylum; and ascribe the worst of all they can commit, not to their own ill conduct but to Fate. This was first observed by Homer, the wisest as well as oldest of the poets, in these verses.

Perverse mankind! whose wills, created free,
 Charge all their woes on absolute decree;
 All to the dooming gods their guilt translate,
 And follies are miscall'd the crimes of fate.

MR POPE.

These three Greek verses are taken from the first book of the Odyssy, and signify in Latin.

Pope, quomodo jam Deos mortales culpant
 Ex nobis enim inquit mala esse: at illi ipsi
 Ob sua scelera præter fatum dolores patiuntur.

La Fontaine hath ingeniously described the same injustice; you will find his thoughts and several others in the book which I quote (81). But may it not be pretended, that, on several occasions, the person who is unhappy by his own fault, has not a less right to complain of fortune, than the unfortunate who has punctually discharged his duty? May we not say that this power, which we call Fortune, occasions misery two ways? She sometimes permits a man to use all the means which prudence can suggest, and yet deprives him of the success he ought to expect; she pleases her self with this, in order to shew her superiority, and the insufficiency of our reason and of human wisdom. Sometimes also she plunges men into misery, by obstructing their use of the means which might have preserved them from it: she confounds their judgment, and hurries them on to irreparable mistakes. It was probably thus that she irretrievably ruined the affair of Pompey. She had declared for Julius Cæsar, and procured him the triumph, by allowing him to act agreeably to all the qualifications of a great commander, and by eclipsing in Pompey's soul those eminent qualities which he possessed. They did not appear at the battle of Pharsalia; Pompey there shewed himself a weak man, and an unskilful General. Was not this eclipse supernatural? Was it not the influence of some superior force, which had designed to raise Cæsar on the ruins of his competitor? Velleius Paterculus declares that when the destinies are resolved to ruin a man, they deprive him of prudence (82): 'Sed pro-

 'fecto ineluctabilis fatorum vis cuiuscunque fortunam
 'mutare constituit, consilia corrumpit . . . (83) sed præ-
 'valebant jam fata consiliis omnemque animi ejus (84) (85) Id. ibid.
 'aciem prætrinxerant. Quippe ita se res habet, ut cap. xxviii.
 'plerumque fortunam mutaturus Deus, consilia cor-
 'rumpat, efficiatque, quod miserrimum est, ut quod
 'accidit, id etiam merito accidisse videatur, & calus
 'in culpam transeat. . . . But indeed the irresistible
 'power of fate designs a reverse of fortune, and corrupts
 'their counsels: . . . But now fate over-ruled their 'counsels, and clouded their understandings. For so it is,
 'that when God intends a reverse of fortune, he gene'rally corrupts human counsels, and so orders it, which 'is the most miserable circumstance, that what happens
 'shall seem to have happened deservedly, and that the 'accident shall be construed into a fault.' The senti'ment of this grave Historian was very common
 'amongst the Pagans; and every day we use this 'saying as a proverb, 'quos Jupiter vult perdere de-'mentat. . . . Those whom Jupiter marks out for de'struction, he first deprives of their understanding.' A 'certain writer being to prove that it is possible for two 'authors to express the same thought without borrow'ing from one another (85), cites Philipp de Commines,
 'who without ever bearing of Paterculus's name, yet said,
 'as well as he, that when God begins to chastise princes,
 'he first lessens their sense, and makes them avoid the coun-
 'sels and company of the wise. I shall cite an excellent
 'passage of Ammianus Marcellinus: 'Ut solent manum
 'injecitibus fatis hebetari sensus hominum & ob-
 'tundi, his illecebris ad meliorum expectationem
 'erectus, egressusque Antiochia numine lævo duc-
 'tante, prorsus ire tendebat de fumo, . . . As mens sensus
 'loquitur vetus, ad flammam (86). . . . As mens sensus
 'use to be clouded and stupified by the controuling power
 'of fate, being encouraged by these inducements to hope for 'better things, and going out of Antioch under the con'duct of his evil genius, he went as the proverb says,
 'out of the smoke into the fire.' A little after speaking 'of Nemesis, he tells us that she turns men out of their 'way, and perverts the ends and designs of men:
 'Hæc ut regina causarum & arbitra rerum ac discepta-
 'trix, urnam sortium temperat, accidentium vices
 'alternans: voluntatumque nostrarum exordia interdum
 'alio, quam quo contendebant, exitu terminans, mul-
 'tiplices actus permutando convolvit (87). . . . She, as (87) Id. ibid.
 'queen, arbiter and disposer of causes and things, pre'sides over the turn of lots, varying accidents at her 'pleasure: and terminating very often what our wills
 'had begun, with a conclusion quite different from that
 'to which they were directed, makes a strange jumble
 'and confusion in things.' She does not always effect
 'this by error, the sometimes makes use of mere igno'rance. What I call error is that false judgment which 'our mind makes of things, in comparing them toge'ther, and choosing the worst: and I call that igno'rance, when a man is in such a state, that the neces'sary ideas do not offer themselves to his imagination.
 'Now when he takes the wrong side, either by reject'ing the proper means actually present to his mind, or
 'by reason of the absence of those ideas, which ought 'to have presented those means to him, he passes for
 'imprudent; but it is certain, that in the first case im-
 'prudence is more voluntary than in the second, and
 'consequently more to be condemned. Several philoso'phers assert, that what is called pure omission is never 'free. Who would venture to maintain that we are 'masters of our memory, and that it is a moral fault not
 'to remember certain things upon any occasion when
 'we want to remember them to conduct us in our deli'berations? Those who acknowledge the empire of 'Fortune, would, I think, be unreasonable, if they sup'posed that she doth not influence our forgetfulness or 'omissions: for, on the contrary, it is by them that the 'frequently occasions our ill success. She removes those 'ideas which would naturally occur to us, and hinder
 'our committing faults. How often has it happened 'that a man of judgment has very much prejudiced
 'himself by the answers he has made to several questions
 'proposed

(81) Réflexions sur ce que l'un appelle bonheur & Malheur en matière de Loteries, &c. vi, pag. 79, & seq. See also Regner, ubi supra, fol. 96 verso.

(82) Velleius Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. lvi.

(83) Id. ibid.

(84) Id. ibid.

(85) Id. ibid.

(86) Id. ibid.

(87) Id. ibid.

would not allow any other cause of unhappiness besides imprudence [L].

proposed to him? All those to whom he relates the questions, ask why he did not make such an answer? He is immediately convinced that he should have done it. He owns it; he is surprized that he did not think of it; he protests that on all other occasions this idea must necessarily have occurred to him, so natural does he find it, so easy, and exactly conformable to common sense. Nevertheless, he is convinced that he did not in the least think of it, and that even the most confused notion of it never reached his thoughts. Why will you not allow him to believe that his ill fortune presided over this forgetfulness, and purposely directed it? Our divines do not deny that providence sometimes blinds men, with respect to omissions, as well as with regard to actual judgment. Plutarch would never allow this doctrine, for he very strongly recommends to those who read the poets, the rectifying of all those passages which represent the gods deceiving us, and inflicting us to evil. He particularly warns us of these verities in Euripides (88), thus translated by Amyot :

(88) Πολλαῖς
μορφαῖς οἱ θεοὶ σοφισμῶνων σφάλλουσιν ἡμᾶς κρείττονας τοφικώτερας. Multis di formis homines sophificatum quod his potentia præstint
in fraudem agunt.
*Euripides, apud Plutarchum de audiendis Poëtis,
pag. 20, 21.*

Les Dieux puissans trop plus que nous ne sommes,
Vont abusant nous autres povres hommes
Par plusieurs tours de ruse tromperesse.

*The gods, whose nature pow'r superior knows,
By various frauds on man's weak mind impose.*

He is so far from owning that a divine power influences us to choose the wrong way, while at the same time we know the right way, that he would have us ascribe it to a brutal passion.

Αἱ αἱ τόδ' ἤδη θείον ἀνθρώποις κακόν,
Ὅταν τις εἰδῇ τάχαθόν, χρεῖται δέ μῃ.

Θηριῶδες μὲν ἔν, καὶ ἄλογον, καὶ οἰκτρὸν, εἰδότες τὸ βέλτιον, ὑπὸ τῷ χείρονος ἐξ ἀκρασίας καὶ μαλακίας ἄγεσθαι.

Eheu, malum mortalibus divinitus
Venit, ut bonum videant, non utantur tamen :

Immò verò belluinum, non divinum est hoc malum, & brutum ac miserabile, melius videntem intempe-rantia & molitie ad deterius rapi (89).

(89) Id. ibid.
 pag. 33, E.

*Alas! From heav'n to man all ill ensues,
We see the good, but want the pow'r to chuse.*

So far is this from being true, that evil is beastly, brutish, and wretched, instead of heavenly, and it is our intemperance and folly that hurry us away to ill, while the good is full in our view. But how solid forever these reflexions of Plutarch may be in some respects, we ought always to remember, that our Theology, and the universal language of all Christians, founded on all passages of holy writ, lay it down as a certain truth, that the blindness of man, his rashness, folly, and cowardice, are frequently the effect of a particular providence, which inflicts them on him as a punishment; and that his prudence, his wife answers to questions, his resolution, and his understanding are favours inspired by providence, in order to his preservation and prosperity. The heathens were not ignorant of this doctrine; for we find that Manlius declared to the Roman citizens, that if the gods prevented his ruin, it would not be by defending on earth, but by inspiring the Romans with a wife resolution, as they had inspired him with that valour and courage which saved the Republic: ‘Benè factis quod abominamini; dii prohibebunt hæc: sed nunquam propter me de cælo descendente: vobis dent mentem oportet, ut prohibeatis: sicut mihi dederunt armato togatoque, ut vos à barbaris hostibus, à superbis defenderem civibus’ (90). . . . You do well in declaring your abhorrence: the gods will prevent these measures; but they will never descend from heaven for my sake: let them give you the courage to prevent them; as they did me, both armed and unarmed, to preserve you from barbarian enemies, and haughty fellow-citizens.

(90) Titus Livius, lib. vi,
pag. m. 176.

I cannot conclude without observing, that if on the one side, we call that ill fortune, which is sometimes the natural consequence of imprudence; on the other side, we name that good fortune, which is sometimes the result of prudence. We have seen some men so rash in their conduct, that there was no room to doubt but that it would end in some cruel mortification; they attacked and fell foul of all the world, and if the first engagement discovered them to be wrong-headed, the following were only a long train of rash, irregular and violent sallies. According to all rules, these men ought to have been shamefully crushed, and nevertheless we have seen them flourish, or at least retire from the battle without any mark of dishonour. This is a great piece of good fortune, say some. But it is certain that some stratagem, some refined stroke of policy, had a greater share in this good success than fortune. These pretended rash men had taken their measures long before hand, with a great deal of prudence; they had rendered themselves necessary to those who were capable of extricating them out of every embarrassment. They had found the secret of being subservient either to their private pleasures or ambition. The circumstances of the times favoured them; the trade of directing spies or some other secret service was of extraordinary use. They were sure of succeeding in their unreasonable quarrels; they did not therefore act rashly.

[2] Cardinal Richelieu, however, would not allow any other cause of unhappiness than imprudence.] Mr Aubert informs us of this particular. He says that Cardinal Richelieu, and the Duke d'Olivarez two prime Ministers, the one of France, the other of Spain, were rivals and antagonists, (91) That their power was much of an equal duration; that they were compared to two stars of the first, or at least of the second, magnitude; which drew on them the eyes, the esteem, and admiration, of all Christendom. That the Cardinal was first eclipsed by a natural death, the 4th of December 1642. And that the other enjoyed the advantage of shining alone, not above five or six weeks, being disgraced the 17th of January 1643. The motive or pretext of his disgrace, was the ill success which accompanied all his enterprises. This was in effect accusing him of imprudence. In Cardinal Richelieu's opinion, imprudent and unfortunate are but two words to express the same thing.

(92). Thus be willingly put in practice one of his most constant maxims which was, to give it you in his own terms (93). 'That in state-affairs it is impossible to be over-cautious, or to look out for too great security. 'That a statesman, if he can, ought always to have two strings to his bow; that to succeed he ought not to take too exact measures, but that in order to do much, he ought to exert himself, and make preparation for doing yet more: that in a word, in all important affairs, if he did not take those measures which seemed too extensive in Theory, he would always find them too short in Practice.' It is hard to believe, that the Cardinal, on occasion of the failure of successes in some of his enterprizes, never acknowledged that he had, notwithstanding, taken all those measures which prudence could suggest. If therefore on such occasions he thought himself guilty of some imprudence, he extended the idea of prudence beyond its true bounds; for if he believed that those, who trusted a man who deceives them, are imprudent, he supposed prudence to comprehend the certainty of events which depend on free-will. But that is a palpable error. There are persons who have given so many successful proofs of their fidelity, and in so signal a manner that one may trust them in an important affair, without the least shadow of imprudence. And yet they differ charge their duty very ill, they begin their treachery on this occasion, and betray their trust. It would be requiring a more than human knowledge from a prime Minister, to pretend that he has rashly and imprudently relied on this man (94), that it is not his misfortune but his fault if the affair has miscarried, since he ought to have been aware of the inward change of this person. You see then that this question is liable to several equivocations or disputes about words. The ill fortune of an enterprise is always attended with some want of knowledge. If indeed you call this imprudence, and will argue in consequence of this definition, you may fully and without reserve maintain Cardinal Richelieu's position; but your definition will be false, and at the bottom you will agree with your adversary.

(91) Aubert,
Histoire du Cardinal Mazarin.
livr. i, p. 100.

(92) This is very different from the opinion of Garimberto, who maintained, della Fortuna, cap. xviii, that he who acts according to prudence ought not to be called a fortunate man; and cap. xix, that no person is fortunate either by art, or prudence, or the favour of God, but by a natural impetuosity raised in the soul; and cap. iii, iv, lib. ii, that fortune favours the bold, and is a friend to the presumptuous, and very often to the rash. See, above, remark [A] of the article CHARLES V.

(93) See the same Aubert, Hist. du Cardin. de Richelieu, livr. vii, cap. iv, pag. m. 383.

(94) Compare what is said above, remark [K], num. v.

TIMOMACHUS. TIPHERNAS. TYPOTIUS.

(a) Moreri has aid very improperly, some pictures of a Me-des and an Ajax.

(b) In Veneris
Genetricis sede.
*Plin. lib. xxxv,
cap. xi.*

(c) Epigr. cxi,
cxii.

TIMOMACHUS, a celebrated Painter, born at Byzantium, flourished in the time of Julius Cæsar. He painted an Ajax and a Medea (a) which were purchased for eighty talents by that emperor, to be placed in the temple of Venus (b). The sum is not inconsiderable, amounting according to Father Hardouin's computation to 192 thousand French livres. Timomachus had not put the finishing hand to his Medea; which made it still more valuable. Pliny justly admires this capricious taste of men [A]. There are in the Anthology, some epigrams on this Medea, which Aufonius has translated into Latin (c). This was not the Painter's master-piece; for besides that his Iphigenia and his Orestes were not less esteemed, his Gorgon was the picture in which he had discovered the greatest art. I have collected some mistakes [B].

[A] Pliny justly admires this capricious taste of men.]

If the sketches of a great master should be more valued than the finished pieces of a mean artist, we should not wonder at it; but that the perfect works of a great hand should be less able to excite our admiration than his rough draughts, seems unreasonable. Is pity concerned in this affair? Do we think it our duty to love these pieces, because they have had the misfortune to lose their author before they received his finishing hand? Perhaps we hunt after reasons, which none are able to give. Let us therefore quit our search; and only cite what Pliny has said. 'Il-
' lud perquam rarum ac memoria dignum, etiam su-
' prema opera artificum imperfectaque tabulas, sicut
' Iria Aristidis, Tyndaridas Nicomachi, Medeam Ti-
' momachi, & quam diximus Venerem Apellis, in ' majori admiratione esse quam perfecta (1). - - - It is ' something very uncommon, and worth recording, that
' the last works and unfinished pieces of Painters, such ' as the Iris of Aristides, the Tyndarida of Nicomachus,

(1) Plin. lib.
xxxv, cap. xi.

' the Medea of Timomachus, and this Venus of Apellis,
' which we have just now mentioned, have been much
' more admired than those that were perfect.'

[B] His Gorgon was the picture in which he had discovered the greatest art. I have collected some faults.]
Read these words of Pliny, chap. xi. lib. 35. 'Præ-
' cipue ars ei fuisse in Gorgone visa est. - - - His art
' seemed to have succeeded more particularly in his Gor-
' gon.' Charles Stephens had cited the fifth book; Mr Lloyd has suppressed this quotation instead of rectifying it, and has added nothing to this article, but that Athenæus lib. 14. cites one Timomachus, who had written the History of Cyprus. Moreri and Hofman cite no authorities. The article Timoniachus is left out in the last editions of Charles Stephens, tho' it remained in that of 1620, which was revised and corrected by Frederic Morel. It is strange that this learned man should not discover the change of an m into ni by a typographical error, had produced the pretended Painter Timoniachus.

(a) And not George, as Mo-
reri has it.

(b) Leand. Albertus, in De-script. Ital. pag.
m. 132.

(c) Taken from
Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. cxvii,
pag. m. 259.

TIPHERNAS (GREGORY) (a), a native of Tifernum in Italy (b), deserves a very good place amongst the learned humanists of the XVth century. He understood Greek, and translated into Latin a part of Strabo. It is that which Guarinus Veronenfis had left untranslated. Some tell us that Politian laid claim to the version of Herodian, of which Tiphernas was the real author; but this is scarce credible (c). The manner in which Tiphernas obtained the Greek professorship in the university of Paris [A] is very singular. You will meet with his Latin verses in the Deliciæ Poetarum Italorum (d). He sometimes bought his own provisions, but he haggled in such a studied stile, that the peasants did not like it [B].

[A] The Greek Professorship in the university of Paris] These are the words of Peter Matthieu: Emanuel Chrysolora's school produced Gregory Tiphernas, who came to Paris, and presenting himself to the Rector, told him, that he came to teach the Greek authors, and demanded the recompence allotted by the holy decrees. The Rector was a little surprized at the assurance of this stranger, yet commended his design, and with the advice of the university retained him, and granted him the appointment he desired. Hermymus of Sparta succeeded him (1). Gabriel Naudé relates the same thing, and makes use of it to prove the disposition of Lewis the XI, to protect learned men. We may judge, says he (2), by Philopbus's epistle cited in the preceding chapter . . . how he constantly encouraged the Constantinopolitan Greeks, who came to Paris, to reside there, and continue the course of their studies in hopes of his liberality. Gregory Tiphernas was the first who made way for the rest (3), who being arrived at Paris presented himself to the Rector, &c. Naudé cites Melanchthon in oratione de Capnione, tom. 3. Several authors mention this pas-

(1) Peter Mat-thieu, Histoire
de Louis XI,
livr. xi, pag. m.
734, 735.

(2) Naudé, additions to the History of Lewis XI, pag. 185.

(3) One may infer from these words of Naudé, that he believed Tiphernas was a Greek.

sage of Tiphernas, and amongst the rest Sixtinus Amama, who observes, that he came to Paris about the year 1470, and informed the Rector of what had been ordered by the council of Vienne: he did not forget to say that the university of Paris was expressly mentioned in the decrees of that council (4).

[B] He haggled in such a studied stile that the peasants did not like it.] Jovianus Pontanus, who was his disciple, tells the story in this manner: 'Gregorius
' Tiphernas quo præceptore Græcis in literis usus
' sum adolescens, ad forum accesserat rerum venalium,
' dumque rusticano cum homine non potest de mer-
' cimonio convenire, sermone enim cum illo nimis
' composito utebatur, ibi ego qui rem perpendissem,
' conversus ad rusticum, &c (5). - - - Gregory Tiphernas
' who taught me Greek in my youth, went one day to ' market to buy some things, but could not agree with a ' countryman about the price of them, because he spoke ' to him in too affected a language, which perceiving I ' turned to the peasant, &c.'

(4) See Sixtinus
Amama, in Præ-fatione de excusa-dis SS. Linguarum studiis, pag.
197, of his Antibarbarus Biblicus, Edit. 1628.

(5) Jovian. Pon-tanus, de Sermo-ne, lib. v, cap. i,
pag. m. 1704,
1705.

(a) Tessier, additions to the E-logies out of Thuanus, Tom.
ii, pag. 353,
Edit. 1696.

(b) See the remark [C].

TYPOTIUS (JAMES), you will find in Moreri what Mr Tessier has already published concerning this Flemish Civilian (a). I shall correct some things in that account (b), and only add that Typotius was guilty of such ill actions, and of writing a book in which he defamed to many persons of quality in Sweden (c), that he narrowly escaped a capital punishment. He in particular abused the illustrious Pontus de la Gardie [A], whom he had accompanied in his embassy to Rome (d). The indignation of John

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) See the Life of this Pontus,
of this Pontus,
published in the year 1690, by Claudius Arrienius Oernhielm,
pag. 165.

[A] He abused . . . Pontus de la Gardie.] He accused him of gaining the favour of Eric King of Sweden by delivering to him the fortrefs of Wardberg which belonged to Denmark. He supposes that Pontus was in the service of his Danish Majesty at that time, which was in the year 1565. Mr Oernhielm refutes this accusation by the passport which that King gave to la Gardie, March the 16th 1571. La Gardie being in the Swedish service was taken by the Danes in a battle in which the latter were victorious in the year 1569. He was detained in prison till the peace was concluded on the 13th of December 1570, and ratified on the 16th of March 1571. The King of Denmark gave him a very honourable passport, which he would not

John III, King of Sweden, against this author, clearly appears from his answer to a letter, requesting him to release Typotius from his imprisonment [B]. He would not grant him this favour; the prisoner was not discharged till after the death of that prince; and having been again received into favour for some time, he found the face of affairs changed (e), and retired to the imperial court. He did not die in the year 1604, as Thuanus relates, but some time before. There is something else to be rectified in his article [C].

(e) See the remark [C].

not have done if he had looked upon him as a traitor. 'Non aliunde melius dilucet Typotiani mendacii vanitas, quâ, ut superius indicavimus, nugatur, apud Ericum Sueonum Regem Pontum captivum locum gratiæ, prodiat ei Wardbergeni arce. Si sic se res habuisset, quomodô potuisset Fridericus Rex, sponte nullaque adactus necessitate, rerum sibi carissimarum proditorum, cari dilectique sibi Equitis nomine compellere? Quis unquam Regum, arcium, terrarum copiarumque suarum proditorum, dignatus est nomine tam honorifico, ac non potius quovis, pro atrocitate facti, proscribi non injusto convicto? Cur non æquam tanto facinorosi mercedem retulit? Cur alia omnia de se meritum, mancipio jam sibi etiam traditum, non benignè tantum toto captivitatis tempore habuit Rex, sed etiam reintegratâ cum Suecis pace, honoris gratiæque plenissimis literis securum redire fecit in Sueciam (1)? - Nothing can more evidently display Typotius's falsehood, which as we have before-mentioned, he invented against Pontus, by affirming that he had ingratiated himself with Eric King of Sweden, by betraying the castle of Wardberg to him. If it had been so, how could King Frederic, of his own accord, and without any necessity, call one who had been a traitor in delivering up so valuable a place, his dearly beloved knight? What King ever honoured with such an appellation, the betrayer of his fortresses, dominions, and forces, or rather would not have given him the character due to his treachery? Why did he not reward him according to his villainy? Why when he deserved so ill at his hands, and was delivered up to him, did the King not only treat him kindly during his confinement, but also after concluding a peace with the Swedes, gave him a passport full of very honourable and gracious expressions? The author I am citing gives the very words of the passport, translated out of the original into Latin. A little before, he had told us that Typotius spoke very ill of Pontus de la Gardie's extradition, which, continues he, is not to be wondered at; for this writer had assurance enough to calumniate even the Kings of Sweden themselves. He observes that this satirical piece had been lately reprinted by the care of some malicious persons. 'Quæ paulo liberaliore manu adduci à me oportuit, ut famosum libellum Jacobi Typotii venenati convincerem mendacii, quo ille, fuggerente veteri quodam congerone Ægidio, ut ipse fatetur, homine ignoto ac terræ filio, natalibus, vitæ famæque Pontum adpergere voluit labem, quoniam sædissimam conciviti ubi ipsi, typis committens furo diſtionis pictas livorise plenas calumnias. Sed quid mirum est, allatrasse eum genus & famam Pontum, qui ne Regibus quidem, aut ulli Suecicæ gentis honesto viro fatis fuit æquus? Etenim, in monstro illo ingenii fœtu, reculo nuper à malevolis, nefandis in bonorum famam sceleris conficiis, atque ideò nec loci nec editoris nomen proferre ausis, debacchatur in Ericum ipsum & Johannem Reges, adeò non parit aliis viris illustribus ex ordine Equestri, quorum gloria semper fuit, ac deinceps erit apud posteros memoria. Quin imo, in religionem, & nationem ipsam, cujus, ut Pontificius è Belgio sacrificulus, flagrabat odio, stolidè nonnunquam invehitur (2). - This I thought myself obliged to particularize more fully, that I might convict Typotius's scandalous libel of a malicious lie, with which, upon the authority of one Giles an old companion, as he himself confesses, a man of no family or consideration, he intended to asperse the life and reputation of Pontus, but has in reality drawn a much greater reflexion upon himself, by committing to the Press such invidious calumnies coloured over with fine expressions. But what need we wonder that he should carp at the fame and family of Pontus, who has never done justice to any gentleman of the Swedish nation, nor even to the Kings themselves. For in that monstrous production of wit, lately reprinted by some malicious persons, conscious of a wicked design against the reputation of the innocent, and therefore not daring to name either the place or the publisher, he inveighs against both King Eric and John, and does not spare other illustrious persons of the Equestrian order, whose memory has and will be to latest posterity always glorious. Nay he even sometimes exclaims very foolishly against their religion and nation, to which as a Popish Mass Priest of Flemish extract he bore the utmost hatred.' For this satirical boldness, adds he, and other crimes, Typotius was condemned to death, which he had certainly suffered if the King of Denmark had not interceded for him; but tho' the intercession of that Prince saved his life, it did not protect him from an ignominious banishment. Ob quæ, aliæque facinoræ, damnatus hic fuit capitis, lussitque factis dignum supplicium, nisi intercessio Regis Daniæ intervenisset, quæ quidem à merita morte illum liberavit, sed non ab ignominiosa ex hoc regno Relegatione (3).

[B] His answer to a letter requesting him to release Typotius from his imprisonment.] Frederic II, King of Denmark had written this letter to him: The King of Sweden's answer runs thus (4): 'Quo minus (5) petitioni Majestatis Vestræ in hac causa satisfacere possimus, facit magnitudo scelerum, quibus caput suum obstrinxerat idem Typotius, quæ si æque Majestati Vestræ ac nobis nota fuissent, scimus, non tantum tributuram fuisse Majestatem Vestram ejus delictis ac precibus, ut pro ipso intercedere sustineret. Etenim is homo est, qui virus mendacis lingue, sine ullo discrimine, in summos imosque passim effundit. Inde est, quod non tetro tantum carceri mancipandum, sed ultimo etiam supplicio afficiendum eum censuimus, in quem si quid mitius in posterum decreverimus, id clementiæ nostræ, Majestatiqve Vestræ intercessionem, non innocentie suæ debebit. Confidimus certò, majestatem Vestram hanc excusationem nostram, ut justam & idoneam approbaturam. - What makes me incapable of gratifying your Majesty's request in this case is the greatness of the crimes which the said Typotius has committed, and which if they were so well known to your Majesty as they are to me, I am sensible you would not have had such a regard to his prayers and intreaties as once to have interceded for him. For he is a person, who lets loose the virulency of his lying tongue, against high and low, universally without any distinction. For this cause it is, that I thought him worthy not only of confinement in a loathsome prison, but also of a capital punishment: and if I should hereafter mitigate his sentence, he will owe it to your Majesty's intercession, and my clemency, not to his own innocence. I do not in the least doubt, but your Majesty will approve this excuse as very just and reasonable.' This letter of the King of Sweden is dated the 17th of February 1583. Note that the King of Denmark interceded for James Typotius, at the request of a person for whom he had a particular regard, and who was his Physician and brother to the prisoner (6).

[C] He died . . . before the year 1604. There is something else to be rectified in his article.] Thuanus's fault in placing his death in 1604 (7), has been observed by Mr Mollerus in his additions to Scheffer's Suecia Litterata (8). There is a book printed in 1602 (9) in which we find Typotius's funeral elogy by John Jessenius à Jessen, Physician to the Emperor. If Mr Teiffier had been aware of this, he had corrected Thuanus's error. Some authors say that Typotius died in the year 1600 (10). We find in the Preface to the second tome Symbolorum Pontificum, Regum, & Principum Octavii de Strada, dated the 15th of March 1602, that he died after having finished the explication of the symbols of this second tome. These words, Jacobus Typotius . . . in aula Suecica diu fuit, Carolo Sudermaniæ duci ac tandem Regi cum Sigismundo Polonia Rege nepote tunc diffidenti percarus (11), are found translated thus by Mr Teiffier: 'James Typotius . . . resided a long time at the court of Sweden, where he was very much regarded by the Duke of Sudermania and the King, who

* Mæffenius Scandize Illustratæ I. VII, ad Anno 1581. A Ponto Typotius plus-marum convictus imposturam & calumiarum, carceri perpetuo adjudicatur mancipaturque, inquit, unde mirum non est, quod in illum in primis debacchetur.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 12, 13.

(5) That is, that Typotius should be released out of prison.

(6) Vix evitato, Frederici II. Danorum Regis (qui Frater ejus Matthias gratissimus erat atque à cura valetudinis) intercessione. Jo. Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Schefferi Suecia Litteratam, pag. 443.

(7) Thuan. Hist. lib. cxxxi, pag. m. 1041.

(8) Pag. 443.

(9) It is Tom. ii, Symbolorum Octavii Stradae. See Mr. Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Suecia Litteratam, pag. 444.

(10) Witte, in Diario Biograph. Mollerus, ubi supra. Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belgicæ, pag. 432, says that he died about the year 1600.

(11) Thuan. ubi supra.

(1) Claudius Arhenius Oernhielm, in Vita Pontis de la Gardie, pag. 19, 20.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 11, 12.

(12) Teiffier's Elogies, taken out of Thuanus,
Tom. ii, pag.
353.

'had at that time some difference with Sigismund King of Poland his nephew (12). This translation is faulty; the Duke of Sudermania's christian name is faulty; the Duke of Sudermania's christian name ought not to have been suppressed, nor a King of Sweden been introduced distinct from this Duke; for it is visible that Thuanus says that Charles was Duke of Sudermania, and afterwards King of Sweden. In this he was right, but he is wrong to affirm that Typotius was long in favour with this Charles. He should have said that Typotius continued a long time in favour with King John the third, brother to this Duke of Sudermania, and that he fell from it afterwards in a terrible manner, having been imprisoned and condemned to death, and obtained his life only by the intercession of the King of Denmark. He might have added, if I am not mistaken, that after the death of John III, he was restored to favour, which he enjoyed under Sigismund the son of the said John; but that he had no interest in Sweden when the Duke of Sudermania was created King upon the exclusion of Sigismund King of Poland his nephew; that he kept his ground during the contest betwixt the uncle and nephew, and at last retired when Sigismund's party was ruined. These were, I think, the vicissitudes of Typotius's fortune. I ground my opinion on what Valerius Andreas says in his Bibliotheca Belgica, that after the death of John III, he was set at liberty by Sigismund, and pronounced the inaugural oration at his coronation before the States of the realm. 'Mortuo deinde Suecorum Rege Joanne, ejus filius atque in Regno successit Sigismundus III, annitente etiam Danie Rege Christiano IV, Typotium pristinae mox restituit libertati: eique tum imposita est provincia in ipsis Regni Comitibus Stocholmiae Orationem illam, quam Inauguralem vocant, habendi, qua Suecorum erga Regem suum fidei atque benevolentiae causas diserte exposuit. Rege autem in Regnum Poloniae, quod ei per electionem accesserat, profecto, Typotius a Romanorum Imp. Rhodolpho II, inter Aulæ suæ familiares adlectus, ac Cæsarei Historiographi titulo ornatus, Præge diem clausi extremum circa annum salutis millesimum sexcentimum (13). . . . Afterwards John, King of Sweden, dying, Sigismund III, his son and successor, being also encouraged thereto by Christian, King of Denmark, quickly restored Typotius to his former liberty; and also gave him in charge to speak the inaugural oration before the assembly of the States at Stockholm, in which he very learnedly explained the reasons of the loyalty and affection of the Swedes towards their King. But Sigismund going to Poland, where he had been elected King, Typotius was invited to court by Rodolphus II, Emperor of the Romans, and being honoured with the title of his Imperial Majesty's Historiographer, ended his days at Prague, about the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred.' We find in the same Bibliothèque, that his Orationes Genethliacæ ad Annam Sueciæ & Poloniae Reginam, were printed at Stockholm in the year 1594. The above-mentioned inaugural oration was also printed at the same place in the same year (14), and he informs us (15), that he published the funeral oration of King John III, who died in November 1592. It was printed at Stockholm in the year 1594 (16). This shews that he was in a very good situation in Sweden after the death of that monarch. There is one thing not easily reconcilable in all this, which is, that very good authors affirm (17), that the intercession of his Danish majesty saved him from a capital punishment, but not from the infamy of being banished the kingdom. Frederic II, King of Denmark, interceded for Typotius either in the year 1582, or in the beginning of 1583. If on his account the punishment of death was changed into banishment, one would think it should be said that the prisoner was banished in 1583. And yet we have seen (18), that Sigismund, the successor of a Prince (19), who died in 1592, gave Typotius his liberty, and that Christian IV, King of Denmark, interceded for him. I am at a loss to reconcile these two relations; perhaps, after the death of King John, Sigismund reversed Typotius's exile, and recalled him.

(13) Valer. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 432.

(14) Scheffer, in Suecia litterata, pag. m. 274.

(15) Typot. lib. ii, de salute Reipubl. pag. 122, epud Scheff. ibid.

(16) Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Sueciam litteratam, pag. 444.

(17) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 443. See also the remark [A], at the end.

(18) Above, citation (13).

(19) John III, King of Sweden.

(20) Mr Tentzelius's Conferences, month of September 1690.

some pages of which, relating to Typotius, I got translated. I have there found a passage which makes me believe that Mr Ornhielm was mistaken in saying that the intercession of Frederic II, King of Denmark, did not prevent this person from being banished Sweden with infamy. This passage is contained in a letter from Zachary Palthenius to Typotius, and printed with a treatise of Typotius, at Franckfort, in 1595. Palthenius affirms, 1. That John III, King of Sweden, prevented Typotius's being entirely ruined by his enemies. 2. That Sigismund III, King of Poland and Sweden, restored this prisoner to his liberty. 'Quæ tibi ergastulum, aut, ut tu loqui soles, Dei gratia peperit, de fortuna & legibus, cum fortuna, quam liberatio, uti videre est, concepit, ego fasciis involvi, prodibuntque brevi in lucem. Felix infelicitas tua, quæ tibi veræ laudis, imo solidæ felicitatis principium exstitit. Abfuit à familiarium commercio, doleo, dolet mecum litteratorum chorus, quanquam meroris tui vehementioris nullum signum in libris tuis repererim, & tu Joannis III, Regis Sueciæ humanitatem ac adversariorum malignitatem cautes. Sed cum abesses à tuis, versatus es cum, quæ maxime tuæ sunt, Musis. Restitutus in libertatem à Sigismundo III, Poloniæ & Sueciæ Rege, huic enim secundum Dei, cui etiam ille cedit, misericordiam, consuetudinem nostram refert acceptam, profert in lucem luce dignissimos diverſi argumenti plurimos Codices (21). . . . Those works of yours, de Fortuna & Legibus, which your prison, or as you are used to say, the Divine Mercy produced, I have laid together, and shall very shortly make them public. Happy is your unhappiness, which has proved to you the foundation of real glory, and even of solid happiness. You have been secluded from the conversation of your friends, which was a misfortune that affected not only myself but all the learned world, tho' I perceived no sign of any extraordinary affliction in your writings, and you are used to cry up the humanity and clemency of John III, King of Sweden, as your security against being made a sacrifice to the malice of your adversaries. But while you was absent from your's, you was present with the Musis, which are most entirely your's. Being restored to your liberty, by Sigismund III, King of Poland and Sweden, for to him, according to the Divine mercy, to which he himself is subject, you ascribe the renewal of our conversation, you bring to light several pieces on different subjects, which may highly deserve to be made public.' Mr Tentzelius says, that Typotius dedicated his treatise de Fortuna, printed at Franckfort in 1595, to Sigismund III, King of Sweden, as he did his book de Fato, printed in the same year, and at the same place, to Christian, King of Denmark; and that he says at the beginning of his treatise de Fortuna, that he had received many favours from King Sigismund, and that he had waited the return of that monarch at Calmar, and that his enemies prevented his going to meet his majesty at Dantzic. You may observe that the Preface to this book was written at Wurtzburg in December 1595. It is very surprising that Mr Ornhielm, Historiographer of Sweden, should be ignorant that this man was honourably discharged out of prison, and not by an infamous sentence of banishment.

(21) Zachar. Palthenius, Epist. ad Typotium, epud Tentzelium, Monastice Univerſitatis, September 1690, pag. 861.

Here follow some mistakes of Mr Moreri. I. He says that Sigismund, King John's successor, gave Typotius his liberty, and employed him in several affairs of the utmost importance. Mr Teiffier (22) has made use of the same words, quoting only Valerius Andreas, who says nothing of this kind, nor any thing farther than that Typotius being set at liberty, was appointed to make the inaugural speech before the States of the kingdom. II. At last, adds Mr Moreri, like a faithful copier of Mr Teiffier, Sigismund being elected King of Poland, Typotius retired to the court of the Emperor Rodolph II. This means, that Sigismund was elected King of Poland some years after he succeeded John III, King of Sweden. Nothing is more false; John III died in November 1592. Sigismund, his son, was not crowned King of Sweden till 1594, and he had been elected King of Poland in 1587. The third mistake of Mr Moreri is in having fixed Typotius's death in the year 1604.

(22) Teiffier, Additions aux Eloges, Tom. ii, pag. 354.

TYRANNION,

TYRANNION, a celebrated Grammarian in Pompey's time, was of Amifus in the Kingdom of Pontus. He was called at first Theophrastus; but by reason of his tormenting his school-fellows, his master Hestizæus gave him the name of Tyrannion [A]. He was a disciple of Dionysius Thracius at Rhodes. He fell into the hands of Lucullus, when that Roman general put Mithridates to flight, and seized his dominions. This captivity of Tyrannion was not disadvantageous to him, since it procured him an opportunity of rendering himself illustrious at Rome, and of acquiring great riches. These he applied, among other uses, to the erecting a library of above thirty thousand volumes (a). He died very old, harassed and worn out with the gout (b). Suidas is mistaken as to the time of his death [B]. I must not forget that Murena asked Tyrannion of Lucullus, that he might have the glory of enfranchising a celebrated Grammarian. The reflexions of Plutarch on this occasion are not improper [C]. The pains Tyrannion took in collecting books, very much contributed to the preservation of Aristotle's works. The writings of this Philosopher met with a singular fate [D]. It deserves

(a) Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Hofman, Murena, say only three thousand.

(b) Ex Suida, in Tupavriov.

[A] By reason of his tormenting his school-fellows . . . he was called Tyrannion. In the version of Suidas we find these Greek words, Τυραννίων ἀνομιᾶς διὰ τὸ κατατρέχειν τῶν ἀμασχιῶν, thus rendered, Tyrannion dicitur quod condiscipulos exagitaret, i. e. κατατρέχειν. - - He was called Tyrannion, from his tormenting his school-fellows. It is hardly necessary to acquaint the reader that exagitaret is a typographical error, instead of exagitarit; but we may very well say that Mr Möreri has not sufficiently minded the title of his book; he gives his own conjectures for the translations of the authors, whom he cites at the end of his articles. If he had writ a romance instead of an historical Dictionary, this liberty had been excusable. No author had informed him that Theophrastus becoming proud of his science, and despising his equals, was named Tyrannion.

[B] Suidas is mistaken as to the time of his death. How was it possible that Tyrannion should die in the third year of the CXXth Olympiad, as we read in Suidas, since he was not brought to Rome till after Lucullus had put Mithridates to flight in the CLXXVIIth Olympiad? Patricius (1) conjectures that instead of ἐλμπιάδ' ἔρ', Suidas said ἐλμπιάδ' ἔρ'. According to this, Tyrannion died in third year of the CLXXth Olympiad. There is some probability in Patricius's correction; and yet it is certain that Tyrannion taught in Cicero's house, in the last year of the CLXXth Olympiad (2); and as he took care to put Cicero's library into order (3); it is not very likely that he was then in the infirm state in which he died, according to Suidas. What I am going to say is infinitely more conclusive, either against Patricius's correction, or against Suidas himself, if he spoke agreeably to Patricius's conjecture. When Cæsar was in Africa, making war against Juba, in the year of Rome 707, which was the second of the CLXXXIVth Olympiad, Cicero and Atticus promised to meet one day, in order to hear Tyrannion read a book of his own composing (4); and Atticus was reproached by his friend for having heard it read without him (5).

[C] Plutarch's reflexions on this occasion, are not improper. Murena, says he, did not at all answer the generosity of Lucullus; for, in seeming to enfranchise Tyrannion, he deprived him of his liberty. It had been much more honourable to have let him remain what he was. These are Plutarch's words, in his description of the sacking of Amifus, which Lucullus not being able to prevent, he repaired that loss as well as he was able. Τότε καὶ Τυραννίων ὁ γερμαλικὸς ἐλάω. Μορήνας δ' αὐτὸν ἐξητήσατο, καὶ λόβων ἀπληθεύειν, ἀνελευθερῆσαι τὴν δωρεὰν χρησάμενος. ἔχων ἤντιμ' ἀνδρῶν διὰ τὰς αἰτίαις ἐσπιδασμίνον δέλον γενέσθαι πρότερον, εἴτα ἀπελευθερῆσαι. ἀπαίρεισι γὰρ ἢ τῆς ὑπαρχούσης ἢ τῆς δοκούσης ἐλευθερίας δόσει. ἀλλὰ Μορήνας μὲν ἔκ ἐλπίδας μίνον ὥρην πολὺ τῆς τῶν ἐλευθερίας καλοκαγαθίας ἀποδόνων. Eadem tempestate captus est Tyrannio grammaticus. Hunc Murena petivit à Lucullo, quem ut accepit, manumissit eum. Verum usus est eo munere illiberaliter, nolebat enim insigni virum eruditioe Lucullus prius servum fieri, inde libertinum. Quippe ereptio presentis erat illa simulate libertatis donatio. Ceterum non hic tantum offendit se Imperatore suo Murena honestate imparem (6). - - At that time was taken Tyrannion, the Grammarian. Murena begged him of Lucullus, and having obtained his request, manumitted him, making but an ungentle use of his present. For Lucullus did not think it by any means proper, that a man of such extraordinary learning should be first made a slave, and then enfranchised. For the seeming liberty which was given him, was, in reality, the taking away that which he had even then a title to. But this was not the only instance which discovered Murena to be far inferior to his General in generosity.

[D] Aristotle's works met with a singular fate. This great Philosopher left them, together with his school and his other books, to his disciple Theophrastus. The latter left his library to Neleus, who had been scholar both to him and to Aristotle. Neleus caused it to be removed to Scepsis (7), and left it to his heirs. They being ignorant and illiterate, took no other care of this library than to keep it close shut up. Παρὶ δόκον ἰδιώταις ἀνθρώποις οἱ κατακλινεῖς εἶχον τὰ βιβλία ἐν ἐπιμέλῃ κείμενα. Reliquit interuditus hominibus, qui incuriē positos sub clavibus reposituerunt (8). And being informed how diligently the Kings of Pergamum, to whom they were subjects, sought after books, they buried under ground those of Neleus. A long time after this, their posterity took them out of their prison very much damaged by damp and vermin, and sold, at a great price, those of Aristotle and Theophrastus to one Apellicon, who caused them to be copied: but his transcribers very ill supplied those places which the worms had eaten, or the damp defaced; so that those books did not appear without innumerable faults. After Apellicon's death, his library was carried from Athens to Rome, by Sylla. Sylla's Library-keeper permitted Tyrannion, who was a great admirer of Aristotle, to take the writings of that Philosopher. The Book-sellers caused them to be transcribed, but they made use of ignorant people, who did not collate their copies with the originals; so that the mischief became greater at Rome than it had been at Athens. Thus far Strabo hath carried this relation, let us take the sequel of it from Plutarch and others.

Plutarch (9) says, that Sylla having rendered himself master of Athens, seized upon Apellicon's library, where were the greatest part of Aristotle's and Theophrastus's works, then very little known to the public. He adds, that it was reported, that after Sylla had transported them to Rome, Tyrannion, the Grammarian, got several of them into his hands; and that Andronicus Rhodius having procured copies from him, published them, and made those tables or indexes which were afterwards joined to them (10). Plutarch and Strabo agree, that for a long time the Peripatetics were unacquainted with the writings of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and that the ignorance of Neleus's heirs was the cause of it. Strabo says expressly, that the modern Peripatetics surpassed the ancient, because the latter having but very few of Aristotle's books, and those few containing pieces of the least consequence (11), were not able to philosophise with profound and methodical exactness. But after Aristotle's writings were discovered, it was much easier for those of that sect to reason according to their master's scheme; yet they were obliged to rely much upon conjectures, because there was an infinite number of faults in his works. This is Strabo's observation (12).

Athenæus (13) has a passage very necessary to be cited. He says that Neleus the possessor of Aristotle's library, sold it entire to Ptolomy Philadelphus, who removed

(7) It was the place of his birth, and a town of Troas.

(8) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 413. Salmasius, in Tertul. de Pallio, pag. m. 177. prooves by this passage that κατακλινεῖς signifies a precious thing, which is carefully preserved. Strabo insinuates no such thing. Besides Salmasius speaks of Apellicon's heirs, whereas he should have mentioned those of Neleus.

(9) In Sylla, pag. 468.

(10) Add to this the passage out of Porphyrius, in Vita Platini, which I have quoted in the article of ANDRONICUS, citation (9).

(11) These were called ἱπποκρίτοι: The others which contained a more profound doctrine, were called ἀπορρηματικοί.

(12) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 413.

(13) Lib. i, p. 3.

Whether the difference between Athenæus and Strabo, has been justly reconciled by Patricius.

(1) Disquisitiones Peripateticæ. Tom. i, lib. iv, pag. 36.

(2) Cicero, Ep. iv, lib. ii, ad Q. Fratre. It was written in the year, that Tullia was married to Crassus: it was the 697 year of Rome. See Fabricius in the Life of Cicero.

(3) See the remark [C].

(4) Epist. II, lib. xii, ad Atticum.

(5) Epist. VI, suprad. Libri.

(6) Plut. in Lucullo, pag. 504.

serves to be mentioned, especially since it relates to so famous a Philosopher. They were in removed it to Alexandria, together with those books which he had purchased at Rhodes and at Athens. He observes, in the same place, that one Larentius, a citizen of Rome, under Marcus Aurelius, had made a larger collection of books, than either Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, Euclid, Nicocrates, the Kings of Pergamus, the Poet Euripides, or Aristotle the Philosopher. Here are two things in which Athenæus contradicts Strabo. The latter affirming, that Aristotle was the first who collected a library, and who taught the Kings of Egypt how to erect one. Athenæus names several persons who collected great numbers of books before Aristotle. He says further, that Neleus fold all this Philosopher's books to Ptolemy Philadelphus; but Strabo assures us, that Neleus left them to his heirs, who concealed them. The learned (14) Dicauff. Peripatetic. Tom. i, pag. 29.

(15) De Philosophorum Sectis, cap. xviii, pag. 86.

(16) Ammonius, Prolegomen. in Categorias.

(17) Ammonius, ibid.

(18) Patricius, Dicauff. Peripatetic. Tom. i, pag. 35.

(19) Strabo, ubi supra.

(20) A. Gellius, lib. iii, cap. xvii.

RAPIN's account examined.

Father Rapin very agreeably relates the adventures of Aristotle's works; some fragments of which narrative I design to cite here, because they deserve some reflexions. 'It is pretended that Aristotle could not prevail upon himself to publish his writings, out of pure respect for Plato; because he opposed his doctrine in several places. But this conduct discovered more policy than virtue; he was resolved to proceed with discretion, because mens minds were as yet too much prepossessed in favour of Plato's opinions. Hence it was that to conceal his works, he intrusted them to Theophrastus, with a strong injunction against their publication, which was religiously observed. So that Theophrastus, who was the trustee of them, Strato, Lyco, Demetrius Phalereus, and Heracleides, who succeeded one another in the Lyceum, taught Aristotle's doctrine only by tradition. This tradition not being supported by any writing, in process of time grew cool, and discovered nothing of that warmth which appeared in the other sects. . . . Theophrastus, that he might strictly observe his master's order upon his death-bed, intrusted Aristotle's writings to the dearest of his friends and disciples, on the same conditions with which he had received them. The name of this friend was Neleus. . . . He died soon after; tho' not without informing his heirs of the value of the Depositum which he left them. This they so well apprehended, that being informed the King of Pergamum . . . was making very diligent searches after books and writings, in order to erect a library, they buried Aristotle's works in a vault built on purpose, in order to secure them the better. This precious treasure remained concealed in that place for about one hundred and sixty years, from whence it was at last taken, half eaten with vermin, and almost entirely destroyed with the dampness of the place. It was at last taken out in order to be sold at a very dear rate to a rich citizen of Athens, whose name was Apellicon. . . . The Professors who then taught in the Lyceum, being informed of this, made their court to this citizen, who lent them those writings for some time. But he took them back again in order to secure them in his library, which he rendered very famous by this important Depositum. Some years after, Sylla . . . caused them to be taken away and carried to Rome. . . . he died quickly after, and these manuscripts fell into the hands of a Grammarian named Tyrannion, who understood where they were from his intimacy with Sylla's library-keeper. Tho' this Grammarian was a very learned man, and had collected a library of above 30000 volumes, after his being brought to Rome by Lucullus. . . . yet he did not know the value of Aristotle's works. But after his death, Andronicus Rhodius being come to Rome, and being perfectly acquainted with Aristotle's merit, because he had been bred in the Lyceum, treated with Tyrannion's heirs for these books, and having them in his power, he so earnestly applied himself to examine them . . . that he was in a manner their first restorer. . . . It was this Andronicus who first made Aristotle known at Rome, about the time when Cicero, by his great reputation, rose to the first posts in the Republic (21).

The remarks I shall make on this discourse, may be reduced to the following heads. I. Father Rapin doth not cite one author who says that Aristotle intrusted his writings to Theophrastus, with a strong injunction against their publication. Strabo and Plutarch, who observe that this Philosopher's books remained a long time unknown, ascribe the cause of it only to the ignorance of Neleus's descendants; and we have already cited an author (22) who assures us, that this Neleus fold Aristotle's library to Ptolemy Philadelphus. So far is he from saying that Neleus preserved these books according to the injunction laid on him against the publishing of them. II. Father Rapin misrepresents the narrative of the author whom he cites (23); for it is not remarked by Strabo that Neleus did not die without informing his heirs of the value of the Depositum which he left them; and so far is he from affirming that they well understood him, that he says they left those books locked up and in confusion (24). It is true that Strabo adds they buried them, when they heard the Kings of Pergamum were collecting books; this seems to signify that Neleus had forbidden his heirs to part with his library: but, in short, Strabo

(21) Comparison de Platon & d'Aristote, pag. 371, & pag. 1636.

(22) Athenæus, lib. i, pag. 3.

(23) He quotes Strabo, lib. xiii.

(24) Olib. ἐν μέλει καὶ ἀτακτοῖς ἐνταφίσαντο.

in the library of one Apellicon: I shall speak of him below [E]. Sylla rendring himself master of Athens, seized upon this library, and sent it to Rome. Tyrannion having found means to insinuate himself into an intimacy with Sylla's library-keeper, got into his possession all the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus which he could meet with. The sequel of this has been seen in the article of ANDRONICUS Rhodius, and is more amply specified below. Strabo was our Tyrannion's disciple (c) [F]; as Cicero's son and nephew were also his disciples at Rome. Cicero made use of him to put his library in order (G). Tyrannion wrote a book which Pomponius Atticus admired [H].

Strabo says no such thing, and it must be left to the casuists of Parnassus to inform us, whether it is lawful for an author to ascribe to those he cites, the consequences, reasons, and motives of what they have said, such as he fancies them to be. How do we know but that Neleus's executors were afraid that their Prince should not give them any thing for these books, and therefore thought it more proper to reserve them for a better opportunity? III. Father Rapin applies solely to Aristotle's writings, what Strabo says in general of all the books which Neleus left to his heirs. IV. Strabo does not say one word of those Professors of the Lyceum who made their court to Apellicon to borrow Aristotle's works of him for some time. He does not say that Apellicon having lent these books to them for some time, afterwards received them back; he says, on the contrary, that Apellicon caused them to be copied, and published them full of faults. V. No author ever said that Tyrannion did not know the value of Aristotle's works. Strabo rather insinuates the contrary by these words, φιλοεστίας ὢν, he was a zealous admirer of Aristotle. VI. Nor hath any one said that Andronicus Rhodius came to Rome after the death of Tyrannion, and that he bought Aristotle's works of his heirs: on the contrary, Plutarch affirms (25), that Andronicus Rhodius received those books at the hands of Tyrannion (26). If it was true that Andronicus did not come to Rome before the time mentioned by Father Rapin, he would not have found Tully in the beginning of his fortune, but at the height of his glory, recalled from his exile to the great satisfaction of the Roman people. The proof of this is drawn from Tyrannion's being brought to Rome in the CLXXVIIth Olympiad, where he became illustrious, enriched himself, collected a library of above 30000 volumes, and died very old (27). This was in the third year of the CLXXXth Olympiad, according to Patricius's correction of the passage of Suidas. Twelve years at least must be requisite for Tyrannion to store up such a large share of riches and books at Rome. Now the third year of the CLXXXth Olympiad is the very year of Cicero's being recalled (28). But besides, I have proved that Tyrannion was alive in the CLXXXIVth Olympiad, when Cicero was at least aged sixty years.

I may conclude this remark with a reflexion which I find in Vossius (29). It is no small glory to Aristotle, that his works being so long unknown, were no sooner come out than they outshone the writings of several other Philosophers, who had enjoyed a long and uninterrupted reputation. I shall add on my own bottom, that by a turn of fortune, the sect which was destined to prevail most in the schools, happened to be that which for several ages found it most difficult to lift up its head, and rise out of its obscurity. Lastly, I say that it is much more surprizing, that so many books of Aristotle are preserved, than that we have lost so great a number of them. It is true, there is room to doubt whether those which pass at present under his name, were the genuine issue of his pen. Vossius rejects the judgment of Cælius Secundus Curio, who owns no more of Aristotle's works than the History of Animals, the treatise of the world, and his Rhetoric to Alexander (30). But I am surprized that instead of alleging this Curio, he does not mention Francis Patricius, who has so learnedly discussed what are, and what are not, the genuine works of Aristotle, and has rejected a very great number as spurious. Ramus made the same attempt. Here is a passage which will inform us that he was not the first. (31) Is it not strange that Francis Picus + who succeeded as well in the learning as in the principality of his uncle, this great Picus, the phoenix of his age, has laboured by a long train of reasons to demonstrate that it is utterly uncertain, whether Aristotle composed any one of all those books which are at present contained in the catalogue of his works:

which was however confirmed afterwards by Nikelius +, and so well examined by Patricius +, that after having given proofs of his surprizing diligence in enquiring into the truth of this proposition, he concludes at last, that of all the books ascribed to this genius of nature, only four, and those very small and inconsiderable, with respect to the worth of the rest, are handed down to us free from suspicion or controversy, namely his Mechanics, and three others which he wrote against Zeno, Gorgias, and Xenophanes: when, on the contrary, Ammonius testifies in his commentary on the Categories, that in the magnificent library of Alexandria, they found forty books of Analytics, which all bore Aristotle's name, tho' he only composed four of them, the two first of which answer the nine cited by Diogenes Laërtius. This is to be imputed, as Galen observes*, to the emulation there was between the Kings of Pergamum and Alexandria, in liberally rewarding those who brought them a book of any good author, and especially of Aristotle, the better to adorn their libraries: before which time none of the ancient books had ever been falsely intitled. This I would shew more at large, if it had not already been done by Patricius.

[E] One Apellicon, I shall speak of him below. I have said nothing of him in his place, but referred the reader hither: it is therefore just that I should say something of him in this remark. ΑΡΕΛΛΙΚΟΝ was of Teos, but settled at Athens, and was there some time. He was very rich and of a troublesome temper. He applied himself to Philosophy, and embraced the Peripatetic sect (32); but he made it appear that his talent lay more in purchasing the works of the Philosophers, than in acquiring any knowledge of their opinions. φιλοβιβάζων μᾶλλον, ἢ φιλοσοφῶν. Librorum amore tenebatur majore quam Philosophiæ studio (34). He bought Aristotle's, and several other numerous libraries. He spared no cost to buy rare books, and found out an expedient to rob the archives of the original decrees which had been antiently published at Athens. If there were in other cities any original pieces valuable for their antiquity, or very little known to the public, by reason of their being kept concealed, he took so much care to recover them, that he got all papers of this nature into his hands. The Athenians having discovered this robbery, had probably punished Apellicon with death, if he had not made his escape. His friends soon occasioned his being recalled. He engaged himself in the cabal of Athenion, a Peripatetic Philosopher, who was become very powerful by a popular sedition during the war betwixt the Romans and Mithridates. The confusions then reigning in Athens, contributed on the one hand to the elevation of Apellicon, and on the other to discover that he was utterly unfit for command. Athenion sent him commander to the isle of Delos; but Apellicon observed military discipline so ill, and took so little care to prevent being surprized by the enemy, that the Romans made a descent into the isle, without being perceived by him, and slew the garrison while asleep. Apellicon had the good fortune to save himself (35). He died a little before Sylla made himself master of Athens (36). I have already said what he did with regard to the writings of Aristotle, and what became of his library. He was an author; he is cited (37) as a defender of Aristotle against the calumnious reports raised against him on account of this Philosopher's intimacy with Hermias.

[F] Strabo was our Tyrannion's disciple. I have cited the place where Strabo relates this particular: but it is false, that he was his disciple in his own country, and that he was his countryman. Pompa who advances these two errors, hath mistaken Amicus, Tyrannion's native country, for Amasia the country of this famous Geographer (38).

[G] Cicero made use of him to put his library in order. This is what he writes to his friend Pomponius Atticus ↓ Lib. 4. cap. 6. de recta ratione Philosophandi.

† Difficult. Peripat. tom. i. lib. 3.

* Comment. in lib. Hippoc. de natura humana.

 Difficult. Peripat. tom. i. lib. 3.

(32) Gassend. Exercit. adverb. Aristoteles, lib. i. cap. iv.

(33) Athenæus, lib. v. pag. 214.

(34) Strabo, lib. xiii. pag. 419.

(35) Athen. ubi supra.

(36) Strabo, ibid. The taking of Athens falls on the CLXXXIIIrd Olympiad, about the year of Rome 666.

(37) Aristoteles Peripateticus, apud Eusebium Præp. lib. xv. cap. ii. pag. 793.

(38) Pompa in Ciceron. Epist. VI. lib. ii. ad Atticum, in Edit. Græviana.

(25) Παρ' αὐτοῦ (Τυραννιονος) τὸν ποσειδὼν Ἀνδρονικὸν εὐπορήσαντα τῶν ἀντιγράφων. A quo (Tyrannion) accepit Andronicum Rhodium exemplaria. Plut. in Sylla, pag. 488, B.

(26) Add to these remarks concerning Father Rapin, what has been said in the article of ANDRONICUS Rhodius.

(27) Ex Suidas.

(28) See Calvinius, ad ann. mundi 3893.

As Inference very glorious for Aristotle, but which may raise some doubt concerning his writings.

(29) Vossius, de Philosoph. Sectis, pag. 88.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 87, where he observes that of these three works, the two last are not Aristotle's.

(31) Naudé Apologie des grans Hommes, ib. vi. pag. 101, 102, 103.

† Lib. 4. Examine. vanit. Doctrine Genitum.

(39) Epist. IV, lib. iv. He wrote it soon after he returned from his banishment. Confer Epist. IV, V, lib. iii, ad 2, fratrem.

(40) Epist. VIII,
lib. iv, ad Atti-
cum.

Atticus. 'Perbelle feceris si ad nos venieris.' designationem Tyrannionis mirificam in librorum meorum Bibliotheca, quorum reliquæ multo mitiores sunt quam putaram. Etiam vellem mihi mitas de tuis librariolis duos aliquos, quibus Tyrannio utatur glutinatoribus, ad cætera administris (39). --- You will do well to make me a visit: the admirable method of Tyrannion in ordering my library, is worth your seeing; I find the remains of it make a better figure than I could have imagined. I must also beg the favour of you to send me any two of your Book-binders, who may be assisting to Tyrannion in adjusting the covers, and other purposes.' He owns in another epistle (40) that the two persons whom Atticus sent him did wonders: 'Postea verò quam Tyrannio mihi

' libros disposuit, mens addita videtur meis ædibus:
' qua quidem in re mirifica opera Dionysii & Meno-
' philii tui fuit. -- But after Tyrannion had metho-
' dized my books, my house seemed as if it was animat' ed; in which your Dionysius and Menophilus were won' derfully assisting. --

[H] He wrote a book which Pomponius Atticus admired (41.) Some believe it was a treatise of Profound. They ground their conjecture on these words of Cicero: Quid ex ista acuta & gravi reseritur ad γεωγραφίαν (42.) Another passage (43) seems to import that Tyrannion pretended to Geography.

(41) Vide Epist.
VI, lib. xii, ad
Atticum.

f (42) Ibid.

(43) Epist. VI,
lib. ii, ad Atti-
cum.

(a) His Name was Dymas.

(b) Ex Suida.

TYRANNION, so called, because he was the disciple of the preceding [A], was first named Diocles. He was of Phoenicia. In the war betwixt Octavius and Mark Anthony he was taken prisoner, and bought by one of the emperor's freed men (a). He was afterwards given to Terentia, who enfranchised him. After this Tyrannion set up a school in Rome, and composed sixty-eight books. One of them was written to prove, that the Latin tongue was descended from the Greek (b). This Terentia had been Cicero's wife [B].

[A] Because he was the disciple of the preceding. I do not know where Lloyd, Hoffman, and Moreri, have found that he affumed his uncle Tyrannion's name; for Suidas whom they cite, says no such thing, and I cannot find it in the Paris edition of Charles Stephens 1620, nor in that of Geneva 1662.

[B] This Terentia had been Cicero's wife. Though Suidas has not distinguished the times, Moreri ought not to confound them. He ought not to say that Damas bought Tyrannion, nor that he gave him to Terence, Cicero's wife. He who bought the slave was called Dymas, and no body said that it was he who presented him to this woman. He ought to have named her Terentia and not Terence; and to prevent mistakes, he ought not to have used an expression which signifies that Cicero was then alive. He had been dead a long time: Terentia was neither his wife nor his widow; for he had divorced her several years before his death.

(a) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. ii,
pag. 18, says he was born at Fon-tanablan Terra
del distretto di
Poitiers. - - -
Fontainebleau, an estate in the district of Poitiers.

TIRAQUELLUS (ANDREW) in French Tiraqueau, one of the most learned men of the XVIth century, was born at Fontenai-le Comte, a town of Poitou (a). I have but little to add to what Teissier and Moreri have already said of him (b). I shall only say, that it is not at all probable he had so many children as some authors bestow on him. They make the number amount to forty-five, and tell us that if he had drank wine, he had been yet much more fruitful, as well in the productions of his pen, as in those of his bed [A]. He died very old in the year 1558 [B]. Some have been much

(b) Moreri has committed two faults, which I correct in the remark [B].

[($ a) Mr Bayle might have cited in this place, Bezza's epigram, on Tiraquellus: Est tibi natorum quæ computat agmina conjux, Est tibi quæ natos bibliotheca parit, &c. Your wife with spoles of lovely children teems, In books your study no less fruitful seems. &c. REM. CRIT.]

(1) Æque ingenii ut corporis numerosa fecundus prole, cum singulis annis

singulos annis singulos libros ac liberos reipublice daret. Tbuan.
 lib. xxi, pag.
 432, ad ann.
 1558. Sammar-
tbanus, in Elog.
pag. m. 33, say in general cum numerosam sobolem ex bonissima
uxore suscepit.

(2) Pierre de
St Romuald, Abrégé du Thréfor. Chro-nolog. Tom. iii,
pag. m. 324,
ad ann. 1558.

(3) Teissier, in the additions to the Elogies, Tom. i, pag. 154.

[A] They make the number of his children amount to forty-five, and tell us, &c. Not long since, I read in a Thesis de aquæ calidæ potu, maintained at Helms-tad, under Henry Meibomius, in the year 1689, that 'ho' Tiraquellus drank only water, he was father of forty-five children, and author of as many books, on which occasion these four verses are mentioned :

Fœcundus facundus aquæ Tiraquellus amator
Terquiddecim librorum & liberum parens,
Qui nisi restinxisset aquis abstemius ignes,
Impleffet orbem prole animi atque corporis.

*Learn'd Tiraquellus, tho' to water true,
Yet forty-five both books and children knew ;
And had his fire not been by water chill'd,
His double offspring must the world have fill'd.*

I dare aver, that the fact is stretched too far (§a). Thuanus could not have been ignorant of a thing so remarkable as this, and would undoubtedly have mentioned it, if he had believed it true: but he contents himself with saying that Tiraquellus bestowed a book and a child on the public every year (1). Some other writers have particularized the number; but confine themselves to thirty. Tiraquellus was no less fruitful in the production of the children of his mind than of those of his body; for in thirty years not one passed in which he did not give the world a book and a son, and if on the one side he extended his name and family by a large number of children, all excellent persons, which he had by a virtuous wife, he acquired still at large a share of glory by the great number of books with which he enriched the public; but what increases the wonder is, that he was thus fruitful tho' he drank only water (2). Mr Teissier, who cites Frey, admir. Gallie, confines himself also to thirty (3). Nor can we reach so far as forty-five if we regulate ourselves by the common obfervation of those authors who mention this; they aver that Tiraquellus had but one wife, and that all his children were lawfully begotten. I am not sur-prized that this fecundity should appear more wonderful to those who reflect that this learned man drank only water: but this perhaps might even contribute to his prolific virtue. His natural heat would perhaps have been inflamed to an excessive degree by the use of rich wines, and in this excess he had been less fit for generation; for we are told of barren marriages, by reason of the too great salacity of the parties (4).

 However it be, Tiraquellus's wife had no reason to fear the attacks of the wits, as she might have done if she had been but seldom pregnant. Her husband was fond of his studies to an excessive degree; his works loudly proclaim that he spent whole days among his books. His writings discover a prodigious reading, labour, and researches, which require a strong application. When a man is known to spend the day in this manner, he is supposed to have exhausted himself, and to require a great deal of rest in the night;

(4) See, above,
 the remark (H)
 of the article
 HERLICIUS.

Quod caret alterna requie durabile non est,
Hæc reparat vires fessaque membra novat (5).

*Our living to alternate rest is due,
This can lost strength, and wearied limbs renew.*

It is imagined that his spirits are wafted with studying, writing, and reading, and that he endeavours to obtain fresh supplies by a sound sleep, instead of undergoing new fatigues. On this account his wife is rallied in company, she is pitied, and bantered with very unacceptable complements of condolence: but if she can strew a house-full of children she is sheltered from these jests. As all things have two faces, it is certain that a married author buried all day amongst his books and papers, may pass either for an easy or troublesome

(5) Ovid. in E.
pist. Heroid.
Epist. iv, vv.
89.

much more guilty of Plagiarism towards him than ever he was towards others [C]. I have elsewhere (c) cited a passage, where it is observed that he inserted several obscenities in one of his books.

(c) Citation (14), of the second article S A N - C H E Z.

troublesome husband. This is just according to the wife he happens to marry. If she is a coquet and loose, he is a very easy husband; for whilst he studies twelve hours or more every day, she has free liberty to dispose of her person agreeably to her inclinations. But if she would do her duty, he is not in all respects a good husband, he sometimes obliges her to with herself a book (6), he goes to bed quite harassed with study, and his head full of a chapter which he could not finish. The inconveniences of this disposition of body and mind are visible to every body. Note that every thing has its exceptions: in reading the lives of learned men, we may observe a great many of them who had large families. The reason is that some constitutions are so strong and hearty, that they are sufficient for every thing.

Observe, that in order to justify those who aver that Tiraquellus had forty-five lawful children, tho' married but once, we cannot suppose of him, what the Menagiana relates of one Blunet (7), who had by his wife one and twenty children at seven successive births (8), three at each time; for if this learned Civilian's wife had very often brought him two or three at a time, it would have been the principal circumstance which authors would have observed. But not one of them has mentioned any thing like it; on the contrary, they have told us that Tiraquellus produced every year a book and a child. Singulis annis singulos liberos reipublice daret (9).

[B] He died very old in the year 1558.) Sammarthanus observes two or three times almost in the same page, that Tiraquellus attained to a very great age; but he does not specify the number of years: if he knew it, he is to blame, for not intimating it to his readers. I will not affirm that he did not know it, for it is his custom to neglect dates. He certainly knew that Tiraquellus died in 1558, and yet he has not said so; he makes use of a long periphrasis to express the time of Tiraquellus's death. 'Obiit, says he (10), planè senex haud multò ante quàm inter Henricum I. secundum & Philippum Hispaniæ Regem post varias bellorum offensiones de pace tandem per utriusque legatos ageretur. . . . He died a very old man, not long before the ambassadors on both sides, after various hostilities, concluded a peace between Henry II, and

'Philip King of Spain.' Mr Bullart makes use of these words of Sammarthanus, and explains them with respect to the time he believes they point at; but he has not succeeded it. 'Having attained to a venerable and decrepit old age, he piously exchanged earth for heaven at the end of the year 1559, just at the time when Europe saw the charming hopes of peace begin to appear again after a bloody war, which divided its most potent monarchs (11)'. A rare explanation! The treaty of Cateau in Cambresis, which gave peace to Europe, was concluded the 3d of April 1559. The world therefore could not be in hopes of this peace at the end of that year. Hence, doubtless, Mr Moreri was led into the mistake he has committed in placing this Civilian's death in 1559. He has been guilty of another fault which Mr Bullart might have helped him to avoid. He saith Michael de l'Hôpital wrote a poem in honour of the Tiraquelli, he ought to have said with Bullart in honour of Tiraquellus's writings (12). To speak exactly he ought to have said that Michael de l'Hôpital addressed one of his poems to Tiraquellus. For the rest, Ghilini is yet more mistaken than Mr Bullart, with respect to the circumstances which Sammarthanus made use of: Ghilini, I say (13), believed that the year 1556 did but by a few days precede the peace of Cateau, betwixt Philip II and Henry II. It is a blunder, and falsity to assert as he doth (14), that the 23d of December 1556, was the day on which Tiraquellus died.

[C] Some have been much more guilty of plagiarism towards him, than ever he was towards others.] He accuses Bartholomew Chassanæus of having stolen from his book de legibus connubialibus above six hundred pages entire, without making any alterations (15). In hunc furti nomine vehementissime invehitur Tiraquellus cum alibi tum in tractatu de utroque retractu (17), ubi dicit eum plusquam sexcentas paginas integras ne vocabulo quidem mutato ex legibus suis connubialibus in tractatum suum de gloria mundi transcripsisse. Chassanæus had accused Tiraquellus of having stolen several things from Cælius Rhodiginus. Against this charge he justified himself, and accused Chassanæus in his turn. His accusation is better grounded than that of his adversary (18).

(11) Bullart, Académie des Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 220.

(12) Bullart, ibid.

(13) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. II, pag. 18.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Jacobus Thomæus de Plagio Literario, num. 385, pag. m. 169. He quotes Speckh. Cent. I. qu. 88. n. 10. p. 376.

(16) Thomæus quotes here several passages out of Tiraquellus, in Leges Connubiales.

(17) Thomæus, quotes here, §. 1. gl. 9. num. 76, circa fin.

(18) See Thomæus de Plagio Literario, num. 563, 564, pag. 249.

TIRESIAS, one of the most celebrated Soothsayers of antiquity, was the son of Everes (a), and of the nymph Chariclo, and derived his original from Udæus, one of those (b) who proceeded from the serpent's teeth sown in the earth by Cadmus. He was blind, for which several reasons were assigned. Some said that the gods, unwilling that he should reveal to mortals what they desired to conceal from them, struck him blind. Pherecydes ascribed it only to the anger of Minerva [A]. He said that this goddess was so incensed that she had been seen naked by Tiresias, that she put out his eyes. She was earnestly sollicitous by Chariclo her favourite, and Tiresias's mother, to restore that unhappy man to his sight. But not being able to do her that favour, she endeavoured to make him some amends by perfecting his hearing to such a degree, that he understood the language of all birds [B]. She also gave him a staff, with which he could guide himself

(a) Moreri calls him wrong Iovius.

(b) They were called Ἐξαπτοί.

[A] Pherecydes ascribed it only to the anger of Minerva.] It will be very proper to compare this place of Apollodorus with a hymn of Callimachus (1), which says that Minerva having been seen by Tiresias, while she was bathing her self in company with Chariclo in the fountain Hippocrene, had no sooner declared that he should see no more, than he lost his eyes. Chariclo was very much afflicted at this misfortune of her son. Minerva to comfort her, assured her, that it was an irrevocable law of the destinies, that all those who saw a deity without her permission, should be severely chastized (2); that a time would come when she would be esteemed a happy woman, for her sons escaping with the loss of his eyes. Minerva farther added out of her great affection for Chariclo, that she would render Tiresias the most excellent soothsayer in the world; that she would perfectly instruct him in the presages taken from the flight of birds; that she would give him a staff which should serve him instead of a guide; that she should confer on him a long life; and that he should be the only man, who after his death should be eminent for his knowledge in hell, where Pluto should particularly honour him.

VOL. V.

[B] To understand the language of all birds.] Ὅλας ἀνὴρ ὀρνίθων φωνὴν ποιῆσαι συνίηται: Omnem avium vocem scire ut intelligeret. Methinks this favour of Minerva will not be understood in its full extent, if it be said only that she communicated to Tiresias a perfect knowledge of all the presages which depend on the singing of birds: we must proceed further, and suppose that they meant that birds communicate their thoughts to one another by their notes, as men do by words; and that Tiresias received of Minerva the gift of understanding and interpreting this language of birds. It is thus, Porphyry understood the matter (3); for imagining that brutes have not only the faculty of reasoning, but also that of speaking to one another, he has said, that Apollonius Tyanæus, Melampus, Tiresias, and Thales, understood and distinguished the various languages made use of by

(3) Porphyry, lib. III, de Abstin. See the article PEREIRA, citat. (32).

(6) See Vol. II, of the Chevrance, pag. 115, Dutch Edit.

(7) A mean citizen of Paris.

(8) Menagiana, pag. 127, of the fifth Dutch edition. It is further said that he debauched his maid, who at nine months end was delivered of three boys.

(9) Thuan. lib. xxi, ad ann. 1158, pag. 432.

(10) Sammarthanus, Elog. lib. I, pag. m. 35.

(1) Εἰς Ἀντὶστήν τῆς Παλλάδος, in lavacrum Palladis.

(2) See an instance of it in the text of the article ADONIS, citation (5).

himself as safely as when he had his eyes. Hefiod tells the story otherwise; he says that Tiresias having found two serpents copulating, he struck them with his staff (c) [C], and was immediately turned into a woman; that at the expiration of a certain time (d) he again found the same animals in the same situation, and resumed the form of a man. Now as he had tasted the pleasures of both sexes (e), he was chosen judge of a dispute which arose betwixt Jupiter and Juno, on the question, whether women had a larger share than men in the venereal pleasure. Jupiter affirmed it, Juno denied it. Tiresias decided against the goddess Juno [D]; who was on that occasion so enraged that she blinded

(4) Apollodor. lib. i, pag. 46.

(5) Phn. lib. x, cap. 49.

(6) Vide Pfeiffer. Theol. Judaicae etque Mohammed. p. 307, 308.

(7) Bonaventura Baro, in the first Tome of the Scotus defensio, mentions a Franciscan Monk, who understood the conversations of animals, and by what means foretold things to come.

(8) Animal. Hist. lib. viii, cap. v. See also Euripides, in Phœnic. ver. 846.

(9) Barthius, in Statium, Tom. ii, pag. 1065, 1149.

(10) Lutatius, in Stat. Thebaid. lib. ii.

(11) Hygin. cap. lxxv.

(12) Metamorphol. lib. iii.

by animals. With regard to Melampus we are told (4) that some serpents having licked his ears whilst he slept, were the cause, that when he awoke he understood what the birds said as they flew over his head; and that afterwards he declared to men the future events he learned that way. 'Qui credit ista & Melampodi profecto aures lambendo dedisse intellectum avium sermonis dracones non abnuet. . . . He who believes these things, will not deny the possibility of Melampus's being taught to understand the language of birds by serpents licking his ears.' These are Pliny's words (5), who immediately after adds that Democritus mentions the names of certain birds, whose blood mingled together would produce a serpent, which would instruct those who eat it to understand the conversation of birds. Vel quæ Democritus tradit nominando aves, quarum confuso sanguine serpens gignatur, quem quisquis ederit intelleturus sit alium colloquia. The Jews and several Mahometans maintain (6) that Solomon understood this language (7). To return to Tiresias, I observe that if we will take Apollodorus's expression to signify only, that Tiresias perfectly understood that sort of divination, which was properly called Augury, (or divining by birds) we shall find in Ælian (8) that Tiresias became principally famous on this account. Barthius imagines that this is quite contrary to Statius (9); but that conjecture is only founded on the false supposition that this Poet has introduced Tiresias despising auguries. I say this supposition is false, to prove which, against Barthius, I need only quote page 1069, of his own second tome on Statius, where he acknowledges that Tiresias declares, that the other ways of founding the intentions of the gods, had not afforded him such a profound knowledge of futurity, as what he had acquired by the invocation of the Manes. Is it despising a thing, not to acknowledge it for the very best of all?

[C] Struck them with his staff. Others say, that he trode upon them: 'In monte Cyllenio Tiresias dracones coeuntes calcasse dicitur: ob id in mulieris formam versus, ut Ovidius refert. Deinde monitus fortibus in eundem locum rediit, & in figuram pristinam (10). . . . On mount Cyllene Tiresias is said to have trod upon serpents copulating; on which account he was turned into the form of a woman, as Ovid relates. Afterwards, by advice of the oracle he returned to the same place, and resumed his former state.' Before Lutatius said this, Hyginus had told us, 'In monte Cyllenio Tiresias Evers filius pastor dracones venerantes dicitur baculo percussisse, alias calcasse, ob id in mulieris figuram est conversus: Postea monitus à fortibus in eodem loco, dracones cum calcasset, rediit in pristinam speciem (11). . . . On the mountain Cyllene, Tiresias a shepherd, the son of Evers, is said to have struck with his staff, otherwise to have trod upon, serpents in copulation, and for that reason to have been transformed into a woman: Afterwards being advised by the oracle he trod upon serpents in the same place, and resumed his former figure.' The commentators are very much puzzled about those words, alias calcasse; but why should not alias be taken for an adverb, after which there is no need of imagining that a globe hath slipped out of the margin into the text. Hyginus might very well mention both, in order to comprehend both traditions; but if nothing be wanting in the two mentioned passages, we may justly be surprized that these authors should omit some essential circumstances. The first forgot that Tiresias met a second time the serpents copulating, and renewed his first blow; he forgot, I say, that these two circumstances were necessary, in order to restore him to his manhood; he pretends that he was only obliged to return to the place. The other forgets the first of these two things. Ovid (12) with all his prolixity likewise forgets it. Hefiod in Apollodorus hath omitted the last of these two circumstances; he has not told us that Tiresias struck the second time. Phlegon and Fulgentius are the persons who have remembered them both. But, on the other side, Phlegon hath his peculiar variations; he will have it, that Tiresias struck one of the serpents the first time, and the other the second; but does not allow him to have struck them both each time (13). Eustathius, and the scholiast on Homer (14), as also Tzetzes on Lycophron, say, that the first time Tiresias killed the female and became a woman, and afterwards killing the male he was changed to a man again; and that this happened on mount Cithæron (15), and not on mount Cyllene (16).

[D] Tiresias decided against the goddess Juno. We are told that the better to give a judicial air to this decision, he took into his hand the balance with which justice is painted. He considered at first as a sum total the pleasure in dispute, then he made the division, and assigned to each sex its lot or quota in weight and measure; and pronounced that the whole being divided into ten parts the woman had nine, and the man one.

Οἷον μὲν μοῖρην δέκα μοιρῶν τέρπεται ἀνὴρ.
Τὰς δὲ δέκα ἐμπαῖσι γυνὴ τέρπεται νόημα.

Parte una è denis mas partibus oblectatur;
At mulier solidum coitus capit ipsa decuncem.

One part of pleasure is the share of men,
Women enjoy the other nine in ten.

Apollodorus, who cites these two verses (17), said just before, if we follow the present miserable state of his Greek text, that the pleasure being divided into nineteen parts the man enjoys nine, and the woman the other ten (18); at which Juno was so incensed, that she deprived him of his sight. Two things shew that this place is corrupted; the first is, that nothing can be more flat or insipid, and more remote from the design of the inventors of this chimerical dispute, than to represent Juno as condemned for so inconsiderable a difference. I say nothing of the severe punishment which she inflicted on her judge, for a sentence so little distant from truth; for I should be answered that her character is choleric, haughty, and revengeful (19), and that on this occasion her resentment exceeded the bounds of reason.

Graviter Saturnia iusto

Nec pro materia fertur doluisse, sui que
Iudicis æterna damnavit lumina nocte (20).

Juno too angry for a crime so light,
Condemn'd her judge to everlasting night.

The other reason is, that Apollodorus would be utterly void of judgment, if after having related the substance of the decision one way, he should soon after make appear by citing the words of the sentence, that he had miserably falsified it. If this blow may be warranted off by saying that we have only a small abridgment of Apollodorus, what shall we urge against so many other authors, who follow not his text, as we have it at present, but the two Greek verses he has cited, as the express sentence? Phlegon (21) and Lutatius (22) admit exactly the proportion expressed in these verses. The Scholiast on Homer (23) cites these two lines with a very inconsiderable alteration. Eustathius (24) quotes some words of them. Lucian (25) does not much differ from them at the bottom. Fulgentius differs still less (26); and the Scholiast on Juvenal (27), explaining a place where this Poet says, that those women who were most fond of manly occupations, and most avoided those of their sex, would not become men: the reason he assigns for this,

(c) Venus hanc erat utraque doct. Ovid. Metam. lib. iii, ver. 323.

(13) Phlegon, de Rebus mirabil. cap. iv.

(14) In Odyss. K, ver. 494.

(15) In Boetia.

(16) In Arcadia.

(17) Apoll. Rhod. pag. 193.

(18) Διανομία μοιρῶν παρὰ τὰς αὐδίας, ὡς αὖ, τὰς μὴ ὀνείας ἀνδρὶς ἡσέβας τὰς δὲ δέκα, γυναικας. De novem ac decem que inter coeundum voluptatis partes capiuntur, novem mas ac mulieres decem fœmine. M. ibid. pag. 191.

(19) Es germanus Iovis Saturnusque altera proles, æstivum tantum voluit sub pectore Rutilus. Can Saturni's iustice and Revenge's utter law, Such malign anger in her bosom bear? Æneid. lib. xii, ver. 830.

(20) Ovid. Metam. lib. iii, ver. 333.

(21) Phleg. de Rebus mirabil. cap. iv.

(22) In Statium, apud Barthium, Tom. ii, p. 318.

(23) In Odyss. K, ver. 494. Vide Munkelium in Hygin. pag. 128.

(24) In eund. loc. Odyss.

(25) In Amori-bus, where he says that according to Tiresias, 'H ἡμέρα τέρψας ἐστὶ μοῖρα ἡλιονακταί τῆς ἀβύσσου, πολέμβος δὲλεσίου tota parte maledicula mperat. . . . The woman's pleasure exceeds the man's, by one part.

(26) Tiresias dixit tres uncias habere virum amoris, & novem fœminam. . . . Tiresias said the man had three parts, the woman nine, Fulgent. Mythol. lib. ii, cap. viii.

(27) Una uncia libidinis est in masculis, octo in feminis. . . . The man has one part, the woman eleven. Scholiast. Juvenal. in Sat. vi, ver. 453.

blinded him [E]: But amends was made him by the gift of prophecy [F], which Jupiter it, is the too unequal division of the venerable pleasure.

Quæ fugit à sexu, viros amat, hæc tamen ipfa
Vir nollet fieri; nam quantula nostra voluptas!

Inur'd to arms, and her own sex to fly,
Yet to be wolly man she would disclaim,
To quit her ten-fold pleasure at the game,
For frothy praises, and an empty name.

DRYDEN.

I ought not to forget that Barthius seems to me very happy in his correction of the text of Apollodorus in pag. 319, and 1066, of the second volume on Statius.

Some may ask whether this pretended judgment of Tiresias, is supported by natural or moral reasons. As for the reasons deducible from nature, I refer them to the Physicians; who, in all probability, will find it very difficult to give a clear decision of this question. And as for moral reasons, I do not believe any stronger can be alleged, than that it is agreeable to a wife and bounteous providence, such as that of God, to make compensations, and to multiply the female pleasure in proportion to the whole train of loathings, inconveniences, and pain, which the women endure from their conception to their delivery. On this foot, the share of pleasure ought to be prodigiously unequal in favour of that sex: but besides that the law of compensations would be attended with consequences that must lead too far; it may be said that God has thousands and thousands of ways of compensation besides this, so that nothing can be determined about any of these ways in particular. But the best morality of this fable is never to mention this pretended history of Tiresias, without adding, that it is false, as well in fact as reason. The necessity of this addition Brantome will confirm to you. 'I knew, says he (28), a young (28) Brantome, Mémoires des Dames Galantes, Tom. ii, p. 45.

'lady, of a very good and great family, who was ruined and became a whore, by having heard her school-master relate the story or rather fable of Tiresias, who having experienced both sexes, was chosen by Jupiter and Juno, to decide a dispute betwixt them, whether the male or female enjoyed most pleasure in the act of copulation. The judge decided against Juno, that the woman enjoyed by far the greatest pleasure: the goddesses enraged at the sentence against her struck the poor judge blind. It is not to be wondered at, if this girl was tempted by such a story: For as she had often heard her companions, or other women say that the men so ardently pursued that pleasure, and took so great delight in it, and that the women, according to Tiresias's verdict, took a great deal more, she therefore must needs try it. Such lessons are, indeed, very proper for girls! Are there no other for them? But their masters will answer, that they will know every thing, and if in the course of their reading, histories or fables occur, which want explanation, (or explain themselves) they must explain them, and must not skip them, or turn to the next page. How many studious girls have been undone by reading this very story, that of Biblis and Caunus, and such like, in Ovid's Metamorphosis?'

As there are some who have objected, that I was in the wrong to suppose that this question should be referred to Physicians, it is necessary I should shew them that it has been in reality debated and discussed already in Physical treatises. I can justify this with so much the more liberty, because my whole quotation will be either in Italian or Latin: Questo suo donare nasce dalla sfrenata sua libidine, e dal prendere maggior piacere nel atto venereo, che gli huomini non pigliano, e non sentono: Come prova Avicenna nel libro nono, e ventisimoprime degli animali, e Hali Abbate nel sesto libro della sua Teorica in questo proposito disse Duplicità est in fœmina concubitus voluptas, quia præter feminis motum, & orificii vulvæ in suggendo quoque nascitur oblectatio, vulva ipsa diversimode mota; il che conferma anco Galeno nel quarto libro de morbis, & symptomatis. E lo dimostra il giudizio di Tiresia, secondo i Poeti. . . . E lo conferma anco Pietro Aponense sopra il decimo quinto problema d'Aristotile; benché Polibio in quel suo libro de genitura provi il contrario, facendo due volontà: volontà intensiva, & estensiva, volontà intensiva chiamando l'ultima, & estensiva nel mandare fuori il seme genitale, & in questa vuole, che si diletta più l'huomo: estensiva intende quella, la quale si piglia innanzi l'emissione nel maneggiarsi: & in questa vuole si diletta più la donna, onde Gorreo Parifino medico dottissimo nelle annotazioni al libro di Polibio scrisse le seguenti parole à favor delle Donne: Tametsi maribus semen calidius acrius copiosiusque inest, motuque ipsi majore quam fœminæ in coitu concutiuntur, plufque multo caloris, & spiritus obtinent, quamobrem ex his major esse maris quam fœminæ videri possit. Verum in fœmina alia privatim considerare oportet, quæ inter præcipuas, & potissimas voluptatis veneræ causas esse possunt. Si quidem ejus uterus magno virili Seminis desiderio tenetur, ipsumque mirum in modum appetit, & attrahendo, sugendo, concipiendoque impensissimè delectatur, est enim ea in re uterus ventriculo similis, sicut enim iste suavis cibis, potibusque gaudet, eoque avidissimè amplectitur; ita ille semen amat, habetque gratissimum. Mario Equicola nel quarto libro de natura amoris. Dice, che se ciò fosse vero, che le donne havessero maggior piacere che gli huomini non hanno nell'atto venereo sempre le femine ricercherbbono i maschi, del che (dice egli) si vede tutto il contrario (29).

[E] She was so enraged that she blinded him.] Apollodorus does not acquaint us in what manner: but Hyginus informs us that she did it with her own hand, Juno irata manu averfa eum excæcavit (30). . . . Juno in a passion struck out his eyes with the back of her hand. Phlegon's expression may very well be interpreted, that she did it with her bodkin, καὶ ἀνὰ δὲ τοῦ τῶς ὀφθαλμοῦς. She pricked out his eyes. The scholiast on Statius adds, that she cut off his hands; illa irata manus ejus præcidit & excæcavit; . . . she in her fury cut off his hands, and blinded him. But he being the only author who says this, it is probable this place is corrupted. Barthius corrects it thus; manus ei læxæ, Vigener superjecit & excæcavit; . . . she laid her hands upon him, and blinded him; and confirms this conjecture from Apollodorus, who speaking of the punishment inflicted by Minerva on Tiresias, says she did it with her own hands; τὴν δὲ ταῖς χερσὶ τῶς ὀφθαλμοῦς αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀλαζομένην ἑρπύων ποίνσαι (31); She laid hold of his eyes with her hands, in order to blind him.

(29) Giuseppe Palli of the academy of the Signori Ricoverati di Padova, & Informi di Ravenna, in the 33d and 34th pages of a book called i Donnechi Difetti, Printed at Venice 1618, in 4to, it is the fourth edition.

(30) Hygin. cap. lxxv. Vigener superjecit & excæcavit; . . . she laid her hands upon him, and blinded him; and confirms this conjecture from Apollodorus, who speaking of the punishment inflicted by Minerva on Tiresias, says she did it with her own hands; τὴν δὲ ταῖς χερσὶ τῶς ὀφθαλμοῦς αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀλαζομένην ἑρπύων ποίνσαι (31); She laid hold of his eyes with her hands, in order to blind him.

[F] Amends was made him by the gift of prophecy.] He acquiesced in this exchange; it does not appear that he regretted the loss of his eyes: he is never introduced deploring his destiny; this had not been consistent with decency, after the great knowledge which his mind was supposed to have received. 'Augurem

Tiresiam quem sapientem fingunt Poetæ nunquam inducunt deplorantem cæcitatem suam. At vero Polyphemum Homerus cum immanem ferumque finxisset, cum arietem etiam colloquentem facit, ejusque laudare fortunas quod quo vellet ingredi posset, & quæ vellet attingeret. Restè hoc quidem, nihilo enim erat ipse cyclops quàm aries ille prudentior (32). . . . Tiresias, the Soothsayer, who is described as a wise man by the Poets, is never introduced by them as deploring his blindness. But Homer having described Polyphemus as cruel and fierce, introduces him conversing with a ram, and envying it's lot, in being able to run and skip wherever it pleased. And in this he was consistent, for the Cyclops himself was in no respect wiser than the ram.' Let the Cyclops, let ignorant men believe that the loss of bodily sight, is the loss of the joys of this world. It is true, that all the unthinking crew are not agreed on this principle, witness the two begging rogues mentioned in the XIXth Serée of Bouchet. They were at a church-door, and could not agree what was the joy of this world; for the blind man cried out, Bestow your alms on a poor man, who has lost the joys of this world: The other rascal, who by a faulcon-shot had lost what should have been in his codpiece, told him he lied, and averred that it was he who had lost the joy of this world.

(31) Barth. in Stat. Tom. ii, pag. 318. See also Munckerus in Hygin. pag. 128.

(32) Cicero, Tullian. V. circa fin.

We are told of a Princess who would have put it out of dispute by condemning the first of these beggars. The story runs thus: 'A Princess of great virtue, who remained a virgin all her life, lost her sight in her pitier bestowed on him. He acquired a great reputation by his divining science [G], notwithstanding which he was ignorant that the water of the fountain Tilphusa would prove fatal to him; for having fled with his countrymen [H] in the time of the second Theban war, he drank of this water and died. This is what we find in Apollodorus concerning him (f). We see in Strabo (g), that the Thebans at that time fled for refuge to the mountain Tilphusa, that at the foot of this mountain there was a fountain of the same name, and that Tiresias's tomb was there also. Pausanias (b) agrees with Strabo concerning the place where Tiresias's tomb was situated. This was, I confess, not very far distant from Alalcomenium; but yet Moreri is very much mistaken, when he says (i) that Alalcomenium was remarkable for Tiresias's tomb. We have given, in its proper place, the article of MANTO, the worthy daughter of this great Diviner, to whom she served as a guide, and was the staff of his old age (k); for it must not be forgot that he lived very

(f) Biblioth. lib. iii, pag. 191. 197, Edit. Sal. mar. 1661.

(g) Lib. ix, pag. m. 285. See also pag. 283.

(b) Lib. ix, pag. m. 307.

(i) In the article of ALALCOMENIUM; for he forgot it in that of Tiresias; he places that monument right, and quotes Strabo.

(k) O nostrar regimen vireque fenestra. Stat. Theb. lib. iv, var. 536.

her old age: being in that condition, a poor blind man was led to her coach-side, and cried out to her, My good lady, have pity on a poor man who has lost the joys of this world: the Princess hearing this, asked one of her women, What is the matter with that man, is he then an eunuch? No, madam, replied the waiting-woman, it is because he is blind, alas, poor man! He is in the right, said the Princess, indeed I did not think of that. The natural simplicity of this good Princess's question pleasantly enough discovered her opinion concerning the joys of this world (33). It is very probable that Malherbe would have decided the dispute conformably to the opinion of the beggar, who had lost by a faulcon-shot, &c. For, his weakness, in that respect, made him inconsiderable, and he would rather have chosen to be a condition to reap the ladies favours, than to obtain the highest dignities of the king his master (34). By the pathetic air of his complaints (35) one would be apt to judge that he had been more than once in the same disagreeable condition of the pretended hermit, who, in vain, had the charming Angelica at his mercy.

(33) Mr de Cailliere, of the French Academy, Recueil des bons Contes & des bons Mots, pag. 132, Dutch Edit. 1693.

(34) See the article M A L H E R B E, remark [B].

(35) See his Letter to Balzac, in the collection of new Letters, printed at Paris, 1642, pag. 65.

*Già refupina ne l'arena giace
A tutte voglie del Vecchio rapace.*

*Egli l'abbraccia, & à piacer la tocca.
Et ella dorme; è non può fare ischerma;
Hor le bacia il bel petto, hora la bocca:
Non è chi'l veggia in quel loco aspro & ermo,
Ma ne l'incontro il suo deftrier trabocca,
C'è al desio non risponde il corpo infermo,
Era mal'atto, perché haveva tropp'anni.
Et potrà peggio, quanto più l'affanni.*

*Tutte le vie, tutti li modi tenta:
Ma quel pigro rozzon non però falla.
Indarno il fren gli scote, è lo tormenta,
E non può far, che tenga la testa alta (36).*

(36) Ariosto, Orlando furioso, Canto Ottavo, Stanza xlviii, & seq.

Racan, Malherbe's good and faithful scholar, had also his master's taste; he would not have parted with the remainder of his vigour for all the triumphs of the greatest conqueror's, nor for all the policy of prime ministers. I am not at all surprized, says he, in a letter wrote to Balzac (37), that N. hath adventured to censure your eloquence, since Mr de Malherbe has had the impudence to accuse me of frigidity, when he himself is nothing but meer ice, and his last mistress died of age, the last hard winter: In boasting of the miracles of his youth, he plays a sure game, there being none living who can change the remainder of mine for the victories of the Prince of Orange, or the wisdom of Cardinal Richelieu, and should be very sorry to change conditions with my accuser. Malherbe's rallery ran thus: 'As for pastorals, his case succeeds the best in the world, but certainly as to what relates to the shepherdesses it could not go worse. This affair requires a sort of application of which his laziness is incapable. If he attacks a place it is in such a manner as to make it believed, that it would be only an incumbrance to him if he had it; and if he takes it, he so slightly keeps it that it must be supposed a woman has been very much surprized who has broke her fast for such a wretched morsel (38). Malherbe does not here speak of himself in the third person, as I once ima-

(37) Racan, Letter to Balzac, in Tom. ii, of the Collection of new Letters, printed at Paris, by Toussaint Quinet, in 1634, pag. 295, & seq.

(38) Malherbe, Letter to Balzac, pag. 61, of the Collection of new Letters, printed at Paris in 1642.

gined: he speaks of his disciple Racan, and it is on this account, that Racan justifies himself, and insults the other in the passage just now cited. But be it as it will, here is a couple of mean, carnal men, to whom Minerva could not have made amends, if instead of blinding them, as she did Tiresias, she had made them eunuchs.

I conclude with the thought of a Philosopher, but a Philosopher who was of a sect more reprobate and heretical in their notions of pleasure, than that of Epicurus. He had lost his eyes, and hearing the good women deplore his condition, he asked them, whether nocturnal enjoyments were not to be accounted pleasures. Illud Antipatri Cyrenaeici est quidem paub obsecrans, sed non absurda sententia est. Cujus cecitatem quum mulierculae lamentarentur, quid agitis, inquit? an vobis nulla videtur voluptas esse nocturna (39)?

[G] He acquired a great reputation by his divining science.] This appears by several passages in Sophocles, and other ancient authors. He was the only sage in Hell (40), if we believe Homer (41).

(39) Cicero, Tull. lib. vi, fol. 278, B.

(40) See what has been quoted out of Callimachus, in the remark [A].

(41) Odyss. K. var. 494.

*Τῇ καὶ τεθνηῶτι νῶν σόφῃ Περσεφίδῃ
Οἶον ἀπὸνύσσει. τοὶ δὲ, σκιάι ἀίσουσιν.*

Huc etiam mortuo mentem tribuit Proserpina Solut ut sciret, reliqui verò umbræ circumvolitant.

*Among the other stult'ring shades below,
He only had Hell's favourite gift, to know.*

MR POPE.

He was honoured as a god after his death (42). Yet I cannot find, in the ninth book of Strabo, what Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Moreri, and Hofman quote from it, viz. that the inhabitants of Thebes paid divine honours to Tiresias, interred near Tilphusa. I find only in Pausanias (43) that they had in their city a place called Tiresias's observatory, οἰωνοσκοπεῖον (44) Τίρεσιον, (which probably was the place from whence he contemplated the auguries) and an honorary tomb, or Cenotaphium: for the Thebans owned that he died near Haliartus (44); and consequently that they had not his tomb amongst them. The Historian has furnished them with a very odd argument; but it does not much concern us. Those gentlemen who have cited Strabo, would have found their account much better in Didorus Siculus; who informs us that the Thebans celebrated a pompous funeral to Tiresias, and paid him divine honours (45).

[H] Having fled with his countrymen.] Mr Moreri has very much mistaken his original Charles Stephens, when he says, that Tiresias being in exile near the fountain Tilphusa, died there. Charles Stephens's Latin runs thus; 'Juxta fontem ejusdem nominis, ubi profugus diem suum obiit: - - - Near a fountain of the same name, whither having fled, he died.' Which is taken from Strabo, ὅφ' ἡ Τίλφωσα κρήνη καὶ τῷ Τίρεσι μνημεῖον ἐκεί τελευτήσαντος κατὰ τὴν φύσιν, sub quo fons est Tilphosa, & monumentum Tiresiae qui extorris ibi mortem obiit. If Mr Moreri had been acquainted with the history of Tiresias, he would not have rendered the word profugus by that of exile. From hence we may infer, that translators are liable to commit strange blunders, when they do not understand their subject; for they may, indeed, know three or four significations of the same word, but this does not hinder them from chusing that which by no means agrees with this or that place. I observe a considerable difference betwixt Strabo and Pausanias. The first (42) Clem. Alexandr. I. Stromat. (43) Lib. ix, pag. 296, 297. (44) That town was not far from the mountain Tilphusa. (45) Θέλειται λαμπρὸς ὁ λαμπρὸς τῶν ματι, ἱερῶν, ἐν τῇ ἀγορᾷ. In the translation printed at Bologn. in 1548, lib. vi, cap. vi, p. 124. Quem, sui civis magna cum pompa sepelirent. Deorum tibi honores tribuissent, there is this, instead of ipse.

(1) Pausan. lib. ix, pag. 290.

(m) See Barthius, in Stat. Tom. ii, pag. 1106, and Tom. iii, pag. 673.

very long [I]. Some bestow on him another daughter called Hifloris (l), who by an ingenious stratagem deceived the goddess Lucina, and was the occasion that Alcmena, whose labour had been prolonged by that goddess, was happily delivered. There has been handed about a certain book under Tiresias's name, by an imposture which has been practised a thousand times. This book treated of the presages of frankincense, de thuris signis. It is twice cited by the scholiast on Statius (m). Tiresias dealt in all sorts of predictions; he made use of Pyromancy (n), Capnomancy, Necromancy, &c. The latter, which consisted in calling upon the dead, pleased him more than the rest (o); this he exercised very imperiously [K], and would not suffer the ghosts to be tardy in appearing. As he was blind, Manto his daughter was obliged to inform him of the phenomena of fire, and smook, &c. (p). Lucian in his treatise of Astrology observes, that Tiresias taught that the planets have not all the same virtue, nor the same sex.

He

(46) Pausan. lib. ix, p. 307.

(47) Diod. Sicul. lib. v, cap. vi.

(48) Petrus Muscardus (de quo vide Deckherum de Scriptore Adepto, pag. 397, Edit. 1686) Hist. Deor. fatidicorum, pag. 87.

(49) Some render it seven ages.

(50) See Munckerus, in Hygia, pag. 128.

first makes Tiresias die in his flight without falling into the power of his enemies: the second, on the contrary, depending on the Grecian histories, says (46), that those of Argos having taken the city of Thebes, were carrying Tiresias with the rest of their booty, to the temple of Delphi, but that he died in the way, by drinking of the fountain of Tilphusa. Diodorus Siculus (47) relates the fact in the same manner as Strabo. An author (48), whose memory I honour, saith, that Tiresias, in his latter days, retired to the mountain called Tilphosia, to end his life in repose, and remote from the tumults of the city. He does not cite any authority; but I make no doubt he had met with it in some celebrated writer. We must, however, say, that this retreat of Tiresias was not at all voluntary.

[I] He lived very long.] Hyginus, Phlegon, and Lutatius, agree in saying that Jupiter repaid Tiresias's loss of sight, by granting him, together with the knowledge of futurity, a life seven times as long as that of others septem aetates (49). Agatharides mentions but five ages; Lucian six: but, according to Tzetzes, some have made Tiresias eleven times the age of Man (50).

[K] This he exercised very imperiously.] Seneca makes him use menacing words.

Carmenque magicum volvit, & rabido MINAX
Decantat ore, quicquid aut placat leves,
Aut cogit umbras (51).

His furious voice the Magic charm repeats,
While trembling ghosts obey his awful threats.

Statius introduces him armed with threats and reproaches.

Atque hic Tiresias nondum adventantibus umbris
Testor ait, Divos quibus hunc sacravimus ignem, Jam nequeo tolerare moram. Cassusne sacerdos Audior, an rabido jubeat si Theffalia cantu
Ibitis, & Scythicis quoties armata venenis Colchis aget, trepido pallebunt tartara motu?
Nostris cura minor?

Ne teneas annos nubemque hanc frontis opacæ
Spernite ne, moneo, & nobis favere facultas,
Scimus enim & quidquid dici noscique timetis (52).

And here Tiresias, while the ghosts delay'd,
Ye gods whose sacred fires now blaze, he said,
I cannot bear this loit'ring. Do I stem
An unskill'd Priest? or at the witch's scream,
Must you obey, while her Theffalian charms,
And Colchic poisonous drugs all Hell alarms?
And shall you fear me less?

You had not best, I friendly now advise,
My weaker years, and perish'd sights despise;
I too can make you tremble when I will,
And fly obsequious to my Magic skill.

(53) Pharfal. lib. vi, ver. 732, & seq.

See in Lucan (53) a long train of threats uttered by the Theffalian witch against the infernal gods. This rite was very common in the magical rites. A Pagan Philosopher ridicules them with a great deal of reason.

VOL. V. No. CXXIX.

Πολλὸν δὲ τέτων ἀλογώτερον, τὸ μὴ δαίμονι, εἰ τύχοι, ἢ ψυχῇ τεθνηκότι, αὐτὸν δὲ τῷ βασιλεῖ ἡλίου, ἢ Σελήνῃ, ἢ τινι, τῶν κατ' ἔργον ἀνθρώπων τῶν τυγχόντι ὑποχρίεσθαι, ἀπειλὰς περσφύροντα ἐκφοβεῖν, ψευδόμενον ἢ ἐκείνοι ἀληθεύουσι. Quodque omnium absurdissimum est, non jam vulgari cuiquam Dæmoni, aut defuncti animæ, sed ipsimet Soli syderum principi, Lunæ, reliquique Diis cœlestibus, homo cuius e Populi fœce obnoxius minas intonat, atque ut eos ad vera dicenda compellat, falsum vanumque terrorem ostendit (54). -- But what is most absurd in all this is, that not only a common dæmon, suppose, or a departed spirit, but even the majesty of the sun, or the moon, or some other of the celestial gods shall be frightened with threats by any vulgar wretch, and by false terrors compelled to speak truth. This puts me in mind of our popular stories concerning Magic: I do not mean the most common sort of stories, but those which seem to be eminent above the rest. It is pretended that there are some Magicians who exercise a sort of command even to compulsion, over those spirits which they raise up. As absurd as this may seem, it may be thought possible, if we should once allow that certain covenants or treaties are entered into betwixt men and evil angels: for there being doubtless a subordination amongst these spirits, there may be some dæmons who reign absolute over several others; cannot one of these superior dæmons promise his Magicians that he will subject to them all the spirits under his command? Cannot he promise them to threaten those with his displeasure who should prove ungovernable? Thuanus, who was present at a dialogue betwixt the Sieur de Calignon and a famous Magician, relates that the Magician did not deny his commerce with dæmons, but affirmed that his Magic tended only to the doing good to mankind, and that there was a very great difference between Sorcerers and Magicians. A Magician, said he, has no correspondence with any other than the aerial and celestial spirits, who are good and beneficent, and teach him a thousand very profitable secrets, and besides he commands those spirits. But a Sorcerer is a vile slave to terrestrial spirits naturally malignant and enemies to mankind. He added that there were schools of Magic in Spain, and that there had been also very flourishing ones in Germany, which were most of them dispersed since Luther had divulged his Heresies. 'Tam preclaræ artis scholas toto terrarum orbe ac professores sparsos, & adhuc in Hispania Toleti, Cordubæ, Granatæ, aliisque focis frequentari, fuisse olim & in Germania celeberrimas, sed magna ex parte defecisse, postquam Lutherus seminato hæresis suæ fermento, tot sectatores habere cepit (55). -- That there are schools of so famous an art, and professors dispersed over the whole earth, and still frequented in Spain, at Toledo, Corduba, Granada, and other places, as there were also some very much celebrated in former times in Germany, but are now most of them deserted, since Luther, by spreading the leaven, of his Heresy began to draw after him so many followers.' He did not confess to his judges all that he owned to the Sieur Calignon; but this did not prevent the Parliament of Paris condemning him to death upon the evidence produced against him. The thing is in my opinion remarkable enough to deserve being laid before my readers in Thuanus's own words (56): 'Magiam quam profitebatur Bellomontius, dæmonum, qui numinis divini particula sunt, cum hominibus conciliatricem artem præclaram esse ad beneficium inventam non ad maleficium, quo Sortarii qui vocantur vulgo utuntur, ipsi malorum spirituum vilia mancipia in contracts with gods

(54) Porphyrius, apud Eusebium, Præparat. Evangel. lib. v, cap. x, pag. 198, A.

(55) Thuanus, ubi infra, pag. 1234. See the remark [H], of the article PONTIUS.

(56) Thuanus, de Vita sua, lib. vi, pag. 1233, 1234.

(q) Auspica avium Tiresias Thebanus (invenit.) Plinius,
lib. vii, cap. 56.
pag. 102.

He was the inventor of Auspices (q). He was worshipped as a god at Orchomenus; his oracle was famous there for several ages, but silenced at last after a plague had rendered that city desolate (r). Perhaps all the directors of the oracle perished by the contagion: or perhaps they believed that a god who suffered the inhabitants of Orchomenus to be destroyed by the plague, was not capable of predicting future events. I take no notice of supernatural reasons.

(r) Plut. de Or-
cul. defectu,
pag. 434.

magic-poor!

(57) Id. ibid.

craftam ignorantiam demerfi, & veneno ac diris fascinationibus eorum arbitrio perniciem humano generi machinantes, cum contra magi ipsi dæmonibus imperant, & eorum confortio ac familiaritate arcana naturæ vulgo ignota nec libris prodita cognoscere, futura rimari, mala declinare, pericula antevertere, amissa recuperare, corpora ceterius quam humana ratione fieri possit, de loco in locum transferre, diffidentis componere, patres cum filiis, uxores cum maritis, & amicitiam cum iis quibus debet conciliare discant, denique sibi rem cum aeris spiritibus & celo participantibus esse, qui natura benefici nihil nisi juvare sciunt, cum terrestres & subterranea incolentes, qui Sortiariis imperant, sint maligni & nocere tantum noverint: tam præclaræ artis scholas, &c (57). - - - Beaumont pretended that the Magic he professed was the art of maintaining a commerce between spirits: (who are a particle of the Deity) and men, invented for good and not for mischief, which last is the end proposed by those called Sorcerers, themselves being the vile drudges of evil spirits, and plunged into the most gross ignorance, and with poison and dreadful enchantments by their direction contriving destruction to mankind; when, on the contrary, Magicians command the spirits themselves, and by their commerce and acquaintance are able to find out the secrets of nature which are unknown to the vulgar, and not to be met with in books, to foresee futurities, to shun evils, to prevent dangers, to recover losses, to transport the body from place to place quicker than is possible by human means, to pacify enemies, to reconcile fathers with their children, husbands with their wives, and re-establish friendship where necessary; lastly, that these have only to do with aerial spirits, and such as partake of Heaven, who being naturally beneficent, know only how to do good, while the terrestrial and subterranean ones, who have the Sorcerers under subjection, are malignant, and know only how to do mischief: that there were schools of so famous an art, &c. See the remainder of this passage in citation (55) of this article. Let us conclude with Cicero's words, who informs us that Tiresias was none of those vulgar Diviners who make a trade of their impostures, and exercise them only for bread. Ante hos Amphiaræus & Tiresias non humiles & obscuri, neque eorum similes, ut apud Ennium est, qui sui questus causa fidas suscitant sententias, sed clari & præstantes viri qui avibus & fignis admoniti futura dicebant, quorum de altero etiam apud inferos Homerus ait solum sapere, cæteros umbrarum modo vagari (58). - - - Before these (58) Cicero, lib.

were Amphiaræus and Tiresias not mean and obscure, de Divinat.
nor like those mentioned by Ennius, who returned fore- fol. m. 310, C.
ed answers for gain, but famous and eminent men, who by the help of birds and signs foretold things future, of one of whom even in Hell Homer says he was the only wise ghost, that the others only wandered about like shades.

TISSANDIER (N). Author of a book no otherwise known to me than by a letter of Balzac. He died very old in the year 1628 [A]. La Croix du Maine does not mention him, and I do not think Du Verdier Vau-Privas, has taken any more notice of him [B].

(1) It is the 18th of the eighth book in the folio edition.

[A] He died very old in the year 1628.] See the letter written the same year by Balzac to one Mr Tiffandier (1). He comforts him on the death of his uncle, who was as old as the Heresy and older than the League; for he had published a book to forewarn France of the conception of this monster, when the Cardinal de Lorraine conceived it. I need not tell you these are Balzac's expressions.

[B] And I do not think Du Verdier Vau-Privas has taken any more notice of him.] I express myself in this manner, because I had not time to examine page by page whether Tiffandier were to be met with in this writer's Bibliothèque Française. The authors are there ranged according to their Christian names, and without subjoining a table of surnames. These are two inexcusable faults when they meet together. The first is supportable when it is alone, as it is in La Croix du Maine; but not to repair this by a table of surnames is only mocking the world.

(a) Cicero in Bruto, pag. m.
280.

TITIUS (CAIUS) a Latin Poet and Orator, was a Roman knight. He carried Eloquence as far as it was possible for one who did not understand Greek [A]. His orations were composed with subtilties, examples, and politeness, so that they seemed to be composed in the Attic style. This subtilty of thought did not succeed on the stage, when he employed it in his tragedies, as he had done in his pleadings. It was not lofty enough to support the gravity of the tragic character (a). When the Consul Fannius proposed his law against luxurious feasting, Titius harangued the people to represent the utility of that law. We shall see in the remarks whether this fact will serve to discover the time when the Lex Fannia was made [B]. The oration made by Titius at that time demonstrates

(1) Cicero in Bruto, pag. m.
280.

[A] He carried Eloquence as far as it was possible for one who did not understand Greek.] Cicero, the best judge in the world, gives him this character. 'Ejusdem fere temporis fuit eques Romanus C. Titius: qui meo judicio eo pervenisse videtur, quod potuit fere Latinus orator sine Græcis literis, & sine multo usu pervenire. Hujus orationes tantum argutiarum, tantum exemplorum, tantum urbanitatis habent, ut pene Attico stylo scriptæ esse videantur. Easdem argutias in tragediis satis ille quidem acute, sed parum tragice transtulit (1). - - - About the same time flourished C. Titius a Roman knight: who in my judgment seems to have arrived to as great a height as it is possible for a Latin Orator to reach, without a knowledge of the Greek tongue, and great experience. His Orations were so full of subtilties, examples, and politeness, that they seemed to be written in the Attic style. He introduced the same subtilties into tragedies, with ingenuity enough, but very little becoming tragic compositions.'

[B] The time when the Lex Fannia was made.] I have in another place (2) examined Glandorp's opinion and found it ill grounded. This author believed (3), that he who proposed this law was not Caius Fannius the father, Consul in the year of Rome 592, but Caius Fannius the son, Consul in the year of Rome 632. For this he offers but one proof taken from a passage of Aulus Gellius, which is of no force. He might have alledged something more specious, if he had quoted Macrobius, who acquaints us that Titius contemporary with Lucilius advised the people to establish the Lex Fannia (4). It is certain that Lucilius was born in the beginning of the VIIth century of Rome: this agrees wonderfully with Glandorp's hypothesis;

(2) In the second article FANNI-
US, remark [B].
(3) Onomastic.
pag. 333.

(4) Id offendunt
tum multi alii,
tum etiam C.
Titius, vir æti-tis Lucilianæ, in oratione qua
legem Fanniam suasit. Macrobius, lib. ii,
cap. xii.

strates that drunkenness was arrived at its highest pitch [C]. The mistake of an interpreter of Horace [D], is inopportune: he has confounded our Titius with a TITIVS who pothesis; for according to that Lucilius was about thirty years old, when the Lex Fannia was made. Consequently the Orator who advised this law must be Lucilius's cotemporary. But if you place the passing of that law in the year 593, this Orator and Lucilius could not be cotemporaries; for the former must have been an old man when the other was but just a youth, and consequently Macrobius furnishes a very plausible proof for Glandorp. This may be strengthened by these words of Cicero, 'Ejusdem fere temporis fuit Eques Romanus C. Titius; --- About the same time flourished Caius Titius a Roman knight.' For he had just spoke of three or four Orators who flourished towards the year of Rome 660. Titius must have lived very near their time, if he recommended the Lex Fannia in the year 632. But there must have been a great distance of time between him and them, if this law was passed in 593. Notwithstanding all these reasons I persist in my opinion declared in the articles

(c) Plin. lib. x, cap. 4.

FANNIUS. That passage in Pliny (5) which points out the precise interval of eleven years betwixt the Lex Fannia and the third Punic war, is more valid than ten citations, where it is only said in general, ejusdem ætatis, ejusdem fere temporis. These loose expressions, be lived almost cotemporary with another, or in the same age with another, will admit of some latitude, may be lengthened or shortened, and favour of a man who does not pretend to be very nice in his Chronology, and who speaks only according to the confused ideas of his memory. But when an author makes use of a determinate number, when he names exactly eleven years; it is a sign that he took pains, that he searched farther into the matter, and consequently Pliny's testimony is here of very great weight to fix the Lex Fannia in the year 593, since the year 604 was the first year of the third Punic war. If these reasons are not admitted, what shall we say, when we consider that according to Macrobius the Lex Fannia was enacted in the year 588, and nevertheless he advances that Titius and Lucilius lived at the same time, or in the same century (6)? I argue thus; either Macrobius was perfectly well acquainted with the age of Lucilius, or he was not: In the first case, we shall be obliged to conclude according to him, that an Orator who recommended a law in 588, and a Poet born twelve years after, lived at the same time, and so his words do not at all confirm Glandorp's opinion: In the second case they confirm it yet less; for no Chronological proofs can be drawn from a man, who speaks at random and without pretending to exactness. As for Cero's ejusdem fere temporis, it is a phrase which does not hinder us from believing that Titius made his harangue in the year 593. Observe that Afranius imitated Titius (7). I do not offer this as a necessary and demonstrative proof that he was younger, but only as a sign that he was so. Now Afranius was cotemporary with Terence (8), who died in the year 594 (9). Thus Cicero has here furnished us with a strong proof against Glandorp. Let us therefore say that our Titius flourished about the year of Rome 590.

(7) Quem studet imitari L. Afranius poeta, homo perargutus in fabulis quidem etiam, ut scitis, disertus. Cicero, in Bruto, pag. 230.

(8) Dulces Latini leporis facie per Cæciliam, Terentiumque, & Afranium, sub piri ætate nituerunt. Patruclus, lib. 1, cap. xxviii.

(9) Sueton. in Vita Terentii.

[C] That drunkenness was then at its highest pitch. The Judges drank so much wine before they went to the bench, that they were necessitated to piss plentifully in every corner. After having heard the state of the case, they caused the witnesses to be called, and in the mean time went to the chamber-pot: being returned they gathered the votes; and could scarce refrain from sleeping. Going to council they used to say, why should we torment ourselves with these fools, let us rather take a bottle and get some tid-bit to eat. Those who understand Latin will be much better pleased with Titius's own words, than with the abridgement I have given of them. 'Ludunt alea, studiose unguentis delibuti, scortis stipati, ubi horæ decem sunt; jubent puerum vocari ut comitum eat per cunctatum quid in foro gestum sit, qui suaserint, qui dissuaserint, quot tribus iusserint, quot veterint. Inde ad comitum vadunt, ne litem suam faciant: dum eunt, nulla est in angiporro amphora, quam non impleant, quippe qui vesicam plenam vini habeant. Veniunt in comitum tristes, jubent dicere, quorum negotium est, dicunt: judex testes poscit: ipse ita minatum: ubi redit, ait se omnia audivisse, tabulas poscit, literas inspicit. vix præ vino sustinet palpebras. eunti in consilium ibi hæc oratio: Quid mihi negotii est cum istis nugacibus: quam potius potamus mulsam mixtum vino Græco, edimus tum pinguem, bonumque piscem lupum germanum, qui inter duos pontes captus fuit (10)? --- They play at dice, being perfumed with fine ointments, and attended by their whores, when the tenth hour is come; they send a man to the court, to inquire what has been voted in the Forum, who spoke for and who against, how many tribes gave their affirmative, and how many their negative. From thence they proceed to court, for fear they should have some accusation against themselves; as they go along, there is never a pissing-place in the whole street, which they do not fill, their bladders being charged with liquor. They come into court in ill humour, order the parties to proceed. The case is stated. The Judge calls for the witnesses: he himself goes out to piss: when he returns, he declares he has heard the whole, he demands the tables, looks into the writings, scarce can keep his eyes open, going to counsel there makes this speech; Why should one trouble himself with these triflers; how much better is it for us to sit down to some Muscadell and Greek wine, to eat a fine fat Thrush, or a delicate Sturgeon, caught between two bridges? Macrobius who hath preserved this curious fragment of this Oration of Titius, had cited another passage of the same in chapter IX, for we ought not to doubt that Cincius in suasione legis Fanniae, in chapter IX, is a mistake of the transcribers, who by degrees changed Titius into Cincius. This other passage informs us, that they used at Rome to cook several other animals together in a Hog's-belly, and that they called this a Trojan hog, in allusion to the Trojan horse which was filled with soldiers (11). These excesses wanted to be suppressed; Luxury was then become so enormous, that several children of good families prostituted and sold themselves in order to gratify their palate with delicious meats: drunkenness was become so common, that the citizens went drunk to the assemblies, where the public affairs were debated. This is what we are informed of by Sammonicus Serenus. 'Lex Fannia sanctissimi Augusti, ingenti omnium ordinum consensu pervenit ad populum. Neque eam prætores aut tribuni, ut pleræque alias, seil ex omni bonorum consilio & sententia ipsi consules perulerunt, cum republica ex luxuria convivorum majora quam credi potest, detrimenta pateretur. Si quidem eo res redierat, ut gula illecebre plerique ingenui pueri pudicitiam & libertatem suam vendiderent; plerique ex plebe Romana vino madidi in comitum venirent, & ebrii de republicæ salute consulerent (12). --- The Lex Fannia proposed under the most sacred Emperor Augustus, was given to the people with the universal consent of all orders. Nor did the Prætors or Tribunes carry it through, as they usually do most others, but the consuls themselves by the general advice and concurrence; since the common-wealth received more damage than can be imagined, from the luxury of entertainments. For the thing was come to such a pass, that to gratify their palate, a great many sons of considerable families sold both their chastity and liberty; crowds of the Plebeians came drunk to the assemblies, and in that condition gave their opinions concerning the safety of the republic.' The succeeding ages which have seen at Rome the most horrid vices, have not seen drunkenness to reign there: at present it is a vice not known in that country; but as for the ancient Romans, they lived like our true northern nations. See the drunkenness of the deputies of a synod in the remark [A] of the article BERENGARIUS. For the rest, I am surprized that Corradus, who was so consummate in the History of particular persons, knew our Titius only by this passage of Cicero: he was ignorant of those of Macrobius. 'C. Titius, says he in page 282 of his commentary on Cicero's Bruto, de quo scriptum nihil nos præterea vidimus. --- Caius Titius, of whom we have never met with any farther account.'

(10) Apud Macrobius, lib. ii, Saturnal. cap. xii, pag. m. 366.

(11) In suasione legis Fanniae obicit Cincio suo quod percum Trojanum mensis interant: quem illi ideo sic vocabant, quasi aliis inclusis animalibus gravidum, ut ille Trojanus equus gravidus armatus fuit. Macrobius, ibid. cap. ix, pag. 356.

(12) Sammonicus Serenus, apud Macrobius, Saturnal. cap. xiii, pag. 367.

[D] The mistake of an interpreter of Horace. It is Corradus who takes notice of this blunder without telling us whole it is. 'Unde videtur interpres Horatii who lived in the time of Augustus.

* rati deceptus, qui putavit eundem Titium fuisse
* pindarici fontis qui non expalluit haustus, & eum
* qui scripsit tragedias, quum hic multo ante florue-
* rit, & ille tempore Augusti vixerit: quamquam ille
* potuit etiam utrumque præstare. - - - From whence * Horace's Commentator seems to be mistaken, who thought * that Titius who was not afraid to take a draught of
* the Pindaric fountain, was one and the same with him
* who wrote Tragedies, since the latter lived long before,
* but the former in Augustus's time: altho' he himself * was able to excel them both. Corradus seems to doubt whether Horace's Titius was at the same time a composer of Odes and Tragedies, though there does not appear much foundation for doubt, when we read these six verses of the third epistle of the first book of Horace:

Quid Titius Romana brevi venturus in ora?
Pindarici fontis qui non expalluit haustus,
Fastidire lacus, & rivos ausus apertos.
Ut valet? ut meminit nostri? fidibus latinis
Thebanos aptare modos studet auspice musa?
An tragica defævit & ampullatur in arte?

And what doth Titius, he of growing fame,
Who doth not fear to drink of Pindar's stream?
Who scorns known springs and lakes, that glorious he,
And is he well, and doth he think of me?

Doth he the Muse propitious nobly sing,
And fit to Roman harps the Theban string?
Or is he writing plays and treads the stage,
In murr'ring verse, and fowells with tragic rage?

CREECH.

The ancient scholiast on Horace assures us that he here means Titius Septimius, who had written both Lyric verses and tragedies, and whose tomb was to be seen below Aricia. Mr Dacier, after several others, pretends that this Titius was the same Septimius, to whom Horace addressed the sixth Ode of his second book, and for whom he wrote the ninth epistle of his first book. This may be; but since he gives no reason for it, and two reasons seem to oppose this opinion, I shall remain a Sceptic on this subject. The sixth Ode of the second book contains twenty-four verses, not one word of which insinuates, that Septimius was a Poet; whereas all that concerns Titius in the third epistle of the first book relates to him as a Poet only. This is my first reason. The second is, that Titius, in Horace's third epistle, is one of the wits who accompanied Tiberius, and composed a society of learned men in his court: whereas in the ninth epistle, Septimius is one who desires Horace to introduce him to Tiberius. I can say nothing in particular against another notion of Mr Dacier: he would have Horace's Septimius, and the Septimius who so ardently loved Acme in the forty-sixth epigram of Catullus, to be the same person (13).

(13) Dacier, upon the sixth Ode of the second book of Horace.

TORELLI (POMPONIO) Count of Montechiarugolo, lived in the XVIth century. He was son of a daughter of John Francis Picus, Count of Mirandola, and a member of the academy of the Innomati at Parma, and had there the epithet of il Perduto (a). He wrote a book intituled Trattato del Debito del Cavalliero, a Treatise on the Duty of a Knight, in which he gives very useful instructions to those who have already attained the honour of knighthood. He chose this subject, because he had a son who was a Knight of Malta. He lost him while his book was in the press, as he informs us in the Epistle Dedicatory, dated at Parma the 15th of February 1596. He was vassal to the Duke of Parma Ranuccio Farnese, to whom he dedicated his treatise. He frequently cites the Poets both antient and modern, and always in Italian verse. His morality is good, and he enters into so particular a detail, that he gives even (b) rules concerning what the Italians call motteggiare (c). He is so zealous for his religion, that he cannot acknowledge him for a true knight, who is out of the Popish communion (d), and insists upon a knight's abandoning the service of his prince who is excommunicated by the Pope (e). He is of opinion that a Heretic is almost always guilty of some enormous crime, and he cites thereupon Pius V [A]. The difference which he puts between the antient and modern Poets requires some limitation [B].

(a) Pomponio Torelli, del Debito del Cavalliero, folio 143, edition of Venice, 1596, in 8vo.

(b) Id. ibid. folio 128, verso.

(c) That is, witty sayings.

(d) Ibid. fol. 25.

(e) Id. ibid.

[A] He is of opinion that a Heretic is almost always guilty of some enormous crime, and he cites thereupon Pius V.] There are some persecutors who do not carry their prejudices to so high a degree of injustice: for they acknowledge that there are some Arch-Heretics whose morals have been unexceptionable. Our Torelli is more rigid. Gli Heretici, says he, (1) Cavallieri esse non ponno in the printed copy to the words Gli idolatri exclusively. Solea dire Pio V. di santissima in the printed copy to the word (2) Ma exclusively.

(1) Torelli, del Debito del Cavalliero, fol. 21, verso.

(2) Id. ibid. folio 25.

[B] The difference which he puts between the antient and modern Poets requires some limitation.] Our Poetry, says he, is more modest than either the Greek or the Latin; our Poets who write love-verses imitate Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid, only in such things as are exempt from lasciviousness and obscenity. Nella Lirica (poesia) è Italiana, è Francese, è Spagnuola si vede, che molto in the printed copy to the words (3) Non vollero gli esclusi. As for Porta whom he reckons among the Poets who avoid obscenities, he is however very much decried on that account (4); but this is not my principal observation; I have a much more considerable thing to object. There were in the XVIth century, and even in the XVIIth, several famous Poets who wrote as wantonly as the antients (5); and consequently Torelli's proposition ought not to be understood without some limitations.

(3) Torelli, fol. 155, verso.

(4) See this article remark

(5) See the remark [D], of the article MOLSA, and the explanation concerning obscenities, num. ii. iii.

(a) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 124.

(b) See La Caille, at page 76, of the Histoire de l'Imprimerie.

(c) La Croix du Maine, ubi supra.

TORI or THORI (JEFFERY) The King's Printer, and sworn Book-seller to the University of Paris (a) in the XVIth century, was of Bourges. He contributed greatly to the bringing the printing types to perfection (b); for he wrote a book intituled, Le Champ Fleury, contenant l'Art & Science de la proportion des lettres Antiques, ou Antiques, & vulgairement appellées lettres Romaines, proportionnées selon le corps & visage humain (c). The flowery field, containing the Art and Science of the proportion of Attic or antique letters, commonly called the Roman letters, according to the human body and face. He himself printed it at Paris in the year 1592 in 4to, and afterwards in 8vo (d). Claudius Garamont, who made punchions and prepared the moulds for the Roman capitals (e) was his disciple (f). We

(d) Id. ibid. Hist. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 445, off. firmes that the book was printed by Gien Garamont, in the year 1592, in fol. (e) La Caille, Hist. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 76. (f) Id. pag. 99.

We shall see below the titles of the other works of Jeffery Tori [A]. He had been school-master in the College of Bourgogne at Paris (g), and had taught Philosophy with applause (b). He died in the year 1550 (i). Some called him the master of the broken pot, which was the sign of his house (k). Others say that his mark was a broken pot filled with all sorts of instruments, and that he added this motto round it, Non plus (l). Francis I. gave him a licence to print the Horæ, or Primer, in consideration of the ornaments and flourishes which he made use of (m).

(g) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç. pag. 124.

(b) La Caille, Hist. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 100.

(i) Id. pag. 99.

(k) La Croix du Maine, ubi supra.

(l) La Caille, ubi supra, pag. 98.

(m) Ibid. Note, that the Sieur la Caille says that this licence is dated on the 28th of September 1544. This cannot be true, since Francis I died in the year 1547.

(1) According to Du Verdier Vau Privas, it was at Paris, in 8vo, in the year 1530.

(2) Taken from La Croix du Maine, pag. 125.

(3) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 445.

[A] The titles of the other works of Jeffery Tori. He translated into French the Hieroglyphics of Orus Apollo: Plutarch's Morals, printed at Lyons (1) by William Bowle: the Table of Cebes, and Thirty Dialogues of Lucian, printed at Paris by John Petit in the year 1529: John Baptist Egnatius's Summary of Chronicles, printed at Paris by himself, in the year 1529 (2), and by Charles l'Angelier in the year 1543 in 8vo (3). 'He procured an edition of Antoninus's Itinerary, in red and black, by HENRY STE-

*PHENS in 1512, with a Preface and Advertifement of his own. . . . He is also the Author of a book intitled, Ædiloquium, seu Digesta (4) partibus ædium urbanarum & rusticarum suis quæque locis adscribenda. Allo Epitaphia septem de Amorum aliquot passionibus, printed by SIMON COLINÆUS in 8vo, in 1530 (5). Mr Catherinot observes that there was printed in 1530, Distiques Latins de Geoffroy Tori de Bourges, sur les Maisons de Ville & de Campagne avec plusieurs Tombeaux en vieux Latin (6).*

(4) It should be of his own.

(5) La Caille, Hist. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 98.

(6) Catherinot, Annales Typographiques de Bourges, pag. 3.

TORQUATO (ANTONY) a famous Astrologer of the XVth century, was born at Ferrara. He gave Matthias King of Hungary a prediction in the year 1480, which was very fatal to Christendom; for he threatened with an entire ruin the Ottoman empire after a fixed time, which caused the Hungarians to engage in a war (a) that ruined them (b). Some of the events he had foretold proved true; but the principal proved chimerical [A]. This hath not disgusted people against uttering or believing such prognostics. They have been so often reiterated, that I forgive an Italian Politician for believing that the Turks suborned this sort of people to publish these predictions [B] in order to lull the Christians asleep. However, I believe that these Infidels did not bethink themselves

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) See Leunclavius, in Historiæ Mulsanæ Appendice.

[A] The principal proved chimerical. The substance of this prediction was: The Turks shall make war upon the Christians, and lose great numbers of their troops (1). They will first attack the Venetians, and do them great mischief: After which they will make peace with that republic, and take Belgrade, and Rhodes, and lay Hungary waste. At last making many threats, lacking Hungary, and attacking the Roman empire, they will fall under the power of the Hungarians, about the year 1594, or 1595. But before this they will enter into Apulia, they will disturb and afflict Sicily, Italy, the coasts of France and Spain. Soon after which their emperor shall be killed in a battle; their monarchy shall be destroyed under the 13th or 14th of their chiefs; they shall not exceed that number, nor the year 1596. The Christians shall then become masters of that vast empire (2). Read the reflexion made on this by a Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris. 'Non est vel

(1) Turci magna strage suorum in Christianos arma movebunt. See Filescus, de Idolatriâ magica, fol. 33, verso.

(2) See Filescus, ibid. & fol. 34, ex Leunclavius in Historiæ Mulsanæ Appendice, pag. Epistolæ.

(3) Filescus, ibid. fol. 34.

'hujus loci, vel mei otii Historias retexere, quibus multa quæ hic exprimentur, evenisse intelligamus, fati sit expendisse corollarium hujus prædictionis quàm varium sit, quàm falsum, quàm ridiculum, de Imperio Turcico funditus everto, ad annum Christi 1596, cum hoc anno 1608, tam florens & potens, magno quidem Christiani nominis malo, cernamus, quàm antea extiterit, nec ulla parte, aut hiare, aut nutare, aut inclinare, tanti Imperii moles perspicatur: nec in quarto decimo Imperatore Osmanida seriem Sultanorum & Principum suorum defecisse videamus, cum Sultanus Muhamet Cham, tertius hujus nominis, sit decimus quintus Osmanidarum Principum, à primò illo Osmano Sultano. Magnò certè constitit Hungaris hæc prædictio, cui cum stolidè inniterentur, motumque maximum sub Sultano Soleimanno in Hungaria excitassent, ab eo magna clade affecti, suæ credulitatis vesanz poenas non minimas dederunt, quemadmodum narrat Leunclavius histor. Mulsanæ lib. 18. (3). . . . This is not a proper place, nor have I leisure to recollect passages of History, by which it might appear that many things came to pass which are expressed in this prediction: Let it suffice to examine the corollary of it, and observe how various, how false and ridiculous it is, that the Turkish empire should be utterly destroyed about the year 1596: Whereas in this present year 1608, we behold it as flourishing and potent as ever, to the great detriment of the Christian name: Nor is there any part of that vast empire which seems to be either in a disjointed, or tottering, or declining condition; and we see the series of their sultans and princes continued down without failing

'in the fourteenth emperor descended from Osman: The Sultan Mahomet Cham, the third of that name, being the fifteenth prince descended from the first Sultan Osman. This prediction cost the Hungarians very dear; for having foolishly relied upon it, and raised a great commotion in Hungary under the Sultan Soliman, they were overthrown by him, and severely chastised for their mad credulity; as Leunclavius relates in his History of the Turks.

[B] I forgive an Italian Politician, for believing that the Turks suborned some people to publish these predictions. What this Italian Politician saith on this head seems to me worth copying. But we ought to remember that when this was written, the Turks were more potent than they have been since the siege of Vienna, in the year 1683. 'Molte predizioni d'Astrologi, oltre à molte profetie, secondo, che si dice, vi sono, & se ne leggono ogni dì, con le quali vien minacciata la, distruzione del Regno, & Imperio Turcheco, & ogni tanti anni pare, che si vadano rinnovando cotali credenze, senza vederene l'effetto. Hora io m'auviso, che non darebbe molto lontano dal segno, uno, che dicesse ciò esser' intentione de' medesimi Turchi, o di qualche Cristiano rinnegato; per addormentar gli animi de' Principi Christiani, con questo sonnifero, & rendergli negligenti, à pensar d'offendergli, con la speranza di dover veder, che il tempo debba esser quello, che trionfi di così fatto nemico: & non è dubbio, che Principi Cattolici, ricercati à colligarli contro il Turco, hanno dato per risposta, che egli era meglio star à veder quel che partorirebbe il tempo, parendo impossibile, che signoria così violenta, debba esser di lunga durata. Et per non parere di dire cose del tutto à vento, certo è, che per accelerar la morte di qualche Imperadore Romano, si serviva alcuno di sparger voci, che le stelle promettevano il principato à tal' uno, che essi conoscevano atto à dover, con sì fatto pretesto, insurgere contro al dominante, & accelerar' à se stessi la successione, con l'accelerazione della morte di lui. Onde al contrario potrebbe pur essere, che tra Turchi per diuturnar' il loro Imperio, si diffamassero queste decerie, della sua piccola durata, per indurre altri ad aspettar, che illo pronostico si verificasse, senza venir' all' atto d'offenderlo, armata mano; Il che farebbe un fottile, ma non impossibile stratagemma (4). . . . We daily read many predictions of Astrologers and many prophecies, which threaten the destruction of the Turkish empire: and we see these prophecies and predictions renewed from year to year, without ever being accomplished. Now I think that a

(4) Bonifazio Vannozzi, della suppellettile degli Avvertimenti Politici, Volume primo, pag. 97. man would not be far from the truth, who should say Bologna, 1609. that themselves of this stratagem. There would be no great craft in it, for nothing more animates men to arm against a monarch, than a belief that it is written in the destinies that he shall be very soon destroyed.

TORQUATO. TORTELLIUS. TOUCHET.

that they were intended by the Turks themselves, or by some Christian renegade, as a soporific, to lay asleep the minds of Christian princes, and make them remiss in attacking the Turks, in hopes that at the time predicted they should triumph over such an enemy. There is no question but that the Catholic princes being required to enter into a league against the Turks, have answered, that it was better to wait for what time should bring forth, it appearing impossible that so unnatural a government could be of long continuance. And that I may not be thought to speak at random, this is certain, that in order to hasten the death of a Roman Emperor, a certain person set about a report that the stars promised the empire to such a one, who was ready under such a pretence to raise insurrections against the emperor and hasten the succession to himself, by hastening the emperor's death. Thus, on the contrary, it might be true, that the Turks to perpetuate their empire, spread about these surmises concerning the short continuance of it, in order to induce the Christians to wait for the accomplishment of that prognostic, and not to attack them with an armed force. This would be a subtle, but not an impossible stratagem.* This may serve as a supplement to the remark [GG] of the article MAHOMET. I daily discover fresh matter to enlarge it, as it generally consists of gross errors. Here is an instance of it. A Father of the Oratory relates, that on certain days of the year, the Turks solemnly curse the Christians. They read in their mosques a prophecy of the destruction of the Ottoman empire by the Franks, after it has continued ten ages (5). During the reading of this prophecy the women cry dismally, and sweep the altars with their dishevelled hair. They imagine that this ceremony will avert the impending fate with which they are threatened. This Father of the Oratory doth not affirm this of his own knowledge, but on the credit of one of his friends. Vias Massiliensis Poeta (6) mibi creditur valde bonus, says he (6), mibi olim cum Massiliæ Rhetoricæ professor multum familiaris, in suis ad Sylvas (7) notis, morem refert Turcarum cum illi Christianos, quos perdite oderunt, ultrò statim diebus deestantur. Habent, inquit ille, Turcæ inter suos fastos prophetiam, per id tantum tempus, M. scilicet annos, Ottomanorum permanurum, mox subvertendum à Francis. Legitur illa quotannis suis in Mosquetis, ut illius omnis terrore ultrò Christianis adversentur. Lugent invicem ululantes feminæ, sparsisque comis infanda verrunt altaria: sicque huic malo fato procurare credunt, dum tam funesto vaticinio perterrentur.

(5) This prediction does not concern the Turkish empire, but the Mahomedan religion. If it concerned the Turks, they would be a little too hasty; their monarchy would be very far from its destruction.

(6) Petrus Bartholæus, Libro singulari de Ars. cap. xv, pag. 181, 182, Edit. Nemesii, 1636.

(7) They are Statius's Silvæ, upon which Vias, a Poet of Provence, praised by Gellius, in Vita Persii, made loose notes.

TORTELLIUS (JOHN). See ARETIN (JOHN).

TOUCHET (MARY), mistress to Charles IX, King of France, was a native of Orleans. What is affirmed by so many authors is not true; viz. That she was an Apothecary's daughter [A]. Charles IX had children by her (a), and afterwards she was married to a person of quality. I believe she was not married to him till after the death of that monarch [B]. She had two daughters lawfully begotten, who followed her example; one was concubine to Henry IV, and the other to the Marshal de Bassompierre

(a) See the remark [F].

[A] It is not true that she was an Apothecary's daughter. She is obliged to Brantome for this origin, whom I shall cite below. Papyrius Masso seems to make her of a meaner descent, for one would think by what he says, that she was a Perfumer's daughter (1), Amavit Mariam Touchetiam Aurelianensis Unguentarii (2) filiam. Others say, she was a Scrivener's daughter; but it is certain that she was better descended, as Mr le Laboureur shews. John Touchet, her father, saith he (3), took the title of Sieur de Beauvais and du Quillart, Counsellor to the king, and Lieutenant-particular of the bailiwick and presidial court of Orleans. He was the son of Peter Touchet, a citizen of Orleans, and grandson of John Touchet, Advocate and Counsellor at Orleans, in the year 1492, whose father was Regnaud Touchet, a Merchant of the town of Parthai en Beaufle. And all that could be said against this lady's birth was, that her mother was Mary Mathy, the natural daughter of Orable Mathy, a Dutchman, and one of the king's Physicians, who to obtain this alliance, gave two thousand crowns with her, which was then a considerable sum.

An error about the family of Madame de la Valiere.

Men commonly fall into two sorts of extremes concerning those whom providence hath very much exalted above their birth. Some by fabulous genealogies furnish them with ancestors of the first quality; others debase them to a much meaner extraction than their true one; either to indulge envy and calumny, or to represent the aggrandizing of their fortune as something stupendous and more proper for exclamations. The Historian of the Amours du Palais Royal, hath degraded the nobility of Madame de la Valiere, in making her a mean citizen of Tours. Yet (4) she was of a family related to that of Beauvau-le-Rivau, one of the most noble of the country; and about an hundred years ago, one Lord de la Valiere married a lady who had been maid of honour to Queen Louise, consort to Henry III. Which doubtless he had never done, if he had not been a gentleman. We shall shew in their places, that slanders of this nature were raised against Albert de Gondi, first Duke of Retz, against Cardinal de Pellevé, the Constable de Luynes, Cardinal Mazarine, &c.

[B] That she did not marry him till after the death of Charles IX. Mezerai knew very well that Mary Touchet's father was Lieutenant-particular of the presidial of Orleans; but I somewhat doubt what he adds, that Charles IX married this mistress to Francis Balzac d'Entragues, governor of Orleans (5). I pass over in silence that this Francis Balzac was not governor of Orleans, till several intrigues had occasioned the Chancellor de Chiverni's losing that government in the year 1588, before which he was only lieutenant of that city (6); I say only that his marriage with Mary Touchet, seems to be posterior to the death of Charles IX. And this is all I can say at present, not being in a place where I can consult the genealogy of this house, nor having yet in my possession such books as are capable of affording an entire certainty. But considering on one side what Papyrius Masso says, that King Charles, on his death-bed, durst not himself commend his mistress to the queen his mother, but did it by the mediation of Charles de Gondi (7); and on the other side, what Mr le Laboureur tells us (8), that we ought not to be surprized, that Mary Touchet found so good a match after so great a figure she had made at court, where she maintained her rank as well as any of the ladies of the first quality (9). Considering, I say, these two things, I cannot think she was married to the Lord d'Entragues in the life time of Charles IX. For if so, it would have been unnecessary for that prince to cause her to be recommended to Catherine de Medicis, (such an husband being a sufficient protector) and one could not apprehend why Mr le Laboureur offers so many reasons why we should not be surprized at the marriage of Francis de Balzac with Mary Touchet, without mentioning the chief, which must have been the great favours bestowed by a living king upon his mistress's husband. This author observes, that she was equally incomparable for wit and beauty, and that the anagram made on her name, Maria Touchet, Je charme tout, (I charm all) was very just. He saith also that Mr d'Entragues became

(5) Mezer. Ab. Chronolog. Tom. v, pag. 184.

(6) Thuan. Hist. lib. xvi.

(7) Brantome relates the thing somewhat differently. Being a dying, says he, he ordered Mr de la Tour to remember him to her (his mistress) and never durst speak of her to the queen his mother.

(8) Le Laboureur, ubi supra.

(9) He had said, pag. 70. That she had no less ambition and dexterity than the Duchesse of Etampes, and the Duchesse of Valentinois, and that she maintained her rank so well, that all the glory, and all the artifices of Queen Catherine, could not put her out of countenance.

pierre [C]. The reason she stabbed a page, according to some authors, is somewhat curious [D]. What she said, as she viewed the picture of the princefs, whom Charles IX

was

became so enamoured of her, that he was called in derision, d'Entragues Touchet, Duke of Orleans, in a libel intitled, The king's edict disguised (10), written in the year 1586, against certain sparks called Bourbons, and some stupid fops, and German drunkards.

(10) By way of allusion to the Duke of Guise.

[C] One was concubine to Henry IV, and the other to the Marfhal de Bassompierre. If the fact which I relate in the remark [D] is true, Henry IV might have been deceived; for perhaps the girl that was ravished might be the very lady d'Entragues, who so much valued the present of her virginity to this prince. A particular relation of her subtilties and cajoling is to be seen in Sulli's Memoirs, and Perefixe's History. The hundred thousand crowns with which the king presented her, were not a shower of gold sufficient to introduce him into her lap, and put an end to her artifices by which she disputed the ground. He must at last be forced to promise her marriage, to remove the difficulties and oppositions of the father and mother, which the daughter seasonably caused to intervene, and which she declared were not to be surmounted, unless these good people were brought over to such a nice point, by this promise satisfying their consciences towards God, and sheltering their honour from the malicious world. This fair one so artfully represented to her lover (11), That he ought not to make any difficulty to satisfy their desire, since it was only that he should give her a small bit of paper (12) in exchange for what to her was the most valuable thing in the world; that he obliged himself under his band to marry her within a year, provided, within the compass of that time she brought him a male-child. If the adventure mentioned by St Romuald, was meant of this lady, what vast expences and earnest pursuits was a great monarch put to, in order to enjoy a page's leavings!

(11) Perefixe, Vie de Henri IV, in the year 1600, where it is mistaken by one year; for it was in the summer, of the year 1599, that the king engaged her. See Bassompierre's Journal, Tom. i, pag. 58.

(12) It must be observed that the king, never to make use of that promise, there being besides no official sufficient to summon such a monarch to appear, and that it should be with all the conditions she knew were desired by him. Memoirs de Sulli, Tom. ii, pag. 247, 248, Duich Edit. 1652, in 12mo.

(13) See the remark [D].

(14) I have said above remark [A], that Mary Touchet's mother was a bastard.

(15) Catherine Henrietta de Balzac, Marchioness of Verneuil, who died in 1633, being in her 54th year, according to Father Anselme; from hence it would follow, that Mr de Perefixe should have allowed her more than 18 years, in the year 1600.

(16) Journal of his Life, Tom. i, pag. 152.

(17) Mary de Balzac, whom he only calls d'Entragues, by whom he had the Bishop of Xaintes, who died in 1676.

Mr de Rofini, the most zealous man in the world for the true interests of this prince, was not contented with tearing this promise of marriage when the king shewed it him; but he endeavoured to cure that prince, by urging to him more suspicions concerning the lady's virtue, than he seemed to entertain of it. It is true, that monarch told this favourite, that he fatigued himself in quest of a maidenhead, which perhaps he should not find. But the other talked much more suspiciously of her honour. 'If you remember, says he, what you have formerly said to me concerning this lady and her brother, in the Duche's time, how freely you then talked of them, and the commands which you obliged me to carry to that baggage, (for you then called the house and family of Mr and Madam d'Antragues) to leave Paris, you will be apt to doubt more than at present you do, whether you will ever find what you expect.' See Sulli's Memoirs, pag. 248, and 253, tome 2. of the Dutch edition, 1652 in 12mo.

However, from all this we learn, that this lady was more tender of her daughter's honour than she had been of her own. The punishment of the page (13), if true, is a proof of it, for she would not probably have been guilty of a murder on that account, if she had been treated in the same manner before. We may further observe how conscientious a mother she was, and how cautious with respect to the world, when her daughter was concerned, but she had not been so in her own case with regard to Charles IX. Yet her care was ineffectual: for as she trod in the steps of her grand-mother (14), so did her daughters in hers. One of them (15) furnished a natural race to Henry IV, as the other did to Marfhal Bassompierre. Let us hear the marfhal himself on this head. 'I returned to Paris, says he (16), to see my mistress (17) in the Coutellerie-street, where her lodging was, in which I had a private passage to the third story which her mother did not rent; and she came to me by a private stair-case of the wardrobe when her mother was asleep.' A little after he hints somewhat from whence one might infer, that Henry IV would have made no conscience of enjoying both sisters, which is that his prince was his rival. He informs us of another thing which confirms my last remark concerning Mary Touchet. 'By misfortune, saith he, the mother had notice of it, and kept the stricter guard. One morning, going to spit, and lifting up the curtain of her bed, she saw that of her daughter's uncovered, and observing that she was missing, she rose very softly, and went up into the wardrobe, where she discovered that the door of our private stair-case was open, which she thought had been nailed up. This made her shriek out, and her daughter at her voice immediately ran to her. I in the mean time shut the door, and marched off in pain to know the event of this affair, which was that her mother beat her, and caused the door of the chamber, in the third story, where we were in the night, to be broke open, which she was surprized to find hung with velvet, and splendidly furnished with candlesticks and other utensils of silver, as well as all other rich furniture. Then all our conversation was broke off; but I accommodated the matter with her mother, by means of a young gentlewoman named d'Azi (18), at whose house I saw her, and asked her a thousand pardons, protesting that nothing had passed beyond kissing, which she pretended to believe (19). He was not long deprived of this lady's conversation, for after some months Madam d'Entragues being gone to court, he says (20), he passed his time very well with her daughter, and with others also. The young lady proved with child four years after, and being turned out of doors by her mother, she desired her lover to give her a promise of marriage to appease her mother, offering at the same time all the counter-promises which he could desire, urging that she begged this only, that she might lie-in quietly, and enjoy the benefit of her mother's affluence (21). She obtained her request, and was so good natured as not to fail in her counter-promise.

(18) Perhaps the same, whom he calls d'Achy, pag. 173, proper names being very much confounded in this Journal.

(19) Journal de Bassompierre, ibid. pag. 157, ad ann. 1606.

(20) Ibid. pag. 165.

(21) Ibid. pag. 261.

There goes a story which I shall here relate. That Marfhal taking the air in a coach with the Queen, when there was a great number of coaches in the ring, it happened that Madam d'Entragues's coach was obliged to stop for some time very near that of the Queen, by reason of the crowd. The Queen looking upon the Marfhal, There is, said she, Madam de Bassompierre. That is only her nick-name, replied he, loud enough to be heard by his old mistress: upon which she cried out, You are a fool, Bassompierre: Not enough to marry your ladyship, replied he; and then the coaches began to move. As this Marfhal had a vast number of amours, I cannot tell whether this other story in Mr Menage relates to another, or the same mistress: 'Marfhal Bassompierre's coach being entangled with that of a lady whom he had loved, and on whom he had spent vast sums, she said aloud; Is it you, Marfhal, from whom I have plucked so many feathers? It is true, Madam, replied he, but they were only the feathers of my tail, and my flight is not thereby hindered (22).'

(22) Suite du Menage, pag. 374, Dutch Edit.

[D] The reason why she stabbed a page, is somewhat curious. I shall here repeat, without the least alteration, what I have said in the project of this Dictionary. Dom Peter de St Romuald agrees in chronology with de Mezarai, as to the marriage of Mary Touchet (23); for he places it in 1572. His Printer was a perfect murderer of proper names, after the example of several of his brethren. The passage contains an action so particular, that it deserves to be set down entire. ' (24) It was about that time (25) that Francis de Bassac, Lord of Entragues-Marcouffe (26), governor of Orleans, married, for his second wife, Mary Touchet, an Apothecary's daughter in that city, equally remarkable for wit and beauty, by whom King Charles IX had had a son, afterwards called the Count d'Auvergne. An action as strange as bold is told of her, which she did to one of her husband's pages, who had ravished one of her daughters, very young and beautiful, in a summer-house in the garden, instigated by a mad fit of love. This wretch she stabbed upon the spot, depriving him of life, who had robbed her daughter of her honour. I wish that this honest Monk, who hath heaped up so many events of all sorts, but not without being liable to some suspicion, had told us where he had this; for I would not advise the reader to believe him upon his bare word.

(23) See the remark [F], towards the end.

(24) Pierre de St Romuald, abridgment of the third Tome of his Threſor Chronol. & Histor. pag. m. 348, ad ann. 1572.

(25) That is, the Paris Mafſacre.

(26) It should be Balzac, Lord of Entragues and Marcouffe.

[E] What

was to marry, deserves to be known [E]. I take this occasion to observe, that those who tell us that this king was no lover of women, have not looked narrowly into the matter [F]. It ought not to be thought strange that I should bestow some articles on such

[E] What she said, as she viewed the picture of the Princess . . . deserves to be known. She eagerly aimed at the possession of King Charles's heart, to the prejudice of his consort. She was very curious, when the treaty of marriage with Elizabeth of Austria was on foot, in examining the picture of that princess, and having very well considered it, she only said, I am not afraid of her. Insinuating by that, as Brantome faith (27), her person and beauty, that

(27) Brant.
Discours sur
Charles IX.

(28) Inspecta Isabella Reginae, quae recens in Galliam venerat, pictura, risisse dicitur, addito verbo nihil me terret Germana.

(29) Du Pleix,
Hist. de Henri
IV. pag. 262.

(30) D'Aubigné,
Tom. iii, p. 637.

ber. Infatuating by that, as Brantome says, that she was presumed to much on her person and beauty, that she believed the king could not leave her. Pappyrus Massio tells us, that when she examined the picture, and said, smilingly, I am not afraid of that German lady, the queen was then arrived (28); but it is not at all probable that Mary Touchet should have staid so long before she saw the Queen's picture; and Brantome's relation seems therefore more likely, with regard to the circumstance of time. Gabrielle d'Étrecé soon saw the pictures of the Infanta of Spain, and of Mary de Medicis, when there was a report of their marriage with Henry IV; they pretend she said, that she had no apprehension of the brown Spaniard, but very much feared the Florentine (29). We have this from an Historian, who affirmeth that he heard it himself. I remember, saith he (30), that the King having intrusted to my keeping the pictures of these two Princesses, permitted me to shew them to the Duchess, and observe what she would say; whicb was, I am not afraid of that black woman, but she other gives me some apprehensions.

[F] Those who tell us that this king was no lover of women, have not looked narrowly into the matter.] Those Historians who have most freely spoken of his ill qualities, say that he was not very irregular with regard to women. Some had endeavoured to throw him into debaucheries, both as to women and wine; but once perceiving that wine disturbed his reason, so much that it made him commit several violences, he abstained from it the whole remainder of his life: and as for women, being ill served by one of those about his mother's person, he took an aversion to the sex, and scarce ever was intimate with any of them again. So Mr Mezerai expresses himself, without observing the rule of the Gram-

(31) Mezerai,
Abrégé Chron.
Tom. v, pag.
183.

(32) See the pieces at the end of Balzac's Socrate Gbretien.

(33) Brantome,
ubi supra.

himself (31), without observing the rule of the dramatica-marian, who censured the placing of the expressions a in Voiture's famous sonnet, where the last imported much less than the first, I bless my torment, and content to die, dare not complain of her tyranny (32). Brantome says, that this Prince did not at first appear very fond of the fair sex, and that the reproaches of the ladies animated him. 'I remember, saieth he (33), that in his briefest
 'age of seventeen or eighteen years, being once
 'violently tormented with the tooth-ach, and the 'Physician's remedies proving ineffectual, a great lady
 'at court, and who belonged to him, gave him a 'receipt, which she had often experienced herself, and 'found very good ; but it did him no good, and
 'next day the asking him how he found himself ; he 'answered, not well at all ; and she replied, I am not surprized at it, Sir, since you neither love, nor trust the women, but prefer hunting and dogs to all of us.
'Wherefore, said he, have you that opinion of me, that I love the exercise of hunting better than your's ? By G . . . , if you provoke me once, I shall join you so close, that I shall throw you all on your backs one after another. He was not as good as his word with regard 'to ALL, but he attacked some of them, rather on 'account of his reputation, than to gratify his laci'viousness, and that very coolly too, and chose for his 'mistress a lady of a very good family, and whom I 'shall not name. She was a very beautiful, discreet,
 'and virtuous lady, whom he treated with all possible
 'honour and respect, and more, said he, to form an
 'agreeable air than for any other end ; nothing, said
 'he, contributing more to polish a young man, than 'a love fixed on a fine and noble subject. He always 'loved this virtuous lady to his death, even when he 'had his Queen Elizabeth, a very agreeable and 'charming person. He also was very fond of Mary
 'Jascoffe, otherwise called TOUCHET, an Apothe-
 'cary's daughter of Orleans, and a most beautiful
 'creature, by whom he had the Grand-Prior, at present called the Count d'Auvergne : ' Here are three mistresses (34), besides a wife : for we ought not to confound her that Mr Mezerai faith served the king ill, with her whom Brantome would not name, and whom this prince loved as long as he lived. When therefore we consider that he died before he was quite twenty-four years of age, and after a long sickness, and that history lays to him two natural sons (35) : I cannot see on what that aversion is grounded, which Mr Mezerai ascribes to him. What would he have him do more ? He wanted, it seems, a great deal to fix the character of debauchery on the lives of people. It is, indeed, true, that in comparison of the horrible corruption of the court of France at that time, Charles IX might pass for a sort of a moderate man in that respect. This Historian mentions but one son of Charles IX by Mary Touchet, and tells us that he was born in 1572, and that he was first Grand-Prior of France, then Count d'Auvergne and Lauragais ; and afterwards Duke of Angoulême (36), and Count de Pontieu. Father Anselme differs from this chronology, and says he was born (37) at the castle of Fayet in Dauphiné, near Montmelian, the 28th of April 1573. I cannot clearly account to my readers why this lady should be sent so far from the court, and her own country, to lie-in. This was not her first child ; the high rank of the father took off the disgrace, and nothing could engage her to affect privacy, when upon such an occasion, a journey may seem necessary to conceal the thing, and to discharge the birth unknown to the world.

unknown to the world.

If what Brantome relates, without believing it, was true, we ought not to entertain a great opinion of Mezerai's Memoirs, as to the aversion which he ascribes to that Prince. Some say (they are Brantome's words) that during his illness he ran to the Queen, and so heated himself that he shortned his days, which gave occasion to the saying, that Venus killed him with Diana, which I cannot believe, for this was never talked of at court amongst those that were most worthy of credit, for I was there. What he saith of Venus and Diana, is an allusion to the two verses which he had already cited, and were a kind of epitaph on Charles IX.

Pour aimer trop Diane & Cythérée auffi, L'une & l'autre m'ont mis en ce tombeau icy.

*Too much I Venus and Diana sought,
And therefore to my grave by them am brought.*

Papyrius Masso, who wrote an abridgment of this prince's life a year after his death, relates an event, perhaps, no truer than this, but at least more probable. He saith the king, in his long illness, once went to see his mistress Mary Touchet, and it was conjectured, that by diverting himself with her at an improper time, or to excess, he increased his distemper and hastened his death. Sane Rex ipse inter moras longissimi morbi semel ad eam divertit, suspicioque est animum morbum ex importuno aut immo dico coitus & acceleratum vitæ finem (38). Mr Le Laboureur (39) hath ill translated these words thus : Also the king, once, during his tedious distemper, going to see her, it is taken for certain, that on account of not being in a condition to approach her, or being guilty of some excess, his disease increased, and this visit hastened his days. Not to take notice that he delivers that as a certainty, which amounts only to a suspicion in the Latin, I am apt to think that there are scarce any readers who by these words, on account of not being in a condition, would not imagine something else than the Historian intended to say ; some accident like that which Mr Rabutin imitates out of Petronius (40). Mr Varillas has not failed to adopt this passage of Papyrius Masso. ' The king was dangerously ill, saith he (41), and those who knew him intimately, whispered two causes of it. The first was his hasty journey from Paris to Orleans to visit the beautiful Mary Touchet, his mistress ; and the second the poison which they pretended was given

PAPYRIUS
Masso ill translated by Le Laboureur.
Varillas criticised.
(38) Papyr. Maf-
ratum vitæ finem (38).
(39) Mr Le Laboureur (39) hath ill translated these words thus :
(40) Petronius, Tom.
ii, page 179.
(41) In the Histoire anecdotée des Gaulois.
Ovid, Annot. lib. iii, Eleg. vii, deservit ipse an accident at large.
(41) Varillas, Hist. de Charl. IX, Tom. ii, page 365.
Edir, 1684.
him

(34) Le Laboureur, additions to Castelnau's Mémoires, Tom. ii, mentions a letter, where it is said that Charles IX was in love with the wife of the Sieur de la Tour. See the last paragraph but one of this remark.

(35) Father Anselme, Hist. Générale, de France, pag. 146, does not say whether they had both the same mother: But Papyrus Massa mentions two, whom he had by Mary Touchet.

der (36) The last nd Dukes of Angou-irst leme are descend-dis- ed from him.
He died at Paris
, as the 24th of Sep-ref- tember, 1650.

(37) Hist. Généalog. p. 173

this PAPHRIUS
 vent, Massillon translatpro- ed by le Laboureur.
 Varillas criticized ath ill (38) Papyr. Ma during lo, in Vita Ca

coli IX.

(39) Addit. à Castelnau, Tom
ii. pag. 819.

(40) In the faire amoureux des Gaules.
Ovid, Amor.
lib. iii, Eleg.
vii, describes an accident a large.

(41) Varillas
Hitt. de Ch
IX, Tom. i
pag. 365; L
Edit. 1684.

such women as these are [G].

(42) Brantome makes him master of the Wardrobe; Papyrius Maffio calls him Carolum Gondium Cubicularium. The Journal of Henry III, makes him master of the Wardrobe, and places his death on the 15th of June 1574, and attributes it to another cause.

him by his steward (42) la Tour, younger brother to the Marfhal de Retz and the Bishop of Paris. The extraordinary vigour of this prince seemed to surmount his sickness, and the apprehension which la Tour had conceived of the report spread concerning him, threw him into a phrenzy, which occasioned his death soon after. Mr Varillas only cites Papyrius Maffio.

This gives me occasion to make some remarks; for, I. The author to whom Mr Varillas refers us, doth not say that Charles IX was obliged to take a journey to Orleans to see Mary Touchet; and there is very little reason to believe that he should keep so far from the king, since she was his public mistress, and had had children by him. In the second place, it is false that Maffio charges this poisoning on la Tour; on the contrary, he makes him die of a distemper occasioned by his grief, for having lost, with Charles IX, the hopes of a vast fortune. I do not deny that la Tour was accused of this wicked act by others; but he ought then to have referred us somewhere else than to Papyrius Maffio's eulogy. Mr le Laboureur hath inserted, in his additions to Castelnau's Memoirs, page 462 of the second tome, a satirical letter, in which Catherine de Medicis is reproached for having caused Charles IX to be poisoned by the Sieur de la Tour, and afterwards la Tour by another. 'Your majesty contrived it so, says the author of this letter, that the late Sieur de la Tour was made to understand, either by you, or by your appointment, that the late king your son designed to kill him, that he might the more easily enjoy his wife; which the said la Tour was readily induced to believe, because he very well knew that the late king passionately loved her, and was, on that account, without difficulty, engaged to poison his said majesty, &c.' This letter is dated at Laufanne, the third month of the fourth year after the treachery, (that is, the Paris massacre) and is signed Grandchamp, who was a gentleman of Nivernois, who had been ambassador at Constantinople, and engaged in the intrigues of la Mole and Coconnas. In the third place, it is impossible to guess, from Mr Varillas's words, whether la Tour died before or after the king; but we should be more apt to conclude it was before than after: nevertheless he died after this prince, either of regret, or poison, or fear, or some other way.

Here is a particular which is not dishonourable to Charles IX. 'That prince one day walking in the Tuilleries, and seeing a charming fine woman, stark-naked, swim over the river from the Louvre to St Germain, stopped to observe her; but whilst his eyes, as well as those of the rest of the court, were fixed on the beautiful object, she dived out of sight, and at last rising to the surface of the water, as swift as lightning, flew ashore, began to wring her hair and do what Antipater says of Venus:

Voy n'agueres Venus hors de la mer fortant,
Ouvrage d'Apelles, entre ses mains tenant
Ses moettes cheveux; elle faict de sa tresse
Humide l'espraignant, fortir l'escume espaissie.

*Fair Venus, whom Apelles drew,
Arising from the seas,
Her wat'ry locks holds in her hands,
And thence thick foam does squeeze.*

'After which she retired, carrying with her the eyes and hearts of all the company. Nevertheless though the thing was diverting enough, it appeared so odd and strange to the king, that he was not heard to say one word in her praise, tho' he heard the greatest part of his retinue, and even the most relieved, loudly express their admiration (43).

[G] It ought not to be thought strange that I should bestow some articles on such women as these are. The beginning of this article in my Project contains these words: 'Dictionaries ought not to omit persons of this class: the figure which they make in the world, is high enough to place them there, and doubtless such a work as Mr Colomies promised (44) and designed to intitle, Cupid on the throne, or the History of the Amours of our Kings since Dagobert, would be very curious.' Since the impression of the Project, a book has appeared which carries the subject higher than Colomies designed it, and begins with Pharamond. I should rather choose Colomies's performance than this. Colomies would have said nothing but what he had taken from some book, he would have consulted scarce books, and always have named his vouchers. But this anonymous author who hath given us the History of the galantries of the Kings of France, from the beginning of the monarchy to Lewis XIV, hath cited no authors, and has not at all prevented our suspecting his book as a Romance. The first edition is better than the following ones: it is more natural and less clogged, and looks more like a History. I happened one day to praise it upon that account before the Bookfeller who printed it. But he very freely answered that he had found by the title of the book that it was the greatest fault in the work, and that it would be supplied in the second edition. The public did not find (said he) a sufficient number of intrigues and surprizing adventures in that piece, we shall insert enough of them to satisfy the reader. After this I distrust that performance more than before. There are several things in it concerning Mary Touchet which I have refuted, or have not related, not being sure that they are not the author's invention; as I judge concerning the dozen of cut-purses whom he has introduced, that the King might see the love-letter which his mistress had received from another galant, the Bishop of Valence's brother (45).

(43) Peter de Lancre, Counsellor of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, Ta-blas de l'incroyance & infamie de toutes choses, fol. 52, verso.

(44) Colomies, Gallia Orient. pag. 67.

(45) See the Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France, Tom. I, pag. 234, Dutch Edit. 1695.

TOULOUSE, a city of France on the river Garonne, being one of the largest and most ancient cities of the west, and the seat of the second parliament of the kings dom, deserves a very long article; but Mr Moreri and the Author of his Supplement having described it at large, I shall not dwell upon it. I shall only say that its consuls bear the title of Capitouls, and become noble by virtue of their office. Mr de la Faille published an excellent dissertation on this subject (a), when a search was made after the false pretenders to nobility (b). The world impatiently expects the continuation of the Annals of Toulouse, which that illustrious Writer hath composed (c). This city which hath always abounded with learned men (d), and does still as much as ever (e), did very well deserve the establishment [A] of the Academy of the Belles Lettres erected there.

(c) Mr de Beauval spoke of the first volume of those Annals, September 1688, pag. 3, & seq. See also the Journal des Savans, of the 19th of April, 1688. (d) See Balzac, in the last page of his Oeuvres diverses, and Sarberiana, at the word Toulouze. (e) The Paris stage and the French academy may witness it.

(1) Intendant of Languedoc.

(2) I wrote this in 1696, since which time this Advocate-General is become President au Mortier, in the Parliament of Paris.

[A] The establishment of the Academy of the Belles Lettres erected there. Mr de Bafville (1), who in the Provinces over which he has been appointed intendant has shewn himself a son worthy of his illustrious father the President de Lamoignon, whilst his brother the Advocate-General (2) shews himself worthy of the same honour in the parliament of Paris, contributed very much to this new establishment. He resolved to change the Floral Games of Toulouse into an Academy of the Belles Lettres (3). The society of the Floral Games alarmed at this design, published some memoirs to engage the city to let things remain in their present posture. These memoirs were refuted; the uselessness of those games was shewn, and the necessity of establishing an Academy for the Belles Lettres in Toulouse was urged, that the happy genius which that city produces might be furnished with an opportunity of perfecting themselves in eloquence. It was asserted that that city might

V O L. V.

(a) You may see the substance of it in a quarto book of Mr Giles de la Roque concerning nobility.

(b) That is about the year 1666.

(3) See the Journal des Savans, of the 14th of September 1693, pag. 666, Dutch Edit.

might furnish a great many subjects to imitate the Academists of the other cities of the realm, and a long list of excellent genius which Toulouse has produced was collected (4). To know whether these reasons were effectual we need only read the following passage extracted out of one of Mr Cousin's Journals. 'The Floral Games of Toulouse have been at last erected into an Academy, the letters patents for that purpose were sealed at the end of the last year. This society is composed of thirty five persons eminently distinguished for their merit and learning. They will distribute two prizes annually, out of the rents of the Floral Games, which are considerable (5).

(4) Ibid. pag. 668.
(5) Journal des Savans, of the seventh of February, 1695, pag. 108, Dutch Edit. where this is said to have been taken out of a letter written from Montauban the 12th of December 1695. It should be 1694; and observe that these words last year relate not to the date of the letter, but to that of the Journal.

(6) Journal des Savans, 1696, pag. 426, Dutch Edit.

(7) Ibid. pag. 427.

(8) Now Dean of the Presidial.

(9) Father of Mr Campanut, Regius Professor of the Civil Law.

(10) He is Professor of Philosophy. See citation (132), of the article RORARIUS.

(a) Cicero, Tuscul. lib. iv, fol. m. 270, B. See also lib. ii, de Finibus, fol. 219, D.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary I have been informed by the Journal des Savans of the 11th of June 1696, that it was not long after the establishment of the French Academy that Mr Pellisson, who was then at Toulouse, formed a scheme of a society designed to the same end; which yet was not brought to perfection till the year 1688, when some learned men began to meet at the house of Mr Carriere, chief Justice and President of the presidial court of that city, which they continued to do till the year 1694, when they removed to Mr de Mondran, a gentleman whose house was more conveniently situated (6). That those who desire to know who were the persons that composed this society, and what their exercises were, may be informed of it by reading the answer of Mr de Martel, one of the members and the worthy secretary of this society, which he caused to be printed at Montauban in 1692, to take off the disadvantageous impressions which the author of a Memoir against this establishment endeavoured to make, under the pretence of defending the Floral Games. That the gentlemen who assist at these Academical Conferences, frequently compose in verse and prose, pieces in honour of the King and on other important subjects; several of which have been printed and met with a general applause. Their zeal went considerably farther in the year one thousand six hundred and ninety four, when they bestowed a prize of a gold medal amounting to the value of twelve pistoles (7). All this and several other particulars much redounding to the glory of these gentlemen, are mentioned in an extract of a letter from Toulouse, published by Mr Cousin author of the Journal des Savans. I have received from that city a long manuscript memoir, the substance whereof I should very willingly insert here, if the Printer could give me time to write for and receive the information which I want. But as I did not examine this memoir till two days before I sent this article to the Press, I cannot wait for that information: I am therefore obliged to confine myself to a few extracts, by which the reader may easily perceive that the Academy erected at Toulouse, is distinct from the society in which the academical conferences mentioned in the Journal des Savans of the 11th of June 1696, were held.

These conferences began in two different places at Toulouse in 1640, at Mr de Malepeires (8), and at Mr de Campanut's (9): but these two societies united at Mr de Garrigis's counsellor of the presidial court, and chose for their director Mr de la Garde, who had rendered himself equally famous for his Latin Poetry, and his excellent discoveries in natural Philosophy; for he wrote against Aristotle's forms and accidents before Gassendus's works appeared. Mr Donneville, President au Mortier, re-established these literary exercises in a much more conspicuous manner in the year 1667. Mr de Nolet, Treasurer of France, some time after established regular conferences in his own house under the direction of Mr Bayle (10) Doctor of Physic; and

Mr Regis made excellent discourses in these conferences on Des Cartes's system. Another society was afterwards formed in the college de Foix, and they began to erect an Academy of Wits. The society of the Floral Games did not relish this project, and an anonymous author wrote a tract to prove it impracticable. Mr Martel a member of the Academy of the Ricourati at Padua, refuted him in a book (11), the extract of which is extant in the Journal des Savans of the 14th of September 1693. He in conjunction with Mr de Carriere (12) and Mr de Malepeire formed regular conferences which continued to the year 1698. Mr Pellisson, who with Mr de Malepeire had formerly laid the foundation of such literary exercises at Toulouse, could not see this happy re-establishment, without looking on it in some measure as his own work, since he had formed the first plan of it, and since the illustrious magistrate, whom he had formerly associated in the first conferences, had so large a share and was so much concerned in the reviving of them. This great man continually bent on the improvement of polite learning, suggested to the authors of these new exercises the erection of their society into an Academy of the Belles Lettres, to be firmly established at Toulouse. He offered his interest, flattering himself with reason that he was able to procure the same advantage for Toulouse, which he had formerly obtained, even in a conjuncture less favourable, in behalf of Soissons. To further this design he engaged the Prince du Mayne, Governor of Languedoc, to be their protector, who presented a petition to the King, supplicating his Majesty to approve the project and execution of that design. It was in acknowledgment of so signal a favour that Mr Richebourg, a member of this society, had the honour to address an ingenious fable to this Prince. . . . This piece of Poetry alarmed some of the gentlemen of the Floral Games . . . and then their society, favoured by several illustrious magistrates who were members of it, fearing the new Academy would be erected on the ruins of theirs, which had the management of a considerable fund, took the most proper measures to get it established by letters patents under the protection of the Chancellors of France. They preserved as much as possible the name and customs it had, in order to follow the footsteps of its ancient establishment: for besides that by their statutes these gentlemen are restrained from printing any thing in the name of the society, or returning any thanks on their reception, of the four prizes distributed, three, and even one of the most considerable, are appointed for Poetry. The gentlemen of the academical conferences redoubled their zeal to perfect their studies; and as they had particularly in view eloquence, antiquities, and all that relates to the Belles Lettres, they chose Terence's Comedies and Quintilian, for the subject of their conferences. Mr de Mondran, Treasurer of France, who had an house very conveniently situated in the middle of the city, chose it to them for the performance of their exercises.

The author of the memoir from whence I have extracted all this, concludes with saying that those conferences, which would not have been interrupted on any other account than the death of several worthy members, may, it is hoped, be revived in a juncture so favourable to the sciences as the general peace which prevails throughout Europe (13).

(11) Printed at Montauban, in 1692.

(12) Now Chief Justice.

(13) This was written in the beginning of the year 1700.

T R A B E A (Q U I N T U S) a Comic Poet, some of whose verses are cited by Cicero (a). The piece which he intitled Ergastulum, is cited by Nonnius Marcellus (b). Aulus Gellius informs us that Vulcatius Sedigitus gave him the eighth place among the ten Comic Poets of ancient Rome (c). Muretus's fraudulent imposition on the great Scaliger [A], which

(b) Nonnius Marcell. Vite Rarenter, pag. m. 515.

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. x, cap. xxiii.

[A] Muretus's fraudulent imposition on the great Scaliger. I shall collect several passages relating to this fact. Scaliger at the age of eighteen valued himself on discerning the different manners of writing of all ages. Muretus to intrap him, made some verses which he shewed him, pretending that he had received them from Germany, and that they were transcribed from an old manuscript. Scaliger after having attentively read them, assured him without hesitation that Trabea an ancient comic Poet was the author of them: and continuing in the same opinion that his conjecture was infallible, he afterwards cited these verses as written by this ancient Poet in his commentary on Varro, Muretus laughed at it heartily, without the least reserve (1). Co-star having expressed himself thus, in his apology, did

(1) Collat. Apolog. pag. 303.

which made him cite some verses of Trabea's which were of a much later date, deserves did afterwards more particularly explain in a letter the circumstances of that fact. 'These verses of Muretus, falsely ascribed to the ancient comic Poet Trabea, deserve indeed your impatient desire to see them. As I have the honour to know you, I dare say that you will learn them by heart; for they elegantly express a moral and frequently useful reflection.

Here, si querelis, ejulatu, fletibus,
Medicina fieret miseris Mortalium,
Auro parandæ lacrumæ contrâ forent.
Nunc hæc ad minuenda mala non magis valent,
Quàm nania Præficæ ad excitandos Mortuos.
Res turbidæ consilium, non fletum expetunt.

*Were moans, or cries, or tears, a cure
For all those ill wretched men endure,
Then tears for money should be bought,
And would by every one be sought.
Now, Master, these stand us in stead
No more than songs to raise the dead.
Advice is useful in distress,
Whining affords us no redress.*

Scaliger cited these verses in his commentary on Varro de Re Rustica, page 211 of Henry Stephens's edition. Producam autem, scilicet he, locum veteris Comici Trabeæ ex Fabula Harpæce, ubi hoc loquendi genus usurpatur, &c. (2). (He is speaking of the phrase, auro contrâ) Quis enim tam aversus à Musis, tamque humanitatis expertus, qui horum verum publicatione offendatur, &c. - - - I shall quote a passage from the play Harpæce of the ancient comic Poet Trabea, where this manner of speaking is used, &c. for who is such an enemy to the Muses, and so void of humanity, as to be offended with the publication of these verses. Muretus bragged of having deceived that great man who thought himself infallible, and Scaliger sensibly touched by this cheat, revenged himself by the following distich.

Qui rigidæ flammæ evaserat ante Tolosæ
Muretus, fumos vendidit ille mihi.

*Muretus, who had from the flames 'scap'd free,
Of rigorous Tholose, sold the smoke to me.*

You understand what he means by the flames of the severe Tholose, and have not forgot that Muretus was accused before the parliament of that city of a crime, which is punished by fire. You will be glad to know too that Scaliger suppressed these verses of Muretus in the second edition of his commentary (3).

Mr Borremans should not have said that this snare was laid for Julius Cæsar Scaliger (4). What is said of this pretended passage of Trabea, being an epigram, is as groundless. 'Joseph. Scaliger, cui ille (Muretus) verba dederat, atque epigramma recens a se compositum pro veteri obtulerat, &c. (5). - - - Joseph Scaliger, on whom Muretus had imposed, and obtruded a modern epigram written by himself, for an ancient one, &c.' It was a passage in a scene of a comedy. See Mr Menage in the 83d chapter of the Anti-Baillet, where you will find several curious things concerning this fact, but not the whole passage of Scaliger. I cannot believe that Menage purposely omitted it. I suspect that he had not by him the commentary on Varro; for if he had known that it contains another snare into which this great Critic fell, I am apt to think he had freely cited it. I have not that edition of Scaliger's commentary, but on the credit of Scrivener I shall venture to affirm that immediately after the words cited by Costar are the following (6). 'Quod si hi placent, non gravabor, & alios ejusdem notæ, sed alios Poetæ, adhibere, qui tanquam superiorum gemini & germani sunt. Sunt autem Accii, veteris ac gravissimi Tragicæ, ex Oenomaio:

(3) Costar, ubi supra, pag. 419, in his second letter to Mr de Heurles.
(4) Borremans, Var. Lect. cap. iii, pag. x.
(5) Nicus Erythr. Pinac. I, pag. 12.
(6) Scrivener, Animadv. in Pervigilium Veneris, pag. 466, 467. Tristatus cui Titulus Bau-dii Amores.

Nam si lamentis allevaretur dolor,
Longoque fletu minueretur miseria,
Tum turpe lacrumis indulgere non foret,
Fractaque voce Divum obtestare fidem,
Tabifica donec pectore excessisset lues.
Nunc hæc neque hilum de dolore detrahunt,
Potiusque cumulum miseris adjiciunt mali,
Et indecoram mentis molliem arguunt.

'Qui versus hæc nunc latuerunt, eosque nunc primum in vulgus publicamus, quorum priores Trabeæ mihi ad verbum è Philemone (vel Menandro, secundum alios) mutuati videntur: qui eandem sententiam extulit: Εἰ τὰ δάκρυ' ἤμιν, &c. Hæc illustris heros, qui posteaquam dolum perferens, præ indignatione hoc distichon, quod mihi de manu in manum vivus videntque olim tradidit, ex tempore lusit:

Qui rigidæ flammæ evaserat ante Tolosæ,
Falsidico fumos vendidit ore mihi.

'Virum disertum designans, cujus nomini heic parco. 'Heroe (æterno, heu, doctorum omnium dolore) defuncto, incidi in Posthuma quædam scripta M. A. M. C. R. (7) & inter poemata repperi hæc.

AFFICTA TRABEÆ.

Here, si querelis, ejulatu, fletibus, &c.

prorsus eadem cum iis quæ supra recitavi. Illud alterum ex Acti Oenomaio fragmentum nusquam comparet: præterquam in Ritterhusii ad Oppianum Commentario: ubi Trabeæ & Actii hos versus, elegantes & memoria dignissimos (ut ipse vocat) producit, transcriptos & mutatos ex Notis Scaligeri. - - - But if these are agreeable, I shall add some others of the same sort, but done by another Poet, which are, as it were, the twins and brothers of the former. They are those of Accius, an ancient and very worthy tragic Poet, from the Oenomaus:

Could lamentations ease our grief,
Or many tears give us relief,
No shame 't would be for us to moan,
And in our prayers to sigh and groan,
'Till GOD should send us a delivery
From wasting plague or other misery.
But now we know all this is vain,
And rather adds unto our pain.
And those that are that way inclin'd
Shew a base effeminate mind.

Which verses have been hitherto unknown, and are now first published by me; the former, done by Trabea, seem to me to be borrowed verbatim from Philemon (or according to others, Menander): who expressed the same sentiment: If tears to us, &c. Thus speaks that illustrious man, who, when he perceived the trick that was put upon him, out of revenge made the following distich extempore, which he himself formerly delivered to me,

He from the flames of barbs Tholose got free,
And with a lie, he sold the smoke to me.

Meaning a certain learned man, whose name I here forbear mentioning. That illustrious person being dead (to the sorrow of all learned men) I happened to meet with some posthumous writings of M. A. M. C. R. (Marc Antony Muretus a Citizen of Rome) and amongst the Poems found the following.

FALSELY ASCRIBED TO TRABEA.

Were moans, or cries, or tears, a cure, &c.

Exactly the same as I have above recited. The other fragment out of Accius's Oenomaus is no where to be found but in Ritterhusius's commentary on Oppianus: wherein he quotes those verses of Trabea and Accius, which serves to be mentioned here. The same mistake is to be found in the Lexicon of Buchnerus (d).

(7) Those five letters signify, Marci Antonii Mureti Civis Romani.

(d) Vocæ Præfixa, fol. 1128. See Muretus's Poems, pag. 50, Edit. Lipf. 1672.

which he calls elegant and most worthy of remembrance, and which he transcribed and borrowed from the annotations of Scaliger. I have not concluded this citation with Scaliger's words, but chose to continue it by citing those which Scriverius adds to them, because they afford matter for two critical remarks. In the first place you see that Scaliger's distich is otherwise expressed than Mr Baillet after Nicus Erythræus wife expressed it (8), and otherwise than Mr Menage has quoted it (9), and otherwise than Mr Menage cites it (9) from the collection of Scaliger's Poems published by Scriverius from Scaliger's originals. In the

(8) Baillet Jugem fur les Poëtes, numb. 1333, cites it thus: Qui flammis rigide vitaverat ante Tolose Muretus, fumos vendidit illi mihi.

(9) Menage, Anti-Baillet, chap. lxxxiii, cites it thus: Qui flammis rigide vitaverat ante Tolose, Muretus, fumos vendidit illi mihi.

(10) Menage, ibid. Note that he cites all those verses of Muretus.

second place we plainly see that Scriverius was ignorant that the pretended verses of Accius were any where else to be found than in Scaliger and Ritterhusius his copy. But we shall immediately see that they were inserted in an edition of Muretus's Poems published two years after Scaliger had published his commentary on Varro. Here is the proof of it (10): Muretus caused them to be printed in his collection of Poems of Aldus's edition in 1575, with this note: Cum veteris Comici Græci Philemonis sententiam à Plutarcho & à Stobæo acceptam, animi causâ ex primæ tentasem, & dicendi genere, & numero, veterum Latinorum simillimo: Placuit etiam expere, nunquid eandem comicæ explicare possem. Viri, sum est utrumque non infeliciter successisse. Per jocum itaque prioribus versibus Accii, posterioribus Trabeæ nomen ascripti, ut experiret aliorum judicium, & viderem num quis in eis inesset vetustatis sapor. Nemo repertus est qui non ea pro veteribus accepere. Unus etiam, & eruditione & judicio acerrimo præditus, repertus est, qui ea à me accepta pro veteribus publicaret. Ne quis igitur amplius fallatur, & rem totam detegendam, & carmina ipsa hic subiicienda duxi.

Afficta Accio.

Nam si lamentis, &c.

Afficta Trabeæ.

HERE, si querelis, &c.

As I had attempted for my diversion to express a reflexion of Philemon, an old Greek Comic Poet, and adopted by Plutarch and Stobæus, in style and verse like the antient Romans; I thought fit likewise to try, whether I could explain it in a comic style. In both which I imagined I succeeded pretty well. And therefore out of playantry I ascribed the former verses to Accius, and the latter to Trabeæ, that I might know the opinions of others, and see whether they favoured of antiquity. Every body took them to be antient. There was likewise a man of great learning and penetration, who having received them from me, published them as such. But that none may be further deceived, I thought proper to discover the whole matter, and subjoin here the verses themselves.

Falsely ascribed to Accius.

Could lamentations, &c.

Falsely ascribed to Trabeæ.

Were moans, &c.

These words of Muretus detect a mistake contained in the passage which is in the beginning of this remark. Mr Costar imagined that Scaliger ventured to find a father for the Latin verses communicated to him; Mr Costar, I say, fancied that this great critic, not content to receive them as a fragment of an antient author, peremptorily decided that it was a part of a certain dramatic piece of Trabeæ. But Muretus shews that the fact was not so, but that he himself produced these lines as the verses of that antient Poet. Scaliger was only deceived by giving credit to Muretus's words. As for the rest, he clearly saw they were an imitation of some Greek verses in Plutarch (11), which in Amyot's version run thus:

(11) Plut. de Consol. ad Apollon. pag. 105.

Si nos mal-heurs les larmes gueriffoyent,
Et si nos maux incontinent cessoyent
Que l'on auroit larmoyé tendrement,
Au poids de l'or payées chèrement
En un mal-heur les larmes devroyent estre:
Mais maintenant les affaires, mon maistre,
N'y penfent point, & n'y jettent point l'œil:
Ains soit, ou non, que tu pleures en dueil,
Par ne lairront d'aller la même voye.
Qu'il-eil besoin donc que nostre zél larmoye?
Qu'y gagnons-nous? Rien: mais douleur produit,
Comme arbres font, des larmes pour son fruit.

If our misfortunes tears could cure

And make our woes to cease,

Then we should purchase tears with gold,

To give us a release.

But now, O master, in distress

No help from thence e'er came,

For, whether did you mourn or not,

It still will be the same.

Why then should we lament and cry?

What do we thereby gain?

Nothing: but e'en as fruit from trees,

So tears proceed from pain.

Scaliger was more excusable on this occasion than when he took the oration de duplici concordia, for a ments in attributing books to performance of Justus Lipsius (12), for nothing better resembles the verses of the antients than those of the pretended Trabeæ (13). But the oration falsely attributed to Justus Lipsius (14), is not like any of that writer's works. The Poet Apollonius Collatius hath nothing in him which looks like antiquity, and yet Scaliger and several other very good critics have taken him for an antient Poet (15). Add to this Mr Colomies words. 'I have heard Mr Vossius say, that Boethornius corrected and commented on a fa-tire de Lite, which he believed to be antient, but was written by the Chancellor de l'Hospital. This to my great satisfaction I afterward found true. Pricæus an English Critic is guilty of the same fault in his commentary on Apuleius's Apology, page 54 (16). A Madrigal of Menage passed for Tasso's: It is in the CXXXIIIId chapter of the Anti-baillet, and the History of this Innocent Cheat is inserted in the same Author's Miscellaneæ. Muretus complains that he was wrongfully accused of being the author of some letters and poems (17). Compare with this the remarks [M] and [P] of the article ERASMUS.

(12) See the Scaligeriana at the word Lipsius.

(13) See Boethornius, letter cent, to Camerarius.

(14) See the remark [I], of the article GOL.

(15) See Bartholinus in Clavdivio, pag. 795, Edit. in 4to. See also baillet, and the History of this Innocent Cheat is inserted in the same Author's Miscellaneæ. Muretus complains that he was wrongfully accused of being the author of some letters and poems (17). Compare with this the remarks [M] and [P] of the article ERASMUS.

(16) Colomies, Opul. pag. 123.

(17) Muretus, Epist. I, lib. I.

TRAERBACH, a small town in the Palatinate, with a castle situated on a rock, is the chief place of a Bayliwick in the county of Spanheim. It stands on the river Moselle, over-against Mont-Royal, between Triers and Coblentz. The Spaniards put a garrison in it in the year 1632. The Swedes took it in 1635 and delivered it to the French. But by the treaty of Munster it was restored to its former possessors. The French seized on it some time after the peace of Nimeguen, and fortified it with Mont-Royal. Both those places were restored by the treaty of Ryfwick in the year 1697, upon condition they should be dismantled (a). The French, under the command of Count Tallard, became masters of Traerbach, after a siege of some days in November 1702. The

(a) Extracted from the Dutch Gazette of Leyden, of the ninth of January 1705.

The allies retook it in December 1704, and met with more resistance than they had expected [A]

[A] The allies . . . met with more resistance than they had expected. They invested it on the third of November 1704, and began to cannonade it the sixteenth or seventeenth of the same month. The Baron de Trosné, a Brigadier in the Dutch army, and director of the attacks, boasted that he would carry the place in five or six days, as it was said in all the Gazettes. However, the castle still held out the tenth of December, when the baron was killed by a musquet shot, and did not capitulate till the eighteenth. The Governor of Traerbach and the Major were killed during the siege. A very honourable capitulation was granted to the garrison.

TRAJAN, a Roman Emperor

Most learned men of the Romish communion now refute the story which was so much cried up, that the soul of this Emperor was delivered from hell by the prayers of Pope Gregory [A].

[A] The story which was so much cried up, that the soul of this Emperor was delivered from hell by the prayers of Pope Gregory. Paul and John Diaconus, who wrote the life of St Gregory, give an account of that affair (1). It is moreover asserted by St John of Damascus (2). The story is related in this manner.

(1) Dionysius de Sammarth. Histoire de St Gregoire, pag. 283.

(2) Ibid. pag. 284; but he observes that the learned doubt whether the sermon concerning the dead, where this is asserted, and which is found amongst the works of Joannes Damascenus, was written by him or not.

* No author that has writ the Roman History, has related this fact, which was however very remarkable. Trajan's panegyrist does not mention it neither.

(3) Ibid. pag. 283.

(4) Ibid. pag. 284.

(5) Ibid. pag. 283.

(6) Ibid. pag. 284.

† Bollandus, on the last chapter, of the Life of St Gregory, by Paul Diaconus.

‡ Auctore anonymo sed syn. chrono. say they.

St Gregory passing Trajan's square, which that prince caused to be adorned with stately edifices, where the principal actions of his life were represented, stopped particularly to consider a basso relievo, which described the favour he did to a poor widow *. This emperor marching at the head of his army, and being obliged to use great dispatch, a very old and poor widow came to beseech him with tears in her eyes, to revenge the death of her son who had been murdered. Trajan promised her that when he returned from his expedition he would do her justice. But, Sir, says the widow, if you should be killed in the battle, of whom may I expect it afterwards? Of my successor, answered Trajan. What will it signify to you, Great Emperor, replied the woman, that any other than yourself render me justice? Is it not better that you should do this good action yourself, than leave another to do it? It is said, that the emperor being then moved at the tears of that poor mother, and persuaded by her reasons, alighted from his horse, commanded those who were accused of the murder of the widow's son to be brought before him, and took an exact cognizance of the whole affair: and tho' the principal officers of his army urged him very much, yet he would not continue his march till he had determined it. He ordered a considerable sum of money to be paid to the widow, but spared the lives of the criminals. St Gregory, add they, touched with this action of justice and charity, prayed to God with many tears and groans, to take pity on that emperor. Being gone from thence to pray at St Peter's tomb, he there shed again a great many tears, and remained long in prayer on the same subject. Soon after he knew he had not prayed in vain: for falling into a sleep, rather extatistal than natural, God revealed to him that his prayers had been heard. But at the same time commanded him never to pray more for persons that die unbaptized (3). John Diaconus, who believed this story to be true (4), and said that it was read in the English churches (5), owns however that it was not received by the Romans, and that it had appeared to them improbable (6). 'It ought indeed to be rejected as a fable, that could find credit no where but with the Anglo-Saxons, who were as yet ignorant and uninstructed in the Christian religion: for John Diaconus evidently shews that it derived its original from them. I am surprised that learned men, who have been employed in collecting the acts of the saints, far from rejecting it, have made a † note to authorize and support it: I fancy the reason why they judged so favourably of it was, because they believed that the ancient life of St Gregory, which they published as the performance of an anonymous author, was written by a cotemporary Historian, as they expressly declare ‡. But that anonymous author is at the same time called Paul Diaconus, and that cotemporary Historian is of the IXth century, younger than St Gregory by about 250 years, as I have proved in the Advertisement. Cardinal Baronius † has very amply refuted this story in the 8th tome of his Annals, and after him Cardinal Bellarmine, not to mention several learned Critics of our own time, who have shewn the absurdity and dangerous consequences of it. But as that does not hinder people from making use of it every day, to authorize a very pernicious doctrine, and to teach that the intercession of the holy Virgin saves those that belong to her, and that wear her livery, even tho' they die in mortal sin; I believe, those who love true piety will be glad to find this falsity refuted by St Gregory himself, and by what he says in his Dialogues (7).

† Ad an. 604, num. 30, & seq. L. 2. de Purgat. c. 8.

(7) Dionysius de Sammarth. ubi supra, pag. 284, 285.

Sammarthanus recites afterwards divers passages of the XLIVth chapter of the fourth book of those Dialogues, and shews thereby that St Gregory did not believe it possible to deliver a damned soul. He refutes likewise some answers that might be made in favour of the contrary opinion. See also page 409 of his work. He does not think it worth while to confute in particular another story which is added to the former. It is reported, that this Pope felt continual pains in his feet and stomach, as a punishment of the sin he had committed in praying for an emperor that was damned. Father Theophilus Raynaud ranks this amongst the calumnies which have been published against great men (8). He quotes Toftatus, who in the LVIIth question on the IVth Book of the Kings affirms, that St Gregory then committed a mortal sin. He says, that Alphonsus Ciacconius wrote a treatise to prove, that this story of Trajan's deliverance was true: and adds that Rutilius Benzonius maintained the same thing in his Speculum Episcoporum, but that Melchior Canus, and Soto, had very well conjectured the falsity of that story, and that Baronius, Bellarmine and Suarez, and several other moderns had clearly demonstrated it to be a fable. All the subtilties invented to reconcile this pretended deliverance of Trajan with the irreversibility of God's decrees against persons who are damned, he looks upon as meer cavilling: and rejects the reflexion of John Diaconus, that those pains were inflicted on St Gregory, as an antidote against the pride wherewith he might have been puffed up, after so great an exploit as releasing Trajan's soul from the pit of hell. Hoc sane fundamento everso . . . præcitantur trices variae ab antiquis Theologis Scholasticis excogitatae, ad exponendum quo modo salva decretorum divinarum veritate de abyssu nunquam fefcense, (id est, ut ipse D. Gregorius XXXII. mor. c. 13. exposuit, de nulla unquam in inferno redemptione) potuerit vir sanctus, exorare Trajanem a Tartaro ereptionem: quibusdam dicentibus, Trajanum precibus sancti Gregorii ad vitam revocatum egisse penitentiam; quod habet S. Thomas in 4. distin. 45. quest. 2. art. 5. ad 5. Aliis afferentibus, suspensam fuisse Trajanem condemnationem, & D. Gregorii oratione impeditam, ut videre est apud D. Thomam in 1. distin. 45. quest. 2. art. 2. ad quintum & quest. 6. de veritat. artic. 6. ad quartum. Nihil bonum necessarium est, supposita narrationis prædictæ falsitate, quæ item revocata, concidit quod ait Joannes Diaconus, ægritudines de quibus diximus, immixtas esse Sancto Gregorio, ne ob eam Trajanem ereptionem exoratam, tumeret animo (9).

(8) Theoph. Raynaud. Haplothea, §. ii. Serie iii. cap. xxvii, pag. m. 435.

(9) Id. ibid.

TRAPPE, an abbey situate in a very solitary place [A], on the frontiers of Perche in the diocese of Seez, is become very famous since the Abbot de Rancé hath reformed it. He held it in commendam above 25 years, but in 1662, he procured an agreement, by virtue of which the Monks of the strict Observance entered and took possession of the monastery. And the better to encourage their establishment, he quitted to them the seat of Nuisement which he enjoyed as Abbot in commendam (a). The following year he obtained of the king a permission to become regular abbot of this abbey. He took the regular vance of the Cistercian order on the 13th of June 1663, being then aged 37 years and five months (b). --- On the 26th of June following having received his patent from Rome, empowering him to hold the abbey of la Trappe, as a regular abbot, he made his profession in the abbey of Perseigne (c). --- The 3d of July following he received the abbatial benediction (d) --- in the monastery of St Martin of Seez, and went to his abbey the 14th day of the same month (e). By his natural eloquence and example he prevailed on his Monks to submit to the primitive austerities of their rule. There was not one of them but would follow his abbot's steps, and in imitation of him abstain from drinking of wine, eating of eggs and fish, and apply himself to manual labour for three hours every day (f). This abbey was fallen into great remissness of discipline. It was founded in the year 1140 [B].

(a) Description de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, pag. 13, 14, Paris edition, 1682. It is a letter of Mr Felibien, to the Duc de Liancourt, as it appears from the Journal des Sçavans, of the 28th of November, 1695, pag. m. 699.

(b) Felibien, ibid. pag. 15, 16.

(c) Felibien, ubi supra, pag. 19.

(d) By the hands of Mr Patrick Plunket, Bishop of Armagh, in Ireland.

(e) Ibid. p. 20.

(f) Ibid. p. 22.

[A] 'Abbey in a very solitary place.' This abbey is situated in a large valley. The wood and the hills which surround it, are disposed as if designed to hide it from the rest of the world. They enclose arable lands, plantations of fruit-trees, pasture grounds and nine ponds which encompass the abbey, and render it so difficult of access, that it is very hard to come at it without a guide. There was heretofore a road from Mortagne to Paris behind the walls of the garden; but tho' it was in the wood, and above five hundred paces from the enclosure, and tho' it was not possible to remove it farther without a vast expence, yet the Abbot turned it another way, in order to render the place round the monastery more solitary. And indeed nothing is more so than this desert: For tho' there are several towns and large villages at three leagues distance round it, yet to people who are there it seems to be a lonely and foreign country. Silence reigns throughout; and if any noise is heard, it is only the rustling of trees shaken by the wind, or the brooks running through the pebbles. This abbey discovers itself at going out of the forest of Perche, when one is coming from the south; and tho' the traveller thinks himself very near, he finds it almost a mile before he reaches it: But having at last descended the hill, crossed the heath, and gone on a little way amongst hedges and through shady paths he comes to the first court, where the receiver's apartment is. It is separated from those of the Monks by a strong pallisado of pales and thorns, which the Abbot caused to be made after he retired thither (1).

(1) Felibien, Description de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, pag. 6, 8 seq. printed at Paris in 1671, and the second time in 1682.

[B] It was fallen into great remissness of discipline. It was founded in the year 1140. I shall continue to use the same authors words who furnished me with the preceding remark. 'The abbey of our Lady de la Maison-Dieu de la Trappe, (for so it is called) was founded by Rotrou Earl of Perche, in the year 1140, and consecrated under the name of the blessed Virgin in 1214, by Robert Archbishop of Roën, Ralph Bishop of Evreux, and Sylvester Bishop of Seez. It felt for a long time the decay of the Cistercian order, and was fallen into the same irregularities, in which every body knows several monasteries of that order continue to this day, since the remissness introduced two hundred years ago, having not yet embraced the strict Observance of the rule re-established in France, by the late Cardinal de la Rochefoucault, when Mr Armand John Bouthillier de Rancé, Doctor of Divinity, chief Almoner to the late Duke of Orleans, and Abbot in commendam of this abbey above twenty-five years, by his great care and frequent exhortations, brought the Monks of this abbey to consent, and to request that it might be put into the hands of the Fathers of the strict Observance of the Cistercian order, to re-establish the primitive and exact practice of the discipline. The Abbot de Barbarie of the strict Observance, and visitor of the province, being come thither, at the request of the Abbot de Rancé, with a commission from the Abbot de Prieres, Vicar-General, made an agreement between the Abbot and the old Monks of la Trappe the 17th of August 1662, which was ratified in the Parliament of Paris the 16th of February 1663. By virtue of which the Monks of the strict Observance entered and took possession of the monastery (2).

(2) Felibien, ibid. pag. 11, 8 seq.

TREBATIUS (CAIUS) surnamed Testa (a), was a very great Civilian. He had a vast memory (b), and tho' he professed himself an Epicurean (c), he was a man of incomparable probity (d). During the war with the Gauls he was received into Julius Cæsar's favour by the recommendation of Cicero, and, if he would, might have enjoyed the profit of a Tribune's post without the exercise of that office [A]. Perhaps he would not have acquitted himself very well in it; for Cicero seems sometimes a little to reproach his

(a) Cicero, Epist. xiii & xxi, lib. vii, ad Famil.

(b) See the remark [A].

(c) Id. ibid. Epist. xii.

(d) See the remark [A].

[A] He was received into Julius Cæsar's favour by the recommendation of Cicero . . . and if he would, might have enjoyed . . . &c.] Cicero recommended him in the following terms: 'Hunc, mi Cæsar, sic velim omni tua comitate complectare, ut omnia quæ per me possis adduci ut in meos conferre velis, in unum hunc con-feras: de quo tibi homine hæc spondeo non illo veteri verbo meo, quod, cum ad te de Milone scripsissem, jure iussisti: sed more Romano, quo modo homines non inepti loquuntur: probiorem hominem, meliorem virum, prudentiorem esse neminem. Accedit etiam, quod familiam ducit, in jure civili singularis memoria, summa scientia. Huic ego neque tribunatum, neque præfecturam, neque ullius beneficii certum nomen peto: benevolentiam tuam & liberalitatem peto: neque impedio, quo minus, si tibi ita placuerit, etiam hinc cum ornibus gloriolæ insignibus. Totum denique hominem tibi ita trado de manu (ut aiunt) in manum tuam istam, & victoria & fide præstantem (1). ---

(1) Cicero, Epist. v, lib. vii, ad Famil. pag. m. 375, 376. Note, that in the first letter of the tenth book to Atticus, he uses these words, Trebatii boni viri & civis verba te gaudio esse delectatum. --- I am glad you was pleased with what was said to you by Trebatius, an excellent man, and good citizen.

'I beg of you, my dear Cæsar, to receive this gentleman with all possible kindness, and to bestow on him alone all the favours my interest with you can procure for my friends: I will answer for him, not in that old saying which I used, when I wrote to you concerning Milo, and which you justly laughed at: but in the Roman way, as wise men speak, that there is not a better, better or more prudent man living. Besides, he excels in the knowledge of the Civil Law; is endowed with a vast memory, and great learning. I do not ask for him the tribunship, lieutenantancy, or any particular post; I only intreat he may have your favour and friendship; and if you thought fit, I should not be against his enjoying those titles of honours. In fine, I deliver him entirely out of my own hand (as they say) into that of your's, excelling in victory and faithful-ness.' This recommendation had great effect, for Trebatius might, if he pleased, have been an honorary tribune, and enjoyed the profits of that high office:

his want of bravery (e); and doubtless it was only his learned conversation which endeared him to Cæsar and his friends. Several of the letters he received from Cicero are yet extant. Those who say that he engaged in Pompey's party, are very much mistaken [B]. He was always firm to Julius Cæsar, and persuaded Cicero to be of that side. He maintained his reputation so well after Julius Cæsar's death, that Augustus being in doubt concerning the validity of codicils, authorized the use of them by the advice and persuasive reasons of Trebatius [C], after having consulted the most able Civilians. Several are of opinion, that whenever we find in the Pandects (f) the sayings of the Antients brought in, it ought chiefly to be understood of Trebatius, and his disciple Labeo. The character of a learned man given to Trebatius by Horace, seems in my mind to signify a great deal in that place (g). This Civilian formed himself under Cornelius Maximus (h). He published several books [D]. He was sometimes mistaken in affirming, that certain things had never been considered [E].

(e) See Bertrand, de Jurispræd. lib. ii, pag. m. 248; and Cicero, Epist. x, lib. vii, ad Famil.

(f) Bertrand, ibid. pag. 249.

(g) Horat. Sat. i, lib. ii, ver. 78.

(h) Pomponius, de origine Juris, lib. iii, cap. xi, num. 45.

fic: 'Ex tuis literis cognovi præproperam quandam festinationem tuam, et simul sum admiratus cur tribunatus commodum, demto præsertim labore militiæ contemneris (2). --- By your letter I find you have been somewhat too precipitate, and wonder that you refused the profits of the tribuneship, especially as you were exempted from the trouble of the service.' Cicero foretold that he himself would prove the greatest obstacle to his fortune (3). He is not the only person of that turn: How many men are there who would have risen, if they had had but patience enough, or if they had been importunate, or very assuaging?

(2) Idem, Epist. viii, ejusd. Libri.

(3) Tibi unum timendum sit ne ipse tibi defuisse videatur. --- One thing you ought to take care of, which is not to be wanting to yourself. Idem, Epist. vii, ejusd. Libri.

* Plut. in vita Cæ.

(4) Guil. Grotius, de Vita Juriscons. pag. 78.

(5) Admonentem C. Trebatium ut affugeret minus familiari vultu respexisse. Sueton. in Julio, cap. lxxviii.

(6) Bertrandus, de Jurispræd. lib. ii, pag. m. 250.

(7) Menagius, Juris Civilis Axiomata, cap. xiv, pag. m. 79.

tain that Trebatius's authority was very great for several ages. Which Ammianus Marcellinus's words plainly testify: 'Hi ut altius videantur jura callere TREBATIUM loquuntur & Cascellium, & Alfenum, & Auruncorum Sicanorumque jam diu leges ignotas cum Evandri matre abhinc seculis obrutas multis (8). --- That they may seem to understand the Law more profoundly, they talk of TREBATIUS, Cascellius, and Alfenus, and the laws of the Arunci and Sicani which have been long since forgot, and buried in oblivion with the mother of Evander.'

[D] He published several books. An ancient scholar (9) asserts, that Aulus (10) Trebatius a Roman Knight, and Civilian, composed several tracts on the Civil-law, and nine books concerning religions. This account is not very exact, for Macrobius (11), hath cited the 10th book of that work of Trebatius. And these words of Bertrandus are yet less exact: 'Certum est Trebatium scripsisse de religionibus lib. duos (12). --- It is certain that Trebatius wrote two books concerning religions.'

[E] In affirming that certain things had never been considered. Cicero once convicted him of falsity. I shall cite the passage at large, to inform the reader that Trebatius entertained his friends very handsomely. Illuleras heri inter scyphos, quod dixeram, controversiam esse, possetne heres, quod furtum antea factum esset, furti recte agere. Itaque, etsi domum bene potus feroque redieram, tamen id caput, ubi hæc controversia est, notavi, & descriptum tibi misi: ut scires, id, quod tu neminem sensisse dicebas Sex.

Ælium, M. Manilius, M. Brutum sensisse (13). --- Last night, in our cups, you laughed at me for saying that it was a question, whether an heir could laid an indictment for a theft, which had been committed before he was made heir: and therefore tho' I had drank pretty freely, and it was late before I returned home, yet I took down in writing the chapter where this controversy is handled, and have sent it to you, that you may see that Sex. Ælius, M. Manilius, and M. Brutus had thought of that case, which you imagined had escaped all other Civilians. Those who quote this epistle of Cicero, to make it appear that Trebatius reduced the precepts of his sect into practice, and that he lived like an Epicurean libertine, reason very ill. Doth not Cicero, so opposite to Epicurus, own that he had drank very freely that night? And is it reasonable thence to infer any thing against his morals? It is therefore certain, that this passage doth not hinder Trebatius from being a proof that the impious opinions of the Epicureans were compatible with the practice of moral virtues; for, as I have already said, Trebatius was a man of great probity. Bertrandus draws another consequence from this epistle of Cicero: he pretends that it proves that Trebatius attempting to pass for the inventor of his answers, magisterially affirmed that no author had ever said any such thing: 'Tantam autem Trebatius in respondendo vanam ostentationem, inanemque gloriolam habebat, ut sæpissime quæ plerique ante eum dixerant, neminem præter eum sensisse audacter profiteretur (14). --- Trebatius was so ridiculously vain and ostentatious in his answers, that he would often confidently maintain, that no body besides himself knew a thing, tho' it had been said by a great many before him.'

(8) Amm. Marcell. lib. xxx, cap. vi, pag. m. 594.

(9) Vetus Scholasticus Horat. in Sat. i, lib. ii.

(10) He should have said Caius.

(11) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. iii, cap. iii, pag. m. 388.

(12) Bertrand. ubi supra, pag. 252, 253.

(13) Cicero, Epist. xxii, lib. vii, ad Famil.

(14) Bertrandus, ubi supra, pag. 252.

- (a) See the remark [2], of the article LEWIS XI.
- (b) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XI, livr. x, pag. 331. Dutch Edit.
- (c) Matthieu, Hist. de Louis XI, livr. xi, pag. m. 751.
- (d) Thevet, Cosmographie Universelle, livr. xiv, fol. 517.
- (e) Thuanus, pag. m. 37, 38.
- TRISTAN L'HERMITE (LEWIS) was the instrument of the revenges and cruelties of Lewis XI (a). He was Provost-Marshall, or, according to others, Great Provost of the king's household. He became so odious to all good men, that they were afraid to name him. . . . He was not content to obey the barbarous commands of depriving those of their lives who had not been convicted of any crime; but executed those orders with a precipitation not excusable in the most savage monsters of cruelty. This made him take sometimes the innocent for the guilty; and in order to repair the fault committed by his mistake, he was obliged to kill two persons instead of one (b).²
- He had been knighted by Charles VII, after the siege of Fronzac (c). His son PETER L'HERMITE was the father of JOHN L'HERMITE, who once shewed Thevet, the Cosmographer, in the house of Mortaigne, several antient deeds, importing the relation betwixt the lords of that house and the antient Romans (d). I take notice of this only as an instance of the folly of those traditions which are preserved in antient families. Thuanus wonders that Philip de Comines hath not mentioned this Trifstan, who left, says he, a great estate behind him, part of which was the principality of Mortaigne in Gascony. . . . possibly it was he who imprisoned Philip de Comines, in a cage (e).

- TRISTAN L'HERMITE (FRANCIS) Gentleman in ordinary to the Duke of Orleans, and one of the best Poets of the XVIIth century, pretended to be descended from the Grand Provost of Lewis XI (a). He was born at the castle of Souliers (b), in the province of la Marche. He was brought up page of honour to Scævola de Sainte Marthe (c). His tragedy intitled Mariamne passed for an excellent piece (d) [A]. He was admitted into the French academy, in the place of Mr Colomby about the year 1649. After which he lived about six or seven years.
- He died very piously at the palace of Guise, without suffering his friends to visit him, and forgot them all to think of God (e).³ What is said of his poverty, doth not seem true in all particulars [B], and would be no proof of the

- (a) Chevrana, ubi supra. (d) See Mr Baillet, Jugemens sur les Poëtes, num. 1483, and Mr Pellisson, Hist. de l'Académie Française, pag. m. 359, where we may see the catalogue of his works. (e) Chevrana, ibid.

- [A] His tragedy, intitled, Mariamne, passed for an excellent piece. The Abbot Marolles observes, that this play was that with which the incomparable Mondori, the best actor of his time, ended (1). This is a little equivocal. He should have said, that this famous player lost his life by the efforts he was obliged to make, to represent the passions which the author had described. In the Parnasse Reformé, an actor is introduced, saying to Trifstan, I believe you would have us act nothing else but Mariamne, and kill a Mondory every week in your service (2).

- (1) Marolles, Mémoire, Part. ii, pag. 242.
- (2) Parn. Réformé, pag. m. 106.
- (3) Menagiana, pag. 146, 147, of the second Dutch Edit.
- [B] What is said of his poverty doth not seem true in all particulars. Let us hear what Mr Menage said of it (3). 'Mr Quinaut was a servant to Mr Trifstan. The Duke of Montausier said, that when he died, he left him his poetical vein, and would willingly have left him his cloak too if he had had one: on which Mr de Montmor made this epigram, which is cited by Mr de Furetiere:

Elie, ainsi qu'il est écrit
De son manteau joint à son double esprit, Récompensa son serviteur fidele.
Trifstan eût suivi ce modele;
Mais Trifstan qu'on mit au Tombeau
Plus pauvre que n'est un Prophete,
En laissant à Quinaut son esprit de Poëte,
Ne put lui laisser de manteau.

Elijah, to reward Elijah's merit,
Left him his mantle and his double spirit.
Trifstan to do the like in vain had try'd:
Poorer than any prophet, when he died,
He left his friend his wit . . . but not a cloak beside.

- Mr Furetiere, whom Mr Menage cites, doth not ascribe this rally to Mr de Montausier, but to Mr Bourdelot. It is no small happiness for Mr Quinaut, says he (4), 'to have been servant to the illustrious Mr Trifstan, under whom he served his apprenticeship in Poetry. Which one day drew on him the compliment of a great prince †, who, at the end of one of his plays congratulated him, by comparing him and his master, to Elifha and Elijah. As Elijah, said he, when taken up to Heaven, by giving Elifha his mantle, left him the spirit of

- (4) Furetiere, troisième Factum, pag. 22, Dutch Edit.
- † The Duke of Guise.

prophecy; so Trifstan, at his death, transmitted to Quinaut his poetical genius. Mr Bourdelot, who was present, observed that the simile was lame in this respect; for Trifstan had never a mantle or cloak: which occasioned this epigram, that was then made to preserve the memory of this parallel.

Elie, ainsi qu'il est écrit, &c.

Elijah left, as it is writ, &c.

I doubt not but Trifstan's wretched condition was here exaggerated, and I cannot persuade myself that his poverty was like that of the famous Poet with whom Boileau begins his satires:

Damon ce grand Auteur, dont la Muse fertile Amusa si long temps, & la cour & la ville:
Mais qui n'étant vetu que de simple bureau,
Passa l'été sans linge, & l'hiver sans manteau (5),

Damon, a mighty author, who had long Amus'd the court and city with his song,
Asham'd to see himself so meanly dress'd,
For drugg'd was at once his worst and best,
That in hot weather he had scarce a shirt
To shift him, and his linnen stood with dirt;
And, what wou'd any man of wit provoke,
At Christmas to be seen without a cloak.

I dare engage that some persons, yet alive, might certify that they have seen Trifstan with a cloak, or at least that they know some who have seen him with one in cold weather or rain. I am willing to believe that it was not a new, or a very valuable one, but, in short, it was a cloak (6). A wit, disposed to divert himself with the poverty of the Poets, chiefly turns on these two topics, viz. their being ill clothed, and ill lodged; and this sort of rally most times exceeds the bounds of truth. Coslar was puzzled when obliged to account for these words. 'Aristo and Tasso have erected very rich palaces, not to speak of that of Love, in Marino's Adonis; and yet they hired chambers to lodge in: this is not what we call edificare casas; building cottages. These, Sir, are the people who, as you say, would delay building

- (5) Despreux, Sat. I, at the beginning.
- (6) Add that it was without doubt rather his own cloak, tho' perhaps bought in a Broker's shop, than a borrowed or hired one.

the injustice of the age, nor any argument of the sterility of the services done to the Muses building till the stones will successively come of their own accord, and place themselves one upon another (7). But his adversary discovered his fallacies and their origin; he observed that Costar was not much concerned for truth, provided he could please his fancy. The whole criticism which falls severely on him, runs thus: 'I own that Tasso was poor, yet he did not live in lodgings; he had his apartments in the palace of the Dukes of Ferrara, and other princes, in whose court he resided. And as to what concerns Ariosto, he was rich enough, and so far from being reduced to live in lodgings, that he built a very convenient house, where he generally resided, as he himself assures us in these verses which he caused to be engraved on it.

(7) Entretiens de Voiture & de Costar, p. 329.

Parva, sed apta mihi, sed nulli obnoxia, sed non Sordida, parva meo sed tamen ære domus.

*This is a small, but neat convenient house,
To none obnoxious, built at my expence.*

Battista Pigna, who wrote his life, saith, that he delighted much in building, and that his most common employment was, continually to alter or improve something or other in his house. Ma dille-tando si molto d'edificare, &c. Intorno a questa sua casa non si contentando mai d'una cosa fatta, faceva spesso risarla dicendo d'essere ancora tale nel far versi, essendo che molto li mutava e rimutava. If you desire another witness, Paulus Jovius says, in his Elogies, 'Receptus inde est ab Alfonso Principe tanquam horarum omnium extruxit peramoenâ hortorum uber-tate, frugi mensæ quotidianos sumptus adæquantem. . . . He was received by the Prince Alfonso as a friend and companion at all hours, by whose liberality he built a city-house, and had a pleasant fruitful garden to it, suited to his moderate circumstances. But you are not much concerned for the truth of what you say; you are afraid that things would be ridiculous if too true. All is well, if the matter doth not fail you, and you can fill the page. You say every thing that occurs to your fancy (8). Costar was not so flattered with this heavy blow as not to think of some shifts; but indeed they are meer cavils. It is true, saith he (9), that Tasso for a long time had an apartment in the ducal palace of Ferrara: but when he wrote his heroic poem Rinaldo, at Padua, or when he was employed in the disposition of the design and matter of his Gierusalemme liberata; did not he live in lodgings? and doth not he, in one of his letters, complain of their inconveniences? As for Ariosto, we shall find him, in his satires, complaining of his extreme poverty (10). . . . At last Alfonso's liberality enabled him to build a house. But Battista Pigna testifies, that it was at a very small expence, poca spesa. And a certain person telling him, that such a small building did not very well agree with so many towering and magnificent palaces, which he had erected in his writings; he answered, That building with words, and building with stones were not the same things: Egli dandogli questa festevole risposta, che porvi le pietre & porvi le parole non è il medesimo. I would ask Mr Girac, if it is not probable, that Ariosto lodged in a hired room, whilst the builders were at work; and much more before he was able to employ them (11)? Costar subjoins several examples. He saith that Terence had not so much as one hired house; that Vitellius when he left Rome to go into Germany , where, soon after, the Roman legions created him Emperor, left his wife and children in a hired room; that Malherbe never lived otherwise; and that his excellent verses did not bring him in enough to build even a poor cottage which he could call his own (12). Every one must needs see that this way of answering is but a wretched apology; for, not to insist on every particular, could we not say that Ariosto, while the workmen were employed in building his house, rented another; a practice very common amongst a vast number of very rich people? Are Terence, Vitellius, or Malherbe, concerned in this dispute, or does the question run upon this, viz. Whether it was shameful (13) for Tasso and Ariosto to live in lodgings? The question is only about the matter of fact itself. Costar could not maintain what he advanced; he is therefore conquered. The same fate would probably fall on those who should be obliged to bring proofs that Tristan l'Hermite had not so much as a cloak.

VOL. V.

Men are too much pleased with exaggerations in this sort of rallery; they imagine that without exceeding the bounds of truth, they cannot give a sufficient poignancy to their thoughts. I am going to cite a Rondeau, which supposes some Poets not able so much as to hire a lodging. This is a hint from the fable of Amphion's lyre, which had such a virtue, that without the help of any other architect, it was able to build a city.

Le (14) beau secret pour elever le corps
D'un grand Logis! Tels Ouvriers sont morts;
Il n'en est plus; à leur douce harmonie
Les gros moëtons venoient de compagnie,
Et s'arrangeoient comme par des re lorts.

A peu de frais, & sans aucuns efforts,
Pareilles gens édifioient alors,
La seule voix au Luth étant unie;

Le beau secret!

Ah! pour bâtir, si les charmans accords,
Si les bons Vers, tenoient lieu de trésors,
Que de Palais de splendeur infinie!
Nos Amphions sont en chambre garnie;
S'ils n'y font pas, c'est qu'ils couchent dehors:

Le beau secret (15)!

O happy art, a house to raise!
Such builders live not in our days,
At the sweet music of whose song
Huge stones spontaneous mov'd along,
And form'd a habitable pile,
Without the master's charge or toil.
'Twas but to sing and touch the lyre,
The house was built to their desire.

O happy art!

Al! were it now, as erst of old!
Wou'd verses pass instead of gold;
What splendid palaces wou'd rise,
What domes poetic brave the skies!
But our Amphions live alone
In hired lodgings: . . . or in none.

O happy art!

You see Mr Benferade thought it impossible to rally agreeably without taking his subject a note higher than those who touched it before him. He believed it too vulgar to lodge the Poets in a hired room very near the garret. This is, doubtless, the destiny of some, as well as it was the hard fate of the Gram-marian Orbilius, who, as Suetonius informs us, taught at Rome, with much more reputation than profit, and he himself complained, in one of his books, that the poverty which attended his old age, obliged him to lodge in a garret (16). This complaint seems better grounded than the confession which Martial makes of being lodged in the third story.

Et scalis habito tribus, sed altis (17).

And in a room three stories high was lodg'd.

Mr Gombauld was rallied for having no better lodging. 'Mr Boitard, President of the Chamber of Accounts at Montpellier, was very much pleased with jesting upon Mr de Gombauld. Once in rallery he caused a bill to be clapped on his door, importing, 'That if any person had found a Bruges fatten bag, in which are Mr de Gombauld's thoughts, if they will be pleased to bring them to the scutcheon of Anceux, in the Rue des Noyers, four pair of stairs, ubi ponunt ova columbæ (18), - where the pigeons lay their eggs, they shall be very well rewarded (19).' Some are of opinion, that Juvenal did not mean, that the best Roman Poets were just ready to turn Bakers, or Bagnio-keepers, but that the true sense of his words is, that they designed to lodge at some Bagnio-keeper's or Baker's.

5 I

(14) Benferade, Métamorph. d'Ovide misé en Rondeaux.

(15) This puts me in mind of Father Garass's words, in his Doctrine Curieuse, p. 63: 'They are of the opinion of the parasite mentioned by the old Comic Poet Cæcilius, that the greatest torment a parasite can be put to, is to see him sit at home, & to come down him to sup at home, & to come home late.'

(16) Docuit major fama quam emolumento. Namque jam per senex pauperem sub tegulis quodam scripto factetur. Sueton. de illust. Grammat. cap. ix.

(17) Mart. Epigramm. cxviii, lib. i. See also Epigramm. cix. of the same book, where he says, At mea Vipinæ spectant canalicula laurus.

(18) It is an allusion to these words of Juven. Sat. iii, ver. 201. Quem tegula sola tueretur A pluvia, molles ubi recludunt ova columbæ.

(19) Suite du Manuscrit, page 176. Dutch Edit.

(8) Girac, Remarques sur les Entretiens de Costar, pag. 263, 264.

(9) Costar, Apologie pag. 330.

(10) Costar quotes in this place several verses of Ariosto, that witness his poverty; but as has been seen above, in remark [E] of the article BENSERADE, the complaints of Poets are not always a proof of their being poor.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 331.

 Uxor & liberis quos Romæ reliquebat meritorio canaliculo abditis, &c. Suet. in Vitell. cap. 7.

(12) Costar, Apol. pag. 331.

(13) Costar supposes without any reason for it, that people fancied he tarnished the reputation of Tasso and Ariosto.

TRISTAN.

402

(f) Marolles, Denombrement
des Auteurs.

Muses [C]. He had a brother who applied himself to the writing of genealogies, and who published an History of Touraine (f), and is, if I am not mistaken, the same John Baptist TRISTAN

Baker's, that they might warm themselves for nothing. However it be, those lines of Juvenal give a lively description of their deplorable condition?

Cum jam celebres, notique poetæ
Balneolum Gabiis, Romæ conducere furnos
Tentarent: nec foedum alii, nec turpe putarent
Præcones fieri, cum, desertis Aganippes
Vallibus, esuriens migraret in atria Cleio (20).

(20) Juven. Sat.
vii, ver. 3.

But now the celebrated wits for need
Hire bagnios, to the crier's trade succeed,
Or get their own by baking others' bread!
Or, by the porter's lodge, with beggars wait
For greasy fragments at the great man's gate.

DRYDEN.

But Mr Benferade goes yet much further; he says, some Poets pass the whole night in the street, and lie under no other canopy than that of Heaven, being more miserable than foxes, who have holes, and the birds of the air who have nests (21).

(21) St Matthew viii, 20.

It is so true, that the thing aimed at by this sort of rallery, is to shew, that Poets have no houses of their own, that a certain ingenious man delighted in supposing, that a Poet having once bought a house, a poetical parliament was called to consider of this great novelty, and the greatest Poets urging, they never lived otherwise than in lodgings, he was immediately obliged to sell his house. This story in Latin runs thus: 'Memini me olim legisse elegantem ingenii lusum, superiore ætate excusum, cum inscriptione: Poeta domum emit. Argumentum libelli est, nescio quis poeta, qui cum propriam domum emisset, res ea tanquam novi & pessimi Exempli, ad Poetarum Senatium delata, acerbè judicata est. Præfatus Senatus Eobanus Hessus constitutus, cui assederunt, Celtes, Huttenus, Bebelius, Brasicanus, alii. Cum Sententias dicerent, nemo ex omnibus fuit, qui vel Meccenatum gratia, vel ingenii felicitate tantum profecerit, ut ædes proprias vel hereditate vel emptione possederit; omnes rei familiaris incurii, in conducto se vixisse & fassi sunt & gloriati. Iussus igitur est quam primum ædes revendere, pecuniam vero in symposium conferre quo immanem hanc culpam elueret, & ubique habitare ac sine curis vivere poetice disceret. Hæc illi (22). I remember I read formerly an elegant piece of wit, printed in the last century, and intituled, A Poet bought a house. The substance of it is this; A certain Poet having purchased an house of his own, the matter was laid before the parliament of Poets, as being an unheard of and very bad precedent, and a severe sentence was pronounced upon it. Eobanus Hessus was chosen speaker, and Celtes, Huttenus, Bebelius, Brasicanus, and others, were members. When they came to give their votes, it appeared there was not one single person, who through the favour of patrons, or an happy wit, was worth so much as to be master of an house either by inheritance or purchase: all of them neglecting their private fortunes, owned, and bragged that they lived in lodgings. The Poet was therefore ordered forthwith to sell his house, and to buy wine with the money for their entertainment, and that he should learn to lodge and live always without care like a Poet.'

(22) Joh. Valentinus Andreas,
Epist. ccli, pag. 342.

The jests made on our Tristan l'Hermit were chiefly levelled at the meanness of his cloaths. It was he whom Mr Gueret chose to be an apologist for shabby Poets: for somebody having said, that their uncombed hair, their dirty linen, and the ridiculous figure which their ragged cloaths made, would force a smile from the gravest men (23); Tristan bluntly replied (24), 'You trouble your head about a trifle . . . let the Poets live as they please: do not you know they cannot abide constraint? And what is it to you, that they are all ill clothed, if their verse be lofty and magnificent? Do not deceive yourself, this great negligence is the source of their finest poems: they are thus unconcerned at worldly things, to make their court to the Muses with the greatest assiduity; and when their eyes appear to you staring or distracted, their imagination is busied in quest of those surprising wonders which ravish you. Would to God our

(23) Gueret,
Parnasse Réformé, pag. 101.

(24) Ibid. pag. 102, 103.

dramatic Poets were only guilty of this fault, I could easily pardon them. But, contrary to those you speak of, they are magnificently dressed, they look great by their rich apparel, and their poems are languid, and without method.

[C] . . . and would be no proof of the injustice of the age, nor any argument of the sterility of the services done to the Muses. If any one should ever think of reducing all the lists of poor learned men, which we find in several places (25), into an universal catalogue, it would swell to a very large book; and the Poets would here take up more room than all other authors, or if we either regard their accounts of themselves, or the truth of the fact. I think I have already cited these verses of Regnier:

Or avecq' tout cecy le poinct qui me console,
C'est que la pauvreté comme moi les afole,
Et que la grace à Dieu, Phœbus & son troupeau
Nous n'eumes sur le dos jamais un bon manteau,
&c (26).

This is my comfort with my scanty store,
They grow the sonder of me, 'cause I'm poor;
And, thanks to heav'n, to Phœbus and the Nine,
I ne'er had a warm cloak, nor place to dine, &c.

(25) You will find one in Weizmann's notes upon the words of Petronius: Nescio quo modo bene mentis foret esse pauperas. These notes are to be found in the edition of Petronius, published by Lestachius, at Frankfurt, 1619, in 4to.

(26) Regnier, Sat. ii, l. l. m. 5 vers.

A little lower he saith:

Pour moy, si mon habit, par tout cicatricé
Ne me rendoit du peuple & des grands méprisé
Je prendrois patience, &c.

As for my self, if tatter'd coat and vest,
Of high and low did not make me the jest,
I could be patient, &c.

The epitaph on Malherbe written by Gombauld, discovers the poverty of both of them:

L'Apollon de nos jours, Malherbe, icy repose;
Il a vécu long-temps sans beaucoup de support:
En quel siècle? passant! je n'en dis autre chose,
Il est mort pauvre, & moy je vis comme il est mort (27).

Here lies Malherbe, th' Apollo of our time,
Long while he liv'd with little to support him.
In what age? Passenger, I say no more,
He died, I live, alike, both very poor.

(27) See the Diverticules Curieuses, Part. 2, pag. 35, Dutch Edit.

It would be very easy to make a collection of pieces of Poetry of the like nature, which would fill several sheets. The general conclusion is that the age is very ungrateful and unjust to suffer so many men to be afflicted with poverty, who deserve so well to be rewarded, and to enjoy the conveniences of life. But it is certain that those who talk thus are very often in the wrong; for there are several Poets, whose poverty is only to be ascribed to their too great neglect of their domestic affairs, and not knowing how to husband the favours which they receive. Those who apply themselves wholly to the Muses, can scarce think of any thing else, and find so many charming engagements in the composition of a Poem, that they cannot take off their thoughts, even when their domestic interest requires them to be employed in something else, than the composing an Ode. The pleasing Poetry affords is very great, and . . . the hours pass away very fast which are employed that way. But does not this wonderful pleasure which Poets take in their performances, divert them from their affairs, prejudice their fortune, and estrange them from the usual conduct of other men? For rather than not finish a sonnet well begun, a Poet will suffer his friend to depart without bidding him adieu, abandon the sollicitation of his law-suit, and neglect the care of his health: as it happened to the Cavalier Marino, who burnt his leg as he was writing some stanzas of his Adonis. This poetic absence

TRISTAN L'HERMITE de Soliers, who in the year 1661, published the Cabinet of Lewis XI, containing several fragments, letters, and secret intrigues concerning the reign of that monarch; and several other curious pieces, never before published. Collected from several archives and repositories (g).

absence is not hurtful when some misfortune has happened; for it does in some measure take off the sense of it: but it is prejudicial, when it throws men into sad accidents, like that of Marino. On indifferent subjects it is innocent and even diverting.

Si lors que tu luy parles,
Il te laisse au Roy Jehan, & s'en court au Roy Charles.

If when to him you talk,
He from one subject to another roves.

The elevated imagination of a Poet is no disagreeable object, when at leisure hours we see it take its flight, and soar up towards every thing that can afford it some thoughts. And if sometimes the beauty or the boldness of those pictures which he draws, divert us; yet the Poet's ill fortune is always to be lamented, because his most pressing affairs scarce ever prevail over his absence of mind (28). There are several other causes of the ill posture of their affairs, which are indeed shameful; some are poor notwithstanding the liberalities of a Mæcenas, because they are prodigal and voluptuous; others lose at play all the money which their poetical productions bring in. Our Tristram ruined himself by this. See what Mr Chevreau says of it. 'We may judge of his genius by his Marianna. We were intimate friends; and when he desired me to inform him of the fate of the last verses which he made for the Queen (29). I answered him that the person who shewed them to her majesty, did not chuse a time when the Queen was in a gay humour. But if she had made him a present, he would have made but a very indifferent use of it: gaming was his predominant passion; and he lost all he could play for. At several times he received of the Duke of St Aignan a thousand pistoles, out of which he could not spare enough to buy a good suit of cloaths (30). Could he then justly complain of the hardness of the age? If he was not rich in proportion to his condition, it was his own fault, and only to be charged on his ill conduct. He is reported to have written his own epitaph in these six verses.

(28) Sorbier, Letter lxxvii, pag. 559, 560.

(29) That is Christina, Queen of Sweden.

(30) Chevreau, Tom. i, pag. 29. Dutch Edit.

Ebloui de l'éclat de la splendeur mondaine,
Je me flatay tousjours de l'esperance vaine;
Faisant le chien couchant auprès d'un grand Seigneur,
Je me vis toujours pauvre, & tâchay de paroître;
Je vécus dans la peine attendant le bonheur,
Et mourus sur un coffre en attendant mon Maître (31).

Smit with the dazzling splendor of the world,
I fed my wishes with expectation vain,
Servilely crouching at a great lord's feet.
Still poor, I labour'd still to seem in want;
I lived in pain, expecting happiness,
And in the service of my master died.

Mr Chevreau mentions another Poet, who ruined himself by his pleasures, viz. Colletet. 'In his Poems we find this verse.

J'ay des maisons aux champs, j'ay des maisons en ville.

City and country houses I enjoy.

But these houses must have been in paribus infidelium, imaginary. He was naturally libidinous, and to tempt him, it was not necessary to be either fair or young. That he might not get a scandalous name among his neighbours, and not being able to live without a female servant, he married her, and she was no sooner dead than he got another, whom he also did not fail to make his wife (32). . . . Those who designed to take an inventory of his goods, assured me that he saved them that trouble, and left his son the name of Colletet only for an inheritance (33).

It would be almost as difficult to enrich certain authors, as to fill the Danaides tub. They are with respect to their expences what others are with respect to secrets (34); money slips from them a thousand several ways.

(31) See the Divertissement Curieuses, ubi supra, Tom. ii, pag. 341, Dutch Edit.

(32) Chevreau, ibid. pag. 30.

(33) Ibid. pag. 31.

(34) Plenus rimarum sum, hac atque illac perfluo. Terent. Eunuch. Act. i, Sc. ii.

TRISTAN DE SAINT AMANT (JOHN) an Antiquary and Medalist in the XVIIth century, author of a work in three volumes in folio, intituled Commentaires Historiques (a), was the son of Charles Tristram, auditor of accompts at Paris (b). Father Sirmond and he wrote against each other (c).

(a) See what judgment Mr de Spanheim gives of him, De usu & præst. Numism. p. 774, & Epist. vii, ad Morellium, p. 148. (b) See the Journal des Sçavans, of the 22d of August, 1689, pag. 584. Dutch Edit. (c) See Baillet's Anti, Tom. ii, p. 264.

TRONCHIN (THEODORE) a Minister, and Professor of Divinity, born April 17, 1582, at Geneva, where his father was a refugee on account of religion [A]. He was designed to be a scholar by the advice of his godfather Theodorus Beza, and he made an extraordinary progress in his studies. The testimonials given him in the year 1600, when he went to visit foreign universities, gave him the character of a young man of very great hopes. He confirmed this character among all the learned men to whom he was pupil, or with whom he contracted any acquaintance in his travels [B]. He returned to Geneva in 1606, and gave such signal proofs of his learning, that he was [A] Geneva where his father was a refugee on account of religion. He was of Troyes in Champagne, and quitted France in 1572, on account of the massacre, which he escaped by the kind offices of a Priest his friend and neighbour, who hid him in his house. He designed to retire into Germany, and to have only passed through Geneva, where he nevertheless staid by the advice of a friend. He obtained the freedom of that city, and not long after was admitted into the council of two hundred, in acknowledgment of several services done to the Republic, during the war it was then engaged in with the Duke of Savoy (1).

(1) Taken from an impaired Memoir.

[B] In his travels. Leaving Geneva in 1600, he studied at Basil under John Nicolas Stupanus, Amanus Polanus, and Antony Waleus. He returned to Geneva in 1602, and departed thence in 1604, to go to Heidelberg, where he improved by the lectures of David Pareus Professor of Divinity, and by those of Æmilius Portus Greek Professor. He spent some time at Francfort to see Gruterus, who had rendered himself famous by his collection of inscriptions. In 1605, he went to the university of Franeker, to hear Sibrand Lubbertus. He staid a considerable time at Leyden, under the Professors Gomarus, Trelcatius, Bertius, and Arminius:

TRONCHIN.

404

was the same year made Hebrew professor. In 1607, he married Theodora Rocca, a woman of an extraordinary merit in all respects, sister to the first syndic of the Republic, and grand-daughter to the wife of Theodorus Beza, at whose house she was brought up, and whose god-daughter she was (a). He was chosen minister in December 1608, and created rector of the academy in 1610. He was desired in 1614, besides his Hebrew lectures to read in Divinity, one of the professors being then sick; and when a professorship of Divinity became vacant in 1618, he succeeded to it, and was thereby discharged from his Hebrew professorship. The same year he received orders from the pastors and professors of Geneva to answer the Jesuit Coton, who had writ against the French version of the bible, a book intitled Geneve plagiaire. He acquitted himself of this commission by a tract intitled Coton plagiaire, a work which was very much esteemed by the public. At the same time he and Mr Diodati were deputed by the church of Geneva to the famous synod of Dort (b), where he discovered his profound knowledge in Theology, and a moderation which was very much praised. In this great conjuncture he acquired some months in 1632 (c), and perfectly answered that lord's expectation, who testified afterwards a very great esteem and particular affection for him. He was very grateful, and honoured the memory of that duke by an oration which he pronounced a few days after the funeral of that great man in 1638. He continued to acquire great esteem in the exercise of all his employments, and by a very extensive correspondence in the reformed countries, where he obtained the friendship of the most learned men, as well as of several great lords and princes. He composed orations and Latin poems with great facility (c): His conversation was very instructive and agreeable; for he had added to the study of Divinity, and of several languages, the knowledge of the Civil-Law, and of several other sciences, and that of sacred and profane history, especially of the two last centuries, of which he knew an infinite number of particulars. He was one of those men, who are more fond of deserving reputation, than of hunting after it, and he might if he had pleased have published very excellent books, as Mr Mestrezat (d) assured us. He was chosen by the pastors in 1655, to confer with and assist John Dury, in the project of uniting the Lutherans and the Reformed, on which he wrote several tracts. He arrived to an happy old age free from diseases, and died very easily, after a fever which had continued some days, on the 19th of November 1657. He had just before received the visit of the pastors and professors in a body, who in their moving discourse to him gave him all the marks of a tender affection. It was observed that he survived all the foreign divines who assisted at the synod of Dort. He was a frank sincere man, zealous for religion, and the service of the churches, a great enemy to the vices of men, tho' very tender of their persons. His advice was greatly regarded both for the civil government, and in the two ecclesiastical bodies; and also by strangers, a great number of whom consulted him. Amongst other children he left LEWIS TRONCHIN, who was minister (e) of the church of Lyons, and four years after was elected to succeed his father both as minister and professor of Divinity (f). This worthy son still enjoys (g) that post with the reputation of one of the ablest Divines of this age. All those who are acquainted with the justness and penetration of his genius passionately desire that he would at last become an author, and are very sorry that he puts so slight a value on that title*.

(a) It is therefore a thing somewhat singular, that both the husband and the wife should have had such an illustrious god-father.

(b) The Republic of the United Provinces, had desired of that of Geneva, two of their Divines.

(c) I have mentioned his funeral oration upon Simon Goulart, in the dissertation concerning Junius Brutus.

(d) The Paris minister.

(e) He was admitted minister in 1651.

(f) Taken from a Memoir, sent from Geneva.

(g) I write this in 1701.

* He died at Geneva, the eighth of September 1705, being 76 years old. See his Elogy in the inaugural speech of Mr Turretin, his successor in the professorship of Divinity.

Arminius: under the last of which he publicly maintained a thesis in Divinity. He also frequented Meula and Baudius, and very often visited Joseph Scalliger and Heinfius, who shewed a great esteem and affection for him. He was loved and praised by all for his virtue and learning. At the Hague he saw Hugo Grotius, who gave him sixteen verses which he had composed, and told him that he did it to put him in mind of his love for him, and of his esteem for his learning. He saw at London Aaron Cappel; at Oxford Drusus (2), and John Reynolds; at Cambridge Richard Thompson and several others. He was very much esteemed at Paris by Montigni and Du Moulin ministers, and by Casaubon who bestowed great elogies on his learning and piety. He afterwards made the tour of France, and visited at Blois, Nicolas Vignier the great Historian; at Samur Philip Birgan, a Breton called thither by Du Pleffis and the academical Senate to be Professor of the Oriental tongues. He spent some months in 1606, at Montauban, where the Divinity Professor Sonius shewed a particular esteem for him, and at Montelimar where the famous Daniel Chamier discovered a tender affection for him (3).

[C] He had leave to go to the Duke of Rohan for some months in 1632. This Duke was then Ambassador extraordinary from the King of France and General of his armies in the country of the Grisons. He sent a gentleman to Geneva with letters to the government, and the Pastors, to desire them to send him a minister to reside with him, with whom he might advise on those things which might tend to the good of the Reformed Churches in that country, that were ill treated by the Spaniards. Theodorus Tronchin was sent to him only for some months. The necessities of the Academy could not allow of his long stay. The term being expired, it was prolonged for two months at the instance of the Duke of Rohan. The churches of the Grisons preserved a great veneration for his person, and very gratefully acknowledged the good offices he had done them (4).

(3) Taken from the same Memoir.

(4) Ibid.

TRUBERUS

TRUBERUS. TULENUS. TULLIA.

405

(a) Konig. Bibl. pag. 810.

TRUBERUS (PRIMUS) was born in Sclavonia in the year 1508 (a). He was the first who taught the art of writing in the Sclavonian tongue (b), and he translated into that language the New Testament, the Catechism, the Augsborg confession, and some tracts of Melanchthon: which was the cause that Lutheranism spread not only in Carniola and Carinthia, but also in the dominions of the great Turk (c). He died in the year 1586 (d), and left a son named FELICIAN TRUBERUS, who was minister at Laubach in Carniola, and had been educated at Tubingen in the college where the Duke of Wirtemberg maintained at his own charge a certain number of students (e).

(c) Hailbrunnensis, Epist. Dedicat. Comment. in Jeroniam.

(b) Primus linguam Sclavonicam in literas referre docuit. Phil. Hailbrunnerus, Epist. Dedic. Comment. in Jeroniam. Primus excogitavit artem scribendi lingua Vandalica. Konig. Biblioth. pag. 810. (c) Konig. ibid. (d) Ibid. (e) Ibid.

TULENUS, a learned man in the reign of Henry II, had been preceptor to the Cardinal, and to the Admiral de Chatillon (a). He was affected with a sort of folly which did not prejudice his reason and judgment in any thing else but his amorous passion for a certain princess, which miserably distracted him. Of which Pasquier, an eye-witness, relates some circumstances [A].

(a) Pasquier's Letters, book xix, pag. 541, 542, book xxii, pag. 791.

(1) Pasquier's Letters, book xix, pag. 541.

[A] Of which Pasquier, an eye-witness, relates some circumstances. Proposing some objections against the common opinion of Physicians, that the judgment, imagination, and memory, are three faculties which are lodged in three separate ventricles of the brain, he saith that the distinction of the three ventricles is insufficient, and that the ventricle of judgment, and that of memory ought to be subdivided as often as either of them acts differently in us. And to prove these different operations, he observes that in the reign of Francis I, One Villenachon resided at court, whose judgment never appeared touched on any other account than his expecting to marry ladies of great quality (1); and after him, continues he, 'Tulenus a learned man whose judgment was entire in every thing else but a passion, which he had ridiculously vowed to one of the first Princesses of France, who was dead. With this person I once diverted myself at my own table, when several men of honour, who were strangers, and not in the least acquainted with him were present. He entertained us till the middle of our dinner with an infinite variety of learned and judicious discourse, to the admiration of all who heard him. At last believing I had sufficiently prejudiced the company in his favour, and that it was now time to make the good old man play another part, I took occasion seemingly by accident to speak of this Princess; after which quitting his amble he immediately began to trot, relating an incoherent crowd of follies, concerning the good and ill treatment he had met with from her. The company amazed from whence this sudden change proceeded, could not tell what to think of him, he having before talked so wittily and learnedly. But after he was gone, I at large acquainted them with the reason of the alteration of his brain. Besides what I have related, it was observed of him, that the judging part being wounded on this subject, had also affected the imaginative so much, that at the first sight of any young lady whom he met with, he was persuaded it was his Julia, (as he called his pretended mistress in Latin, and Jolivet in French) and guided by this foolish imagination, he sometimes walked in his gown and square-cap as far as Fontaine-Bleau, persuading himself that she hid herself there. I relate nothing concerning him but what I have seen or heard of him (2). This example confirms what we have seen in another place (3), that some persons lose common sense with regard to some things, who nevertheless by the rest of their conduct plainly convince us that their sense, knowledge, and reason are entire and in a flourishing condition (4).

(2) Pasquier repeats the same thing much in the same words in the xxiiid book, pag. 791. But he says there that Tulenus was crazy in two respects, in aiming at the bishopric of Cambray, and in his love for that great Princess. See Sorel's remarks upon the Berger extravagant, pag. 176, 177.

(3) Above, towards the end of remark [E], of the article MARESTS (JOHN DEKS).

(4) See Fromon de Anima, lib. iv, cap. iv.

TULLIA, Cicero's daughter, is so often mentioned in that great man's epistles, that her history deserves to be enquired into. She was born the 5th of August (a), but the year is unknown to us. Some very learned men believe that she was married to her first husband in the year 689 (b). His name was Caius Pifo [A]. He was a man of strict honour, he interested himself with the utmost concern in the affairs of his father-in-law [B], and wanted neither capacity nor eloquence. It is thought he died during Cicero's exile, which was in 696. TULLIA was a second time married to Furius Craffipes the following year [C]. It is not known how she was separated from this husband; whether he died, or whether she was divorced from him: we are only told that in 703 she was married to Publius Cornelius Dolabella. This third marriage was contracted during Cicero's absence, when he was governor of Cilicia. Those friends whom

(a) Cicero, Orat. pro Sextio, & Epist. i, lib. iv, ad Atticum.

(b) See the remark [A].

(1) Corradus, in Quentura, pag. m. 83, and after him Sagittarius, in Vita Tullie, m. 5, & 11.

(2) See Cicero, Grevius's edition, Epist. ad Attic. Tom. i, pag. 33. And in Manutius's Commentary, pag. 18.

(3) Orat. pro Sextio, pag. m. 73.

[A] His name was Caius Pifo. This is not to be doubted of, if we consider these words: 'Tulliam C. Pisoni L. F. Frugi despondimus. . . . I have given my daughter Tullia in marriage to Caius Pifo.' So Tully concludes the third epistle of his first book to Atticus. It is thought to have been written in the consulship of Lucius Julius Cæsar, and Caius Martius Figulus, in the year 689 (1); but no reason is alleged for that date, and I find no hint in the letter itself to countenance it. Casaubon believes it was written before the year 686, and that Tullia was not above twelve years old at most when she was married to Caius Pifo (2).

[B] He interested himself with the utmost concern in the affairs of his father-in-law. Cicero could never sufficiently praise him. 'Vexabatur, saith he (3), uxor mea: liberi ad necem quærebantur: gener, & Pifo gener à Pisonis Consulibus pedibus supplex rejectus. . . . My wife was harassed, my children persecuted to death, and the humble petitions of my dear son-in-law Pifo rejected by the consul Pifo.' In one of his Orations (4) he speaks thus: 'Alter fuit propugnator meorum fortunarum & defensor assiduus, summa virtute & pietate C. Pifo gener, qui minas inimicorum meorum, qui inimicitias affinis mei propinqui sui Consulibus, qui Pontum & Bithyniam Questor pro mea salute neglexit. . . . C. Pifo, my son-in-law, a man of great honour and probity, vigorously supported my interest; he despised the threats of my enemies, and the hatred of the Consul, who was allied to me and related to him: and when he was Questor, he neglected Pontus and Bithynia upon my account.' The like passages are to be found in his epistles. See the elogy which he bestows on him with respect to his eloquence and virtue in his treatise de Claris Oratoribus (5).

[C] Tullia was a second time married to Furius Craffipes the following year. See Cicero's epistles to his brother, book the second, epistle 4 and 7. Ludovicus Vives hath (6) reduced these two sons-in-law of Cicero to one: he supposes that Tullia was but twice married, the first time to Pifo Frugi Craffipes, and the second

(4) Post reditum in Senatu. See also his speech Post reditum ad Quirites.

(5) Pag. m. 398.

(6) In August. de Civit. Dei, lib. xix, cap. iv.

VOL. V.

5 K

(c) I mean Terentia, Cicero's wife, and Tullia their daughter.

whom he desired to inform him whether Dolabella was in good circumstances [D], acquitted themselves very ill of that commission; and he afterwards repented that ever he had consented to that match, before he could himself enquire into Dolabella's affairs, which were not in a very good posture. He was a young man who lived irregularly [E]; but knew so well how to cajole the mother and the daughter (c) [F], that they winked at his debaucheries, and looked on him as a good match. He gave his father-in-law very second to Cornelius Dolabella, and that she died in child-bed in the house of the latter. We shall refute this below (7).

(7) In the remark [N].

[D] To inform him whether Dolabella was in good circumstances. I only advance this as a conjecture which I borrow from the learned Manutius: it is very probable and founded on some expressions of Cicero. He tells Atticus: 'Tullia mea venit ad me pridie Idus Jun. deque tua erga se observantia benevolentiaque mihi plurima exposuit, literasque reddidit trinas: ego autem ex ipsius virtute, humanitate, pietate non modò eam voluptatem non cepi, quam capere ex singulari filia debui; sed etiam incredibili sum dolore affectus, tale ingenium in tam misera fortuna versari, idque accidere nullo ipsius delicto, summa culpa mea (8). -- My daughter Tullia came to me the 12th of June, and acquainted me with the respect and civility you had shown her, and delivered to me three letters: but I am so far from conceiving pleasure, as I ought, on account of her extraordinary virtue, good nature, and piety, that I am overwhelmed with sorrow, because those excellent qualities are attended with unhappy circumstances of life, and that through no fault of her own, but mine.' Let us now see how the two last words are paraphrased by Manutius. 'Mea enim negligentia factum est, ut Dolabellæ nuberet: quem ego probare generum non debui, nisi prius omnia percrutatus, non solum quod ad mores, sed etiam quod ad facultates attineret: quod si fecissem, ejus ære alieno perpecto, nunquam passus essem, ut homini in tanta rei domesticæ difficultate constituto filia mea collocaretur; sed commisi, ut me absente res per amicos ageretur, quibus in Cilicium proficiscens ita mandavi (9), ut, quoniam ego tam longe abfuturus eram, de Tullia meâ matrimonio agerent ipsi quod probassent. in quo meam negligentiam agnosco, tantam enim rem aliis committere non debui, sed in reditu meum integram reservare. -- For it was owing to my negligence that she was married to Dolabella: whom I should not have approved of for a son-in-law, until I had first enquired into every thing, not only with respect to his morals, but likewise with regard to his circumstances: which had I done, and found that he was plunged in debt, I would never have suffered my daughter to be married to a man labouring under such difficulties: but I agreed that the affair should be managed by friends in my absence; to whom I gave a power, as I was going into Cilicia, and was to be absent so long, to do whatever they thought proper in the marriage of my daughter Tullia; wherein I acknowledge my fault, for I ought not to have trusted a matter of that importance to others, but to have deferred it entirely till my return.' This author confirms his paraphrase in the following manner: 'Cur autem hoc à Cicerone putem significari, facit Epistola ad Terentiam his verbis scripta: Tullia nostra venit ad me pridie idus Jun. cujus summa virtute et singulari humanitate graviore etiam sum dolore affectus, nostra factum esse negligentia, ut longe alia in fortuna esset, atque ejus pietas ac dignitas postulabat. Dixit autem, Tale ingenium in tam misera fortuna versari, hoc sensu; quod Tullia virum haberet tam perditum, tam flagitiosum, tam multa in tribunatu nefarie molientem: siquidem in tribunatu iniquas leges ferre Dolabella conatus est, maxime debitorum causa, è quibus ipse unus erat (10). -- I am inclined to think that this is Cicero's meaning, from the following epistle to Terentia: My Tullia came to me the 12th of June, whose great virtue and singular good nature gives me the greater trouble, as it was through my negligence that she did not meet with a fortune suitable to her piety and merit. The reason why he says, Those excellent qualities were attended with unhappy circumstances of life, was, because Tullia had a debauched and profligate husband, who excited tumults in Rome whilst he was Tribune of the people: for Dolabella in his tribuneship endeavoured to enact unjust

(8) Epist. xvii, lib. xi.

(9) This appears from these words of Cicero. In quo unum verum ne tu parum perspicuas ea que gesta sunt ab aliis esse gesta, quibus ego ita mandaram, ut cum tam longe abfuturus essem ad me ne referrent, agerent quod probassent. -- Wherein I am afraid you do not attend to one thing, viz. that what was done, was done by others, to whom I gave a commission, as I was to be absent a long time, to manage in that affair as they should think fit, without referring it to me. Epist. xii, lib. iii, ad Familiares, wherein he excuses himself for having married Tullia to Dolabella, the accuser of Appian, to whom he writes.

(10) Manutius quotes Dion in this place.

laws, especially in behalf of debtors, whereby he himself was one.

[E] He was a young man who lived irregularly. Cælius hinted it to Cicero, when he congratulated him on that marriage: I shall cite his own words because they contain the very compliment we should make at present in a like case. He excuses what was past on account of his youth, and though he durst not venture to assure him, that all the failings of that age were mended, yet he hoped the marrying such an accomplished lady, the daughter of such a father, would certainly compleat the cure. 'Gratulor tibi affinitate viri medius fidius optimi. Nam hoc ego de illo existimo. Cetera porro quibus adhuc ille sibi parum utilis fuit, & ætate jam sunt decursa, & consuetudine atque autoritate tua & pudore Tullia, si qua restabunt, confido celeriter sublata iri. Non est enim pugnax in vitiis, neque hebes ad id quod melius sit intelligendum (11). -- I congratulate you upon your affinity with a man, that is in truth an excellent person: for such is my opinion of the eighth book of him. As to those follies he may have been guilty of to his own prejudice, they are now cured with age; or if any still remain, I dare say he will be reclaimed by your company and authority, and by the virtue of Tullia. For he is not obstinate in his failings, and he has sense enough to know how to behave better.' Observe what Cælius says, that age had already cured the vicious inclinations of Dolabella. This inclines me to believe that Appian was mistaken when he affirmed (12) that Dolabella was not above twenty-five years of age when Cæsar was killed. He must then have been but eighteen or nineteen when he married Tullia. Was it then reasonable to say that the vicious course of his youth was past? But here are yet other difficulties against Appian. The commentators on Cicero will have the following words to be meant of Dolabella: 'Illud verò mihi permirum accidit, tantam temeritatem fuisse in eo adulescente, cujus ego salutem duobus capitibus judiciis summa contentione defendi, ut tuis inimicitias suscipiendis oblivisceretur patroni omnium fortunarum ac rationum suarum: præsertim cum tu omnibus vel ornamentis vel præditiis redundares, illi (ut levissimè dicam) multa defessent. cujus sermo stultus & puerilis erat jam antea ad me a M. Cælio, familiari nostro, percriptus: de quo item sermone multa scripta sunt abs te. Ego autem citius cum eo qui tuas inimicitias suscepisset, veterem conjunctionem diremisset quam novam conciliaissem. -- I am very much surprised that that young man, whose life with great difficulty I saved, when he was twice indicted for capital crimes, should be so indiscreet as to become your enemy and forget the patron and guardian of all his fortune: especially considering the vast honours and powerful interest you enjoyed, whilst he (to speak moderately) is in great want. Our friend M. Cælius had before informed me by a letter of his filly and childish discourse, concerning which you have likewise writ much. I had rather break off an old acquaintance with one that is your avowed enemy than contract a new one.' Cicero wrote this in 703, when he was in Cilicia, before Dolabella was his son-in-law. The epistle, of which these words are part, was written to a person whom Dolabella had accused (13). It seems therefore that they cannot be meant of any body else besides Dolabella. But it would be very strange, that before the age of eighteen a person should be twice arraigned for capital crimes. Besides I find that Tullia was not Dolabella's first wife. He had one who left him when he accused Appian (14).

[F] He knew so well how to cajole the mother and the daughter. This we may infer from these words of Cicero to Atticus (15). 'Ego, dum in provincia cum omnibus rebus Appium orno, subito sum factus accusator ejus socer. id quidem, inquis, dii approbent, ita velim: neque ita cupere certo scio. fed

(11) See Cicero's eighth Epistle of the eighth book of Familiares.

(12) Appian. lib. iv, de Bell. Civili.

(13) To Appian Pulcher. That letter is the 2th of the third book of the third book of Familiares.

(14) Inter petitionem & nominationem delationem uxoris à Dolabella discessit. Epist. vii, lib. viii, Cic. ad Familiares.

(15) Epist. lib. vii.

very great uneasiness [G], by the tumults which he excited in Rome when he was tribune of the people. He endeavoured to establish a law very prejudicial to creditors; for he pretended that debtors should not be forced to the payment of their debts, either by personal imprisonment or seizure of their effects. Mark Antony was obliged (d) to bring some troops into the city, who fell upon the favourites of Dolabella, of which they killed eight hundred [H]. Poor Tullia was unhappy in her last husband; and it is not to be doubted that her journey to Brundisium [I] to speak with her father, proceeded amongst other reasons from the necessity of consulting him how to behave herself towards so troublesome a husband. She was divorced from him [K], and yet Cicero always treated

(d) He was at that time General of the Horse, under the second dictatorship of Julius Cæsar, the year after the battle of Pharsalia.

Dolabella

‘crede mihi, nihil minus putaram ego, qui de Ti. Nerone, qui mecum egerat, certos homines ad mulieres miseram, qui Romam venerunt factis sponsalibus. sed hoc spero melius. mulieres quidem valde intelligo delectari OBSEQUIO ET COMITATE adolescentis, cætera non ἐξαναδίζω. --- Whist I am heaping favours on Appius in the province, I am on a sudden become father-in-law to his accuser: you wish it may prove fortunate, you say: I wish so too; and I am certain you heartily desire it. But believe me, there is nothing I less expected; for I had sent some persons to my wife and daughter concerning Ti. Nero, who had made proposals to me; but before they came to Rome, the match was concluded. I hope it will be for the better. I understand the women were wonderfully charmed WITH THE COMPLAISANCE AND CIVILITY of the young man, but did not examine into other matters.’ Terentia and Tullia were so charmed with the complaisance and civility of this young man that they pardoned his faults, and did not enquire into his life. The same thing frequently happens in our time. A young debauchee who renders himself agreeable by his deportment, and by acting the well-bred man, will so insinuate himself into the favour of both mothers and daughters, that they will not consider whether he has wasted his whole estate; he will exclude his rivals though more deserving than he, if they are not of the same obliging and complaisant behaviour. Let us have him, he pleases our eyes. This undoubtedly utterly ruined the affairs of the other suitor to Tullia, who was not Titus Nero, but Tiberius Nero: probably the same who married Livia, and was father to the Emperor Tiberius. Some authors believe that Dolabella by his flatteries and obliging civilities so touched Tullia’s heart, that she easily excused his almost dwarfish shape: for it is to him that Tully’s jest is applied, Who has fastened my son-in-law to his sword (16)? Their conjecture may be a little helped by Macrobius, who calls Lentulus the son-in-law, whom Cicero rallied in that manner (17). This surname agrees better with Dolabella than with Piso and Furius; for the Lentuli were a branch of the Cornelian family, and perhaps the Dolabella’s were of the branch of the Lentuli. See below a passage of Alconius Pedianus.

[G] He gave Cicero very great uneasiness. Not to repeat what I have said in the article of Dolabella concerning the new laws which he proposed in favour of debtors, I shall content myself with citing one or two proofs of his father-in-law’s uneasiness. ‘O dii, faith be in a letter to Atticus (18), generum ne nostrum potissimum, ut hoc, vel tabulas novas. Quod me audis, faith be in another letter (19), fractionem esse animo, quid putas, cum videas accessisse ad superiores ægritudines præclaras generi actiones? --- Can you wonder to hear I am dejected in mind, when you see the glorious actions of my son-in-law are added to my former troubles.’

[H] Of which they killed eight hundred. We should have had the particulars of this action, if Livy had come to us entire; for in the summary of his 113th book we find: ‘Quum seditiones Romæ à P. Dolabella tribuno plebis legem ferente de novis tabulis excitatæ essent, & ex ea causa plebs tumultuaretur, inducis à M. Antonio Magistro equitum in urbem militibus octingenti è plebe cæsi sunt. --- When seditions were excited at Rome by P. Dolabella, Tribune of the people, who enacted a new law concerning creditors, and on that account the people mutinied, Mark Anthony, Master of the Horse, having brought some troops into the city, eight hundred of the people were slain.’ All Historians represent the city at that time in a dismal condition. It is true that the inhabitants of Rome were so accustomed to bloodshed in their streets, and in the assemblies of the people, by the animosity of contrary factions, that they were less surprized than we at this time should be, to see their city filled with guards continually ready to fall on one another.

[I] Her journey to Brundisium. Her miserable condition which she laid open to her father, overwhelmed him with grief; in so much, that this interview which on another occasion would have afforded this tender father the greatest pleasure, turned into an insupportable affliction: this appears from the words above cited in the remark [D], citation 8, and those in a letter written to his wife Terentia. ‘Tullia nostra venit ad me pridie Idus Junii: cujus summa virtute, & singulari humanitate, graviore etiam sum dolore affectus, nostra factum esse negligentia, ut longe alia in fortuna esset, atque ejus pietas, ac dignitas postulabat (20). --- My daughter Tullia came to me the 12th of June; whose great virtue and extraordinary good nature gives me the greater trouble, as it was through my negligence that she did not meet with a fate suitable to her piety and merit.’ Cicero did not detain his daughter long there, he sent her home; her presence not being able to lessen their mutual affliction. ‘Tulliam autem non videbam esse causam cur diutius mecum tanto in communi more retinerem: itaque matri eam, cum primum per ipsam liceret, eram remissurus. --- But I saw no reason to keep Tullia with me longer in our mutual great affliction: and therefore I sent her back to her mother as soon as she could go.’ This he writes to his friend Atticus in the seventeenth epistle of his eleventh book.

[K] She was divorced from him. This is not to be doubted of if we consider Sulpicius’s hint in his consolatory letter on her death. Amongst other reasons he offers this, viz. that in the unhappy posture of affairs, nothing could engage Tullia to desire to live, seeing her father could not have found a good husband for her. This supposes that she was perfectly disengaged from the conjugal bonds. ‘Quoties in eam cogitationem necesse est & tu veneris, & nos sæpe incidimus, hisce temporibus non pessime cum iis esse actum quibus sine dolore licitum est mortem cum vita commutare? Quid autem fuit quod illam hoc tempore ad vivendum magnopere invitare posset? quæ res? quæ spes? quod animi solatium? Ut cum aliquo adolescente primario conjuncta ætatem gereret? Licetum est tibi (credo) pro tua dignitate ex hac juventute generum diligere, cujus fides liberos tuos te tuto committere putares (21). --- How often must you have thought, as I have frequently done, that in such a situation of affairs, those had no reason to complain who were permitted without pain to exchange life for death? What was there that could much induce Tullia to desire to live? What thing? What hope? What pleasure of mind? Could she have spent her days in marriage with any young man of the first rank? It was in your power (I believe) considering your dignity, to choose a son-in-law from amongst that youth, had you thought a good one could have been found.’ If this proof was insufficient I would offer those places in Cicero’s letters concerning the restitution of her portion. ‘Teneor tamen dum à Dolabella procuratoribus exigam primam pensionem (22). --- I am detained till I receive the first payment from Dolabella’s agents.’ Some think that Dolabella designing to divorce Tullia, pressed the establishment of the new law, that he might not be obliged to refund her fortune to Cicero (23). It is surprizing that Alconius Pedianus was so ill informed of the fate of Tullia, as to affirm that after Piso’s death she married Lentulus, and died in child-bed at his house (24). Which are two or three mistakes.

[L] Cicero

(16) Adeo placuit Tullie novi sponsi comitas, ut minori ejus statura non offenderetur. Notus est Ciceronis locus, Quis generum meum alligavit gladio? Cæsar Sagittarius, in Vita Tullie, num. 30.

(17) M. Cicero cum Lentulum generum suum exigue nature hominem longo gladio acinsum vidisset, Quis, inquit, generum meum ad gladium alligavit? Macrobius Saturnalis, lib. ii, cap. iii.

(18) The xxiii of the xth book.

(19) The xliii of the same book.

(20) Cicero, Epist. xi, lib. xiv, ad Familiarem.

(21) Epist. v, lib. iv, Cicero, ad Familiarem, pag. m. 192.

(22) Epist. xviii, lib. vi, ad Familiarem, scripsit ubi Cæsar was in Spain: against Pompey’s sons.

(23) See Cicero, Grævius’s edition, Tom. ii, Epist. ad Attic. pag. 270.

(24) Cicero filiam post mortem Pisonis generi P. Lentulo collocavit apud quem illa ex partu decessit. Alcon. Pedian. in Grat. Cicero, contra L. Pisonem, pag. 157.

Dolabella as tenderly as possibly he could [L], till after the murder of Trebonius, he fell on

[L] Cicero always treated Dolabella as tenderly as possibly he could.] He doubtless had a greater share of capacity than reticulation, and he saw Pompey's party running into ruin more and more by the continual victories of Julius Cæsar. He probably feared that the conqueror would at last cease to shew his clemency, and would make away with such as had a republican spirit, and were men endowed with parts sufficient to oppose him. He knew that Dolabella was in very great credit with Cæsar: after which it is needless to ask why Cicero dissimbled his resentment against his son-in-law. His kind treatment of him kept him within the compass of friendship; for Dolabella stood Cicero's friend at Julius Cæsar's court, in opposition to those who endeavoured to render him odious, and a little after the death of Tullia he desired to be acquainted with the posture of his affairs. 'Quod scribis prælia te mea causa sustinere non tam id laboro, ut si qui mihi obtestent à te refutentur, quam intelligi cupio quod certe intelligitur me à te amari (25).--As to what you write, that you stand severe on my account; I am not so solicitous to have those brunts on my account; as to have it known that refused by you who asperse me, as to have it known that

(25) Epist. xi,
lib. ix, ad Fa-miliares.

(26) The xith
of the ixth book
ad Familiares.

(27) Philipp. I,
pag. m. 690,
691.

(28) Talisque
everfio illius excratæ columnæ.
Ibid. pag. 674.
I have cited the whole passage in the article DO-LABELLA, citation (18).

(29) In Cæsar.
cap. lxxxv.

pore, long time, is a mistake, which clearly proves that Suetonius had not read the first Philippic, or at least did not remember it; for that oration informs us, that the column was destroyed before the first of June. Cicero's letters tell us, that it was pulled down before the first of May (30). Now Cæsar was killed the fifteenth of the preceding March. But to return to the good correspondence betwixt Cicero and Dolabella: nothing could be more endearing than the letter which Cicero wrote to him on account of this column. 'Cum te semper tantum dilexerim quantum tu intelligere potuisti, tum his tuis factis hic incensum, ut nihil unquam in amore fuerit ardentius (31) Cicero, Epist. xiv. lib. i., ad Famil. pag. m. 32. 'Am, I always had a great affection for you, thefe your actions have so inflamed my love, that nothing ever exceeded it.' He doth not forget to acquaint him that he himself passed for the author of this good advice; and the turn of his thought is admirable. 'Eti contentus eram, mi Dolabella, tua gloria, fatique ex ea magnam lætitiâ voluptatè capiebam, tamen non possum non confiteri, cumulari me maximo gaudio, quod vulgo hominum opinio solum me adscribat tuis laudibus. Neminem conveni, convenio autem quotidie plurimos quin omnes, cum te summis laudibus ad cælum extulerunt, mihi continuo maximas gratias agant. Negant enim se dubitare, quin tu meis præceptis & consiliis attemperans præstantissimum te civem & singularem consulem præbeas. Quibus ego quamquam verissime possum respondere te quæ facias tuo iudicio & tua sponte facere, nec cuiusquam egere consilio: tamen neque plane assentior, ne imminuam tuam laudem, si omnis à meis consiliis profecta videatur: neque valde nego, sum enim avidior etiam quam satis est gloriæ. . . . A te autem peto, ut me hanc quasi falsam hereditatem alienæ gloriæ finas cernere, meque aliqua ex parte, in societatem tuarum laudum venire patiari: quamquam, mi Dolabella, (hæc enim jocus sum) libentius omnes meas, si modo sunt aliquæ meæ laudes, ad te transfererim, quam aliquam partem exhauserim ex tuis (32). . . . Tho' I was contented, (32) Id. lib. i. pag. 30. 'my Dolabella, with your glory, and received sufficient pleasure and satisfaction from it; yet I must own it was a vast addition to my joy, that people generally thought me intitled to a share in your honour. Every body I meet with, (and I daily meet with great numbers . . .) whenever they extol you to the skies, continually thank me at the same time. For they say, they do not question, but that by following my directions and counsels you shew yourself to be an excellent citizen, and an extraordinary Consul. Tho' I might truly answer them, that what you do, proceeds entirely from your own judgment and inclination, and that you do not want the advice of any body: yet I neither can cur with them altogether, lest I should lessen your merit, if it were thought to flow entirely from my counsels: nor do I very much contradict them, for I am more covetous of glory than I ought to be. . . . But I beg of you to allow me to usurp another's glory: and suffer me, in some measure, to be a partner in your reputation: tho', my dear Dolabella, (for I spoke in jest) I had rather transfer to you all my fame, if I had any, than to diminish yours in the least.' He seems to be transported when he speaks of this action to his friend Atticus. See Epist. xv and xvi of the sixth book, and the first letter of the xiiith book of the Familiaris. I have somewhere read that he designed to go to Syria Dolabella's lieutenant, if Hirtius and Pansa, who were to be Consuls the next year, had not dissuaded him. He let Dolabella go without him, and embarked for Athens, after having promised to return when Hirtius and Pansa should enter on the consulship. Contrary winds retarded his voyage, and he received some advices from his friends, which engaged him to return speedily to Rome. The day after his arrival the senate was assembled, but he did not appear there, at which Mark Antony was offended. This is what we find in Amyot's translation of Plutarch's life of Cicero. One might convict Plutarch of a mistake, if the phrase which he makes use of (33), and Amyot translates, he let Dolabella go, was not equivocal: but as it may barely signify, he thought no more of Dolabella, he left him, this criticism only affects the translator. He was in the wrong to think that Dolabella departed from Rome before Cicero; for the first Philippic was pronounced

(30) Epist. xv,
lib. xiv, ad Atticum.

. (31) Cicero,
Epist. xiv, lib.
ix, ad Famil.
pag. m. 32.

ed, (32) Id. 1111

take,
Amyot (33) Δολοβέ-
: but λαν μὲν εἶατο abella, χαίρειν. Dola-bellam missum flator. fecit. Plutarch. in parted Ciccr. p. 882, E.
ic was ounced

on him with his whole stock of rhetorical figures (e) [M]. Tullia died in the year 708 [N]. Her father remained inconsolable for some time [O]: his friends used all their pronounced in Dolabella's presence, after Cicero's return. This obliges me to repeat what I have several times said, that it is extremely difficult to translate well; for tho' we may take the expressions of the original in the most probable sense, that doth not always secure us against mistakes; and the knowledge of a thousand particular events is necessary to direct us to express the true sense. For instance, if Amyot had remembered that Dolabella was present in the senate as consul, when Cicero spoke his first Philippic; if he had remembered that Cicero, in that oration, urged his reasons for departing from Rome, and the motives of his return, he would not have translated those words of Plutarch, be let Dolabella go. After all, I do not dispute the fact; I see no reason against my believing that Cicero designed to follow Dolabella into Syria. This is a fresh proof of the text of this remark.

(e) See the article DOLABELLA.

[M] Till after the murder of Trebonius he fell on him with his whole stock of rhetorical figures. He had reason to censure very severely such enormous perfidy and cruelty; but he should have taken care not to contradict himself, and expose his reputation too much. He had protested a great value for Dolabella in several letters, and afterwards in his Philippics he declared that he never had any merit, and had been always a wicked wretch. 'Dolabella quidem tam fuit immemor humanitatis, quamquam ejus NUM- QUAM particeps fuerit, ut suam insatiabilem crudelitatem exercuerit non solum in vivo, sed etiam in mortuo, ac in ejus corpore lacerando atque vexando cum animum satiare non posset oculos paverit suos (34). . . . Dolabella was so void of humanity, tho' indeed he never had any, that he not only exercised his excessive cruelty on him when alive, but likewise when dead, and when he could not satiate his mind, he set his eyes in tearing and mangling his corpse.' He makes him equal to Mark Antony in all sorts of vice.

(34) Philippica XI, pag. 827, Edit. Græv.

'Duo hæc capita nata sunt post homines natos tetrica & spurcissima Dolabella & Antonius. . . . Ecce tibi gemitum in scelere par, insitatum, inauditum, ferum, barbarum. Itaque, quorum summum quondam inter ipsos odium, bellumque meminitis, eodem postea singulari inter se consensu, & amore devinxit impurissimæ naturæ & turpissimæ vitæ similitudo (35). . . . Dolabella and Antonius are two of the most cruel and infamous wretches that ever lived. . . . They are a couple not to be paralleled in wickedness, cruelty, and barbarity. And therefore the similitude of their most impure natures and flagitious lives has united them in mind, and affection, tho' you remember they formerly were at great variance, and mortally hated one another.' What could he say more? And when he affirms, that to compare Trebonius with Dolabella were to treat the former very unjustly, he expresses himself thus, for the passage deserves to be transcribed: 'Nam cæteris quidem vitæ partibus quis est qui possit sine Trebonii maxima contumelia conferre vitam? Trebonii cum Dolabellæ? alterius consilium, ingenium, humanitatem, innocentiam, magnitudinem animi in patria liberanda quis ignorat? alteri à puero pro deliciis crudelitas fuit; deinde ea libidinum turpitudine, ut in hoc sit semper ipse lætatus, quod ea faceret, quæ sibi objici ne ab inimico quidem possent verecundo: & hic, dii immortales, aliquando fuit meus, occulta enim erant vitia non inquerenti. Neque nunc fortasse alienus ab eo essem, nisi ille vobis, nisi mœnibus patriæ, nisi huic urbi, nisi diis penatibus, nisi aris, & focus omnium nostrum, nisi denique naturæ, & humanitati inventus esset inimicus. . . . For in other respects, who can compare Trebonius with Dolabella, without doing great injustice to Trebonius? Every body knows the wisdom, the temper, the humanity, the innocence, and heroic spirit of the former in delivering his country: but the latter delighted in cruelty from his cradle; and is guilty of such abominable lust, that he was always pleased to think, that he could not be upbraided with it even by an enemy who was modest: and this very man, O heavens! was formerly my son-in-law; for as I did not enquire into his life, his vices were concealed from me. And, perhaps, I should not appear against him now, were he not found to be an enemy to you, to his country, to his city, to his domestic gods, to the religion, and liberty of us all, and lastly, to nature and humanity.'

(35) Idem, in eadem Oratione, ibid.

VOL. V.

[N] Tullia died in the year 708. Cæsar was then in Spain engaged against Pompey's sons. The consolatory letter which he wrote to Cicero on this occasion was dated from Hispalis (36). Which is a strong proof of my text: that which Plutarch furnishes me with, is not satisfactory: it is not clear enough, nor free from some errors. This Historian having spoken of the divorce of Terentia, adds (37), that Cicero afterwards married a young woman, and that Tullia died in child-bed not long after this match. She died, continues he, at Lentulus's house, to whom she was married after the death of Piso, her first husband. To prove from this, that Tullia died in 708, one thing ought to be supposed, which Plutarch doth not mention, viz. that Cicero married his second wife in 708 (38). And as for the rest, it plainly appears, that Plutarch did not well consult Tully's Epistles, for he would there have been informed, that Tullia's second husband's name was Furius Crassipes, and that she died divorced from her third husband who was Dolabella. A modern author (39), in order to prove that Tullia did not die in child-bed, and that she was with child when divorced by Dolabella, alleges the following passage of Cicero: 'Tullia mea peperit XIV. Kal. Jun. puerum ἐπ' αὐγασίας, quod μὴ τὸ κρῖνον gaudebam; quod quidem est natum perimbecillum est (40). . . . On the 19th of May my daughter Tullia was brought to bed of a boy in the seventh month: I was glad she was safely delivered; but the child is very weak.' He ought to have known that Cicero wrote this before the battle of Pharsalia, and that consequently these words are of no use to prove that Tullia did not die in labour, and that she was divorced when big with child. What he should have alleged I find in another letter written during the last war which Cæsar made in Spain. The words are: 'Me Romæ tenuit omnino Tullia: meæ partus; sed cum ea, quemadmodum spero, satis firma sit, teneor tamē dum à Dolabellæ procuratoribus exigam primam pensionem (41). . . . The lying-in of my daughter Tullia detained me at Rome; but tho' she be now, as I hope, pretty well, yet I stay till I receive the first payment from Dolabella's agents.' Let us favour Plutarch and Alconius Pedianus as much as we please, we shall yet be forced to accuse them of having expressed themselves ill. Cicero, whose credit in this case outweighs that of an hundred Historians, informs us, that Tullia was pretty well after her delivery: so that the best supposition we can make in favour of Plutarch and Alconius Pedianus, is that Tullia, before she was perfectly recovered, was surprised by some dissipated incident to child-bed-women, of which she died.

(36) Now called Seville. See the xth letter of the xliith book to Atticus.

(37) Plut. in Cicero, p. 881, 882.

(38) Fabricius, supposes it in vita Ciceronis, pag. m. 193.

(39) Caspar Sagittarius, in Vita Tullia, num. 54.

(40) Epist. xviii, lib. vi, ad Attic.

(41) Epist. xviii, lib. vi, ad Famil.

[O] Cicero was inconsolable for some time. If we believe Plutarch (42), the Philosophers flocked from all parts to Cicero's assistance. They doubtless brought him the choicest of their troops, I mean the most excellent moral reflexions which their topics, or common places, could furnish. But it signified nothing, company was insupportable to Cicero, he confined himself in a solitude, where he found more consolation, than in the discourses of his friends, or his books. 'Quod me ab hoc mœrore recreari vis, facis ut omnia: sed me mihi non defuisse, tu testis es. Nihil enim de mœrore minuendo scriptum ab ullo est, quod ego non domi tuæ legerim. Sed omnem consolationem vincit dolor (43). . . . (44) Ne discessissem quidem è conspectu tuo nisi me plane nihil ulla res adjuvaret . . . mihi adhuc nihil prius fuit hac solitudine . . . me scriptio & litteræ non leniunt sed obturbant (45). . . . The pains you take to divert me from this grief, is a new proof of your friendship: but you can bear me witness that I have not been wanting to myself: for I read at your house whatever has been written to lessen one's sorrow; yet my grief exceeds all consolation. . . . I would not have left you, if pedior, non equidem satis (via enim urget) sed relaxor tamen. He endeavoured to relieve his mind by reading and writing. . . . Reading tude was preferable to every thing else. . . . Reading and writing do not comfort, but disturb me.' He protests, in another epistle (46), that solitude seemed to him the most supportable thing in the world. 'Nunc omnia respuo, nec quicquam habeo tolerabilius quam solitudinem. . . . Now I reject every thing, and find nothing so tolerable as solitude.' To be sensible of the disorder

(42) In Cicero, pag. 882, A.

(43) Cicero, Epist. xiv, ad Attic. lib. xii.

(44) Ibid. Epist. XVI.

(45) He says much the same thing in lib. xiv, lib. xii, Totos dies scribo, non quo proficiam quid, sed tantisper im- pedior, non equidem satis (via enim urget) sed relaxor tamen. He endeavoured to relieve his mind by reading and writing.

(46) The xviiiith of the same book.

5 L

their endeavours to comfort him : he himself wrote a book on that subject [P], and designed disorder into which his affliction had plunged him, we need only consider his frank confession, that he sunk under his grief, and at the same time reflect on the ostentation with which he brags of his courage. He willingly boasted that he was inconsolable, but would by no means endure the reproaches of too much weakness. Sentiments utterly incompatible. Quod

(47) Epist. xxviii, ejusd. Libri.

me ipse per literas consolatus sum non poenitet me potui, nec si possem, vellem (47). - - I do not repent my having endeavoured to comfort myself by reading. I have lessened my affliction, but I neither could nor would get rid of my grief. Here is a man who neither could, nor would abate his grief. In hac solitudine careo omnium colloquio; cumque mane me in silvam abstrusi densam & asperam, non exeo inde ante vesperum, secundum te nil est mihi amicus solitudinis, in ea mihi omnis sermo est cum litteris, eum tamen interpellat fletus: cui repugno quoad possum, sed adhuc pares non sumus (48). - - In this solitude I am without any company and conversation; in the morning I hide myself in the thickest and most obscure part of the wood, and continue there till night: next to you there is nothing so agreeable to me as solitude: all my conversation in it is with books; but it is interrupted with tears, which I endeavour to refrain from as much as possible, but hitherto I have not been able to do it. He hid himself in the obscurest place of a wood from morning till night, and could not refrain from tears. Doth not he almost own that he had lost his senses? In consolationis libro quem in medio (NON ENIM SAPIENTES ERAMUS) morore & dolore conscripsimus (49). - - In the book on Consolation which I wrote (FOR I WAS NOT IN MY SENSES) in the height of my grief and sorrow. Doth not he confess that he had shamefully surrendered his arms to fortune (50)? But let us see, on the other side, how he glories in his courage (51).

(48) Epist. xv, ejusd. Libri.

(49) Tufcul. Quest.

(50) Lactantio teste affirmavit se tum a fortuna victum turpiter. Sagittar. ubi supra, num. 57, and before him Corradus, in Questura, pag. m. 294.

(51) Epist. xl, lib. xii, ad Atticum.

(52) A country-house, whither he retired after he had left Atticus.

Quod scribis te vereri, ne & gratia & auctoritas nostra hoc meo morore minuat: ego, quid homines aut reprehendant, aut postulent, nescio; ne doleam? qui potest? ne jaceam? quis unquam minus? dum tua me domus levabat, quis à me exclusus? quis venit, qui offenderetur? Asturam sum à te profectus, legere isti læti, qui me reprehendunt, tam multa non possunt, quam ego scripsi, quam bene, nihil ad rem, sed genus scribendi id fuit, quod nemo abjecto animo facere posset. - - You write to me, that you are afraid my interest and authority will suffer by my immoderate grief; for my part I know not what men find fault with, or what they would have: would they have me not to grieve? how is it possible? would they have me not to give way to grief? who ever gave way to it less than I? Whilst I was at your house, did I not always see company? Did ever any come that was offended with me? From your house I went to Astura. Those merry people, that find fault with me, are not able to read so much as I wrote there: how well I did it, is nothing to the purpose; but it was that sort of writing which cannot come from a dejected mind. To those at Rome who took it ill that he hid himself so long, he declared that his employments were not those of a man quite overwhelmed with sorrow. Ne me quidem contemno: meoque judicio multo stare malo, quam omnium reliquorum, neque tamen progredior longius, quam mihi doctissimi homines concedunt: quorum scripta omnia, quæcumque sunt in eam sententiam, non legi solum, quod ipsum erat fortis ægroti, accipere medicinam; sed in mea etiam scripta transuli; quod certe afflicti, & fracti animi non fuit (53). - - I do not think the worse of myself for it; and, in this case, I had much rather acquiesce in my own judgment than that of all others; and yet I do not exceed the bounds that very learned men allow me: all whose writings on this subject I have not only read, like a strong patient, by way of medicine, but also transcribed them in my own writings, which certainly is not a sign of a dejected and broken spirit. See the marginal note (45) above, which makes it appear that writing of books afforded him scarce any relief against his grief, but only a little stupified the part affected. Is this an effect of fortitude?

It must be owned that his affliction is the most convincing proof which he gave of his tender affection for Tullia; but if he had died before her, we should not have wanted proofs of his extraordinary affection to her. All his expressions, when he speaks of her in his epistles, are so many evidences of it; 'Delicia, deliciolæ, mea anima, lux, desiderium. - - My darling, my delight, my soul, my life, my love.' It is very probable that Tullia was endowed with a thousand good qualities, and was one of the most charming ladies of her time, since she so deeply engaged the affection of such a father. Mr Sagittarius (54) conjectures, that she was instructed in polite learning. He had not advanced this as a bare conjecture only, if he had met with the passage hereafter cited of out Lactantius (55). If Plutarch is to be believed (56), one of the causes of Terentia's divorce was, that she would not allow her daughter a sufficient equipage to go to advise with her father at Brundisium. He adds, that Cicero's second wife was divorced, because she rejoiced at Tullia's death. There is no reason to dispute the truth of this with Plutarch, under pretence that Cicero's epistles to Atticus inform us, that this second wife lived a pretty long time with her husband after Tullia's death (57). This objection, I say, would be ill grounded, because it is certain the divorce had been effected the summer after Tullia's death (58).

Cicero's extraordinary affection for his daughter, inspired his enemies with such a boldness as to report that he loved her incestuously: So true it is, that there is nothing so pure from which a satirical genius cannot extract a filthy poison. Those cares which proximity of blood authorizes amongst relations of different sexes, are exposed to sinister interpretations when they are more than ordinary. How doth calumny envelop things! See in the margin (59) what the de-claimer, who assumed the name of Sallust, faith, and remember that Donatus, an antient interpreter of Virgil, believed that this verse of the Æneid, Hic thalamos invasit natæ vetitæque hymenæos (60).

He with his daughter incest did commit.

ought to be understood of Cicero. But Servius rejects this opinion (61).

[P] He himself wrote a book on that subject.] I have cited some passages in the preceding remark that hint at this tract. It is great pity that it is lost. But it is not Sigonius's fault that the public doth not at present believe it is yet extant: he wrote a tract de Consolatione, and endeavoured to make it pass for Cicero's. The judicious Critics (62), prevented the deceit immediately. Sigonius, tho' he published some dissertations against them, did not gain his point. Cicero, on this occasion, seemed like those who eat nothing with pleasure, which they themselves have not a hand in cooking of. All the consolatory arguments which his friends offered either in conversation or by writing were ineffectual. It was his book de Consolatione only which in some measure abated his grief: Quid ego de consolatione dicam, quæ mihi quidem ipsi sane aliquantum medetur; ceteris item multum illam profuturam puto (63). - - What shall I say of my book de Consolatione, which indeed gives some relief to myself, and I believe will be of great service to others.

He observes, that in the greatest of his grief, he began the preparation of this antidote. In consolationis libro quem in medio (non enim sapientes eramus) morore & dolore conscripsimus, quodque vetat Chrysippus ad recentes quasi tumores animi remedium adhibere, id nos fecimus, naturæque vim attulimus, ut magnitudini medicinæ doloris magnitudo concederet (64). - - In the book of Consolation, which I wrote in the height of my grief and sorrow, (for I was not in my right senses) and because Chrysippus forbids to apply a remedy to the fresh wounds of the mind, I have given such strength to nature, that the force of affliction yields to the force of the medicine. This tract abounded with historical passages and instances, as St Jerom (65), and St Augustin inform us. Quis enim sufficit quantovis eloquentiæ flumine vitæ humanæ miseria explicare, quam lamentatus est Cicero in consolatione de morte filię, sicut potuit (66)? - - What man, with the greatest eloquence, can display the miseries of this life, which Cicero bewailed as well as he

(54) Ubi supra, num. 10.

(55) In the remark [R], citation (74).

(56) In Cicero, pag. 88a.

(57) Sed etiam non negavimus Cicero non admodum bene convenisse cum uxore nova, multo tempore post alium Tullia cum Cicero vixisse, ex Epistolis ad Atticum liquet. Sagittarius, in Vita Tullie, num. 70.

(58) See the xxviii letter of the fifth book to Atticus.

(59) Verum, ut opinor, splendens domus illi animos attollet, uxor sacrisque ac perjuris delictis, filia matris pelleret, ubi jucundior atque obsequior quam parenti patet est. - - But in my opinion you are puffed up with pride, on account of your domestic splendour, and your daughter debauched by her mother, who is more agreeable and obsequious to you than she ought to be to a father.

(60) Æn. lib. vi, ver. 623.

(61) Servius in hunc locum Æneidos. See Schottus, in Cicero vindicato, cap. xii, pag. m. 90.

(62) Lipsius, Gaubilus, &c.

(63) De Divitiis lib. ii, inst.

(64) Cicero, in Tufcul. apud Corradum, in Questura, pag. 294.

(65) In Epist. Negotiari.

(66) Augustin. de Civit. Dei. lib. xix, cap. 10.

(f) See the latter end of the remark [O].

(g) See the four first remarks.

designed to build a temple to the deceased, and even to make an apotheosis for her [Q]. His enemies were so base as to accuse him of loving Tullia incestuously (f). Plutarch is mistaken in some parts of her story. He did not know that she had had three husbands (g). Mr Moreri who had Gaspar Sagittarius's dissertation on the history of Tullia (b), did not know how to make the most advantageous use of it; he has scarce extracted any thing of consequence; only a story related by Cœlius Rhodiginus, which Mr Sagittarius has justly banished to the fabulous lands. The project of a temple is by Mr Moreri converted into a real one, furnished with a magnificent Mausoleum. See the

(b) He quotes it; but the Printers have put a comma after Gaspar, which made many readers believe that he had quoted two writers, Gaspar and Sagittarius.

'be could in this book of Consolation.' We shall produce below an observation of Lactantius.

[Q] And even to make an apotheosis for her.] He several times communicated his design to Atticus: but we shall at present content ourselves with two or three passages. 'Habeo nonnullos ex iis, quos nunc lectito, auctores, qui dicant, fieri id oportere, quod sæpe tecum egi, & quod à te approbari volo. de fano illo dico; de quo tantum, quantum me amas, velim cogites; equidem neque de genere dubito; placet enim mihi Cluati: neque de re; statutum est enim; de loco nonnunquam. velim igitur cogites. ego, quantum his temporibus tam eruditus fieri poterit, profecto illam consecrabo omni genere monumentorum, ab omnium ingenii scriptorum, & Græcorum & Latinorum: quæ res forsitan sit refractura vulnus meum. sed jam quasi voto quodam, & promisso me teneri puto (67). -- Some of those authors, whom I am now reading, say that I ought to do what I have often consulted you about, and which I should be glad you approved of. I mean with regard to the temple: and I intreat you, as you love me, to consider of it. Indeed I am in no manner of doubt concerning the kind of it, for that of Cluatus pleases me; nor as to the thing itself, for I am fully determined; but I am sometimes in doubt with respect to the place. And therefore I beg you would think of it. I am resolved to eternize her memory, as much as it is possible in an age so learned as this is, by monuments of all kinds from the ingenious writings of Greek and Latin. Which perhaps will make my wounds to bleed afresh, but now I think myself bound as it were by a vow and promise.' The following passage more clearly shews, that he was engaged by a vow to build a temple, and that he believed it was irreligious not to put that design in execution. Lactantius will inform us below concerning this engagement. 'Si ista minus confici possunt, effice quidvis. Ego me majore religione quam quicquam fuit ullius voti, obstrictum puto (68). -- If those things cannot be effected, do any thing. For I think myself more strictly bound than ever any one was by a vow.' A monument, a mausoleum, or whatever had the name or likeness of a sepulchre, could not satisfy him. 'Famum fieri volo; neque hoc mihi erui potest: sepulchri similitudinem effugere non tam propter poenam legis studeo, quam ut maxime affequeretur ἀποθεῖσθαι: quod poteram, si in ipsa villa facerem. sed, ut sæpe locuti sumus, commutationes dominorum reformido. in agro ubicumque fecero, mihi videor allequi posse, ut posteritas habeat religionem (69). -- I would by all means have a temple built; nothing can dissuade me from it. I endeavour to avoid the likeness of a tomb, not so much because of the penalty of the law, as that I may obtain an apotheosis: which I might do, were it to be in the village itself; but as I have often said, I fear the change of proprietors. Wherever I do it in the country, I think posterity might be brought to respect it from a sense of religion.' He gives his imaginations a very proper name. 'Hæc meæ tibi ineptiæ, fateor enim, ferendæ sunt (70). -- These my follies, for I own they are such, you must pardon.' If Mr Moreri had but given himself the trouble of considering with attention, what he pillaged from the moderns; would he have told us, That Cicero caused a temple to be built, in which he included Tullia's ashes, in a stately Mausoleum? Might he not have seen in the author whom he cites in the last passage quoted by me, which says that Cicero designing an apotheosis, avoided all that could be thought to look like a tomb? This was not on account of the expence, as he clearly explains himself: 'Ante quam a te proxime discessi, numquam mihi venit in mentem, quo plus infumtum in monumentum esset, quam nescio quid, quod lege conceditur, tantundem populo dandum esse, quod non magno pere moveret, nisi nescio quomodo, ἀλόγως fortasse,

(67) Cicero, Ep. xviii, lib. xii, ad Attic.

(68) Ibid. Epist. xlii.

(69) Ibid. Epist. xxvi.

(70) Id. Ibid.

'nollem illud ullo nomine, nisi fani, appellari. quod si volumus, vereor ne allequi non possimus, nisi mutato loco (71). -- Before I parted with you lately, it never came into my thoughts that it would cost more to build a monument, than what by law is to be given to the people, which would not trouble me much, were I not unwilling (perhaps without reason) that it should be called by any other name than that of a temple; and I am afraid, it could not be effected but by changing the place.' According to Cicero's principles, nothing was more absurd or impious, than to pay divine honours to those persons on whose tombs funeral rites were celebrated; and it was for this reason that he says he would not have given his suffrage to the decree of the Senate, which ordered supplications to be made to Julius Cæsar: 'An me censeatis, patres conscripti, quod vos inviti secuti estis decretum fuisse ut parentalia cum supplicationibus miscerentur? ut inexpiabiles religiones in Rempublicam? ut decernerentur supplicationes mortuo? . . . Fuerit ille L. Brutus . . . adduci tamen non possem ut quemquam mortuum conjungerem cum deorum immortalium religione, ut ejus sepulchrum usquam existeret ubi parentetur, ei publice supplicetur (72). -- Do you think, illustrious senators, that I would have given my suffrage to a decree, which you have unwillingly obeyed, that funeral rites should be mingled with supplications? that divine honours should be paid to the dead person, which is an impiety not to be atoned for? . . . Were it L. Brutus . . . yet I could not be prevailed on to render to any dead person the honours due to the immortal gods, to make public supplications to him, upon whose tomb funeral obsequies are celebrated.' If Mr Moreri had written confidently, he had avoided another mistake. He assures us that Cicero actually caused a temple to be built: of which there appears no footsteps in his letters. Cicero appears very earnest and warm on this design, I own; we find him even threatening his good friend, for not being forward enough, and prefixing a set time when the work should be finished: but it doth not appear by any of his letters, that the building of that temple was ever perfected, or even begun. Is not this a proof that his project came to nothing, and that either time, which asswages grief, made him sensible that his design was ridiculous, or that unforeseen accidents, or other affairs had diverted the execution of his Apotheosis.

Lactantius several times cites the book de Consolatione: by which it appears that Tully did not in the least scruple to sacrifice the honour and glory of his gods to his ridiculous fancy of deifying his daughter: to justify which, he shewed that the gods publicly adored in Rome, were formerly men. This instance affords a natural image of the empire of the passions. They spare nothing in heaven or earth, when bent on their justification (73). Lactantius's expressions are very beautiful, and the more deserve our transcribing, because they contain a fragment of a book which is lost, and the promise which Cicero publicly made his daughter, that he would place her among the gods.

M. Tullius . . . in eo libro quo seipsum de morte filia conolatus est, non dubitavit dicere, Deos, qui publice colerentur, homines fuisse. Quod ipius testimonium eo debet gravissimum judicari, quod & augurale habuit Sacerdotium, & eosdem se colere, venerarique testatur. Itaque intra paucos vericulos duas res nobis dedit. Nam dum imaginem filia eodem se modo consecraturum esse profiteretur, quo illi à veteribus sunt consecrati, & illos mortuos esse docuit, & originem vanæ superstitionis ostendit. Cu m verò (inquit) & mares, & feminas complures ex hominibus in Deorum numero esse videamus, & eorum in urbibus, atque agris augustissima delubra veneremur, assentiamur eorum sapientiæ, quorum ingenii, & inventis omnes vitam legibus, & insti-

(71) Ibid. Epist. xxv.

(72) Cicero, Philipp. I.

(73) We have seen of late a famous minister, who endeavoured to find in the Prophets of the Old Testament, all the faults that were objected against the false Prophets of Dauphiné, whom he obliged himself to defend as true Prophets.

the remark [2]. Cicero's words in the exordium of his book de Consolatione, where he advanced, that men come into the world only to suffer the punishment of their sins [R], will

(74) Lactant.
Divin. Instit.
lib. i, cap. 15,
pag. m. 48.

tutis exultamus, constitutamque habemus. Quod si ullum unquam animal consecrandum fuit, illud pro-fecto fuit. Si Cadmi, aut Amphitryonis progenies, aut Tyndari in cœlum tollenda fama fuit, huic idem honos certe dicendus est, quod quidem faciam, reque omnium optimam, doctissimamque approbantibus Diis immortalibus ipsis in eorum cœtu locatam ad opinionem omnium mortalium consecrabo (74). . . .
Cicero, in that book which he wrote to comfort himself for the loss of his daughter, made no scruple to say, that the gods, who were publicly worshipped, had been formerly men. Which testimony is of the greater weight, as he enjoyed the augural priesthood, and declares that he himself worshipped and adored those gods.
And therefore in a few words he informs us of two things. For when he tells us, that he will consecrate the image of his daughter in the same manner, as those were consecrated by the antients, he shews that they are dead, and acquaints us with the origin of vain superstition. BUT, (says he) since we find a great many both men and women ranked amongst the gods, and since we reverence their magnificent temples in cities and in the country, let us submit to the wisdom of those, to whose abilities and inventions we owe a well regulated and civilized life. Now if ever any living creature deserved to be deified, she certainly did so.
If the offspring of Cadmus, or Amphitryon, or Tyndarus, deserved to be translated by Fame into heaven, the same honour ought surely to be paid to her; which indeed I shall do, and shall place thee, my most excellent and most learned daughter, in the number of the immortal gods, with their own approbation and that of all mankind. I might stop here, but the rest of this passage affording a reflexion, I shall subjoin it: Fortasse dicat aliquis præ nimio lætu delirasse Ciceronem. Atqui omnis illa oratio & doctrina, & exemplis, & ipso loquendi genere perfecta non ægri, sed constantis animi ac iudicii fuit. Et hæc ipsa sententia nullum præfert indicium doloris. Neque enim puto, illum tam variè, tam copiosè, tam ornate scribere potuisse, nisi lætum ejus & ratio ipsa, & consolatō amicum, & temporis longitudo mitigasset (75). Lactantius proposes as an objection: that perhaps Cicero raved when he wrote that book, and the greatness of his affliction had affected his brain. But I maintain, replies Lactantius, that his book de Consolatione is so fine, that it could only be composed by a person who was in his perfect senses, and whose grief had been softened by reason, the consolation of his friends, or time. He was obliged to turn the argument upon this, in order to render Cicero an unquestionable evidence. But if he had designed to prove the insufficiency of Philosophy to comfort a man in affliction, he would then have alledged this very book of Cicero, as the performance of a man who confessed himself shamefully born down by grief for the loss of his daughter (76). To what cause is this conduct to be ascribed? Is it owing to inadvertence, or some rhetorical artifice, that things are thus made use of to contrary purposes.

(75) Ibid.

(76) See, above,
the remark [0],
cit. (59).

(77) Lactant.
Divin. Instit.
lib. iii, cap. xxviii,
pag. m. 197.

(78) Recte ergo
profatus est errore ac misera-bili veritatis ignorantia se tene-re. . . . And therefore he very rightly said he was detained in error, and in miserable ignorance of the truth.
Id. ibid.

[R] Cicero . . . says that men come into the world only to suffer the punishment of their sins. He could not paint his grief by more signal characters, than by saying, that human life is a punishment, and cen-suring those of a contrary opinion. Quid Ciceroni faciemus? qui cum in principio consolationis suæ dixisset luendorum scelerum causa nasci homines, iteravit id ipsum postea, quasi objurgans eum qui vitam poenam non esse putet (77). . . . What shall we say of Cicero, who, tho' in the beginning of his book de Consolatione he had said that men were born to suffer for their sins, yet repeats it again, censuring those who think life is not a punishment. Lactantius ought not to be blamed for censuring this assertion of Cicero (78); for it is certain that it betrays an ignorance of the reason why God placed us in the world: but as this reason was above the reach of natural light, and is only well known by the evangelical revelation, we ought not to be much surprized that Cicero, hurried on by grief, and oppressed by affliction, stretched the platonic hypothesis. Plato's Philosophy taught, That the soul of man did exist before it was inclosed in a human body, and that this anterior state had been much more glorious and happy than that of man.

Hence some pretended Philosophers advanced, that the soul had never changed its condition, if it had not deserved chastisement; and they concluded, that it was confined to the body as its prison, in order to inflict on it its deserved punishment. Quæ ignoran-tia effecit ut quosdam dicere non puderet, idcirco nos esse natos ut scelerum poenas lucrermus, quo quid delirius dici possit non invenio. Ubi enim, vel quæ scelera potuimus admittere, qui omnino non fuimus (79). . . . From this ignorance it came to pass, that some were not ashamed to affirm that we were born to suffer the punishment of our sins, than which na-thing can be more ridiculous. For where or what crimes could we commit, who had no manner of existence. Cicero adopted this hypothesis (80), but Lactantius looks upon it as the most senseless of all extravagancies. And yet it is certain that this tenet differs from the doctrine of original sin in its circumstances only; for since the Christian Faith instructs us, that Adam sinned for himself and all his posterity, it follows, 1. That all souls, in the eye of God, are involved in guilt even before they exist. 2. That they are united to the body only by an act of punishment, since by their being united to the body, they incur the penalty of eternal damnation, to which they are justly sentenced, and it is by no other means than remission and grace that some are saved; wherefore the scripture saith, that all men are born children of wrath (81). Lactantius ought therefore to have refuted Tully's hypothesis more dexterously, and that by proofs which only affect those particulars in which it differs from that of original sin. If he had well considered Arnobius's second book, he would have found it was no easy matter to refute Cicero by philosophical arguments; for I do not see what reply the Platonists might offer to Arnobius's reasons, I mean those objections which he offered against the affirmation, that immortal spirits in their own nature innocent, happy, abounding in knowledge, either voluntarily descended into human bodies, or were sent thither by providence. He makes a long enumeration of the follies, crimes, and miseries of mankind, and concludes that it was inconsistent with the goodness and justice of God, that such spirits should be united to human bodies. Into which he takes it to be exactly the same thing to command or suffer them to descend. Atque ita perficitur, says he (82), ut ni-hil intersit omnino voluntariè venerint, an illius ob-temperaverint jussioni: cum non prohibendo quod oportuerat prohiberi, cessatione crimen fecerit pro-prium, & retentionis dissimulatione permiserit prius.
Sed procul hæc abeat sceleratæ opinionis immanitas, ut Deus credatur omnipotens, magnarum & invifibilia rerum sator & conditor, procreator, tam mobiles animas genuisse gravitatis ac ponderis constantiæque nullius, in vitia labiles, in peccatorum genera universa declives: cumque eas tales atque hujusmodi sciret, in corpora ire jussisse, quorum in-ductæ carceribus sub procillis agerent tempestatibus-que quotidie fortunæ, & modo turpia facerent, mo-do paterentur obsœna: naufragiis, ruinis, incendi-orum conflagrationibus ut perirent. Pauperes alias, alias ut mendicitas premeret, ut ferarum paterentur aliæ laniatus, muscularum aliæ ut interirent veneno, claudæ ut incederent aliæ, ut aliæ lumen amitterent, ut articulis federent aliæ colligatis, morbis denique obscurentur ut cunctis, quos infelix & miseria mortalitas diversarum sustinet dilaceratione pena-rum: tum deinde oblitæ unius esse se fontis, unius genitoris & capitis, germanitatis convellerent atque abrumperent jura: urbes suas everterent, popularen-tar hostiliter terras, servos de liberis facerent, insultarent virginibus, & matrimoniiis alienis, odissent invicem sese, aliorum gaudiis & felicitatibus inviderent: tum deinde se omnes maledicerent, carperent, & favorem dentium mordacitate laniarent. Sed procul hæc abeat, ut eadem rursus perfusio, ut ille dicamus, tam immanis, & scelerata persuasio, ut ille salus rerum Deus, omnium virtutum caput, benig-nitatis & columnæ; atque ut eum laudibus extollamus humanis, sapientissimus, justus, perfectæ omnia faciens, & integritatis suæ conservantia manfones, aut aliquid fecerit claudum, & quod minus esset à recto,

(79) Id. ibid.
pag. 196.

(80) See, above,
the article
OVID.

(81) Eph. ii. 3.

(82) Arnobius,
lib. ii, pag. m.
74-75.

will admit of a good reflexion.

recto, aut ulli rei fuerit miseriarum aut discriminum causa, aut ipsos actus quibus vita transigitur & celebratur humana, ordinaverit, iusserit, & à sua fluere constitutione præceperit. Minora hæc illo sunt, & magnitudinis ejus destruentia potestatem: tantumque est longè ut istarum auctor rerum esse credatur, ut in sacrilegè crimen impietatis occurrat quisquis ab eo conceperit hominem esse prognatum, rem infelicem & miseram, qui esse se doleat, qui conditionem suam detestetur & lugeat: qui nulla alia de causa sese in-telligat procreatum, quàm ne materiam non haberent per quam diffunderent se mala, & essent miseri sem-per, quorum cruciatibus palceretur nescio qua vis latens, & humanitati adversa crudelitas. --- And so it is the same thing whether the souls came into their bodies entirely of their own accord, or in obedience to GOD's command: since by not preventing what ought to have been prevented, he permitted and became the author of sin. But far be it from us to entertain such an impious thought, as if almighty GOD, the maker of all things visible and invisible, should create souls so fickle and inconstant, prone to vice and all manner of sin: and that when he knew them to be such, should command them to enter into bodies, that being therein inclosed they might be continually tossed up and down with the storms and tempests of fortune, and sometimes all and sometimes suffer vile and abominable things:
that they might perish by shipwrecks, ruins, and fires:
that some might be oppressed with poverty, and others reduced to beggary; some torn to pieces by wild beasts, and others poisoned by insects; some lame, others blind, and others again not able to stir a joint; in fine, that they might be exposed to all the diseases and torments of wretched mortality. And then, forgetting that they all flow from the same fountain, and are all descended from the same father, should dissolve and break the ties of flesh and blood, demolish cities, waste lands, in-slave the free, ravish virgins and matrons, hate one another, and envy one another's joy and felicity: that they should curse, revile and maliciously slander one another. But as I said before, far be it from us to entertain such a monstrous and wicked opinion, as if GOD, the Saviour of the world, the fountain of all virtue, the author of all good, and (that we may ex-tol him as we are able) who is most wise and just, and makes all things perfect, and preserves them in their integrity, I say, as if GOD should make any thing defective or imperfect, or be the cause of misery and danger, or decree, ordain, and appoint the actions of human life. Those things are beneath him, and derogate from the power of his greatness: and it is so far from being right to believe him the author of those things, that whoever imagines man was created by him miserable and wretched; he who is sorry that he exists, who detests and bewails his condition; who thinks he was made for no other purpose but to undergo a multitude of evils, and to be always miserable, and by torments to feed the cruelty of some invisible power, an enemy to mankind, I say, such an one is guilty of the highest impiety. To censure this doctrine of Ar-nobius as an ill one, would be too great a piece of moderation, it ought to be called abominable; for it overthrows the foundations of Christianity, and is not much better than the doctrine of the Manichees. Cicero might have found in it as lively a description of human misery as he could have made; but he might have answered that objection by his hypothesis of the pre-existence of sin, which however false it was, might yet inspire patience. For he might very well say to himself, My daughter's death hath overwhelmed me, and plunged me into despair; but about two hundred years ago or more, I committed some crimes which deserve this punishment. I hereby expiate them. I suffer for them in this organized prison, in which my soul was confined when I was born: It is just that I should be unhappy, since I sinned so long ago. If Psyche's father had reasoned in this manner, he would not have answered, as the author of that play, makes him answer to that common place of consolation, that the gods have the right to take away those children which they have given.

Ah, cherche un meilleur fondement
Aux consolations que ton cœur me présente,
Et de la fausseté de ce raisonnement
V O L. V.

Ne fais point un accablement
A cette douleur si cuisante,
Dont je souffre ici le tourment.
Crois tu là me donner une raison puissante
Pour ne me plaindre point de cet arrêt des Cieux ?
Et dans le procédé des Dieux,
Dont tu veux que je me contente,
Une rigueur assassinnante
Ne paroît-elle pas aux yeux ?
Voi l'état où ces Dieux me forcent à te (83) rendre,
Et l'autre où te recet mon cœur infortuné :
Tu connoitras par là qu'ils me viennent reprendre
Bien plus que ce qu'ils m'ont donné.
Je receus d'eux en toi, ma Fille,
Un présent que mon cœur ne leur demandoit pas :
J'y trouvois alors peu d'appas,
Et leur en vis sans joye accroître ma famille.
Mais mon cœur ainsi que mes yeux
S'est fait de ce présent une douce habitude :
J'ai mis quinze ans de soins, de veilles, & d'étude,
A me le rendre précieux :
Je l'ay paré de l'aimable richesse
De mille brillantes vertus,
En lui j'ai renfermé par des soins assidus
Tous les plus beaux trésors que fournit la sagesse,
A lui j'ai de mon ame attaché la tendresse,
J'en ai fait de ce cœur le charme & l'allegresse,
La consolation de mes sens abbatus,
Le doux espoir de ma vieillesse.
Ils m'ôtent tout cela, ces Dieux,
Et tu veux que je n'aye aucun sujet de plainte
Sur cet affreux arrêt dont je souffre l'atteinte ?
Ah ! leur pouvoir se joue avec trop de rigueur
Des tendresses de notre cœur :
Pour m'ôter leur présent, leur falloit-il attendre
Que j'en eusse fait tout mon bien ?
Ou plutôt, s'ils avoient dessein de le reprendre,
N'eût-il pas été mieux de ne me donner rien (84) ?

Oh ! seek some better ground of consolation.
Think you, this weakly-pleaded Sophistry
Ought to restrain my just complaint of Heav'n ?
Let thy grown age be weigh'd against thy infancy,
And thou wilt see the gods take much more from me
Than what they gave. I, child, receiv'd in thee
A present which I did not ask from Heav'n :
Then with a cold and unrejoicing heart
I saw my family's increase, but now
A fifteen years endearing habitude
Has made that present precious to my eyes,
The subject of my late and early care,
Now ornamented with the richest treasures
Of wisdom and a thousand brilliant virtues.
It mov'd my tender soul with fond delight,
The charm and entertainment of my heart,
Staff of my life, my age's soothing bope,
And my diminish'd sense's consolation.
All this they take from me, these gods take from me.
And wouldst thou leave me unrepining sit,
And bear this harsh decree without a murmur ?
They too severely sport with our fond hearts.
If they were minded to resume their gift,
Why staid they till I set my soul upon't ?
Or rather . . . why bestow'd their gift upon me ?

However, I think that Cicero would much better have relished Arnobius's discourse, which doth not extenuate the miseries of life, than that of Lactan-tius, which doth extenuate them. ' Quid ego dicemus, nisi errare illos, qui aut mortem appetunt tanquam bonum, aut vitam fugiunt tanquam malum ?
' Nisi quod sunt iniquissimi, qui pauciora mala non pen-sant bonis pluribus ? Nam cum omnem vitam per exquiritas, & varias traducant voluptates, mari cupiunt,
5 M

(83) A father is brought in speaking to his daughter, whom the gods designed shortly to take away from him

(84) Molière,
Tragédie de Phé-
drite, Act. II, Scène I.

si quid fortè his amaritudinis supervenerit: & sic habent, tanquam illis numquam fuerit bene, si ali- quando fuerit male. Damnant igitur vitam omnem, plenamque nihil aliud, quàm malis opinantur. Hinc nata est inepta illa sententia, hanc esse mortem, quam nos vitam putamus, illam vitam, quam nos pro morte timeamus. Ita primum bonum esse non nasci, secundum, citius mori. Quæ ut majoris sit authoritatis, Sileno attribuitur. Cicero in consolatione: NON nasci (inquit) longe optimum nec in hos scopulos incidere vitæ: Proximum autem si natus sis, quam primum mori, & tanquam ex incendio effugere fortunæ. Credidisse illum vanissimo di- sto exinde apparet, quod adiecit aliquid de suo, ut ornaret (85). - What shall we say then, but that those err who either wish for death as a good, or decline life as an evil? But that they are most unjust, who do not weigh the greater good against the lesser evil? For tho' they spend their whole life in variety of exquisite pleasures, yet if any thing disagreeable happens to them, they desire to die: and, they behave, as if it had never been well with them, when any thing happens to fall out ill. They therefore condemn all life, and think it only full of evil. Hence that foolish saying, that what we esteem life is death, and what we dread as death is life. And also, that not to be born is the chief good, and the next to that is to die soon. Which saying, that it may be of greater weight, is ascribed to Silenus. Cicero, in his book de Consolatione, says, it is the greatest degree of happiness never to be born, nor to fall upon these rocks of life; and the next to that, if one is born, to die very soon, and to escape out of the fire of fortune. It is evident he believed that most ridiculous saying, because he added something of his own by way of embellishment. By this we see that Cicero, in his book de Consolatione, put a great value on this sentence of Silenus: The highest pitch of happiness, is never to be born; and next to that, to escape very quickly out of this life as out of an house on fire.

He mentions this sentence in one of his books which are still extant, and adds some verses, which import, that we ought to mourn at the birth, and rejoice at the death of men. Fertur etiam de Sileno fabella quædam: qui cum à Mida captus esset, hoc ei munus pro sua missione dedisse scribitur: Docuisse regem, NON NASCI HOMINI LONGE optimum esse:

Proximum autem, quam primum mori: Quæ est sententia in Cresphonte usus Euripides.

Nam nos decebat cœtus celebrantis domum, Lugere, ubi esset aliquis in lucem editus, Humanæ vitæ varia reputantis mala: At, qui labores morte finisset gravis, Hunc omnes amicos laude & lætitiâ exequi (86).

There goes a story of Silenus, that when he was taken prisoner by King Midas, he gave him, by way of recompence for his liberty, the following sentence, That it was the greatest blessing NEVER TO BE BORN, NOPHANCES, and the next to that, to die soon. Which saying Euripides made use of in his Cresphontes.

*We at the birth of man should mourn,
For many woes his life attend;
But at his death we should rejoice,
Because to them it puts end.*

Plutarch has the original Greek of these verses (87). Lactantius supposes one thing which Cicero would have denied him: That the good things of this life surpass the evil. I am sure that the dismal state to which Cicero was reduced by the loss of Tullia, appeared to him such a weighty pressure that he would very willingly have quitted all the lustre of his glory, to be delivered from this insupportable anxiety. I believe also that he would not have returned into the world, on condition of passing through the various states that he had gone through (88). We have already seen (89) what he made Cato say: He thought as much of himself. He had nevertheless a large share of fortune's favour; his eloquence was admired; he was raised to the first dignities of the Republic; he acquired a glorious reputation: but, if I am not mistaken, he would have sworn that all the pleasures of his life, weighed against the pain and uneasiness which he had endured, or did then feel, would not have been as an ounce to a pound. I shall elsewhere (90) touch on this dispute: whether the good things of this life surmount the evil. Authors are divided on this subject, some declare for the affirmative, others for the negative.

TUPPIUS (LAURENCE) a Civilian, was born in Pomerania, and lived in the XVth century. He translated into Latin a German book, which the princes of the Augsborg confession caused to be written, to justify them for not submitting to the council of Trent [A]. The epistle dedicatory to this Latin version is dated from Straßbourg the 31st

[A] A German book which the princes of the Augsborg confession caused to be written . . . concerning the council of Trent. They had at first presented their grievances in the assembly of Naumbourg, when Pope Pius IV, and the Emperor Ferdinand exhorted them, either to come in person, or send their deputies to the council. They afterwards laid them before the Diet of Francfort, at the time of the coronation of the same Emperor. That memorial contained the reasons, for which they rejected the decisions of the council of Trent: but, the better to shew the equitableness of those reasons, they appointed a certain number of Divines and political Counsellors to compose a work, wherein those same grievances were enlarged, illustrated, and justified. You need only read the advertisement which is on the back of the title page of Tuppius's translation. Hæc Gravamina pro DEFENSIONE SINCERÆ ET ORTHODOXÆ RELIGIONIS, propoſita primum in Naeburgico conventu Principum; deinde repetita, atque oblata Majestati Cæsareæ in Imperii conventu publico, qui ob Electionem & Coronationem Incolytæ Regis Rom. habitus fuit Francofurti: tandem summorum quorundam Imperii Ordinum mandatu & voluntate, à delictis ad hoc Ecclesiæ suarum Doctoribus, & Consiliariis politicis, uberiore explicatione singulorum Capitum, ex sacrarum litterarum testimoniis, Patrum scriptis, Theologorum scholasticorum Commentariis, ac Canonum interpretibus, aliisque scriptoribus compluribus; ad eum usum jampridem diligentia singulari collectis, illustrata sunt: & hoc scripto, quod ad posteritatem de horum Ordinum erga

Religionem & Rempublicam studio extet, comprehensa. . . . These grievances, IN DEFENCE OF THE PURE AND ORTHODOX RELIGION, were first laid before the assembly of the Princes at Naumbourg, and afterwards presented to his Imperial Majesty by the Diet of the empire, held at Francfort for the election and coronation of the illustrious King of the Romans; and at last by the order and command of some of the chief Princes of the empire, are illustrated by certain Divines of their own churches, and by political counsellors, appointed for that purpose; each head being more fully explained from the testimonies of holy Scripture, the writings of the Fathers, the commentaries of school Divines, and interpreters of the canon, and several other writers, which have been very carefully collected to that end: and contained in this work, to be a monument to posterity, of the love those Princes have to Religion and the Republic. The title of the book is this: Concilii Tridentini restitutioni seu continuationi à Pio IV Pontifice anno 1562, indictæ, decretisque tunc editis, opposita Gravamina: quibus & causæ necessariæ & gravissimæ exponuntur, quare Electores, Principes, Ordines Imperii, Augstaniam Confessionem amplexi, Concilium illud neque agnoscere neque adire voluerint. . . . Grievances opposed to the continuation of the council of Trent, appointed by Pope Pius IV in the year 1562, and to the decrees then passed: wherein are explained the necessary and important causes, why the Electors, Princes, and States of the empire, embracing the Augsborg confession, would neither acknowledge nor go to that council. We have seen above (1) a citation from this work: it re-

(85) Cicero, Tusc. I, lib. fin. fol. m. 253, verso. See the remark [D] of the article XE. towards the end.

(87) Plut. de audiend. Poëtis, lib. fin. pag. 36.

(88) Compare with this what shall be said in the remark [F], of the article VAYER.

(89) In the remark [R] of the article PORCIUS.

(90) In the article XENOPHONES, remark [D]. See the article PERICLES,

(1) In the passage of Mr. Heidegger (who has, or might have, copied Bernegger's) recited in remark [H], of the article LATES

31st of March 1565. The work was reprinted in the year 1597 in 8vo.

lates to the Atheism of Leo X: but it is somewhat strange that no authority is quoted on that head, and that in a book of this nature facts should be advanced which are only known by uncertain reports. However, the work in general is not to be censured for want of quotations. It contains a great number of them, and they are very good in themselves: tho' indeed they are to be found in a great many other books. The observations on the tax of the Apostolic Chancery have not been spared (2), which are concluded with a long detail of the articles of that tax. That detail

(4) See pag. 79, and 89, of the edition of 1597.

might pass for an edition of Taxa Sacra Penitentiaria: and Hunnius looked upon it as such, when he inserted it in the Preface to his book de Indulgentiis, printed at Frankfurt in the year 1599, in 8vo: but observe, that as to the form, and even as to divers points of the matter, this edition is different from several others I have seen, and which I have mentioned elsewhere (3). I had conjectured (4), that du Pinet had followed the edition inserted in the book of the Protestant Princes of Germany; which conjecture is very well founded, as I have since verified.

(3) In the remark [B] of the article BANCK, and in the remark [B] of the article PINET.

(4) See remark [B], of the article BANCK.

TURLUPINS, A sect of impudent and scandalous heretics of the XIVth century, who taught that when man was arrived at a certain degree of perfection, he was freed from the yoke of the divine law: and contrary to the doctrine of the Stoics, who made the liberty of their wife man consist in being free from passions, they placed this liberty in being no longer subject to the precepts of eternal wisdom. They did not believe they ought to pray to God any otherwise than mentally; but what was yet more shocking in their sect, was that they went naked [A], and according to the example of the Cynics, or rather of brutes, they performed the work of the flesh at noon-day, in view of all the world (a). They pretended that we ought not to be ashamed of any part which nature has bestowed on us. Notwithstanding these profane extravagancies they affected a very spiritual and devout air, the better to insinuate themselves into the womens favour, and allure them into the snare of their unchaste desires (b). For this is the rock of all those sects who aim at distinguishing themselves by paradoxes in morality: examine to the bottom the visions of the pretenders to new light, and of the Quietists, &c. you will find if any thing can unmask them, it is somewhat relating to venereal pleasure; this is the weak part of the place, where the enemy makes the assault; it is a worm which never dies, and a fire which never goes out. These Heretics appeared in France, in the reign of Charles V (c). They chiefly appeared in Savoy and Dauphiné. Great care was taken to purge the world of them [B]. It is not easy to discover the true cause of their name. Vignier (d) derives it from their living in places exposed to the wolves. They affected to call themselves the FRATERNITY OF THE POOR, as du Tillet (e) and Gaguin (f) have observed.

(a) Cynicorum Philosophorum more omnia vendenda publicitus nudata gestabant, & in publico velut jumenta coibant, instar canum in nuditate & exercitio membrorum pudendorum degeneres. Gerson, apud Prætorium.

(b) Gerson, apud eundem.

(c) Mezerai. Abrégé Chronologie, Tom. iii, pag. m. 227, Duth Edit.

(d) Ad ann. 1159.

(e) Chronique des Rois de France, sous Charles V.

(f) In the Life of Charles V.

[A] They went naked.] We cannot sufficiently wonder that such a whimsical fancy should be so often renewed amongst Christians. Paganism affords us only the sect of Cynics, who fell into this impudent practice; and it must also be observed that this sect was not numerous, and that the greatest part of the Cynics did not discover their nudity, or do what is consequent upon it, as it was said of Diogenes. The Indian Gymnosophists were not naked in those parts which the Adamites, Turlupins, Picards, and several Anabaptists discovered. We ought then to grant, that in that respect the Christians have been more irregular than the Pagans. We shall not be surprized at this, when we observe that a gospel principle, of which the Pagans were ignorant, is liable to this abuse: I mean, that the second Adam came to repair the evil which the first had introduced into the world. From hence a Fanatic ventures to conclude, that those who are once partakers of the benefits of the covenant of grace, are perfectly restored to the state of Adam and Eve. I own that Fanaticism must be carried to an high pitch, and the dose must be very large, which is able to overcome the impressions of modesty which nature and a Christian education have stamped on us; but what is not the infinite combination of our passions, imaginations, animal spirits, &c. capable of doing? I have, in another place (1), spoken of some antient Anchorets, who scrupled to see their own nudity. The Pagans afford us no such example that I know of; they were only very careful of hiding it from the eyes of others. This was observed not only amongst the women (2), but also amongst some very debauched men (3). And therefore Petronius did not stretch too far when he said, 'Quam ne ad cognitionem quidem admittere severioris notæ homines solent. . . . To which knowledge they do not admit men even of a grave disposition.'

(1) In the remark [F], of the article ADAMITES.

(2) See the article OLYMPIAS, remark [I].

(3) See the same article, ibid.

(4) Ex computo Nicolai Mauregeri, Burgensis Parochensis de Auxiliis Præpositurae Parochensis, an. 1574, apud Du Cange Glossar. voc. Turlupini.

[B] Great care was taken to purge the world of them.] The following words afford us a specimen of that diligence (4): To Brother James de More, of the Preaching Order, Inquisitor of the Sodomites in the province of France, as a gift bestowed on him by the King's Letters-Patents, the second of February 1373, for and in compensation of several pains, missions, and expences which he had been at, suffered and sustained in pursuit of the male and female Turlupins, whom he found and took in the said province, and who, by his diligence, have been punished for their errors and justices, the sum of fifty francs, which are worth ten Paris livres. Gaguin observes, in his Life of Charles V, that the books and cloaths of the Turlupins were burnt in the hog-market at Paris, without the gate of St Honoré; that Jean Dabentonne, and another person with her, being the chief preachers of that sect, were also burnt; but the latter, says he, whom I do not name, dying in prison, before sentence, his corpse was kept fifteen days in a heap of lime, to keep it from putrifying, after which it was burnt at the time appointed for execution. Du Tillet says also, that under Charles V, the superstitious religion of the Turlupins, who had called their sect the Fraternity of the poor, was condemned and abolished, and their ceremonies, books, and cloaths, condemned and burnt. But how do these cloaths which were burnt agree with the report of those, who tell us that they went naked? We must suppose the nakedness of all these sorts of Fanatics to have been limited with regard to times, or places, or with regard to certain members. We have seen that the Adamites did not strip themselves any where but in the stoves where they met, and that the Picards condemned above all, those who did not shew their privy-parts. The cold and rain would not permit them to go always naked: it is not at all probable that they durst regularly and continually appear naked in those cities in which they were not the most powerful; and it seems that the Turlupins in particular discovered only the parts which distinguish the sexes. 'Turlupini Cynicorum sectam suscitantes de nuditate pudendorum, & publico coitu (5). . . . The Turlupins revived the sect of the Cynics as to the nakedness of the privy-parts, and coition in public.' My citations out of Gerson amounts to the same thing. Therefore they had cloaths notwithstanding their impudence; and probably before persons not yet initiated, or those godly women whom they intended to draw into their nets, they did not immediately shew their privy-parts.

(5) Genebrard Chronique.

TURPIN,

TURPIN, a fabulous Historian of the actions of Charlemagne and of Roland. No body at present takes him for Turpin, promoted to the archbishopric of Rheims by Charlemagne, nor gives any credit to his relations; but some believe him to be near as antient as that Archbishop [A]. Others rather incline to fix him in the XIIth century [B]. If it were true that some Popes or Councils declared his book authentic [C], it would be a clear proof of a gross ignorance, or of an egregious imposture.

Mr Allard

[A] Some believe him to be near as antient as that Archbishop. Papyrius Masso places him a little after the reign of Charles the Bald; but speaks of him as of a wretched author, who mispent his leisure hours in composing a romance for the use of children. See the following remark.

We find a curious observation in Mr Catel. This author having mentioned some lies of Tilpin or Turpin, Archbishop of Rheims, adds: 'These fables written by Tilpin are very antient; for this book is to be seen in manuscript in a very antique letter, and in old French, in several libraries: they are followed by many old authors, as by Matthew Paris, who wrote the History of England; Dante, an antient Italian Poet; Chalcondylas, in his History of the Turks; Petrus Venetus, in his catalogue of Saints, who wrote the life of Roland, and others, which he partly extracted from the said Tilpin, and Godfrey of Viterbo, in his History called Pantheon, who imputing those fables, relates how Charlemagne went to Jerusalem to visit the holy places, where the mysteries of our redemption were accomplished. But most of what these Historians have written is fabulous, for Tilpin himself, in the Preface of his History, ascribed to Leopold, Dean of Aix-la-Chapelle, saith, that Charlemagne's Spanish wars are not mentioned in the antient chronicles of St Denys, of which he might be very well informed, being a Monk of the Order of St Denys. And besides, it is very hard to believe that Archbishop Tilpin should be the author of this romance, which contains the History of Charlemagne, in which the death of that Prince is mentioned, which happened in the year 814, and yet Tilpin died in 813, as Trithemius with a great deal of probability observes; for Uvulpharius, who succeeded him in his bishopric, held a council in 814, as Flodoard in the third book of his History of Rheims informs us (1).'

(1) Catel, Mémoires de l'histoire du Langue-doc pag. 545.

(2) Arnoldus Oihenartus, Notitia utriusque Vascónie, pag. 397.

(3) Mihi præfatio historice illi, à Gaufrido Priore Volsen, qui paulo ante annum 1200 scribebat, in exemplari manuscripto, cujus copiam fecit Joannes Cordesius Canonici Lemovic, præfixa, plane persuadet hoc opus, recens tempore Gaufridi vulgatum, Hispani hominis illo ipso sæculo xii viventis, abortum esse. Id. ib.

[B] Others rather incline to fix him in the XIIth century. Oihenart wonders that Papyrius Masso should place him much higher. 'Hanc (de rebus Caroli Magni prodigiosam Historiam) nescio quo argumento, Papyrius Massonus (est) autore imperitæ & mendacii damnet' è vetustate commendat. Dum, non multo post Caroli Calvi imperium, ab homine otioso in juvenutis scriptam fuisse videri pronunciat (2). - - Papyrius Masso recommends this wonderful history of the actions of Charlemagne, on account of its antiquity, but upon what authority I know not; tho' at the same time he accuses the author of ignorance and lying. For, he says, it seems to have been written not long after the reign of Charles the Bald, by one that mispent his time, for the use of children. Here is the reason which induced Oihenart to believe that Turpin lived in the XIIth century, and was a Spaniard. Mr des Cordes, Canon of Limoges, had lent him a manuscript of this history, to which was prefixed a preface, written by a Prior a little before the year 1200 (3). This preface imports, that the Prior had lately recovered that manuscript, which was brought him out of Spain, and which he took for Archbishop Turpin's history, to whose intercession he devoutly recommends himself. I believe his own words may not be unacceptable here: 'Gaufridus Prior Volsensis, sacro Martialis conventui & universo Clero Lemovicini climatis gaudiis sempiternis perfuri. Egregios invicti Regis Caroli triumphos ac præcellis Comitis Rotholandi prædicandos agones in Hispania gestos nuper ad nos ex Elperia delatos granatæ cepti & ingenti studio corrigens scribere feci, maxime quod apud nos ista latuerant hæcenus, nisi quæ joculariores in suis præferebant cantilenis. Quia verò scriptura ipsa Scriptorum vitio depravata ac pene deleta fuerat non sine magno studio decorando correximus, non superflua subtrahens, sed quæ necessaria aderant, addens, ne quis me putet reprehendere inclite laudis Turpinum qui se infra scripta scripsisse fatetur.

Ego tanti Pontificis oratibus mihi à judice pio dari veniam opto (4). - - Gaufridus, Prior of Voville, to (4) Apud Oihenartum, ibid. the convent of St Martial, and to all the Clergy of the country of Limousin, wisheth eternal happiness. The glorious exploits of the invincible King Charles, and the noble feats of the excellent Count Roland, performed in Spain, were lately brought me out of that kingdom, which I received with joy, and caused to be transcribed, being first corrected with great care; especially as those things had been hitherto unknown to us, except what has been vented in ballads. But because the writing was very incorrect and almost blotted out and defaced, through the fault of the transcribers, the correcting cost me a great deal of trouble: I did not throw out superfluities, but added what was necessary, lest I should be thought to find fault with the renowned Turpin, who confesses that he wrote the following history. To the intercession of so worthy a Prelate, I recommend myself.

[C] That some Popes or Councils declared his book authentic. Vossius having observed that this history in the manuscript of it in Bennet-college library at Cambridge, is intitled, Liber Turpini Archiepiscopi Rheimensis quomodo Carolus Rex Francorum adquisivit Hispaniam, adds, that Pope Calixtus declared it authentic (5). He doth not say this on his own authority, but (5) Vossius, de Hist. Latine, lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 299. on the credit of Thomas James, which he supposes grounded on the title of the book, or some note written in the manuscript. Hunc librum dicit Papa Calixtus esse authenticum, ut adjungit Thomas James: Ut puto ex MSi operis inscriptione five nota ei addita (6). Vossius (6) Id. ibid. did not know the foundation of James's assertion; he did not remember a certain place in the Fasciculus temporum. The thing is this: Mr du Pleffin Mornai speaking of some canons of a council held at Rheims in 1119, adds this reflexion; 'And observe by what spirit those bishops were influenced, who in the same council declared authentic the history of Charlemagne by Archbishop Turpin, which is most fabulous and ridiculous, and as such condemned and exploded by Baronius himself (7). Coëteteau answered him thus: He cites in the margin his trifling chronicle of Fasculus temporum, who doth not say one word of this synod; and the fraud proceeds from hence, that speaking of Calixtus he saith, He wrote a little book of the miracles of St James: He also made a statute concerning the history of Charles, compiled by blessed Turpin, Archbishop of Rheims. Well, reader, is it not a pretty conclusion? Calixtus made a statute concerning the history of Charles, written by the Archbishop of Rheims; ergo the council of Rheims, where he presided, declared this book authentic. Certainly they had something else to do than amuse themselves with these fables. But after all where did his wretched chronicler find that Calixtus made no statute? What likelihood is there that he should so much as trouble himself with this Romance (8)? Gretser the Jesuit answering the same book of du Pleffin, doth not know whether what is related concerning the authenticity of Turpin ought to be reckoned fabulous. Perhaps, saith he, we should not be in the wrong to deny all this, for the acts of the council, nor the commentary of Hesso the Scholastic do not mention it at all (9). The Fasciculus Temporum only hints it in an indefinite manner: 'Statuit etiam (Calixtus) Historiam Caroli descriptam à beato Turpino Remensi Archiepiscopo. - - He made a statute concerning the History of Charles, written by the blessed Turpin, Archbishop of Rheims.' He doth not tell us the name of this statute, where or when it was made. But let us grant, adds Gretser, that Calixtus approved this book; what advantage accrues thereby to the mystery of iniquity? This History of Turpin is not so full of lies, but that the Protestants have published it amongst the antient Histories: 'At demus Calixtum Historiam Turpini statuisse, hoc est, confirmasse, quid utilitatis inde ad Mysterium Plebsium redit? Quæ tam fabulosa non est, ut absterreat Sectarios,

(7) Du Pleffin Mornai, Mystère d'Iniquité, pag. 279. He quotes Fasculus temporum ab. 1119.

(8) Coëteteau, Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité, pag. 754.

(9) Neque enim in Actis quicquam hujus apparet, ut nec in Commentario Hesselii Scholastici, qui res gestas hujus Concilii et profecto litteris mandavit. Coëteteau, in Exam. Myst. Plebsii, pag. 353.

Mr Allard affirms that the romance of the Archbishop Turpin of the year 1092, was composed at Vienna by a Monk of St Andrew (a).

(a) Allard, Bibl. de Dauphiné, at the end.

(10) Ibid. Sestarios, quò minus eam cum aliis veterum monumentis publicent. Tettis Justus Reuberus, qui à suo Tomo Antiquorum Scriptorum Turpinum excludere, turpe duxit (10). - - - But suppose Calixtus made a statute, that is, confirmed the History of Turpin, what advantage accrues from thence to the mystery of du Plessis? That history is not so fabulous but the Sestaries publish it with other ancient Histories. Witness Justus Reuberus, who would not exclude Turpin from his volume of ancient writers. This last part of the Jesuit's answer is pitiful; for if it be a shameful thing, as it is no doubt, for a council to approve a book stuffed with impertinent fables, du Plessis's reflexion is very judicious. Besides, is it to prove strongly that a history is good, to say that a Huguenot or Lutheran compiler hath published it amongst other books? Is it not sometimes a sufficient Reason for the inserting a book in a collection that it hath some antiquity? And after all because a man is orthodox, is he necessarily happy in the choice of authors, who best deserve to be placed in a collection of Historians? Gretser had done very well to have kept to his first answer: He ought to have been satisfied that the words of the Fasciculus temporum prove nothing. Mr Rivet is of the same opinion; he replies for M. du Plessis in the following manner (11). It is of no importance whether Calixtus confirmed this history of Turpin in a Council, or whether he did it alone by virtue of his authority. It is undeniable that the Carthusian, who collected the Fasciculus, expressed himself thus, statuit historiam Caroli, descriptam a B. Turpino, Rhemenſi Archiepiscopo. Here Coëteteau insults du Plessis, after having falsely translated; he made a statute concerning the History of Charles instead of he decreed, that is, established or confirmed the History of Charles. He may learn at his leisure from any little Grammarian the difference between Statuere Historiam and Statuere de Historia. If this Chronicler is mistaken, if he saith this without mentioning any author, we are not to blame. We return to the Papists what they give us. For my part I am inclined to believe that he is mistaken, and that instead of Calixtus's statutes for the establishment of Archbishop Turpin, he mistook and thought it concerned the confirmation of Archbishop Turpin's history.

(11) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystère d'iniquité, Tom. II, pag. 238.

TURREL or TURREAU, (PETER) in Latin Turellus, a Philosopher and Astrologer (a), and rector of the college of Dijon his native place (b), lived in the reigns of Lewis XII and Francis I. See what I have said of him in the remarks [B] and [C] of the article C A S T E L L A N. I add that he is author of a small book intituled The Period, that is, the end of the world, containing the disposition of terrestrial things, by the virtue and influence of the celestial bodies. This piece was printed at Lyons in the year 1531. There is likewise another book written by him, which was printed at the same place, and is intituled, Fatal precision by the stars and disposition of the same on the region of Jupiter now called Burgundy for the year 1529, and for several years following (c). James Tahureau in his dialogues very much ridicules this Period or end of the world. Longolius exceedingly commends Peter Turellus in his oration pronounced and printed at Poitiers in the year 1510, touching the praise of the French compared with the Romans. Peter de Saint Julien, fol. 13 and 14 of his History of the Burgundians, speaks of a Chorographical table of Burgundy, and of an History of Burgundy written by this Turrel (d). If we will believe Paradin, this Astrologer had foretold to the Queen-regent the misfortune of the battle of Pavia a little before it happened (e). We must not mistake him for that Turrel who wrote against the Franco-Gallia of Francis Hotman [A].

(a) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 1065.

(b) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 417.

(c) Extracted from Du Verdier Vau Privas, ubi supra.

(d) Extracted from La Croix du Maine, ubi supra, pag. 515.

(e) Paradin, Hist. de notre temps, pag. m. 132.

(1) Pappyrus Masson, and Anthony Matharellus. See, remark [I] of the article HOTMAN.

[A] We must not mistake him for that Turrel who wrote against the Franco-Gallia of Francis Hotman. We have named two authors (1), who refuted this piece. Here is a third. Petri Turelli, Campani, & in supremo Galliarum Senatu Advocati, contra Oibomanni Franco-Galliam Libellus, Parisiis apud Michael de Roigny 1576, in 8vo. This treatise was dedicated to Christopher Thuanus, first President in the Parliament of Paris, and is dated the 12th of September 1575. The author proves in it, that as to kingdoms, hereditary governments are preferable to elective ones. He touches a little on the design of the Salique law, and the famous question whether women may be called to succeed to the crown of France (2).

(2) Taken from a manuscript Memoir, communicated by Mr Lancelot.

TURRETIN (FRANCIS), a Minister and Professor of Divinity at Geneva his native country (A), was born on the 17th of October 1623. Having studied at Geneva, Leyden, Paris, Saumur, Montauban, and Nîmes with great success, he was admitted to the holy ministry in 1648, and officiated at the same time in the French and Italian churches at Geneva. Two years after he was offered the Philosophy professorship, which he refused; but he complied with a call to the church of Lyons (a). He was recalled to Geneva at a year's end, that city wanting him for their Theological lectures, on which he entered in the year 1653. He was deputed to Holland in 1661, to request a pecuniary assistance which the city of Geneva then wanted. In that journey he met with all the success which he could promise himself, and got so great a reputation, that the Walloon churches of the Hague and Leyden earnestly invited him to their ministry, and the university at the latter of these places earnestly intreated his stay. After his return, he re-assumed the exercise of his office, in which he continued till his death with very great application. He died the 28th of September 1687, with the most edifying marks of an ardent love for God (b). He was a man of a great deal of merit; he

(a) To succeed Aaron Morus, brother to Mr Morus.

(b) Taken from his Funeral Oration pronounced at Geneva by Mr Pictet, the third of November 1687.

[A] At Geneva his native country. FRANCIS TURRETIN his grandfather, of an ancient and noble family of Lucca, having left Italy on account of his religion, resided some years at Antwerp, and had a great intimacy with the famous St Aldegonde. He afterwards went to Zurich, and at last fixed at Geneva, where he had a son named BENEDICT TURRETIN, who was an illustrious Professor of Divinity in that city, and very well known by his writings VOL. V. No. CXXX.

(1): This was the father of our Francis Turretin. All which the reader may find in the funeral oration of the latter pronounced by Mr Pictet, his nephew, a very eloquent piece and worthy of its author, who is a Minister and Professor at Geneva, and author, besides other works, of a book intituled, Morale Chrestienne, in several volumes in 12mo, and of a Theologia Christiana in 8vo.

fermons, intituled, Profit des chatimens. He had been minister of the church of Nîmes. [B] By

(1) He wrote among other books, Défense des Vérités de Geneve contre le Pere Coton. That work contains two volumes in 4to. He published also some French sermons.

was eloquent, judicious, laborious, learned, and zealous for orthodoxy. All which appears by the books he hath published [B]. He left a son endowed with extraordinary parts [C].

(2) See the encomium bestowed upon it in the Dutch edition, 1696. It has been abridged for the use of students. The name of the author of that abridgment, which was printed the second time at Amsterdam, 1695, is Leonard Rijfftenius.

[B] By the books he hath published. Besides his sermons dedicated to the Ducheſs of Scomberg, he wrote an answer to a tract published by a Canon of Aneci, to expoſe the Proteſtants amongſt other topics, on that of the obedience of ſubjects to lawful princes. He alſo answered the Biſhop of Lucca's letter to the families of Geneva, originally deſcended from his diocēſe, to exhort them to the profeſſion of the Catholic faith which their anceſtors had abandoned. But what will chiefly immortalize him is his Inſtitutio Theologiæ Elenctica in three volumes in 4to (2), and his theſes de Satisfactione Chriſti againſt the Socinians, and de neceſſaria ſeſſione ab Eccleſia Romana.

[C] He left a ſon endowed with extraordinary parts. I have cited ſomewhere (3) the learned theſes which he maintained at Leyden in 1692. The Carteſian Philoſophy, in which he was ſo perfectly inſtructed by Mr Chouët (4), does very much ſet off his great knowledge of Divinity. A Profeſſorſhip of Sacred Hiſtory in the academy of Geneva was erected on his account, which he very worthily diſcharges, as well as the office of miniſter.

(3) In the article NICOLL, citation (15).

(4) This illuſtrious profeſſor, the ornament of Geneva, his country, has been long ſince taken from his profeſſorſhip, and admitted into the government of the Republic.

TUSCUS (BALERUS) paſſed (as we are told) for the author of a book condemned by the Inquiſition in 1622, and intituled Tela Catholica contra judicia erronea, he paſſed, I ſay, for the author of this treatiſe, becauſe it was thought that the ſtile diſcovered it to be written by him (a). Friar Angel of the Purification, Hiſtoriographer of the order of the barefooted Carmelites, made uſe of this inſtance to authorize his ſuſpicion that Conrad Janningus, the Jeſuit, was the author of a letter from the Emperor to his Catholic Maſteſty diſperſed in the year 1696, and alledged alſo that by this conformity of ſtile St Jerom found that John of Jeruſalem was the author of a certain letter (b). We ſhall ſee, below, his miſtake [A]. It is certain that the letter diſperſed under the Emperor's name was really written by his Imperial Maſteſty.

(a) Lambert, Batavus, in Arte nautica Catholica, lib. ii, cap. ix, apud Papebroch. Elucidat. Hiſt. pag. 149.

(b) Hieron. Epiſt. xv, apud eund. ibid.

[A] We ſhall ſee, below, his miſtake. Father Papebroch, who hath inſerted in one of his books, the complaint this Carmelite Hiſtoriographer brought before the Tribunal of the Inquiſition, ſays, that the Imperial Ambaſſador at Madrid, demanded that the author of this injurious complaint againſt the Emperor ſhould be puniſhed, and that it was reported that this Carmelite eſcaped the puniſhment only by diſowning the accuſation. Obſerve, that this accuſer attempting to prove that the letter, which he pretended to be ſuppoſitious, was Janningus's ſtile, cited, as the works of that Jeſuit, two tracts which were written by Sebaſtian de Sancto Paulo a Carmelite Monk (1). Was not this effectually to prove the conformity of ſtile? Father Papebroch adds (2) that he has not found the name of Balerus Tuſcus in any catalogue of books condemned by the Inquiſition, and ſuſpects that this Balerus having prefixed his name to a book, wherein the private regulations of the Eaſt-India company were blamed, the Dutch Miniſters cenſured him, and that the author, without naming himſelf, oppoſed that cenſure by his Tela Catholica, which were alſo condemned. He alſo conjectures that Lambertus Batavus was captain of a ſhip in the Dutch ſervice, and conſequently a Proteſtant, and that his book taught the art of ſailing in all parts of the world. At laſt he ſaith, that the moſt expert in affairs of this nature, could not hitherto diſcover any thing concerning this book at Amſterdam. Ipoſe (libro) needum reperto, licet ab ejuſdem rerum peritiſſimis Amſtelodami quaſitus ſit (3). I never met with any perſon who had heard of this book, nor have I found the title of it in any catalogue.

(3) Id. ibid.

(1) Daniel Papebrochius, Elucidat. Hiſtorica actuum in Controverſia Carmelita, pag. 150. See alſo the ſiſt part of his answer, Art. xi, num. 240, 241.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 153.

V A Y E R

V.

V A Y E R (FRANCIS DE LA MOTHE LE) a Parisian, Counsellor of State in ordinary, and Preceptor to the Duke of Anjou, only brother of King Lewis XIV, was a very learned man. He was admitted into the French Academy on the 14th of February 1639 [A]. He had more reading and learning than the greatest part of that society, but most of them wrote more elegantly than he: for his stile was not very polite; and though he had made less use of his memory and of his reading of the Latin authors than he did, he would yet have come far short of perfection in language. He was a man of a regular conduct, very like that of the ancient sages: a true philosopher in his manners, who despised even lawful pleasures, and was passionately fond of a studious life, and of reading and composing of books. This regularity, austerity, and wisdom, did not prevent his being suspected of having no religion [B]. It is likely that this suspicion was grounded on some dialogues which he wrote, and which appeared under the name of Orasius Tubero (a), and on his discovering generally in his works too great a prepossession in favour of Scepticism or the Pyrrhonian principles. It is certain there is a great deal of looseness in the dialogues of Orasius Tubero; but he that should conclude from thence that the author had no religion, would render himself guilty of a very rash judgment: for there is a vast difference betwixt writing freely what may be objected against faith, and believing it to be really true. Several people believe that these dialogues hindered his preferment to the place (designed for him) of preceptor to his majesty [C]. This is not very probable, since if the Queen or Cardinal Mazarin had been affected by this reason, they would not have intrusted the king's

(a) Tholomeus, and those of 'Tubertus Ocella', under which he disguised himself upon some occasions, allude to the signification of la Mothe le Vayer, or Voyer.

[A] He was admitted into the French Academy the 14th of February 1639. Mr Esprit and he were admitted into it on the same day (1). Mr Balzac writes on this subject to his friend Mr Chapelain thus: I rejoice at the Academy's new acquisition of the Philosopher

(1) Pellisson, Hist. de l'Acad. Française, pag. m. 228.

*, who indeed is a fine gentleman, and doth not want wit; tho' he for the most part makes use of that of others (2). I observe here by the way, that Moreri, when he saith that la Mothe le Vayer was one of the first admitted into the French Academy, is mistaken. For that cannot be said of a man elected in the place of a dead Academic (3).

(2) Balzac's first letter of the 17th book to Chapelain, pag. 149, 150, Dutch Edit. 1661. That letter is dated the fourth of January 1639.

(3) See Pellisson, ubi supra.

[B] He was suspected of having no religion. Patin shall be my voucher. 'Mr de la Mothe le Vayer was lately called to court, and made Preceptor to the Duke of Anjou, the King's brother. He is about sixty years old, of a middle stature, as much a Stoic as any man in world; he is one who would be praised himself but never praises any body, fantastical and capricious, suspected to be guilty of that sort of wit with which Diagoras and Protagoras were tainted (4).' Patin wrote this letter the 13th of July 1649.

(4) Patin, Letter xxii, pag. 97, 98, of Vol. i.

[C] Several people believe that these dialogues hindered his preferment to the place (designed for him) of preceptor to his majesty. The learned Naudé informs me of some things which contradict that opinion. He tells us: 'I have also been always persuaded, that the choice of men was one of the most difficult things at court. But I was thoroughly convinced of it when the question was put who should be preceptor to the king; for the intention of the queen and the ministers being to commit that charge to one of the ablest, most famous, and esteemed persons in France, they first cast their eyes on Mr de la Motte le Vayer, as on him whom Cardinal Richelieu had designed for that post, induced thereto, as well by the excellent book which he had written concerning the education of the Dauphin, as on account of the reputation he had acquired by his many other writings of being the French Plutarch. But the queen having resolved not to bestow that place on a married man, they were necessarily obliged to think of another; who was Mr Aubert, Abbot of St Remy, principal of the College of Laon, Canon of that city, and Regius Professor of the Greek tongue, of whose polite manners, probity, learning, and facility of expressing himself with accuracy in Latin and French, no man can doubt modo caput habet extra cucurbitum, who is not a blockhead. But neither he, nor Mr Gassendi, the only oracle in our age of Philosophy, Mathematics, and Astronomy, and of whatever is excellent in the most sublime sciences; nor also Mr Rigaud, tho' the Coriphæus of our Humanists, and of a capacity universally known to extend to all other sciences, after having been put to the trial without knowing any thing of it, did stand it so well as the Abbot de Beaumont, Doctor of Divinity, and at present the worthy Bishop of Rodez, who was also preferred to another of the brightest ornaments of the Clergy, because not being inferior to any of the preceding, he had some other qualities, which turned the balance on his side (5). The reason which I have advanced (6) against those who pretend that the dialogues of Orasius Tubero were the occasion of our le Vayer's being excluded from this charge, seems to me demonstrative; for tho' it is usual to take a greater care of a young king's education, than of his brother's, yet they would never give a preceptor to a king's brother, whom they would not have intrusted with the king's education, for fear the preceptor should infect him with impious principles. If there had been no other reason, la Mothe le Vayer had been chosen preceptor to Lewis XIV, notwithstanding his dialogues, as well as to the Duke of Anjou: For since it was judged that so wife a man would carefully avoid infilling the Libertinism of Orasius Tubero into the young duke, it was more reasonable to conclude that he never durst presume to inspire it into the young monarch. Cardinal Mazarin was too well acquainted with mankind not to know that a Philosopher, who, by I know not what train of arguments, is led to Pyrrhonism in religion, is a man of a quite different character from a man who becomes impious out of brutality and debauchery. Such a Philosopher, in all particulars like la Mothe le Vayer, would be very uneasy, that persons liable to make an ill use of his opinions should ever imbibe them (7). He

(5) Naudé Dialogue de Mafcurat, pag. 375.

(6) In the text of this article.

(7) Compare with this the remark [F] of the article DES BARREAUX.

king's only brother to his care. The world was surpris'd that so wife a man should write so very freely on obscene subjects [D], but they were equitable enough at the same time not to draw any conclusion from thence to the prejudice of his morals: so true it is that

He would always be so discreet as to keep them from youth, and much more from a prince whose solid piety may extremely contribute to the public happiness.

What Moreri says that la Mothe le Vayer was Preceptor to his majesty for the space of one year, is affirmed by Mr Pellisson (7*). And we find in another writer (7) that la Mothe le Vayer began to exercise that function in May 1652, and that he was chosen by the Queen-mother herself being already Preceptor to the King's brother. Though Mr Pellisson mentions only one year, it cannot be inferred from thence, that this function lasted no longer. We can only infer from it that it had lasted but one year, when he spoke of it, that is, when he published his History of the French Academy in 1653. However it be, this confirms what I have said against those, who believed that la Mothe le Vayer was excluded from that place on account of the dialogues of Orasius Tubero.

[D] He wrote very freely on obscene subjects. There are some very wanton thoughts, and very smutty expressions in the dialogues of Orasius Tubero: but perhaps they are nothing if compared with the third and fourth (9) days of the Hexameron rustique.

His other books contain nothing like this, though in certain places by way of quotation or otherwise he expresses himself somewhat cynically. He seems to have apologized for himself two ways. I. By making it appear (10) that Seneca, Dion Chrysostome, and St Augustin have inserted in their works some things so obscene and so filthy, that there is scarce any body but is offended at it; and yet the first is acknowledged the most austere moralist of the Romans, the second

(7*) Pellisson, History of the French Academy, pag. m. 352.

(7) Pierre de Saint Romuald, in Continuatione Chronici Ademari, pag. 534, 535.

(8) Wherein he treats of the privy-parts of men and women.

(9) He tells us there, that by the Nymphs cave, Homer meant the privy-parts of Penelope.

(10) Hexameron Rustique, pag. 43, & seq. Compare with this, what is said in the article SANCHEZ, (THOMAS), remark [C].

(11) Ibid. pag. 42.

(12) Ibid. pag. 41.

(13) Ibid. pag. 99.

Accius esset atrox, conviva Terentius esset, † Ovid. i Trist. Essent pugnaces, qui fera bella canunt †.

Terence a glutton, Accius would be fierce,
And soldiers those, who bloody wars rehearse.

The falshood of this way of arguing formerly influenced Timæus to assert † that Homer and Aristotle were great gluttons, the last having frequently treated of the seasoning of eatables, and the first frequently used the word σπασμωδία, which implies to distribute meats. And if such consequences are just, as Virgil must of necessity pass for a soldier, and Dioscorides for an infamous poisoner; so the pious meditations of Arctin will prove his of several passages sanctity, and the fine sentences of Seneca concerning poverty will make us believe him necessitous, notwithstanding the seven millions of gold in cash, and the eight hundred thousand livres annual estate which he is said to have enjoyed (14).

La Mothe le Vayer's maxim generally considered is very true: the judgment to be passed on a man's morals from his writings would be false on a thousand occasions. Sallust is an example which may be added to the former. What he says, 'against the corruption and disorders of his age could not be better expressed by any other; but he should have left that to Cato, or to some other persons of a rigid virtue, who were zealous for the antient discipline: and in my opinion a declamation against luxury and lewdness is not less incongruous in the History of Sallust, who was reprimanded for debauchery by the Censor in a full senate, and twice accused of adultery

† Ex Pol. in Exc. Const.

(14) See in Melibonius, in Vita Maccenatis, cap. xxi, pag. 132, a collection of several passages relating to the opposition between Seneca's morals and his writings.

before the Prætor (15), than an invective against the ambition of ruling would be in Cæsar's Commentaries (16). See how Cicero rallies Clodius's oration against the negligence of the Romans in their divine service (17). The world hath always been, and is at present full of persons who declaim against vice, and are themselves very immoral; who are grave and severe in their books, and very loose in their conduct. We should therefore be finely deceived, if we judged of their morals by their writings. But may we justly say by the rule of contraries, that there are some persons whose morals are stricter than their writings? Yes, I believe we may: but it more rarely happens that an author allows himself a large liberty in his writings, and but a little in his manners, and takes but a very little freedom in his books. The reason of this difference is very obvious; for he that can perform the most, can also perform the least, but he who is capable of performing the least cannot perform the most. What is more easy than to declaim in verse or prose against the irregularities of the age, and what is more difficult than to avoid sharing some part of them? A wise man therefore doth the hardest task; it is not then very difficult for him to instruct by the productions of his pen, for this is infinitely easier than that. But it doth not follow that a man who can write very edifying and religious books, clean and free from all immorality, can live as regular. This is infinitely harder than the other.

To come more directly to the point. Catullus and Ovid, whose verses were so impure, lived as they wrote. Their debaucheries with women were extolled. The same may be affirmed of the French Poets who composed the Parnasse Satyrique, and of several Italian Poets whose Poems are very filthy. And this sentence is very true.

Raro moribus exprimit Catonem
Quisquis verbis exprimit Catullum.

Cato's life he rarely follows,
Who in verse writes like Catullus.

But by allowing all this we do not thereby ruin la Mothe le Vayer's apology; for there is a vast difference betwixt these two things: 1. The relating debaucheries committed by ones self, praising, and applauding them, and exhorting the readers to an imitation: and, 2. the relating gallant adventures in terms a little too brisk and natural, enlivening the recital, though one condemns or disapproves those actions; and discussing a point of doctrine (18), or a mythological reflexion by phrases which represent impurities. The first of these is utterly inexcusable, and infamous, and ought to be severely punished. But the second is perhaps only a piece of wit, and naturally affords no reason to make any inferences prejudicial to the author's morals. It is this that saves le Vayer.

I shall observe, by the way, that we ought not universally to condemn all those Poets as unchaste in their lives whose verses are immodest. Catullus doth not deserve to be comprehended in the apology which he made for them: he too much exceeds all bounds in most of his Poems, and even in the very epigram in which he pretends to justify himself. There is enough in it to condemn him.

Pædicabo ego vos, & inrumabo
Aureli pathice, & cinæde Furi;
Qui me ex vericulis meis putatis
Quod sint molliculi, parum pudicum,
Nam castum esse decet pium poetam
Ipsum. Vericulos nihil necesse est:
Qui tum denique habent salem, ac leporem,
Si sunt molliculi, ac parum pudici,
Et quod pruriat incitare possunt.
Non dico pueris, sed his pilosis,
Qui duos nequeunt movere lumbos (19).

Aurelius

(19) Catullus, Epig. xvi.

(18) See in the article LUCRATIUS, remark [C], where has been said in his vindication.

that the publick is not always rash, blind, and unjust in their judgments! this subject affords a favourable opportunity of answering a question, lately proposed to a learned Journalist,

*Aurelius, thou Catamite
And Furius, thou Sodomite,
I'll — you, for that you say
I am immodest and too gay,
Because my verse is delicate,
Soft, tender, and effeminate.
The Poet should himself be pure,
Not so his verses, to be sure.
Those only pleasant are and witty
Which are soft and somewhat smutty,
And into people can inspire
A strong libidinous desire.
Not boys but men I write to please
Who cannot move their loins with ease.*

Ovid, Martial, and several others ought likewise to be excluded the benefit of this justification, though they profess their innocence, and the purity of their lives in the midst of all the impurities of their Muses (20). Beroaldus hath in vain endeavoured to excuse them, and made himself ridiculous when he said that if those books ought to be condemned which contain criminal gallantries; the canonical Scriptures ought to be treated in like manner: 'Si scripta omnia quibus amores, res amatoriae continentur sunt cum suis scriptoribus repudianda, repudiandus Canonicae scripturae, hoc est instrumenti veteris luculenta illa volumina, quibus nihil sacratius, nihil religiosius, nihil mysticum magis estimatur (21). — If all writings wherein amours and gallantries are contained, ought to be condemned, then the holy Scriptures should also be rejected, that is those writings of the Old Testament, than which nothing is reckoned more sacred, religious, or mystical.' This is wretched arguing, and doth not at all affect the reason for which these Poets are condemned (22). But if the aforementioned do not deserve the benefit I speak of, there are yet several who deserve to be included in it. Their lascivious Poems were only flights of wit: the contagion of these impure ideas did not infect their minds: they made those verses to display their ingenious thoughts; they could not resist the temptation of expressing themselves in such a manner as would make their genius applauded: they were willing to accommodate themselves to the taste of a vast number of readers, who find in it an agreeable tartness, and charms with which they are ravished. They had indeed done very well to have resisted this temptation, 'Tanti non erat esse te disertum. — It was not of so great concern to be thought witty.' But they were only words; their morals preserved their integrity, and what an emperor said of Voconius is applicable to them,

(20) Circe mihi mores diktant à carmine nostro: Vita verecunda est, musa jocosa mihi. Ovidius. lib. ii. Tristium, ver. 353. Innocens censura potest permittere lascivum: Lasciva est nobis pagina, vita proba. Martialis, Epig. v, lib. i.

(21) Philippus Beroaldus, Orat. habita in principio Enarrationis Propertii, continens laudes Amoris.

(22) Consult Raderus upon Martialis, Epig. v, lib. i.

(23) Hadrianus, apud Apulejum Apolog. pag. m. 261.

(24) Quod nonquam ita dixisset, si forent lepidiora carmina argumentum impudicitiae habenda. Apul. ibid.

(25) Aufon. in Centone nuptiali, fol. 6n. pag. m. 115, 116. See the article AU-SONIUS, remark [E].

(26) See the article APULEIUS, citation (64).

Lascivus versu, mente pudicus erat (23).
In verse lascivious, but in heart was chaste.

This he would never have ventured to say, adds Apuleius, if too licentious verses were a proof of lasciviousness (24). Aufonius having occasion to prevent the suspicions which might be formed against his wisdom on account of his cento nuptialis, alleges several persons irreproachable in their conduct, who had taken great liberties in their verse (25): 'Sed quum legeris, adesto mihi, adversum eos, qui ut Juvenalis ait, Curios simulant, & Baccanalia vivunt, ne forte mores meos spectent, de carmine.'

Lasciva est nobis pagina, vita proba:

'Ut Plinius dicit. Meminerint autem, quippe eruditi, probatissimo viro Plinio in poematis lascivum, in moribus constituisse censuram: prurire opusculum Sulpicii, nec frontem capere: esse Apulejum in vita Philosophum, in epigrammatis amatorem, in praeceptis omnibus extare severitatem, in epistolis ad Carcelliam subesse petulantiam (26). — But when you read, defend me against those, who, as Juvenal says, Like saints do look and like the devils live, lest they judge of my practice by my verse,

VOL. V.

My page lascivious but my life is chaste,

'As Pliny says. Learned men will remember, that Pliny a virtuous person was wanton in his Poems and rigid in his Morals: that Sulpicius wrote lasciviously and was not ashamed of it: that Apuleius was in life a Philosopher, in epigrams amorous, in all his precepts severe, and in his epistles to Carcellia wanton.' He besides mentions Plato, Annianus, Laevius, Erenus, Menander (27), and Virgil. Note, that a reader ought not to judge of Poets by himself; I mean that he ought not to think that that piece of Poetry which in reading hath an ill effect upon his mind, made the like impression on the Poet who wrote it. Some of them accustom themselves to these thoughts, and are touched with nothing but the poetical beauties with which they are clothed. Constitution and habit have created in them the same insensibility, which Marigny ascribes to a Governor of the Spanish Netherlands with regard to the fine ladies of the court of Brussels. The Arch-duke, saith he (28), seconded by his sole virtue resists the powerful charms of all the beauties of which I speak. . . . He looks on them as fires which dart refugent light, but do not inflame him.

Comme dans un jardin rempli de fleurs nouvelles,
Dont l'éclat fait des yeux le plus noble plaisir,
Un Sage curieux regarde les plus belles;
Mais sans fonger à les cueillir.

*As in a garden of new flowers
Whose beauty strikes the eye,
A virtuoso does not gather,
But only them survey.*

This Prince looks on all these miracles just as he does on the pictures of his gallery, and though the Queen of the North (29) lay six weeks not above four steps from his apartment, as if he had drank of Merlin's enchanted fountain, the passion which often disturbs the reason of the bravest heroes, does not at all affect him (30).

Dorme vicina à lui la donna bella,
Fusse altro, fusse l'acqua di Merlino
Non e quel ch'esser suole il Paladino.

You see some Poets make amorous verses, in which they express themselves wantonly, though age hath rendered them as cold as ice. Ought not what they say to pass for a flight of wit? Read Pontanus's hendecasyllabic verses, written to a lady who shewed her breast, and selected from several other verses less modest.

Prædico tege candidas papillas,
Nec queras rabiem ciere amantum,
Me quem frigida congelat fenestra,
Irritas male, calcasique, quare
Prædico tege candidas papillas,
Et pectus strophio regente vela.
Nam quid lacteolos sinus, & ipsas
Præ te fers sine linteo papillas?
An vis dicere basia papillas?
Et pectus nitidum suaviare?
Vis num dicere, tange, tange, tracta?
Te ne incedere nudulis papillis?
Nudo pectore te ne deambulare?
Hoc est ad Venerem vocare amantes.
Quare contege candidas papillas,
Et pectus strophio decente vesti,
Aut, senex licet, involabo in illas,
Ut possim juvenis tibi videri (31).

*Thy fair neck hide, take my advice,
Seek not to blow a lover's fire,
For tho' with age I'm cold as ice,
You make me burn with fierce desire.*

5 O

With

(27) Quid ipsam Menandrum? quid Comicos omnes; quibus severa vita est, & laeta materia. Aufon. ibid.

(28) Marigny, in his letters printed in the year 1658.

(29) That is, Christina Queen of Sweden.

(30) See concerning the devotion of that Arch-duke, a book intitled, Mémoires de Hollande, printed at Paris in 1678.

(31) Jovianus Pontanus, Hendecasyll. lib. i, fol. 187, verso, Edit. Venet. 1513.

Journalist, concerning John della Casa, and his detestable Capitolo del Forno [E]. La Mothe le Vayer is a great instance of the small portion of happiness we taste in this life; for

With handkerchief I beg you'd hide
Your pretty bobbies soft and fair,
Wherefore, pray, should you take a pride
In going with them wolly bare.
Do you by that intend to say,
My naked breast come feel and kiss,
And with my milk white bosom play,
For nothing I will take amiss.
To walk out with uncover'd breast,
A powerful motive proves it must,
For lovers, wanton and unchast,
To come and gratify their lust.
A gorget then do you apply,
Therewith thy snowy bobbies cover,
Or else, tho' old, on them I'll fly,
Like any youthful eager lover.

There are some authors who are more scrupulous in the choice of modest expressions, for fear that any licentious expressions should confirm the bad report which runs concerning their morals. Others on the contrary emboldened by their virtuous life and the good opinion which the world hath entertained of their wisdom, morum fiducia, are not so solicitous in this particular, and allow themselves too large a scope in order to divert their readers. Probably Mr de la Mothe le Vayer was of this number: he very well knew that he could alledge for his excuse in case of necessity (32), 'Verba mea arguuntur, adeo factorum innocens sum' (33). . . . They find fault with my words, 'because they have nothing to say to my actions.' Let us conclude with considering the stupendous diversity of tempers and characters observable amongst men. There are some who scruple to say, what they make no scruple to do: others dare not do what they freely venture to say. (34) A certain writer observes that 'those who discover so much zeal in leaving out such places in the Classics as offend chastity, are not always so sober as those ancient authors.

Nimirum Criticus facere id quam scribere mavult,
Quod mavult vates scribere quam facere (35).

For Critics would much rather act than write,
What Poets would much rather write than act.

[E] Concerning John della Casa, and his detestable Capitolo del Forno. I have already said that several Italian Poets ought not to be admitted to justify the obscenities of their Poems by this rule, Lasciva est nobis pagina, vita proba.

Tho' my page lascivious be,
I lead a life of probity.

I shall say nothing in particular against Calcagnini (36), but Molza, Mauro, John della Casa, &c. deserve a sentence of condemnation. Not but that the judgment passed on the last by incompetent judges, who have not read him, is too severe; and as we ought to do justice to every body, I am obliged to declare that they have wronged him in imputing to him a book de Laudibus Sodomie. This pretended Poem is nothing but the Capitolo del Forno, where, under the allegory of an oven, John della Casa describes the leud intercourse betwixt men and women. Allegories of this sort were then in fashion; one borrowed the metaphor of a fig, another of a bean (37). What is most horrible in John della Casa is that having observed that certain leud youths began to despise the common oven, he adds that for his part he was not so nice, and that he seldom baked any where else. Which was to own that sometimes at least he committed the unnatural sin.

Tennero il Forno già la Donne sole.
Oggi mi par che certi Garzanacci

L'abbian mandato poco men ch' al Sole.
Spazzolino a posta lor, nessun non vacca.
Dicon pur ch' egli è umido e mal netto.
E sono ben cagion quelle sue stracci.
Io per me rade volte altrove il metto:
Con tutto che'l mio pan sia piccolino,
E'l forno delle Donne un po' grandetto.
Benche chi fa questo mestier divino,
Sà ben trovar dove l'anno nascofo
Calà dirieto un certo fornellino (38).

Mr Menage cites this passage of the Capitolo del Forno in a French book which he published at the Hague in 1688. This ought to be observed, to prevent some cavillers saying, that I alledge things which no body before knew, and which ought to be kept unknown. Let us now come to the question which occasions this remark.

A certain person wrote from Utrecht to Mr Basnage de Beauval (39), that he had read in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for the month of July 1685, That John della Casa being reflected upon in a satire, Moy 1696, page 427, made an answer in Latin verses, where he denied the fact, affirming, That he never pretended to praise any thing besides the enjoyment of women. But I would fain see those Latin verses, adds that anonymous person of Utrecht, not being able to imagine that the Archbishop of Benevento was capable of denying the fact with so much impudence; for it is not long since I saw and read this infamous Italian piece, intituled, Capitolo di M. Giovanni della Casa sopra del Forno: and most certainly it is not concerning the use of women as women, that he intended to speak. Since Daniel Francus's book, where the Latin verses of that Archbishop are recited, is so hard to be met with (40), I here inform the reader, that he may read them in Mr Menage's Anti-Baillet (41). It is beyond dispute that Casa denied he had ever praised the sin against nature.

Obscene nihil
Scripsisse me scitote: namque tunc quoque
Festiva nos à turpibus secrevimus,
A mollibusque impura. Cumque verbis Laudavimus Furnum, haud mares laudavimus:
Quod ille ait per maximam calumniam:
Sed feminas plane: ut videre Carmine
Ex ipso adhuc potestis.

Nothing obscene
Dropt from my pen, from smutty what is gay
I separated, and from soft impure.
And when in verse an oven I extoll'd,
Not men, as he most slanderously asserts,
But women I extoll'd, as you may see
By the poem itself.

You see he appeals to the poem itself for which he was accused. Most certainly, as we told in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Scavans, it is not concerning the use of women as women that he speaks. But we may answer, that most certainly his Capitolo concerns only that use. It is true, that he inserted in his poem the observation which I have cited, that certain leud youths were disgusted at that use, and hunted after the other, in which he very seldom imitated them. He doth not praise those leud youths, nor himself for sometimes imitating them; wherefore he cannot be justly accused of praising that abominable crime. But the Poem and it's author are nevertheless execrable; for tho' the epithet of Mestier divino, divine practice, falls on the venereal exercise in general (42), and not on sodomy in particular, the libertinism and profanation is such as cannot be sufficiently detested. Some (43) excuse him by

Lasciva est nobis pagina, vita proba est,
Tho' my page lascivious be,
I lead a life of probity. And by Lascivus versu, mente pudicus erat.
In verse lascivious, but in heart was chaste.

(38) John de la Casa, apud Menage, Anti-Baillet, cap. cxxx.

(39) See the Histoire des Ouvrages des Scavans, May 1696, page 427.

(40) Hist. des Ouvrages des Scavans, ibid.

(41) Anti-Baillet, ubi supra.

(42) Mr Menage, ubi supra, page 105, has these words: 'Benche chi fa questo mestier divino, è tenuto a be-ndere, ac-cording to found Grammar, if the love of men, and not of boys. See what goes before and what follows.'

(43) Menage, ibid.

And

for whatever reason he might seem to have to be contented with his state, he would not have returned into the world [F], on condition of being obliged to act the same part which

(44) Mr Menage quotes here the verses of Catullus, which you have seen above, in the remark [D], citation (19).
 'And indeed it is very probable that Cafa here calumniates himself, in imitation of several other Poets (44) . . . But of all the excuses alleged for Cafa, on account of this Capitolo del Forno, the best, in my opinion is, that he saith he repaired this fault by a virtuous life.'

Moribus,
 Industria, pudore, continentia,
 Lasciviam nos Carminis correximus
 Illius: emendavimusque seris Jocos.

*My wanton verse which gave offence,
 And all those jokes which I have vended,
 Now by a life of innocence
 And serious thoughts I have amended.*

These verses are part of the Latin poem which that curious person of Utrecht desired to see. There are also others in it wherein John della Cafa confesses his fault, but too faintly, and endeavours to excuse himself on account of his youth, and by the custom of good Poets, though on all other accounts, virtuous men.

Annis ab hinc triginta, & amplius, scio
 Nonnulla me, fortasse non castissimis
 Lussisse verbis: quod ætas tunc mea
 Rerum me adegit inscia, & semper jocos
 Licentia gavisa, concessu omnium, Juventa: quod fecere & alii item boni.

'Tis thirty years ago, and more
 Since I some verses did compose Perhaps obscene good men before
 Have done the like; my youth jocos
 Impell'd me, which, as all agree,
 Is thoughtless, and loves liberty.

The only excuse is that which Menage likes best. Let us observe by the by, that there are few subjects, where the boldness of authors in copying one another, without ever consulting the original, is more visible, than in this. Mr Menage hath cited several who accused Cafa, but he hath forgotten a very great number; and I wonder he did not know this place of a book which has been read by every body.

*John de la Cafa, Archbishop of Benevento, wrote a book in praise of Sodomy, calling it a divine work, and saying that he found a great deal of pleasure in it, and used no other sort of wensery (45). Observe, that the famous Mr Magliabechi having detected the infamous passages of the Capitolo del Forno, points out several other Italian Poets whose works are equally horrible, or even more execrable than this; of which the Protestants have nevertheless taken no notice: whence he concludes, that Vergerio's personal hatred against Cafa, was the source of their complaints so often copied. 'Io non intendo di far qui l'Apologisa del Cafa: troppo chiare sono l'infamità che si leggono in quel suo sporco Capitolo, &c. Contuttocio, come è detto, fu sua gran disgrazzia l'aver per nemico il Vergerio. Ognun vede le orribili infamità nel medesimo genere che si trovano nel Berni nel Capitolo a M. Antonio da Bibbiena, e nell'altro Capitolo sopra un Garzone, ed in mille altri luoghi: in Curzio da Marignolle: nel Ruffoli; in Marco Lamberti: nel Perfiani: ed in cento e mille altri nostri Poeti Fiorentini; per tralasciare altri quasi infiniti di altre patrie (46). -- I do not intend here to vindicate Cafa; the infamous things we find in his abominable Capitolo, &c. are too too evident. However, as I said before, it was his great misfortune to have Vergerio for his enemy. Every body sees the horrible obscenities of the same kind in the Berni, in the Capitolo of M. Antonio da Bibbiena, and in the other Capitolo sopra un Garzone, and in a thousand* other pieces: in Curzio da Marignolle; in Ruffoli; in Marco Lamberti; in Perfiani; and in a world of other Florentine Poets, not to mention almost infinite numbers of Poets of other places.' The Poets were not the only persons who let loose at this rate; but prose was also made use of by some leud authors of that country: witness the oration of Heliogabalus, composed by Leonard Aretinus (47). All these authors are very much to blame, and so much the more inexcusable, because they knew the weakness of their readers. They were not of a country where nature is proof against temptations, but where it is easily heated; for which reason Poggius envied the Swifts, the honesty and sincerity which he observed amongst them. He could not sufficiently admire the Baths at Baden, where men and women, boys and girls, were bathing promiscuously, without raising any ill suspicions. Poggius Florentinus de Thermis Badenibus Helveticorum admirabundus scripsit ad Leonh. Aretinum (48), in iis pueros puellasque viros & feminas simul conspici: sæpe feminas nudas nudo viro obviam ire, nulla inhonesti suspitione: masculos campestribus seu femoralibus, feminas linteis indui vestibus, crurum tenus à latere scissis: neque collum, neque brachia, neque lacertos tegere, &c. Et addit postea: Cernunt viri uxores tractari, cernunt alteri colloqui. Eß quidem illis solatium, nihil bis commoveatur, nihil admittantur: omnia BONA MENTE fieri putant, neque est ex iis, qui Zelotypus esset, & mores nostris (Italicis) dissimiles, qui semper res in deteriorem partem excipimus: qui usque adeo calumniis delectamur & obiretationibus, ut, si quid videmus per ullam conjecturam, statim pro manifestis crimine attestemus. Invidet, imo nostras execror animi perversitatem, &c. (49). -- (49) Matthias Berneggerus, Question. Miscellanea, x, ex Taciti Germania.

(45) Sainte Aldegonde, Tableau des Differens, Part. v, Tom. ii, ch. vii.

(46) Magliabechi, letter to Mr Bigot, in the Anti-Baillet, at the end of chap. cxx.

(47) Exstat in monumentis Desiderii Erasmi Rotodami ex recensione editis, oratio invictoria Heliogabali Romanorum Imperatoris, habita in concione ad meretrices, quam à Leonhardo Aretino compositam plerique credunt. Sacra Eleusinia, paterfacta, pag. 21. See the article PINEAU, citation (3), touching these Sacra Eleusinia.

(48) That letter is the cxxxvth, among those of Æneas Silvius.

(49) Matthias Berneggerus, Question. Miscellanea, x, ex Taciti Germania.

Poggius, the Florentine, admired the Baths at Baden in Switzerland, and wrote to Leonard Aretin, that boys and girls, men and women, bathed promiscuously in them: that men and women often met one another naked, without raising ill suspicions. That the men wore drawers, and the women linen shifts, open in the sides as far as the knees; that they went with their necks, shoulders and arms bare, &c. And afterwards he adds: The husbands behold their wives handed by, and holding discourse with other men. They are not at all moved, nor surprized at such things, but are even pleased with them. They think every thing is done with an HONEST INTENTION, and there is not a jealous person amongst them. O how unlike are those manners to ours in Italy, who always take things in the worst sense, and who are so pleased with calumny and slander, that if we imagine or conjecture any thing, we immediately attest it as a manifest crime. I envy the Swifts, but I abhor the perverse turn of our minds, &c.

[F] He would not have returned into the world.] His words are (50): 'Life alone seems to me so indifferent, to say nothing farther to it's disadvantage, that far from ever desiring to renew the race, if put to my choice, I would not change the few remaining calamitous days in an age so far advanced as mine is, for the numerous years, expected by an infinite number of young persons, all whose pleasures I well know. I could really swear to this as well as Cardan, if I did not think it more to the purpose to cite his own expressions, to which I subscribe, tho', according to his manner of writing, they are more judicious than elegant: 'Nos, per Deum, fortunam nostram erigiam, atque in ætate senili, cum ditissimo juvene, sed imperito, non commutaremus. -- By G -- I would not exchange my small fortune, even in my old age, for the largest possessions of an inexperienced youth.' I suppose, with great probability, a thing, which he hath not exactly expressed; which is, that the race of life which he would not begin again, would be the same which he had almost finished. From whence I conclude, that there is scarce any part which to a man of judgment seems worth repeating on the stage of the world; for that which was allotted to la Mothe le Vayer, was the most desirable that could be imagined in his rank. He wanted nothing that was agreeable, if we may judge of it by the outside

(50) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter cxxiv, p. 204. of Vol. xii.

(b) He died in 1664.

which providence had imposed on him. He was extremely afflicted at the loss of his only son (b), his grief disordered him so much that he married again [G], and had no reason to deplore the loss of his first wife. The passage where he acquaints us with this last particular, is very favourable to those who assert, that the conjugal vow of fidelity is not side. La Mothe le Vayer was born in the metropolis of his country, an advantage which all learned men, and several others, would bestow on themselves, if in their gift. He was very well educated by a learned Father (51), whose merit and employments (52) rendered him considerable. He was loved and considered by the two Cardinals, who governed France successively: splendid titles and honourable posts he did not want; for he was Counsellor of state in ordinary, and Preceptor to the King's only brother. He distinguished himself gloriously amongst the authors, and deserved a place in the French academy. The great number of books which he published, met with a very great demand. They were several times reprinted separately, and afterwards collected together. He was as rich as his condition required. He was a little inclined to forbidden pleasures during the heat of the beginning of his youth (53), but he soon extricated himself, and afterwards constantly led a pure life, which made him be looked on as a rigid follower of the most perfect morality (54), inasmuch that he acquired a very particular esteem on that account. It is a greater

(51) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 84, who calls him Felix de la Mothe le Vayer.

(52) Morel says he was Counsellor to the King, and Substitute to the Attorney-General in the Parliament of Paris.

(53) See the Hexameron Rustique, pag. 97, 98.

(54) Virtutis vere castos rigidique fastidit. Horatius, Epist. i. lib. i. ver. 17. We have seen that Patin calls him a Stoic.

perfection to be always wise than to become so by way of amendment; but the conversion to wisdom is more difficult than the keeping in her paths without ever turning out of the way. There was therefore in this particular of la Mothe le Vayer's life something very agreeable. This made him remember the violence which he made use of to renounce the pleasures which he was very well acquainted with: a violence greater, might he say to himself, than to abstain from those pleasures which one hath never tasted. Besides, was it not agreeable to find in his lot the successive enjoyment of the pleasures of the body and soul? This was more likely to tempt him to accept of the repetition of his condition, than if he had been deprived of the pleasures of youth. Yet neither this, nor all the other allurements of this author's life, tho' so charming, could engage him to desire the repetition of it. This is a proof that it was intermixed with crosses, of which we were ignorant, which turned the scale on the side of evil. But if misfortune fell in upon so many advantages; if it poisoned them with a loathsome bitterness, so as to make him despise life as a burthenome honour, which he would not accept, if he had the power of refusal: What can we think of the condition of so many persons, who seem to us to be destitute of almost all the causes of human happiness, and exposed to a thousand misfortunes? A great many assert, that except some brutal wretches, no old man would return into the world on condition to be obliged to act the same part over again. We are, indeed, unwilling to die, we would always live, we flatter ourselves that things will mend; but the remembrance of what is past, the good and evil things of this world being duly balanced together, does not permit us to desire to run again in the same career. The Antients feigned, that the souls that were to return into the world, passed through the river of oblivion, as if without that there were reason to fear they should grow restless. On this head, see the New Letters against Maimbourg (55).

(55) New Letters against Maimbourg's History of Calvinism. pag. 722, 719 bis, & 768.

[G] He afflicted himself extremely at the loss of his only son, his grief disordered him so much that he married again. To this purpose, Guy Patin furnishes me with two necessary passages. We have here an honest gentleman under very great affliction. It is Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, a celebrated author, and formerly preceptor to the Duke of Orleans, aged seventy-eight years. He had an only son about thirty-five years old, who fell ill of a continual fever, to whom Dr Esprit, Dr Brayer, and Dr Bodineau, have given emetic wine three times, and sent him to the place from whence there is no return (56). This is extracted from a letter, dated the 26th of September 1664. Three months after Patin wrote another letter, in which are the following words: Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, to comfort himself for the death of his only son, is this day married, being seventy-eight years old, to the daughter of M. de la Haye, formerly ambassador at Constantinople, who is at least forty. She flaid long enough to be a Sibyl. Non invenit vatem, sed virum, sed vetulum (57). -- She found not a prophet, but an husband, and that an old one. Observe, that Patin makes him seventy-eight years old in the year 1664. This doth not agree with what he says in another letter (58), that in 1649, he was aged about sixty years. Mr de Vize's Novelists makes it a round number; they assure us that he married when eighty years of age. The death of Mr Godeau gave occasion to speak of that of Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, who hath thereby left a second vacancy in the French academy. He was a very learned man, richly stored with polite learning, and hath left the public fifteen or sixteen volumes of his works, by which he acquired a vast reputation. He had been preceptor to the King's only brother, and at the age of fourscore, married Madam de la Haye. After which he lived several years. Thus the Novelists discoursed about it, and as they said nothing but what is true, I have nothing farther to add on this subject (59).

(56) Patin's Letter cccxvi, pag. 656, of Vol. ii.

The author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres sticks at seventy-eight years. I shall cite what he says somewhat at large, because, besides other particulars, we are thereby informed, that this marriage was a weakness which the Philosophers will never forgive him. Mr Petit discharges his indignation on some learned men, who imagine that the description of the Nymphs cave, denotes the characteristic part of women (60). He saith, that after the war which they have declared against the sciences, and human reason, nothing could stop their fury from attempting the ruin of polite learning by bespattering Homer. It is easy to perceive that this is levelled at the fourth day of the Hexameron rusticque of la Mothe le Vayer, a famous Pyrrhonist. Indeed it had been better if, in his old age, he had not printed such a book as this, in which, notwithstanding his caution in several places, it cannot be denied that there are too many impure thoughts. But this is not the only thing which is censured in the last years of this venerable old man, whose virtue had so successfully conducted him in the paths of the antient sages: he married again at seventy-eight years of age; a weakness which the Philosophers will never forgive him (61). Because all learned readers will desire to see this indignation of Mr Petit, as it is vented in the original, and perhaps may not have his work de Sibylla, I shall here cite his words: pag. 1118, 1119.

Sed & propudiosa quorundam interpretamenta excluduntur, qui ista imagine antri Nympharum utrum & pudendum muliebrem ænigmatice ab Homero designatum censent: quibus cum opponitur durum ejus antri portarum descriptio, eo amentia & furoris procedunt, ut ad adversæ & averæ seu pollicæ venæ flagitiosa divortia confugere non erubescant. Adeo impudentes ut non vereantur poetarum omnium principem, literarum parentem, ingeniorum fontem, ad hæc transferre nefanda, ut qui rationi humane & scientiis bellum indixissent, literas quoque omnes, infamato earum principe, quantum in ipsis esset, perderent (62). -- But likewise the shameful interpretations of some are exploded, who, by the image of the Nymphs Cave, fancy that Homer figuratively meant the womb and privy-parts of women. And when the description of the two gates of the cave is objected to them, so great is their folly and madness, that they are not ashamed to recur to the flagitious distinction of natural and unnatural venery. They are so impudent, that they are not afraid to lay those impious things upon the prince of Poets, the parent of learning, and the fountain of wit. For after they had declared war against human reason and the sciences, nothing remained for their fury to do, but to attempt the ruin of all learning, by defaming the prince of it. For the rest, la Mothe le Vayer's son was reckoned amongst the learned Abbots; it is to him that it is thought Mr Boileau inscribed his 4th satire. In the year 1656 he published a French translation of Florus, and dedicated it to the Duke of Anjou, the King's only brother. He saith, that

(57) Idem, Letter cccxi, pag. 70, of Tom. iii. It is dated the 30th of December, 1664.

(58) See the palage of Patin, cited in the remark [B].

(59) Mercurius Galant, for the year 1673, Tom. ii, pag. 38, 39. Dutch Edit.

(60) The author of a treatise of Anatomy, intitled, Særa Elæphina partitæ, explains in the same manner the cave of Anaxilas. See Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. viii, cap. i.

(61) Nouv. de la République des Lettres, Octobre, 1668, pag. 1118.

(62) Petrus Pontanus, de Sibylla, lib. ii, cap. 2, in fine, pag. 234.

not much better observed than that of Celibacy [H]. The reflexions he made in an another that he published this Florus from the translations which the young prince had made. This version is accompanied with a learned and curious commentary, where Coeffeteau's translation is very much censured. See the elogies which the Abbot of Villeloin bestows on the father and the son (63).

(63) Marolles, Mémoires, pag. 194.

(64) You will see in the remark [B], of the article CRISTO (JAMES) who she was.

[H] The passage . . . where he acquaints us that he had no reason to deplore the loss of his first wife (64), is very favourable to those who assert, &c. . . First of all I ought to acquaint the reader that he never charges his wife with any amours: He only owns that he was perhaps as sensible of the inconveniences of marriage as any body. In a letter to a friend who had informed him that a certain person was separated from his wife, on account of adultery, he expresses himself thus. 'Do not expect that I should offer you a panegyric on a condition of life, whose inconveniences I am perhaps not less acquainted with than those who are most weary of them. I have always taken that sleep into which God call our first father before he presented him with a wife, not only for a caution to distrust our own sight, as a very bad counsellor in this affair; but for a moral instruction, that no man would probably take upon himself that incumbrance, if the eyes of his mind were open enough to foresee the inconveniences to which he subjects himself, who engages in so dangerous a society. And I never read the first verse of the tenth book of Ovid's Metamorphosis, where he arrays the god Hymen in a saffron coloured robe,

. . . Croceo velatus amictu,

without fancying that the Poet thereby designed to express what is so essential in marriage. The cares of a family which you take upon yourself, the several blows of fortune which you render yourself liable to, the inevitable jealousy which you will have of your wife, on account of the charms you find in her, and the fear of being touched in your honour, are they not sufficient causes of jaundice? And is it not a miraculous thing, if a constitution, even the most sanguine or gay, be not by this means icterical? But after all we ought to acquiesce in our destiny, and submit to what the wisest legislators have on this occasion ordered for the best. We cannot change their decrees, and we may render ourselves yet more miserable, by taking a course much more dangerous than that already prescribed to us (65). By these last words he gives us to understand that the inconveniences of marriage do not render that state the most miserable of all conditions of life; this he had plainly told us in the foregoing pages. I am very much mistaken, if this man does not find the remedy which he designs to apply to his misfortune, worse than the evil which he believes to be insupportable; and if at length he does not find that in several respects concubinage is something more intolerable than marriage itself. For it does not seem sufficient to say only with the ancients, (65) La Mothe le Vayer, letter lxxvii, pag. 224, & seq. of Vol. xi.

Tam malum est foris amica, quam malum est uxor domi *.

* Laberius.

A mistress abroad is as great an evil as a wife at home.

. . . He is ridiculous, if he expects a greater intimacy in libertinism, and imagines that he shall be more ardently and sincerely loved in a state where the fires are barely artificial. You, as well as I, have known several men more harassed in extricating themselves from such a licentious life as he designs, than they could be by all the disgraces of an unfortunate marriage (66). All this is worthy of the wisdom and genius of this great author. But I proceed to what he says more essentially proper for the commentary on my text.

(66) Id. ibid. pag. 223, 224.

'I will not penetrate so far as you into the secrets of this marriage. It is enough that I tell you that without being a very great prophet, one might long since have foretold this adventure. No man ever discovered a more foolish passion for his wife, he made love to her with all the extravagancies of a lecher. But this is a great defect in a wife man, who ought to avoid all such behaviour; Adulter est uxoris amator acris. . . . He is an adulterer that too violently loves his wife; and this is, according to

VOL. V.

Laberius, to make a coquet of one's own wife. And truly it cannot be denied, that the wife I speak of has hitherto behaved herself in such a manner, that one may very well believe part of the coquetries her husband accuses her of, without doing her much wrong, or without being too credulous. And yet what does he charge her with besides living according to the mode? Indeed our manners in that respect are at present arrived at a very strange period; and the prostitution of the sex, even by those whose honour so absolutely depends on their conduct, is what is not to be accounted for by reason, nor could any thing but seeing it every day make us believe it possible *.

Eo prolapsi mores jam sunt, ut nemo ad suspicanda adulteria nimium credulus videri possit. . . . The age is now so corrupt, that none can be thought too credulous in suspecting adulteries. And the Latin grammar by its rules never rendered (Cornu) Horn so indeclinable, as our senseless deportment in this respect hath at present rendered it inevitable by a pleasant synonymy (67). Do not believe that la Mothe le Vayer is the only author who thunders out such terrible and satirical sentences: A vast number of other writers pronounce the same judgment. It would be too tedious to enumerate them, see only some of the newest books, those which terminate in ana (68), and those that go by the name of stories, letters, memoirs, comedies, novels, &c. They represent leudness like Deucalion's deluge which overspread the whole earth, and as a distemper which marriage rather heightens than restrains.

 Sen. Cont.

(67) Id. ibid. pag. 222, 223.

(68) À Menagiana, Harlequiniana, Farsetiana, Saintveermoniana.

They induce us to conclude that the time which Seneca mentions is returned upon us, the time I say when the multitude of adulteresses took off the shamefulness of that crime, when conjugal fidelity was a proof of ugliness, and an husband was taken for no other use than to excite the love of a gallant. Seneca's description is so nervous, that I choose rather to transcribe it than translate it faintly. Non expedit notum omnibus fieri, quam multi ingrati sint, pudorem enim rei tollet multitudo peccantium: & desinet probri loco, commune maledictum. Numquid jam ulla repudii erubescit, postquam illis quædam ac nobiles femine non consulum numero, sed maritorum annos suos computant? & exeunt matrimonii causa, nubunt repudii? Tam diu itud timebatur, quamdiu rarum erat, quia verò nulla sine divortio acta sunt; quod sæpe audiebant, facere dicerunt. Numquid jam ullus adulterii pudor est, postquam eò ventum est, ut nulla virum habeat, nisi ut adulterum irriter? argumentum est deformitatis, pudicitia. Quam invenies tam miseram, tam fordiam, ut illi fati sit unum adulterorum par? nisi singulis divisit horas, & non sufficit dies omnibus? nisi ad alium gestata est, apud alium manit? Infrunita & antiqua est, quæ nesciat, matrimonium vocari unius adulterium. . . . horum delictorum jam evanuit pudor, postquam res latius evagata est (69). . . . It is not fit that the world

(69) Seneca, de Benefic. lib. iii, should know, how many ungrateful persons there are: For the multitude of offenders would take away the shame of the offence, and a common reproach would cease to be a disgrace. Is there any woman now a-days, that blushes at a divorce, since some illustrious and noble ladies, compute their years not by the number of the consuls but of their husbands, from whom they depart in order to be married, and are married in order to be divorced? A divorce was so long dreaded as it was uncommon; but since there are now few or no marriages without it, people learn to practise what they often bear. Is any one now ashamed of adultery, since the age is become so corrupt, that no woman takes an husband but to be a cloak for adultery? Chastity is an argument of ugliness. What woman is so wretched, so fordid, as to be contented with one couple of adulterers? Unless she has one for every hour of the day, and the day is not sufficient for all? Unless she visits at one place and dines at another? She must be a doating old woman that does not know, that the keeping company with one man only is called marriage. . . . The shame of those crimes is now vanished, since they are become universally known.

The champions of monastical vows boast of no small advantage to their cause by this; as if they could

5 P

could not be confuted by this reason, viz. that incon-tinency, which naturally prompts to marriage, and is generally the cause of it, ought to be left at full liberty to take its course. It is not at all tamed by it, say they; and it may as effectually be restrained by the vow of celibacy, as by the solemn one of conjugal fidelity. There are two sorts of vows, one of which ought to be observed as inviolably as the other; and if one is not better kept than the other, as practice plainly shews, of what advantage would the abrogation of monastical rules be? The Monks and Nuns are charged with thousands and thousands of leud actions. Terrible lifts are made of bairds and abortions, and such other disorders proceeding from the celibacy of Ecclesiastics (70).

(71) See the article PATIN, remarks [C], and [F].

(72) Peter du Moulin, the son, Traité de la Paix de l'Ame, livr. iii, cb. xiv, pag. 382, Paris 1673.

(73) Histoire de la Mappemonde Papistique, pag.
81, Edit. 1567,
in 4to.

(74) Ibid. pag. 32.

persons proceeding from the celibacy of Ecclesiastics (70). If those persons obliged to continency by their state of a single life, were at their liberty in the world, could not they fall into worse uncleanness? Turn our eyes to what authors relate of the abortive births (Paris 71). Under the covert of marriage, exempt from the fear of consequences, to what lewdness do they abandon themselves? And if those who have occasion to fear the anxiety which the fox was reduced to, I mean the necessity of being confined, till their bellies grow as flat as they were before, will notwithstanding venture it; can we expect any better from those who on the like occasion lie under no necessity to hide themselves, marriage veiling their fault from the eyes of the world? But you may say what you please, you champions of monastical vows, you will never be able to convince me, with all the proofs which you are pleased to cite out of la Mothe le Vayer and a hundred other authors, that the conjugal vow of fidelity is not better observed than that of celibacy, and that marriage is not an effectual remedy against the incontinence of a very great number of persons. We ought not to stretch too far what was said by a very good man, equally recommendable for his father's glory, and his own virtue. In one of the best pieces of Christian morality that we have, intitled, Of the Peace and Contentment of the Mind, a sensible, serious, grave, and religious book, he saith, that the husband whose wife is false ought to practise the great remedy against irremediable evils, which is patience, and that the good company of so many honest men, who are in the same condition, helps to bear it, and he needs not think it more strange than to wear a fashionable hat (72). Once more, this expression ought not to be urged too far; for the number of those, who follow the mode in their dress, surpasses the number of those whom this wife Divine endeavours to com-

port. What I have said above concerning the fox will be more intelligible, when I have related to those gentlemen what I have read concerning the pernicious effects of those vows, which they would justify. It is a story, the ground of which I could never yet meet with in the ecclesiastical annals : I have engaged some people in quest of it. In the mean while all that hath yet reached my knowledge is, that about the year 1537, the Countess of Guastalla, by the advice of Baptiſt de Crema, a Jacobin Monk, founded a fraternity of the Victory over one's self against the flesh. . . . To gain this victory, a certain lady named Julia, put a young fellow into bed with a young girl, and laid a crucifix as a barrier betwixt them, to the end that they should not kick one another, as we generally call bars or poles between horses: And this was the trial (73). This fraternity multiplied prodigiously. Such ladies, says my author (74), go very often to several of the neighbouring towns, to visit their Priests and spiritual Fathers, for they have their nests in several towns. But it often happens to them as to a certain famished fox, who entering into a chamber by a little hole, eat so greedily, and stuffed his belly so full, that he became so swollen that he could not get out again : So it happens frequently to these good ladies, when they enter the chambers of their fathers confessors, their bellies begin to swell to that degree that they are obliged to stay there, and not stir a foot till the fruit is ripe, because their repast proved too large : Which proceeds from their gormandizing, because their hunger is as great as that of the fox. See what Horace says.

*A hungry fox, when pinch'd for want of meat, Crept thro' a little hole to heaps of wheat,
And there well fill'd he would return again
Thro' the same chink; he strove, but strove in vain:
When lo the wheel cry'd absurd design,
Fox, you were thin and lean when you got in,
And if you would get out be quite as thin.*

(75) Horace,
Epist. vii, lib. i,
ver. 29.

СРЕДН.

Let us return to la Mothe le Vayer. He judiciously observes, that this divorced woman was ruined by her husband's fault; who loved her too lasciviously. Brantome for the same reason charges the ill lives of several wives to their husband's account (77). Generally speaking we may affirm, that the mens part in all these disorders is infinitely greater than the women's. They are the instigators, sollicitors and seducers. This an author of the XVIth century hath very nautically inclined. We very seldom see, faith he (78), women guilty of pride, cruelty, murder, drunkenness, gluttony, sacrilege, robbery, or generally tainted with all sorts of vices as the men are: But, on the contrary, they are for the most part humble, civil, sober, chaste, discreet, and charitable in their hearts are tender and humane; and if there are any, as it may be alleged against me, who are vicious I aver and maintain, that they are most commonly introduced and inticed to it by men, without whose inticement few or none of this sort would be found. And I speak plainer, for a small number of ill women the greater part of the men are stark nauts. And if any person is pleased to contradict me, I ask him what the men would be, if they were continually enticed, excited and solicited to evil, vice and sin, by the women, as the women are by them, considering that of their own accord without any affliction they are so corrupt and vicious? Who ought to be esteemed most excusable, he who at the inticement of another loses her virtue, or he who uses his utmost endeavours to extinguish it, which I see confirmed by daily experience? And therefore I am a little surprized at the thoughtless sparks, who incessantly censure the women for the very vice which is not so common amongst that sex as amongst their own. If the women (as they say) were subject to luxury and incontinence, (which I utterly deny) ought they not to be as full as abominable and detestable, or rather more, in infinite load of other vices and imperfections which may find amongst themselves, the least of which deserve as much to be blamed as that? I cannot imagine where such an error should proceed, unless from a desire of tennening others to justify themselves: which would avail them with regard to me; for I know that they almost all so generally addicted to the same vice (by others) that there is not a wretch though ever so bad amongst them that doth not desire to gratify his lust.

ally, or as many women as please him: do thou the modesty and chastity did not stop the torrent of vice, it would be no more continence amongst mankind amongst brutes (79). But we see they are still without intermission, and with much less trouble they might enjoy their fill of pleasure, notwithstanding in which they very seldom fall into this fault, we though so much blamed in them, is becoming almost a to the men. Is it then less displeasing to God to a sex than in the other? It is indeed very strange they should be so severely censured, for what they glory in, considering also that the sin is committed on female side with some colour of excuse, whilst the male really none. What hath been lately said concerning the weakness of men, and the strength of men, in a book intitled, Moliere Comedien their charms Elisbes (80), is the best thing in that book and doubts he that wrote the satire against

(76) I cannot tell whether the following passage of a letter of Lucia Gonzaga, p. 134, may be applied to the members of that fraternity. Havete ridette tanto quella pia crociata che io vi narrai occorre tra Guastallino, & lui. . . . I laughed at those comical things which I told you happened there: it is the Guastallians and him. Ho tentio Lando in meant by the word him.

(77) Brantome
Mémoires des Dames Galantes
Tom. i, pag.
54, 55.

(78) Claudius Taillemont, L. onnois, in bis Discours des Champs Faes.
l'honneur & e altation des Dames, print at Lyons 155 in 8xx.

(79) Com
thus with is laid in t
ticle LAN NIANO,
tion (18)

which vir- (80) Pri
one 1896. S that vi, of A fools pag. 157
in the of the A other flam edi con- You will
f wo- the fame
aux in the iv book; of the D huf- Currier ands. 68, & Dutch

at night, &c. [I]. He lived several years after his second marriage, and died in the year 1672 (c) I shall speak of the editions of his works [K].

(c) Moreri says in 1671. Mr Witte is very much mistaken in his Diarium Biographicum, where he places the death of this author, in the year 1664.

The

bands, in answer to Mr Boileau's satire against women, had a more fruitful subject than Mr Boileau.

[I] We have room to imagine that he was experimentally acquainted with the ill side of marriage, the broils of the day, and manner of composing them at night, &c.] See a letter which he wrote to a person who desired his advice concerning marriage. He first of all makes an enumeration of some imperfections which the antients attributed to women, after which he adds (81). 'But the want of capacity, and a sufficient number of other defects, with which those of our days abound more than ever, would not perhaps be so considerable, if we had the remedies which the antients practised against the most incorrigible. For besides divorces, which were allowed them if they found their wives but in a small fault, on four occasions they had a right to take away their lives, and the women ran as great a risk by drinking of wine, or using of false keys, as by impoling of children on the husband, or committing adultery . . . (82). But as our laws are very far from any such strict severity, we find that their indulgence favours the debauchery and depravation of women to that degree, that being at present restrained by no sort of fear, I see nothing which we ought reasonably to hope for from the most prudent of them,

(81) La Mothe le Vayer, letter xlv. pag. 357. of Vol. x.

(82) Id. ibid. pag. 358, 359.

† Juven. Sat. vi. vers. 50.

Paucæ adeò Ceres vittas contingere dignæ †.

On Ceres' feast restrain'd from their delight, Few matrons there but curse the tedious night.

DRYDEN.

'And if we ought to except some few who are touched with a sense of honour, how can you be free from the rest of their infirmities, which the greatest Philosophers, nor the most potent Emperors have not been able to correct? Philip of Macedon † protested, that he did not know a humour so martial as that of his wife Olympias, who incessantly made war against him. Their gaming, the excesses in their feasting, and the rest of their profusions, at present exceed those of the most debauched of our sex, and quickly make an husband sensible of the truth of the Italian proverb, spesa di sposa, noce che nuoce. Nor are you yet to expect that the noisy uneasiness of the day will exempt you from the duties of the night. There is no peace or rest to be hoped for, if it doth not proceed from that side, ‡ Dio. Chryz. or. 2.

† Ovid. l. 2. ver. 413, de art. am.

Sed lateri ne parce tuo, pax omnis in illo est †.

But no endearments no carresses spare, Enjoyment pacifies the angry fair.

 Diod. Sic. l. 17.

'And you will find the greatest part of them like the fountain of Hammon  extremely cold by day, but very hot by night.' When a married man talks at this rate, he gives very good reason to believe, 1. That he has often undergone such a trial. 2. That this made him so well acquainted with the seal, which ought to be affixed to those reconciliations. 3. That he was very well versed in the distinction betwixt the groundless quarrels, which are like the ill humour of a creditor ill paid, and those which result from a peevish temper.

(83) Epistle Decretory of the third edition.

[K] I shall speak of the editions of his works.] His son collected them into a body in 1653, and dedicated them to Cardinal Mazarin. This edition in folio being followed by a second, he published a third, larger and more correct than the two former (83), and dedicated it to the king in 1662. After this edition another came out in fifteen volumes in 12mo, which comprehends more tracts than the last in folio, which was in three volumes. Those three volumes in folio contain but the twelve first tomes of that in 12mo. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth, being the tracts which the author published in the year 1667, 1668, and 1669.

There is no small advantage to be made of reading this writer, and we have no French author who approaches nearer to Plutarch than he. We find beautiful thoughts, and solid arguments interwoven and dispersed through his works. Wit and learning go hand in hand. His wit would doubtless appear more conspicuously if it went alone; for the authorities and citations very often obscure it: but in some places it shines most by the happy application of a foreign thought. This author, amongst his other various sorts of reading, applied himself to that of voyages. In which each person hath generally his particular end. Mr Daillé (84) read them only to discover the difference betwixt the Apostles converting the antient Pagans, and the Popish Missionaries converting the new ones. Our Vayer had another aim, he only looked for arguments for Pyrrhonism. The prodigious diversity which he met with betwixt the manners and customs of different nations charmed him: he could not conceal the satisfaction with which he digested these materials, nor did he hide the consequences which he would have us to draw from thence, viz. that we ought not to be so decisive as to condemn as ill and unreasonable, whatever we do not find agreeable to our opinions and customs. I cannot tell whether he believed with Cardan, that Opinion is the queen of mankind (85), but I believe that he might have made as good an oration about the empire of Opinion as that of Schuppius, (86) and an excellent commentary on these three verses of Sophocles.

(84) See his life, written by his son.

(85) Æstimatione & Opinione rerum humanarum Regine sunt. Cardanus, lib. iii. de Utilit. apud Naudæum, Coups d'Etat, pag. m. 92.

(86) Christopher Pellerus quotes it sometimes in his Politicus sceleratus impugnatus. See there pag. 55, 56, & 219.

*Παῦσαι, κατ'ἀρκεί τῷ δὲ κεκλισθαι πατρός
Εἵτερ πύρκα γ' εἰδὲ μὴ, μέλιον βλάσῃ.
Τὸ γὰρ νομισθὲν τῆς ἀληθείας κρείττεϊ.*

*Pausa: sat est me hoc patre natum dicier,
Natus tamen si sum: fin autem, obest parum.
Nam veritate potentior est opinio*

Pausa, it is sufficient that I am said to be descended of this Father; it is no matter whether I really am so or not: for opinion prevails over truth.

His treatise concerning the Education of the Dauphin (87) and that of the Pagan Philosophy, are the best which he hath written. That of the Historians is good: but as Mr Baillet very judiciously observes, it did not cost him much pains (88). I have observed in it several other faults besides those which I have mentioned in the articles of Suetonius and Tacitus. No vans, Tom. ii, body is ignorant that his last works are much inferior to those composed in the flower and vigour of his age. These are the words of Mr Baillet (89).

(87) See Sorberiana, pag. 223, Dutch Edit.

(88) Baillet, Jugemens des Sçavans, Tom. ii, Art. 126.

(89) Id. ibid. Tom. i, Part. ii, ch. ix.

Mr de Vigneul Marville pretends that la Mothe le Vayer's works are only a collection of what he liked best in the course of his reading; that formerly such sort of rhapsodies were read, but are not relished at present (90). There is too much harshness and severity in this sentence: all unbiassed persons have always made a vast difference betwixt la Mothe le Vayer's writings, and rhapsodies. He was not an author who heaped up passages like the compilers of a Florilegium or a Polyanthæa. He contented himself to confirm his thoughts by those of the most excellent authors of Antiquity, or to use his learning in order to give new hints by the applications he made, or the consequences he drew. This is not what is called a rhapsody. He says an infinite number of things which were purely his own, and which he intermixed with a great deal of spirit and wit; and tho' he hath interspersed several borrowed thoughts, which are not chosen with sufficient discernment, it is nevertheless true that from thence arises a work, the reading of which is highly advantageous, and which continues to please some very good judges. Mr de Vigneul Marville believes that he hath done a great honour to France by saying that la Mothe le Vayer's rhapsodies are not adapted to our present taste, and that the readers no longer lose their time in reading them; but it is to be feared that he will hereby confirm (90) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Hist. & de Littér. Tom. ii, pag. 300, Dutch Edit.

(d) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Hist. & de Littérat. Tom. ii, pag. 301, Dutch Edit.

(e) That is, that he was a Philosopher, who minded only the inward part, and despised the vanities of human life.

The French Academy considered him as one of their best members; but the world looked on him as a capricious humourist, who lived according to his fancy, and as a Sceptic Philosopher. His physiognomy and dress made every body that saw him judge him an extraordinary man. He walked always with his head erect, and his eyes fixed on the signs of the street. Before I was told who he was, continues the writer from whom I have extracted this passage, I took him for an Astrologer, or a searcher after secrets and the philosophers stone (d). This serves only to confirm what we have seen above (e).

He had some cousins, whose descendants make a very good figure in the Law (f).

confirm several foreigners in the judgment which they make, that France, too much disgusted with all that favours of learning, only employs herself in refining her language, and in giving a happy turn to the descriptions and characters of men. The best writings of the first Academists are not less slighted than those of la Mothe la Vayer (91); and yet it is agreed on all hands that the French Academy was never better filled than in its beginning.

(91) I made this observation to shew that if la Mothe le Vayer is not read as he was formerly, it proceeds from a general disgust at most things that have lost the grace of novelty.

(f) See the Mercur Galant, for March 1682, pag. 166, & seq.

VAL (GEOFFREY DU) See VALLEE.

(a) At Rouën, in 8vo.

(b) I have this from Mr Drelin-court.

(c) At Rouën, 1603, in 12mo.

(d) Ibid. 1612, in 8vo.

VAL (JOHN DU) a Physician at Issoudun, his native place, translated into French the Antidotary or Dispensary of John-James Wecker, Physician at Basil, and added to it several things of his own. This book was printed at Geneva in 4to in 1609. The new edition of Vander-Linden, de Scriptoribus Medicis, doth not mention him, any more than it doth JAMES DU VAL, a Physician of Evreux, who published (a) a book in French, treating of hermaphrodites and the delivery of women in 1612 (b). He had before printed (c) a book concerning the medicinal spring about Rouën, and (d) a new method of curing Catarrhs (e).

VALDES (JOHN) in Latin Valdesius, flourished at Rome under Pope Julius II. He was a young well proportioned handsome polite Spaniard. His learning, industry, and the friendship of several great persons procured him very great riches. He fell in love with a Senator's daughter, not less virtuous than beautiful; and finding that the only way to gratify his passion was honourable love, he courted her for marriage, and carried the matter even to the signing of the contract. A little after which it was discovered that it was not possible to advance so far as the nuptial solemnity, by reason of his engagement in the ecclesiastical life. This very much angered the father of the betrothed lady, and obliged him to complain to Cardinal Leonard de la Rovere, who commanded in Rome in the absence of Julius II. That Cardinal caused Valdes to be imprisoned in the castle of St Angelo. The prisoner seeing himself charged with a crime, promised to renounce his priesthood if the Pope would permit him, and marry the betrothed lady, even tho' she had no fortune. Upon which he was discharged under bail; but whilst they were endeavouring to obtain the dispensation, he was so embarrassed but twixt the desire of keeping his benefices, and that of enjoying a wife, that he could not disengage himself from this labyrinth, otherwise than by throwing himself headlong from the top of his house [A]. By which he broke all his bones, and died immediately very much lamented by the whole city. His mistress being informed of this desperate act,

(e) I have this from Mr Bower delot.

[A] He could not disengage himself from this labyrinth otherwise than by throwing himself from the top of his house. His struggles with two different passions, was very fierce: on the one side he found himself unable to quit the charms resulting from the large revenue of his benefices, and on the other he despaired of resisting the violence of his love, if he could find means to annul his contract. If I keep my benefices, said he to himself, I shall never enjoy the person I love, and I do not find myself able to endure that privation. If I enjoy this person, I shall lose my preferments, and I do not believe I can any more bear this loss than the other. This plunged him into a deep melancholy, which was aggravated by his reflecting on the prejudice he did his mistress. He knew that by breaking off the promised marriage, he at once ruined the reputation and fortune of a very virtuous lady. For he doubtless imagined that she would find no more a suitable match. The scrupulous niceness of the Italians is such that they cannot easily digest the privacies which they suppose one after a contract of marriage may have and actually has taken. Nay, in the very countries, where people are not so nice, some men would never marry a lady who hath several times hearkened to the declarations of love from a young spark admitted by her relations; for they suppose that the more she became sensible of her parents consent, the lesser bounds she set to the caresses of young man, and that she abandoned the out-side of the place. What would they not think if the matter broke off betwixt the contract and the wedding-day? However it was, our Valdes thought he should ruin the reputation of this fair one, if he should annul the marriage-contract; he was touched with a compassion for her; he was ashamed to use her so ill; and these two passions joining with others so cruelly tormented him, that to free himself from this slavery he resolved to end his life. Early in the morning then he went to the turret on the top of his house, and threw himself into the street. Valdesius neque libenter sacerdotiis, quæ opulenta erant, abdicare cogitat, neque perferre se amorem, etiam si impune liceat, ulterius sperat. Igitur cum id consilii se cepisse videret, quod non facile poterat explicare, graviore ob id dolore affectus, quod pudicissimæ feminæ famam, & fortunam omnem everterat, si repudii nuntium remisisset, magnis excruciatu sollicitudinibus, misericordique & pudore confectus, ut erat æstivus dies, turriculam quandam ad prospectum super ædium culmen excitatam discinctus adhuc ascendit, quasi matutinalem auram strictiorem animi gratia captaturus, servuloque mox negotii certi nomine ablegato nullam aliam rationem nactus, qua se turbulentissimis miseriis explicaret, & dulcissimæ sponse famæ nominique prospiceret,

would have killed her self; wherefore they were obliged to keep a watchful eye over her to prevent any attempts of that nature. You expect to hear that time and another sighing lover comforted her, but you are mistaken; for as soon as her grief admitted of a little solace, she turned nun (a).

(a) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, in Litterarum Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. 44, 45.

spiceret, ex editissimo eo loco in viam mediam sese precipitem dedit, quo ita totis offibus colliso, & statim exanimato, Alterii filia re percepta, ipsa quoque sponsi desiderio sibi met manum inferre tentavit, sed diligenti familiarium observatione prohibita, custoditque, posteaquam tempore dolor aliquantulum mitigatus est, maritalem perosa vitam perpetuo victura celibatu vestalem induit (1). -- Valdes could not think of resigning his rich benefices, nor did he believe he could be able to resist the violence of his love, even tho' the contract were annulled. Therefore, when he saw he was involved in difficulties, from which he could not extricate himself, being the more concerned because he should ruin the character and fortune of a very virtuous lady by breaking off the match, and being agitated between compassion and shame, and cruelly tormented with anxious thoughts, he went up one summer's morning, before he was dressed, to the turret on the top of his house, as if to take a little fresh air, having sent out his servant under pretence of some business; and finding no other way to free himself from this insupportable misery, and to save the reputation of his dear mistress, he threw himself headlong from that high place into the middle of the way, whereby he broke all his bones, and died upon the spot. The daughter of Alterii bearing of it, attempted to kill herself for the loss of her lover, but was prevented, and carefully watched by her friends. Afterwards, when her grief was a little assuaged by time, she conceived an aversion to a married state, and resolving to lead always a single life, went into a convent. The author does not mention whether this unhappy man was interred in a church, or whether the judges exercised the rigour of the law on his corpse. He only tells us that the whole city deplored his death (2).

(2) Valdesius totius Romæ luctu deploratus est. Id. ibid.

(1) Pierius Valerianus, de Litterarum Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. 45.

(a) See the Bibliotheca Anti-trinitariorum, p. 2.

(b) Nobili generatus in Hispania & dignitate equitum ornatus à Carolo Cesare. Melchior Adam in Vita Petri Martyris, pag. 31.

V A L D E S (JOHN) one of the first founders of Lutheranism in the kingdom of Naples, was a Civilian (a), and a Spanish gentleman, on whom Charles the Vth conferred the honour of knighthood (b). It is believed (c) that in his travels to Germany he was tinctured with the opinions which were preached there against the Church of Rome; and that having carried to Naples the books of Luther, Bucer, and the Anabaptists, he made use of them to get profelytes. It is certain that he communicated his opinions to several persons, who privately assembled to serve God according to these new instructions. Some women of quality frequented these assemblies [A]. Some Monks of extraordinary merit, and among others Peter Martyr Vermilius (d), and Bernardinus Ochinus (e) resorted also thither. The Inquisition discovered it, and by the application of their usual violent remedies suppressed this beginning of reformation. Valdes's disciples were not all equally steadfast: some stuck to the new doctrines and retired into Protestant countries; but the greatest part yielded and betrayed their consciences [B]. He lived unmarried and very chastely, and died at Naples, about 1540 (f). He attacked the Church of Rome on some points only [C], and it is pretended that on the doctrine of the Trinity, he neither agreed with the Protestants, nor the Roman Catholics. The Unitarians have placed

(c) See the Bibl. Anti-trinitariorum, pag. 2; & Spondanus ad ann. 1547, num. 21, 22.

(d) See the remark [A].

(e) Spondanus, ubi supra, num. 22.

(f) Celius Secundus Curio, preface to Valdes's Considerationes.

[A] He communicated his opinions to several persons, who privately assembled to serve GOD. . . . some women of quality frequented these assemblies. A passage in Peter Martyr's life informs us of this more particularly. We have there a very fine eulogy on our Valdes, the founder of this dawning Church. 'Qui (Joannes Valdesius) posteaquam à Deo veræ religionis agnitione donatus est, vitam suam in Italia, & præcipuè Neapoli egit, quo loco doctrina & sanctissimo vite exemplo, quamplurimos, præsertim nobiles, Christo lucrificet, ac fuit eo tempore non spernenda Ecclesiæ piorum hominum in urbe Neapolitana. Nam in illo cœtu multi viri erant nobiles & docti; multæ etiam excellenti virtute femine: inter quas ut alias illustres & vere heroínas omittamus, silentio tamen præterire non debemus nobilissimam heroinam Isabellam Manricam, quæ postea CHRISTI nomine à patria exulavit. In hoc cœtu piorum fuit ibidem CHRISTI nomine exul Galeaxius Caracciolo Marchio Vici, & alii magni viri post exules, quos omnes nominare non necesse est. Quamvis autem hujus Ecclesiæ prima laus debeatur Valdesio: nihilominus tamen Martyris quoque virtus commemoranda est (1). -- John Valdes, after GOD had bestowed on him the knowledge of the true religion, spent his days in Italy, and chiefly in Naples; where, by his doctrine and holiness of life, he gained many to CHRIST, especially several of the nobility, and at that time there was a considerable church of pious men in the city of Naples. For in that assembly there were many noble and learned men, and likewise many women of extraordinary virtue; amongst whom, not to mention other illustrious and truly great ladies, I must not pass over in silence the most excellent Lady Isabella Manriquez, who afterwards was banished her country for the name of CHRIST. Among those pious men, Galeaxio Caracciolo, Marquis of Vico, was also banished for the sake of CHRIST; and after that, other great men, all whom it is needless to mention. Tho' the chief honour of this Church be due to Valdes: yet we ought not to forget the great merit of Martyr. See the remark [F].

[B] The greatest part yielded, and betrayed their consciences. Nicolas Balbani, minister of the Italian Church at Geneva, informs us of this: his words, according to Mr Minutoli's version, are: 'The greatest danger that threatened him (2) proceeded from the same person from whom he had received the beginning of his knowledge; for the number of the disciples of this Valdes, of whom we have already spoken, and who were the only company that Galeazzo frequented after he became acquainted with them, being extremely increased in Naples, most of them not advancing farther in point of religion than to establish the means of justification by JESUS CHRIST, and to condemn some of the grossest Popish superstitions, without abstaining, on that account, from frequenting the churches, and assisting at the Mass, and partaking with the rest of the Papists in several idolatries; it was to be feared that Galeazzo would make no greater progress than those gentlemen, whose good intentions miscarried when they came to be persecuted and imprisoned, and they were constrained to abjure their principles, after which some were put to death on pretence of relapsing to their former errors, and amongst them was Caferta himself, who had been the instrument of Galeazzo's conversion (3).

(a) That is, Galeazzo Caracciolo Marquis of Vico.

(3) Vie de Galeazzo Caracciolo, pag. 47, 48.

[C] He attacked the Church of Rome on some points only. Add to the passage I have just now cited the following words of the same book: 'There was then at Naples . . . a certain Spanish gentleman whose name was John Valdes, who having some knowledge of, and being even sensibly touched with the truth of the gospel, especially in the point of justification, had the happiness to sow some seeds thereof amongst the nobility he conversed with, and began in that manner to draw some gentlemen out of their ignorance, undeceiving them concerning the merit of good works, and the righteousness of men, as well as concerning several superstitions (4). Compare this with what I have cited from Thuanus, in 11.

(4) Ibid. pag. 10, the

VOL. V.

5 Q

placed him in the number of their authors [D]. He wrote some books [E], of which the

the article FLAMINIUS, and observe, that Flaminus was one of those who with Valdes confirmed Peter Martyr Vermilius in his new opinions (5).

(5) Melchior Adam, ubi supra.

[D] On the doctrine of the Trinity he did not agree... The Unitarians have placed him in the number of their authors.] See the following passage of the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum: 'Ab eo (Johanne Valdesio) Bernardinus Ochinus sententiam suam contra receptam de Trinitate opinionem imbibisse perhibetur. Floruit a. 1542. De eo ministri ecclesiarum consentientium in Sarmatia & Transylvania lib. 1. cap. 3. de falsa & vera unius Dei Patris, Filii, & Spiritus Sancti cognitione, hæc scribunt: De Joanne etiam Valdesio, genere & pietate clarissimo, quid dicendum? Qui scriptis publicis suæ eruditionis specimina nobis relinquens, scribit, se de Deo ejusque Filio nihil aliud scire, quam quod unus sit Deus altissimus Christi Pater: & unicus Dominus noster Jesus Christus ejus filius, qui conceptus est de Spiritu Sancto in utero virginis, unus & eborum Spiritus (6). . . . Bernardinus Ochinus, is said to have taken from John Valdes his sentiments against the received opinion concerning the Trinity. He flourished in the year 1542. The ministers of the united churches in Poland and Transylvania, in the book concerning the false and true knowledge of one GOD, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, write thus concerning him: As to John Valdes, a man eminent for his birth and piety, what shall we say? In the books he published he gives evident proofs of his learning, and writes that he knows no more concerning GOD and his Son, than that there is one Almighty GOD the Father of CHRIST, and our only Lord JESUS CHRIST his Son, who was conceived of the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin, and one Spirit of both.' This may perhaps be confirmed by Balbani's words: The Devil still continued to forge shackles for Galeazzo Caracciolo; for fear he should escape, he again endeavoured to pervert his mind, by the efforts which he obliged certain persons to make, to draw him over to a pernicious party. These were a band of Anabaptists and abominable Arians, who were unhappily spread in Naples and other parts of the kingdom; they promised themselves to find in Galeazzo (thinking the starting of a new opinion enough to gain a novice) the man whom they wanted to be their powerful support and defence, and the patron of their cabal: Wherefore they left no means which they thought proper unattempted to engage him on their side, and taint him with their heresy (7). The author further adds, that this gentleman vigorously repelled their efforts. Observe that he makes a distinction betwixt these Persons, and Valdes's disciples (8): But we may venture to say, that his acknowledging that a party of Antitrinitarians appeared in the kingdom of Naples, renders more probable what Sandius (9) affirms concerning Valdes's heresy. I have read a thing in Beza's letters which deserves a place here. A Minister of the French church at Embden, was accused amongst other things of having got translated and printed in the Dutch language, without the knowledge of his colleagues, Valdes's Considerations, full of blasphemies against the word of God (10), and of having left out the notes which were added to the Lyons edition. Besides other reasons in his defence, he urged the two following; that the book was not full of blasphemies, and that it ought not to be left permitted at Embden, to praise the piety of Valdes than at Basil, Zurich, and Geneva. He was answered, that book had done a great deal of mischief to the flock of Christ at Naples, and that Ochinus had there imbibed the errors which had ruined him; and that if any good men had bestowed eulogies on those Considerations of Valdes, they would change their opinion as soon as they had examined them. It was added, that the Bookseller at Lyons, who printed them, was very sorry and asked pardon for it, after Calvin and some others had informed him of his fault. Read all these particulars in the following Latin words of Beza: 'Scimus ex idoneorum hominum testimonio, quantum nascenti Neapolitanæ Ecclesiæ liber ille detrimenti attulerit; Scimus etiam quod fuerit de illo iudicium D. Joannis Calvini: Scimus & illud, Ochinum infelicis memorie virum ex illis lacunis suas illas prophanas speculationes hausisse, & ita tandem sensim à verbo Dei abductum in ultimum illum exitum sese præci-

(6) Biblioth. Antitrinitariorum, p. 2.

(7) Balbani, Vie de Galeazzo Caracciolo, pag. 45, 46.

(8) Ibid. p. 47.

(9) He is the author of the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum.

(10) Multis erroribus atque etiam blasphemis adversus sacrum Dei verbum factis. Beza, Epist. IV, pag. 200, Tom. iii, Operum.

pitasse, in quo miser interit: ac proinde librum illum à spiritu Anabaptistico multis locis non multum diffidentem, id est, à verbo Dei ad iuanes quasdam speculationes, quas falso Spiritum appellat, homines abducentem, vel nunquam editum, vel statim sepultum fuisse magnopere cuperemus. . . . Ceterum quinam illi sint probati iudicii homines qui scriptum illud (personam enim ipsam Valdesii non attingimus) ut pium & religiosum libris etiam editis commendarent, nos quidem ignoramus, neque dubitamus quin si boni viri sunt, re diligentius perspecta sententiam mutent, quod & Lugdunensi Typographo viro bono evenit, ut qui, quamvis additis illis notis merito se posset excusare, admonitus tamen à fratribus, & nominatim quidem à D. Calvino, culpam deprecari quam excusare maluit (11). . . . (11) Theod. Beza. We know from unquestionable evidence, what mischief that book has done to the infant church of Naples: What opinion Mr John Calvin entertained of it: and that Ochinus, of unhappy memory, drew his gross errors from that corrupt fountain, and so by degrees forsaking the word of GOD, he ran into that pernicious heresy wherein he died: for which reasons we heartily wish, that book which differs not much from the Anabaptistical spirit, that is, it leads men from the word of GOD to vain speculations which they falsely call the spirit, had never been published, or immediately buried in oblivion. . . . But who those judicious men are, who in printed books have commended that piece (for as to the person of Valdes I say nothing) as pious and religious, I confess I do not know, and I do not question but if they are good men, they will change their opinion as soon as they have carefully examined the matter; which the Printer at Lyons, a man of probity did; for though he might have justly excused himself on account of the notes that were added, yet being admonished by the brethren, and particularly by Mr Calvin, he chose rather to deprecate than to vindicate his fault.

[E] He wrote several books. Of which Sandius gives us the following catalogue. Dialogi Charon & Mercurius impressi Italicè. Considerationes pie & doctæ. In Psalmos aliquot. In Evangelium Matthæi. In Evangelium Joannis. Commentarius in epistolam Pauli ad Romanos. a. 1556. Commentario brevis, & declaracion compendiosa, 3 familiar, sopra la primera epistola de san Pablo à los Corinthios, muy util para todos los amadores de la piedad Chriftiana (12). He observes that the Spanish Inquisition hath inserted Valdes's commentary on the first epistle to the Corinthians, in their index of prohibited books, both with and without the author's name. He was in the right to make this observation, for that it is so expressed in the index is very true (13). Don Nicholas Antonio observes the same thing (14); but he doth not seem to know who Valdes was. Joannes de Valdes quidam, faith he, scripsit commentario brevis à declaration, &c. . . . One John de Valdes wrote Commentario brevis à declaration, &c. He adds that du Verdier Vau-Privas says, that Claudius de Kerquifian a Parisian, translated the hundred and ten divine Considerations Joannis Valdesii out of Spanish into French. Du Verdier calls this author Jean de Valdesio, and faith, that the French translation of these divine Considerations was printed at Lyons in 8vo. by Charles Pesnot, and at Paris in 16mo, by Mathurin Prevost 1565 (15). So he says under the word Claudius de Kerquifian. But under the word Jean de Valdesio, Secretary to the King of Naples (16), he only speaks of one hundred Considerations, and refers us to Claudius de Kerquifian. By which we may observe that he had no regard to uniformity, either in proper names or the titles of books. He adds that Charon and Mercury, dialogues of the same Valdesio, were translated into French by an unknown author. This confirms the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum, and the epitome of that of Gefner, where our John Valdes is called Secretarius Regis Neapolitani, Secretary to the King of Naples, and declared to be the author of the dialogues Charon and Mercurius. Let us say, by the by, that they deceive us, when they make use of the plural number with respect to the book wherein Charon and Mercury are the interlocutors. It is but one dialogue; which I own is followed by another, but in this the persons are Lactantius and an Archdeacon. The whole title of the book runs thus.

Du

(12) Biblioth. Antitrinitariorum, pag. ii. See also the Epitome of Gefner's Bibliotheca, pag. m. 506.

(13) See the Index Librorum prohibitorum & expurgatorum, pag. 756, of the edition of 1667, at the word Jean Valdesio.

(14) Nicol. Antonio, Biblioth. Scripturum Hispanicarum, Tom. i, pag. 606.

(15) Du Verdier, Bibliothèque Française, pag. 182.

(16) Ibid. pag. 759.

the most esteemed is intituled one hundred and ten Considerations. I shall mention below by whose care it was printed [F].

(17) Konig. Bibl. vet. & nova, pag. 826.

Due Dialoghi, l'uno di Mercurio & Caronte: nel quale, oltre molte cose belle, gratiose, & di buona dottrina, si racconta quel che accade nella guerra dopo l'anno MDXXI. L'altro di Laestantio & di uno Arcidiacono, nel quale puntualmente si trattano le cose avvenute in Roma nell'anno MDXXVII. Di Spagnuolo in Italiano con molta accuratezza & tradotti & revisiti. In Vinsgia con gratia & privilegio per anni Dieci. The date of the impression is not specified; The book contains 148 leaves in octavo. As for the rest Mr Konig misleads us (17), when he refers us to Pierius Valerianus with respect to John Valdes, who wrote a commentary on the epistle of St Paul to the Romans, printed in 1556. For Pierius's Valdes is another man. I find nothing concerning our Valdes in the Oxford catalogue; but under the name of John de VAL D'Esso, or Valdesse, you find one hundred and ten divine Considerations, printed at Lyons in 8vo, 1563. You will also find there the same book printed in Italian at Basil in 1550 in 8vo, and in English at Oxford, in 1638, in 4to.

[F] By whose care it was printed. The French edition which I here make use of, is that of Paris 1565, in 16mo, intituled Dent & dix Considerations divines de Jan de Val d'Esso. Traduites premierement, & Es-paignol en langue Italienne, & de nouveau mises en François, par C. K. P. The Preface is written by Celsus Secundus Curio, who was the editor of the Italian edition at Basil in 1550. He represents it as an excellent work, and after a great many eulogies, goes on in the following words. 'But we are obliged for this great and heavenly treasure, to Mr Peter Paul Vergerius, as the instrument of divine providence to occasion the printing and the publishing of it, that it may be seen and possessed by every person. For leaving Italy, and quitting a false and pretended bishopric to join and apply himself to the true apostleship, to which he was called by Christ, he brought with him several excellent compositions. He did as every body uses do, when, by some sad disaster, his house is on fire, or the town where he lives in danger of being plundered by foldiers; for in such a distress he endeavours to save himself with the most valuable things he has. In like manner our Vergier (18), having nothing dearer to him in this world than the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, he carried off with him those compositions which tended to illustrate and enlarge it. He neglected the earthly riches, and carefully preserved the heavenly and divine treasures: Amongst which this little piece was one of the most valuable which could be imagined or coveted. After which, very well knowing that all things in their own nature excellent, raise their value and esteem, by being communicated and distributed to several persons, he left me these hundred and ten Considerations that I should publish them: which I have done, as you see with the utmost diligence that I have been capable of. These Considerations, as several can testify, were originally written by the author in Spanish, but afterwards translated into Italian, by a person of great piety and virtue; though through inadvertence, several Spanish idioms, have slipped into the version. And besides he has purposely retained some few words of the author's mother tongue, because John de Val d'Esso the author, was a Spaniard, of a noble and ancient family, raised to an honourable state, being at first a gentleman, knighted by Charles V, but after that a more honourable and magnificent Knight of JESUS CHRIST. After CHRIST was revealed to him, he did not long follow the court, but lived in Italy, and resided at Naples. Where by the engaging charms of his doctrine, and the holiness of his life, he gained many disciples to CHRIST, especially a good number of gentlemen and knights, and women of quality who deserved all sorts of praise. He was so mild and charitable, that he made himself debtor to every person for the great talents with which he was entrusted, and accommodated himself to persons of the meanest condition, and became all things to all men, in order to gain them to CHRIST. Not only this, but he served as an instrument to convey the light of the gospel to some of the most famous preachers in Italy. This is what I know, by having particularly conversed with them. . . . And besides he left several other excellent pieces behind him, which by means of the above mentioned Vergerius, we hope in time will be communicated to us.

(18) His article will be seen hereafter under the word VERGERIUS.

VALDES (JAMES) (a) author of a book, in which he endeavours to prove that the kings of Spain ought to have the precedence of all Christian princes [A]. He was born in Asturia in the XVIth century, and run through the course of his studies at Valladolid, where he exercised the profession of an Advocate, and taught the Canon-Law for

(a) Nicolas Antonio, Biblioth. Scriptorum Hispanie, Tom. i, pag. 247, calls him Didacus.

[A] He is author of a book in which he endeavours to prove, that the kings of Spain ought to have the precedence of all Christian princes. This was published at Granada in 1602, in folio, and dedicated to Philip III King of Spain, and it was reprinted at Frankfurt in 4to, in 1626. The title is Prærogativa Hispaniæ, hoc est, de dignitate & præminencia regum regnorumque Hispaniæ, & honoratori loco ac titulo eis eorumque legatis à Conciliis, nec non Romana sede debito, tractatus eximius, Reges Catholicos Christianissimis aliisque jure, regni, sede ac titulo potiores extitisse adhuc (1) liquido demonstrans (§ a). The author had chosen this for the subject of an oration, which he pronounced in the University of Valladolid, in the presence of King Philip II. Which was so applauded, and that monarch was so well pleased with it, that he ordered him to write a tract on that subject. This occasioned the book (2), wherein Valdes pretends to the same fate with Ægidius Romanus, who having argued on the question de Regno in the schools, in the presence of Philip IV, King of France, received orders from that prince to prepare an entire treatise de Regimine Principis. Mibi evenit id, quod olim Ægidio Romano accidisse Paulus Æmilius in Philippo IV auctor est, quod cum in Scholis publicam de regno coram Philippo Pulchro questionem habuisset, tandem ejus regis imperio, opus de regimine principis edidit (3). If Valdes hath not more faithfully cited other authors, I look upon his book to be one of the worst in the world; for it is false that Ægidius Romanus disputed on the thesis de Regno, in presence of Philip IV. It is

(1) I transcribe this from the Frankfurt edition, where the word extare or esse seems to be wanting.

(2) Jacobus Vindobonus, in Epist. Dedicat.

(3) Id. ibid.

false that he received any order to write a book on that subject after the pretended disputation. But the thing is this. That prince engaged him to publish a tract de Regimine Principum, and afterwards commanded him to make a speech to him in the name of the whole university, at his return from his coronation. Paulus Æmilius's words are: 'Philippus pulcher jam inde à prima adolescentia Ægidium Romanum theologum observavit, authorque fuerat ut de regimine principum monumenta quæ extant conscriberet, ederetque. Eundem Lutetiam à Rhenenibus sacris regressus, quod Sacre Scholæ universique Musæi oratione novos excipi Reges solemne sit, dicere jussit (4). . . . Philip the Fair had from his very youth an esteem for Ægidius Romanus, a Divine, and made him write and publish a book which is now extant de Regimine Principum. When he returned to Paris, from his coronation at Rheims, he ordered him to make a speech, as is usual on that occasion, in the name of the whole university.' It is true that the subject of this oration was de Regno: Paulus Æmilius recites it, but it is of his own composition. Ægidius Romanus could not express himself otherwise than in the crabbed scholastic style; he could not use the selected words and neat Latin which that Historian lends him. As for the rest, the French authors have not been silent concerning this Spaniard's pretensions: They have published books to convince him of his mistake. See the Memoirs concerning the precedence of the Kings of France before the Kings of Spain, by T. Godefray, Advocate in Parliament,

(4) Paulus Æmilius, lib. viii, initio pag. m. 162, ad ann. 1286.

(b) Taken from Nicolas Antonio, Biblioth. Scrip. Hisp. Tom. i, pag. 247.

(5) Secretary to the King. He is very well versed in History, and has a very fine library.

for twenty years. After which he was promoted to the office of counsellor in the council of Granada. His Additiones ad Roderici Suarez lecciones variarum Jurium were printed at Valladolid in 1590 (b).

Parliament, printed in 1612, but above all, the book of Mr Bulteau (5) printed at Paris 1679. The Journal des Savans of Feb. 11, in the same year, gave an extract of it.

[(5a) That book was probably an answer for the King of Spain to the pretensions of France, maintained in France by two pieces published about the year 1577, a little before the sitting of the first Estates at Blois. They are both to be found in the Memoires de la Ligue. Tom. IV. pag. 709. & seq. of the edition of 1598. R. M. C. R. I. T.]

(a) Plutarchus, in Sylla, pag. 474.

VALERIA, Sister to the Orator Hortensius [A], by a very curious way came to be Sylla's wife. She was a woman of great beauty and quality, but lived in a kind of celibacy, for she had lately been divorced from her husband. Sylla having just lost his wife, was present at a great combat of gladiators: the women sat then promiscuously with the men. Valeria going to sit next to Sylla, softly put her hand to his robe when she was behind him, and pinched off a little of the wool. He looking on her with surprise; It is nothing, my Lord, said she, I would only enjoy a little of your good fortune as well as others. These expressions, very far from displeasing Sylla, inspired him with some agreeable emotions. He presently discovered that he was touched; he sent to inform himself of the name, quality, and reputation, of the lady. After which nothing but glances [B] and mutual smiles passed between them, which at last ended in a promise of marriage [C]. The Historian (a), from whom we have this adventure, blames Sylla only; others think, that without wronging his judgment, he might also have censured Valeria [D]. Which he doth not in the least; but he observes that her husband was so far from regarding her alone, that he kept actresses and women-dancers in his house. He left her pregnant of a daughter, called Posthumia, from her being born after the death of her father.

(1) Valer. Maximus, lib. v, cap. ix.

[A] Sister to the Orator Hortensius.] Doubtless she was only his sister by the mother's side, and we should say that Hortensius's mother was married to a man of the ancient family Valeria. But on the other side, we know that Hortensius had a sister, who was the mother of Valerius Messala (1), Consul in the year of Rome 701. It must therefore be said, that his mother and sister married into the same family. I have not found any author, who hath informed me whether Valerius Messala's mother had the same father with Hortensius, or whether she was the same who married Sylla.

(2) Plutarchus, in Vita Syllæ, pag. 474.

[B] Nothing but glances.] If any one is ignorant that the Greek language abounds with very significant terms to express the mute language of love, let him only consider the words which I cite. 'Εκ δὲ τούτων, ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν ὁμιλία ὑπὸ ἀλλήλους ἐγὼν' οἱ, καὶ παραπισσεύει συνήγεις προσώπων καὶ μετὰ διαμάχων διαδύσεις. Hinc oculorum invicem amictus, assidue ac leve in se mutuo vultus conversiones, rursus adjectiones (2). . . . Hereupon followed glances, smiles, and continual turnings of their heads to one another.

[C] Which at last ended in a promise of marriage.] Plutarch hath not exactly specified whether the proposals of marriage, and the acceptance of it, happened the same day at their going from the Shew. It is probable that that affair was not long a doing, and that after they had tired their eyes with making love by signs, while the gladiators were engaged, they broke silence as they were leaving the Amphitheatre. Sylla quickly took fire, and the lady was not coy: it is therefore very likely that she did not put him to the trouble of asking twice, and that as soon as she had a glimpse of hopes to participate of Sylla's fortunate star, not by barely touching of his robe, or keeping a little of the wool of it, but by a conjugal union, she abandoned herself to that good fortune. This was to take opportunity by the fore-lock. From glances they proceeded to conversation, and from conversation to conjugal enjoyments; all this within a day, though Plutarch doth not tell us so in express terms.

[D] He might also have censured Valeria.] She perhaps, saith he, according to Amyot's version, does not deserve any censure for her carriage on this occasion; but tho' she was the most honest and virtuous woman in the world, the occasion of Sylla's marrying her, was neither honourable nor proper, because he was struck on a sudden by an affected look and expression, as if he had been a young boy, and those passions which are moved by these trifles, are commonly the grossest and most scandalous. Methinks I hear Brantome relate the adventures of his gallant women, after having given them the eulogies of good and virtuous ladies. If a translator should give himself never so little liberty, he might make Plutarch speak more reasonably than he doth in Amyot's translation: he might make him say, that tho' Sylla should have met with a virtuous woman, yet he would be to blame to marry her from such a principle of love as this which determined him.

(a) Taken from Nicus Erythreus, Pinacoth. I, pag. 170, 171.

(1) You will find it in the Recueil de Pièces curieuses, printed at the Hague for Moëtjens. See Tom. v, p. 14.

(2) The life of Adam. See the remark [L], of the article EVE.

VALERIUS (AUGUSTIN) Bishop of Verona, and a Cardinal, flourished towards the end of the XVIth century. He was born at Venice, and there he taught Moral Philosophy. He perfectly understood the Latin tongue, which he spoke readily and elegantly; but could not without difficulty express himself in his native language. His morals were very edifying, and he discharged the duties of a Bishop like a good pastor. He was created Cardinal by Gregory the XIIIth. His grief to see his country lie under the excommunication of Paul V, threw him into a distemper, of which he died (a). Besides several other books, he composed an holy Rhetoric, where he informs us of a very curious particular relating to the Martyrologies [A].

[A] He informs us of a very curious particular relating to the Martyrologies.] In the Mercurie Galant of December 1695, there is a letter inserted, which to me seems excellent (1). I cannot tell how the public judges of it; but I imagine that I am not the only person who relishes it. There is in it a judicious and modest censure on a piece of Loredano (2), which had then been just translated into French. The author seems to me to treat him too gently, contenting himself with saying, That he hath apparently trifled with his subject, and without any respect to the holy source from whence he drew it, has only painted it in the gayest colours of his eloquence, and adorned it with the most agreeable incidents which his imagination could suggest. He adds, that Lope de Vega used the same liberty in his pastoral, where he treats of the shepherds coming to the manger at Bethlehem, and that he

he has seen a manuscript in folio, written by a poor young man on the dialogue betwixt our Lord and his disciples, as they were going to Emmaus. After this he relates, That Cardinal Valerio, Bishop of Verona, in his book, intituled, de Rhetorica Christiana, informs us, that one of the causes of the false legends of the martyrs was the custom formerly observed in several monasteries, to exercise the young Monks, by Latin exercises proposed to them on the martyrdom of some saint, which giving them the liberty of introducing the tyrants and the persecuted saints, as acting and speaking, in such a manner as appeared to them the most probable, at the same time gave them room to compose on these subjects a sort of histories, rather filled with ornaments and inventions than truth; but tho' they did not deserve much regard, yet these which seemed most ingenious and best composed, were laid up. So that after a long series of years, they, together with other manuscripts (3), being found in the libraries of the monasteries, it was very difficult to distinguish these exercises of wit from the genuine histories of the saints there also preserved. It is to be confessed that these pious writers are very excusable, they having no other design than to exercise themselves on holy subjects, could not foresee the erroneous consequences, which, in process of time, proceeded from thence; so that if posterity is thereby deceived, it is rather owing to their own want of discernment than a proof of the ill intention of those writers. It would be hard to have the same regard for the famous Simeon Metaphrastes, a Greek author, of the IXth century, who first gave us the lives of the saints for every day of the month through the whole year; since it is visible they were not written for that purpose, but in a very serious manner, tho' at the same time amplified and stuffed with several imaginary events, as Bellarmin himself testifies, who plainly tells us, that Metaphrastes writ several of the lives, as they might be, and not as they really were (4). But it is no wonder that such a thing should have been done by some Ecclesiastical Historians, through a pious zeal to honour the saints, and to render their lives agreeable to the people, commonly more inclined to admire those they reverence than to imitate them; seeing this liberty crept into the very translation of some books of the Bible; as we are informed by St Jerome, in his Preface to that of Esther, that the Vulgar edition of that book of Holy Writ, commonly read in his time, was stuffed with several additions, which I cannot better express than in the words of that Father. 'Quem librum, sicut be, speaking of the book of Esther, Editio vulgata lacinolis hinc inde verborum finibus trahit, addens ea quæ ex tempore dici poterant, & audiri, sicut solitum est scholaribus disciplinis sumpto temate, excogitare quibus verbis uti potuit qui injuriam passus, vel qui injuriam fecit. . . . Which book in the vulgar edition here and there is patched with forgeries, such things being inserted in it as might have been said and heard extempore, as it is usual when a theme is given in schools, to invent what might have been spoken by one that suffered or committed an injury.'

Those who would see a vast number of curious and judicious observations on this head, need only read Mr Baillet's discourse of the lives of the saints. Of which Mr de Beauval has given us a very good extract in his Journal for January 1701, from page 37, to 56.

VALLA (LAWRENCE) One of the most learned men of the XVth century, was born at Rome in 1415 [A]. He very vigorously attacked the barbarity under which the Latin tongue had groaned for several ages, and wrote some books in which he collected the elegancies of that language so little in use in the works of the school-men and Civilians. But when he came to write an history, he shewed that he was more capable of pointing out how others ought to write, than of practising his own rules [B]. He was a great lover of criticism and contradiction, in both which he allowed himself a liberty which drew on him a great many enemies [C]. He had the courage to confute a false tradition

[A] He was born . . . in 1415.] The proof of this I draw from his epitaph, where we find he died the first of August 1465, and that he lived fifty years. The words of this inscription in the church of St John of Lateran are: 'Laurentio Valle harum ædium lacrum Canonico, Alphonsi Regis & Pontificis maximi Secretario, Apostolicoque scriptori, qui sua ætate omnes eloquentia superavit, Catharina mater filio pietissimo posuit. Vixit annos L. obiit anno Domini MCCCC.LXV. Calendis Augusti. . . . This monument was erected by Catherine, in memory of her most pious son [Laurence Valla, who was canon of this church, secretary to King Alphonsus and the Pope, and an apostolic writer, who excelled all of his time in eloquence. He died on the first of August 1465, aged fifty years.] According to Vossius (1), this distich follows the epitaph.

Laurens Valla jacet, Romanæ gloria linguz,
Primus enim docuit qua decet arte loqui.

Here Laurence Valla lies within this tomb,
Who was the glory of the Latin tongue;
For, be it's beauties first made us to know,
And th' art of speaking well he first did show.

I believe he is mistaken; these verses were indeed written as a sort of epitaph, by Franchinus of Cosenza (2), but it is no proof that they were engraved upon the tomb of the deceased. Paul Jovius does not say they were. Several persons are mistaken concerning the age of Laurentius Valla, and the year of his death. Some assure us that he signalized himself in the council of Constance, in 1420. 'Claruit in Concilio Constantienso personaliter sub Sigismundo Imperatore anno Domini 1420 (3). -- He distinguished himself in the council of Constance under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year 1420.' Here are two errors, for that council began in 1414, and ended in 1418. And we have seen that Laurence Valla was fifty years of age in 1465. So that he was but three years old when that council ended. Gefner hath committed the same fault (4); he hath made him flourish in 1410 (5). The learned Huetius hath also adopted this opinion; for when he introduces Casaubon speaking towards the latter end of the reign of Henry IV, he makes him say (6), that two hundred years before Laurentius Valla translated Herodotus. His death is placed in 1457, by Paul Jovius (7), in 1467 by Spondanus (8), and in 1495 by Moreri.

[B] He very vigorously attacked the barbarity . . . But . . . he shewed that he was more capable of directing others than practising his own rules.] Paul Jovius furnisheth me with a proof of these two things. 'Indignatus tandiu corrumpi seculum leguleorum & sophistarum immani conspiratione, optimasque artes inculta sermonis barbarie defœdari, Elegantiarum libros edidit, traditis Romanæ elocutionis præceptis ex accurata veterum scriptorum observatione, quibus juvenutis æmulandi studio ad detergendas corruptarum literarum fordes accenderetur . . . apud Alphonsum regem de avitis bellis in Hispania, atque Sicilia gestis historia pericripita est, sed eo styli caractere, ut ejus minime videri possit, qui cæteris elegantiarum præcepta tradiderit (9). . . . Being much concerned that the age should be so long corrupted thro' the vile conspiracy of pettifoggers and school-men, and that the best arts should be defiled with gross barbarisms, he published some books containing the elegancies of the Latin tongue, and laid down some rules for speaking that language, from an accurate observation of antient writers; that thereby he might excite the emulation of youth to purify learning from it's dregs. . . . Whilst he was at the court of King Alphonsus, he wrote an history of the wars, carried on by that prince's ancestors in Spain and Sicily, but in such a stile, that no body would think it done by one, who had given rules for writing elegantly.'

[C] Which drew on him a great many enemies.] Here is another passage of Paul Jovius: 'Fuit Valla ingenio maxime libero, ob idque mordaci, contentio-

(4) Compare this with the article LAMBERT, citation (10).

(4) Gefner. in Bibl. fol. 477.

(5) And not in the year 1510, as Hankius, de Scriptor. Rerum Romanarum, Tom. ii, Part. i, cap. xi, pag. 118, says he did.

(6) I have set down his words, in the remark [K].

(7) Jovius, in Elog. cap. xiii, pag. 37; Bosfeld. in Leonibus, num. xiii, apud Hankium, ubi supra, pag. 117; Aub. le Mire, in Auctario de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. p. 275; Zeillerus, in Hist. Part. ii, pag. 154, agrees with Paul Jovius.

(8) Spondan. in Annal. ad ann. 1467, num. 13, which he grounds upon Paul Jovius, who only mentions the year 1457.

(9) Paul. Jovius, ubi supra, p. 36.

(3) See the article TANAGUIL, at the end of the remark [B].

(1) Vossius, de Hist. Latinitate, lib. iii, cap. vii, pag. 580. Moreri has transcribed this fault.

(2) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. xiii, p. 37.

(3) Tritemius, de Scriptor. Ecclesiast.

(a) Ex civitate patria seu iuffa Pontificis . . . seu sponte migrabat. Hankius de Romanorum Rerum Scriptis, lib. ii, Part 1, pag. 116. Othuinus Gratius, in Fasciculo Rerum expetendarum, says, he was expelled from Rome.

tradition, which greatly pleased the court of Rome; it was the pretended donation of Constantine. He left his country either by the Pope's orders, or because he had rendered himself the object of the hatred of too many persons (a), and retired to the court of Alphonfus King of Naples, that great protector of learned men, who desired to learn Latin of him at 50 years of age (b). If he had confined himself to criticize on the Humanists, he had escaped several reflexions published against him with a great deal of animosity, which he returned in the same stile; but he did not stop here, he carried his censures yet higher, he fell on the ecclesiastics, and spoke very boldly of certain things which they approved, and he disliked [D]. These adversaries were much more formidable than those who disputed with him on points of literature only; they were not less able to revile, and besides could dart upon him the thunders of the Inquisition, and deliver him up to

(b) Cui jam quinquagenario Latinas literas anno Christiano circiter 1443 tradidit. Hank. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.
 'soque, utpote qui aliena satirico dente facile perfringeret, & lites in literis, quasi id opus esset, adversus ignorantes acerrimas fereret. Extant enim Investivarum, & recriminationum aliquot libri, eruditè falsæque percripti; quibus dum læsi nominis famam tueretur, Facium Ligurem, Panhormitam, Pogium, & Raudensem jugulasse videri potest (10).
 . . . Valla allowed himself great liberties, and was of a satirical and contentious disposition; for he would bitterly inveigh against the writings of others, and maintain violent disputes in learning against the ignorant, as if it were a matter of great importance. Several books of invectives and recriminations, containing much learning and wit, are extant, wherein, whilst he endeavours to defend his wounded reputation, he seems to murder that of Facius, Panbormita, Pogius, and Raudens. I shall specify the titles of some of his works, which will be sufficient to prove him one of the greatest duellists of the Republic of Letters, and that we may justly compare his life to that of a gladiator. Antidoti in Pogium Florentinum libri 4. in quibus promiscue & mores ac vitam hominis & impuram ditionem notat. Apologus & actus Scenicus in eundem. Adversus eundem libellus seu dialogus secundus. In Antonium Raudensem annotationum libellus. In Benedictum Morandum Bononiensem libri duo seu confutatio prior & posterior. In Bartolemeum Facium Ligurem & Anton. Panbormitam recriminationum libri 4. He never forgave his adversaries one word or phrase that favoured of barbarism; which gave occasion to the fiction after his death, that he rendered himself so formidable in Hell, that Pluto dared not presume to speak Latin. To which it was added, that Jupiter would have given him a place in Heaven, if he had not been afraid of introducing a Critic of his words. Spondanus cites the four verses, which contain this ill-natured jest:
 'Acerrima mordacitate sua & aliorum doctorum virorum veterum recentiorumque satyricâ perfrictione infamis. Ut non illepidè quidam in illum mortuum, apud Tritheimium * sic lusit.

* Tritheim. de Script. Eccl.

Nunc postquam manes defunctus Valla petivit,
 Non audent Pluto verba Latina loqui.
 Jupiter hunc cœli dignatus parte fuisset, Censorem linguæ sed timet esse suæ (11) (§ a)

(11) Spondanus, ad ann. 1467, num. 13, p. 114.

'He became infamous by his bitter invectives and satirical reflexions on learned men, both ancient and modern: so that it was wittily said of him after his death, as we find it in Tritheimius:

Since Valla's dead, and into Hell convey'd,
 To speak in Latin Pluto is afraid;
 Jove dreads a Critic of his words in Heav'n,
 Or else to him a place he would have giv'n.

Cato, the censor, was rallied almost in the same manner.

Πύρρον, πανδακτύην, γλαυκόμματον, ἡδὲ δανύων
 Πέριον εἰς διδὸν φερεσθὲν δέχεται.

Ruffus, mordacem, glaucum, ne quidem exanimatum
 Porcium in infernum Persephone recipit (12).

(12) Plot. in Catone majore, init. pag. 336.

Red-bair'd Portius, and gray-c'd,
 'Gainst every body who inveigh'd,
 Tho' dead, from hell Pluto drives back,
 Fearing the thunder of his clack.

Another epitaph on our Valla was,

Ohe ut Valla filet solitus qui parcere nulli est!
 Si quæris quid agat, nunc quoque mordet humum (13).

(13) Volaterranus, Comae. Urban. lib. xxi, pag. m. 774.

Tho' Valla, who us'd none to spare,
 Mute in his grave is found,
 If you shou'd ask what he does there,
 Ev'n now he bites the ground.

Several have believed that in writing of books, his end was not the instruction of his readers, but to censure both the living and the dead. He fell upon Aristotle, Cicero, Virgil, and paid no respects to any besides Epicurus (14). The latter was a fit man at that time to be praised by those, who loved to be singular. All the world cried out against him, and abhorred him; which perhaps was the reason that rendered him admirable to Valla's eyes. This thought is not in Pontanus, whom I here cite: 'Qui cum Laurentio familiaris vixerunt, affirmant illum eo nequaquam consilio in Grammaticis scripsisse, ac dialecticis, quod doceret, disciplinaeque ab ignoracione vindicaret, atque a forde, verum ut malediceret, obloquendoque detraxeret de fama atque autoritate rerum scriptoribus; tum illis qui exemplo sunt ad scribendum aliis propter antiquitatem majestatemque dicendi, ac præcipiendi, tum illis ipsis, qui tunc viverent, qui ne dubitaverit ipse quidem dicere, profiterique palam, habere se quoque in Christum spicula (15).'
 These who were intimate with Valla, say, that he did not write Grammar or Logic to instruct his readers, or rescue learning from ignorance and error, but to censure and lessen the reputation of other writers, both such as deserve to be imitated for antiquity and majesty of stile, and those who were cotemporary with himself: and that he did not scruple to declare openly, that he had arrows in his quiver against Christ himself. This learned man, notwithstanding, did not want defenders: read the writings of Floridus Sabinus, and Erasmus's Epistle to Christopher Fisher in 1505 (16), occasioned by Valla's Notes on the New Testament, which he found in a library, and which he published. See also the third letter of the seventh book of Erasmus's Epistles.

(14) Ciceronem velicabat, Aristotelem carpebat, Virgilio sublebat. . . maximis quibusque ringens authoribus unitum Epicuro assurgeret. Jovianus Pontanus, de Sermone, lib. i, pag. m. 1574.

(15) Id. ibid.

[(§ a)] This epigram, which we find likewise in a letter of Goudanus to Erasmus, is there ascribed to Pogius. See the Memoires de Litterature, Tom. ii. pag. 50. Part i. REM. CRIT.]

[D] He fell on the Ecclesiastics, and spoke very boldly of certain things . . . which he disliked. It is agreed that his censure was not only personal, but also real in some respects; for he censured the faults of the Ecclesiastics, and some of their opinions. 'Ipso etiam sui sæculi Theologos seu ignorantia supina seu inveterata persuasione vanis opinionibus indormientes, ad veri sensum acutiore stilo excitare nihil veritus est . . . quod in publicis Scriptis quoddam Ecclesiæ Romanæ traditiones erroris damnavisset, aliis ipse gravis censor, hæreticæ pravitate censores sibi gravissimos sentiebat (17). . . He was not afraid to use a sharp stile to (17) Hankius, ubi supra.
 'excite the Clergy of his own time to a sense of the truth, who, through gross ignorance, or inveterate prejudice, entertained ridiculous opinions. . . As he was a severe Critic on others, so he found others severe on him, as being an Heretic, because he had condemned some traditions of the Roman Church as erroneous.' He was told, that unless he was weary of his life, he ought to refrain from censuring the Ecclesiastics, and writing such tracts as his refutation of Constantine's donation. Two things to the penal laws of the secular power. They profecuted him so violently that he had been burnt alive, if King Alfonso had not moderated their rigour (c). They were then obliged to content themselves with whipping him round the Jacobins cloister. He returned to Rome, where he found so good patrons that they obtained for him the Pope's favour, and leave to teach, besides a pension (d). He died there on the 1st of August 1465, as appears by the epitaph (e) which his mother caused to be engraven in the church of St John de Lateran of which he had been canon. I shall give you the substance of a long relation which I have met with of his quarrels with the inquisitors [E]. We find besides that he had drawn on himself the violent enmity of a Civilian, whom he had gruelled in a disputation. He was provoked to this dispute by an air of contempt, which doubtless increased the rage of the aggressor. He is blamed for being a little too vain; for

(c) See the remark [D].

(d) Ibi quorundam patronorum ope sic faventem sibi reddebat Pontificem ut ab eo non tantum docendi potestatem sed stipendium quoque conquiretur. Id. ibid.

(e) See the remark [A].

things raised him enemies, he had galled the sacred heads by censuring both their morals and opinions.

Et sane à Francisco Philopho etiam communis est satyra luculenta, ut nisi vitæ suæ satur sit, abstinere velit à perfringendis sacri ordinis viris, ac similibus scribendis, uti illa adversus donationem Constantinam. Satyra ea existat Hecatothichorum lib. ii. fat. iv. (18).

(18) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 580.

And, indeed, he was admonished by Francis Philophus in a fine satire, to forbear censuring the Clergy, as he valued his life, and writing such traits as his refutation of Constantine's donation. That satire is in Hecatothichorum, lib. ii. fat. iv. Several people take one of these two things for the true cause of the persecution which he suffered, and the other for the pretence. His personal satires irritated the inquisitors, who, in order to be revenged on him, endeavoured to convict him of Heresy. The better to satisfy their resentment they accused Laurentius Valla of Heresy in several points of great consequence, such as the Mystery of the Trinity, the Doctrine of Free-will, and Vows of Celibacy, &c. It is affirmed, that he was condemned to be burnt, the execution of which sentence he escaped only by the favour of the King of Naples; that he was obliged publicly to abjure the assertions for which he had been condemned, and besides, to suffer the chastisement of the lash in the Jacobins monastery. Spondanus's words, in the year 1447, are:

Eodem tempore Laurentius Valla Romanus, elegantissimus quidem pro sæculo, sed pro quolibet tempore virulentissimæ linguæ homo; Neapoli existens, cum quadam propositione hæretica afferuisset, delatus ad Inquisitores, & in carcerem trusus, damnatusque pro hæretico, beneficio Alfonso Regis pœnam ignis evasit; propositionibus tamen publicè ejuratis, virgibus privatis per claustra monasterii Prædicatorum manibus revinctis cæsus (19). -- At the same time Laurentius Valla, a man learned indeed for that age, but of a most virulent tongue, for any age whatsoever, having advanced some heretical propositions, was brought before the Inquisitors, thrown into prison, and condemned to be burnt as an Heretic, but by favour of King Alfonso he escaped the execution of that sentence: however, having publicly abjured those propositions, he was privately whipped round the cloisters of the Jacobine monastery, with his hands tied behind him. He adds, that Poggius insinuates that Laurentius Valla had erred on those articles, which I have mentioned above (20). This is very remarkable. Spondanus doth not cite the propositions which Laurentius Valla was obliged to retract; he doth not even say that they contained Heresies relating to the Trinity, Free-will, &c. he saith only that one of Laurentius Valla's enemies insinuates it. This may make us think that Valla's doctrine was misrepresented by captious and malicious extracts, that it was charged as erroneous, tho' not really so. Observe, that notwithstanding all the mischievous efforts of the Neapolitan Inquisitors, he lived honourably at Rome; he there obtained permission to teach; he enjoyed a pension, and the Pope's esteem. This confirms the opinion of those who conjecture he was no Heretic, but that it was resolved he should be chastised for having censured the Clergy. See the following remark.

[E] I shall give the substance of a . . . relation which I have met with of his quarrels with the Inquisitors. The author whom I cite mentions these quarrels, after having related a dispute which Laurentius Valla had on a point of law. A Civilian censured him very severely: You are, said he, a Shoemaker, you go beyond your last, you do not content yourself with the study of Philology, you thrust your fiddle into other peoples harvest, and pretend to understand the Roman Law (21). Explain me then that place of the Code, shewing him the famous puzzling Law, Quinquæ perdam Præscriptione (22). Valla replied, that nothing could be more unjust than to pretend that he was absolutely ignorant of the Roman Law, if he did not explain a passage which scarce any person had yet understood; that he ought not to propose this difficulty to those who only believe they have some knowledge of the ancient Law, but unto such as pretend to understand every part of it. Quid improbius quam velle damnare me, ut nihil juris intelligentem, quia lo- cum aut nulli, aut vix ulli intellectum non exponerem? Devisse illum proponi non ei qui aliquid juris se intelligere diceret, sed ei qui omnia (23). He nevertheless, by the explication of the question, discovered that he very well understood the Roman Law; after which, in his turn, he proposed a question to the Civilian, and silenced him. This aggressor finding himself gruelled by the questions put to him concerning the right of præscriptions established in the XII tables, withdrew in a rage, and from that time conceived such a mortal hatred against Valla that he attempted his life. Aliâ è Jure questione petita adversarium ad silentium adegit. Nam cum de Jure Usucapionum ex duodecim tabulis nonnihil rogaret, in eas angustias eundem illum suum adversarium adduxit, ut hic in conclave, velut furens se receperit, atque ex eo tempore homo vindictæ cupidissimus, odio plusquam Vatiniano Val- lam fuerit prosequutus, vitæque ejus infidatus (24). This is the first part of Boxhornius's relation, the second follows. As the science of the Divines is more holy and more necessary, continues he, and their authority greater, Valla could not attack their follies without exposing himself to the greatest dangers. Ut Theologorum & sanctorum magisque necessaria disciplina est, & auctoritas major, ita cum eorum quoque ignorantia & putidissimis ineptiis commissus, vitam ac omnes fortunas suas in ultimum pene discrimen adduxit (25). He was present at a Lent sermon, preached by a Franciscan (26) at Naples, he was one of the auditory, I say, when the Monk took for his text the Apostles Creed. And having observed the preacher to affirm that St Peter said, I believe in God the Father Almighty, that St Andrew added, Creator of Heaven and Earth, and that the other Apostles furnished the rest of the articles in their turn; after the sermon was ended, he asked Angelillus Campanus (27), whether there were any authors who related that the Creed was composed in this manner? Campanus answered, that he had never met with it in any book, and that this Monk was the only person whom he ever heard aver that St Jerom was born at Rome. They made him a visit, and asked him where he had read that this holy Father was a Roman. Several affirm it, replied he, but who denies it? Valla laughed at this incongruity (28), for it is he that affirms, who ought to produce his evidence, and especially when required; and others are not to name those who deny it. Yet he did not fail to observe to the preacher, that St Jerom makes himself a native of a town in Dalmatia. Hieronymus ipse non se Romanum dicit, sed Pannonium aut Dalmatam ex oppido Stridone (29). -- Jerom himself does not say he was born at Rome, but at Stridon in Pannonia, or Dalmatia. Some, answered the Monk, say he was a Roman, and others, that he was a Dalmatian. There were two faults in this answer. Could any witness worth hearing be opposed to St Jerom himself? And after all, ought he not to have named his evidence? Valla finding the ignorance and obliquity of the man left that subject (30), and proceeded to the question concerning the Creed. What

(21) Vallam aliquando acerbè increpuit quod, ut futor ultra credidam, humaniorum literarum cultu haud contentus falsè mitteret in mescum alienam, & Juris Romani peritiam aliquam sibi arrogaret. Boxhornius, Hist. Univ. pag. 953, Edit. 1652.

(22) Quem (lo-cum) obsecrissimum, & à nemine ejus ætatis Jurisconsultorum intellectum, imo depositum esse constabat. Id. ibi pag. 954. See the article ABE-LARD, remark [A].

(23) Boxhorn. homo vindictæ cupidissimus, odio plusquam Vatiniano Val-lam fuerit prosequutus, vitæque ejus infidatus (24). This is the first part of Boxhornius's relation, the second follows.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Id. ibid.

(26) His name was Antonius Betontinus.

(27) He was Secretary to the King.

(28) Primum hominis multum risu Valla excepti quasi alicui deberet ostendere qui negaret, & non ipse qui hoc affirmaverat, & quis traderet rogabatur. Id. ibi.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Cognitæ hominis imperitia & improbitate, ultra noluit insistere. Id. ibi. pag. 955.

ground

(19) Spondan. ad. ann. 1447, num. 10, pag. m. 3.

(20) Quod prolixius narrat Poggius secundò in eum invecivâ, errasse innuit in articulo Personæ in Deo, Trinitatis, Liberti Arbitrii, & Virginitatis sanctimonialium. Id. ibi.

(21) Vallam aliquando acerbè increpuit quod, ut futor ultra credidam, humaniorum literarum cultu haud contentus falsè mitteret in mescum alienam, & Juris Romani peritiam aliquam sibi arrogaret. Boxhornius, Hist. Univ. pag. 953, Edit. 1652.

(22) Quem (lo-cum) obsecrissimum, & à nemine ejus ætatis Jurisconsultorum intellectum, imo depositum esse constabat. Id. ibi pag. 954. See the article ABE-LARD, remark [A].

(23) Boxhorn. homo vindictæ cupidissimus, odio plusquam Vatiniano Val-lam fuerit prosequutus, vitæque ejus infidatus (24). This is the first part of Boxhornius's relation, the second follows.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Id. ibid.

(26) His name was Antonius Betontinus.

(27) He was Secretary to the King.

(28) Primum hominis multum risu Valla excepti quasi alicui deberet ostendere qui negaret, & non ipse qui hoc affirmaverat, & quis traderet rogabatur. Id. ibi.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Cognitæ hominis imperitia & improbitate, ultra noluit insistere. Id. ibi. pag. 955.

ground

he made too great a shew of his wit and learning, which he displayed with more pride and ostentation in the conversation of learned men, than in his works [F]. This is the character of those who aim at being paid on the spot, and are willing to be the witnesses of the admiration they aspire after. He embraced Epicurus's opinion with respect to the sovereign good [G], but so rectified as to render it agreeable to the principles of Christianity. He was an excessive admirer of Quintilian, and affected to despise Aristotle [H]. It is said that at table he once let fall this expression, that he had arrows in his quiver against ground have you, said he, to assert that the Apostles formed it by pieces? The Doctors of the Church, answered the Monk, have informed me so. Name them, replied he, cite them. I have already answered you, said he, and then growing very angry, he said, that Valla was an impious man, and an enemy to the Christian religion (31). Some days after he defamed him in a sermon, and continued to inveigh against him so outrageously, that King Alphonso was obliged to stop the torrent of his calumnies. Valla thinking he was challenged to dispute with him, affixed to the great church all the propositions which he found censured, and offered to maintain them against all opposers. To this fight he invited several spectators, and even the king's son. He prepared a very spacious hall: every body was very attentive on the issue of this affair, but Valla's enemies would hazard nothing: in order to strengthen themselves, they made interest at court that Valla might be forbidden to proceed any farther. He obeyed, but insulted his adversaries by a Latin distich, which he affixed to the door of the hall.

Rex pacis, miserans sternendas Marte phalanges Victoris cupidum continuit gladium.

*The king foreseeing, what slaughter would be made,
The victor's eager sword in pity laid.*

After this they became so incensed that they used their utmost endeavours either to have him condemned to death, or a perpetual imprisonment. They cited him before the Archbishop's Vicar-general. He appeared, and was surprized to see a numerous croud of Monks; for he never once suspected that this intrigue was of that importance. He was asked whether he did not believe that the Creed was compiled by the Apostles? No, said he, but by the Council of Nice, I ground myself on very strong reasons. The Inquisitor, who interrogated him, declared, that the answer was heretical. Some letters were produced, in which Valla corrected some errors, which by the negligence of the copiers had crept into the Pope's decrees, and it was urged against him, that this insolence deserved burning. He perceived the danger, and protested that on all these heads he believed as the Church believed. They pressed him to condemn and retract his writings; but he desired that first they would please to shew wherein he was mistaken, otherwise they would plainly make it appear that they did not aim at the correction of his heart, but only at that of his tongue. 'Cur non potius vos docetis esse revocanda? an mavultis oris mei quam animi emendationem? quo enim pacto ego emendor, nisi id quod ore fateor, animo etiam sentiam? Et quomodo ex animo sentiam nisi sententiam, quam ut verissimam haecenus tueor, vos falsi convincatis (32)?' -- Why do not you rather shew me what ought to be retracted? Do you desire the correction of my tongue more than of my heart? For how can I amend, unless I believe in my heart what I profess with my mouth? And how can I believe in my heart, unless you prove to be false what I have hitherto maintained to be true? A Bishop then laid hold on him, and cried out, Wicked wretch that thou art, thy pride must be immediately abated (33). Valla repeated as before, I believe all that the Church believes. He was afterwards asked what he thought of the ten Categories. What, replied he, do they belong to matters of Faith as the ten Commandments of the Divine Law? Why, replied they, should they not belong to Religion? Are you ignorant that the Logical Doctrine, sensus divinus, sensus compostus, serves to explain the most important controversies in Theology (34)? To shorten the dispute, answered Valla, I declare, that though our holy Mother the Church knows nothing of the matter, yet I believe all that she believes concerning it. Age, inquit Valla, rem compendii faciamus: etsi ista mater Ecclesia ignoret, tamen idem de illis credo quod mater Ecclesia. They would have proceeded; but the king having sent people to protect Valla, they stopped there.

I find two faults in this long relation of Boxhornius: one is, that he refers all these things to the year 1411, which is before the birth of Valla; the other, that he cites no author.

[F] He displayed with more pride . . . in the conversation . . . than in his works.] Jovianus Pontanus makes this observation after having very much praised the modesty of Pomponius Laetus. 'Contra vero, continus be (35), Laurentius Vallenius, multae vir doctinae, ingenique in primis acuti, popularibus in congressibus, ac litterarum circulis ostentandae disciplinae judicatus est fuisse studiosior, ne dicam parum modestus, ut in iis circulis multo appareret diligentior, quam in libris ipsis, quos scriptos reliquit. Cumque non pauca in Dialecticis adinventisset adversus horum temporum artis ejus magistros, eo sese efferebat, palam ut diceret, nullam esse Logicae praeter Laurentianam. . . . On the other hand, Laurentius Valla, a man of great learning and penetration, when he was in public assemblies, and in company with learned men, was thought to be too forward, not to say that he wanted modesty, in shewing his learning, so that in those companies he displayed it more than in his books. And when he had found out several things in Logic against the masters of that art in those times, he was so vain as to say in public, that there was no Logic but the Laurentian.'

[G] He embraced Epicurus's opinion, with respect to the sovereign good.] See his book de voluptate & vero bono, which was put into the Index as a book the reading of which is prohibited. See also the book, which he calls Apologia pro se & contra calumnias ad Eugenium quartum Pont. Maximum. You will there find that he chiefly justifies what he had taught, that pleasure is the sovereign good. 'Defendit le suae scripta, & praecipue quod voluptatem statuerit summum bonum, Virtutes ancillas esse voluptatis, Prudentiam non a malitia, Nihil amari propter aliud, nec etiam propter se, Praescientiam Dei non obfistere bitrii libertati: Symbolum non factum esse ab apostolis per particulas (36). . . . He defended himself and his writings, and particularly what he had taught, that pleasure is the chief good, that the virtues were the handmaids of pleasure, that prudence differed not from malice, that nothing was loved either for its own sake, or that of another, that GOD's prescience was no obstacle to free-will, and that the Apostles did not compose the Creed by pieces.'

[H] He was an excessive admirer of Quintilian, and affected to despise Aristotle.] Vossius furnishes me with the comment I want on this head. I borrow it from that place where he attempts to prove that Aristotle is the greatest master of Rhetoric that we can imitate. 'Neque nos, adds be (37) aut Aufonius judicium moris, vet, qui Latinorum tantum rationem habuit: aut Vallenius (quamvis viri non minus de Rep. literaria meriti, quam Camillus olim de Romanâ) elogium terret: quia ille, nec in Fabio laudando modum invenit, nec in Aristotele, Tullio, Prisciano, (& quo non, si unum Fabium demas) infectando, sepe habet causam. . . . I am not moved at the judgment of Aufonius, which only regards the Latins: nor does the encomium of Valla (too a man who deserved no less of the Republic of Letters, than Camillus formerly did that of Rome) terrify me; because he observed no bounds in extolling Quintilian, and frequently, without cause, censured Aristotle, Cicero, Priscian, and every body else except Quintilian.' The following words are remarkable: 'Videtur autem vir ille nimis quantum liberaliter Quintilianum fuisse laudibus, quod videret Georgium Trapezuntium perpetuum esse in hoc incessendo. Nam & lib. iv. Antidoti scribit,

(31) Vehementer in Valla velut impium hominem & Christianae rei Ecclesiaeque hostem exorsus est stomachari. Id. ibid.

(32) Id. ibid.

(33) Tum Alejanus Episcopus ejusdem Ordinis (Praedicatorum) manus ei injectit & tibi, inquit, homo sceleratissime superbia hic dependenda est. Id. ib.

(34) Quidam, inquit, Alejanus, ad fidem ista pertinent? An ignoras ex illo dogmate Dialecticorum de sensu diviso & composito gravissimas in Theologia controversias explicari, Id. ib.

(35) Jov. Pontanus, de Sermonibus, lib. vi, cap. iv, pag. 1737.

(36) Celan. in Bibl. fol. 47h.

(37) Vossius, de Rhetorice actum ac constitutionem, pag. 48.

against the Messiah himself [I]. He did not understand Greek well enough to undertake, as he did, the translation of Thucydides, Herodotus, and Homer's Iliad: these versions are not good [K], but his notes on the New Testament are not amiss. See what Mr Simon saith of them (f). He was much more learned in Latin than in Greek, as his book of Elegancies compared with his versions of Thucydides, &c. proves: He is falsely accused of having stolen it [L]. Ludovicus Vives praises him for a thing which deserves to be known [M]. Mr Varillas hath committed several errors [N].

(f) In chap. xxxiv, of the Critical History of the Commentators on the New Testament.

scribit, ea de causâ sibi semestri integro cum Trapezantio fuisse contentionem; neque in gratiam cum eo rediisse, nisi cum in publicè docendi provinciam defineret. - - But he seems to have loaded Quintilian with such immoderate praises, because he found Georgius Trapezantius continually attacked him. For in the fourth book of his Prefervative he writes, that upon that account he maintained a dispute with Trapezantius for six months together: and was never reconciled to him, till he laid down his office of teaching in public. I believe, with Vossius, that the spirit of contradiction hurried Laurentius Valla to this excess of admiration of Quintilian: he had an adversary who continually declaimed against this Rhetorician, he wanted no other reason to espouse the contrary party. In his Logic he depresses as much as he could the authority of Aristotle.

[I] It is said that he once let fall this expression; that he had arrows in his quiver against the Messiah himself. We are told that he uttered this blasphemy to Antonius Panormita. This was doubtless whispered in his ear (38), and not spoke so loud that all at the table could hear it. Panormita trembled with horror, and would no more speak to him. 'Taceo, faith

(38) Ysa Pontanus says, as we have already seen, proferique PALAM habere se quoque in Christum spicula.

(39) Vossius, ubi supra.

† Lib. 1. de sermone.

‡ Fol. 87. edit. anni 1513.

(40) Spondanus, ad ann. 1447, num. 10.

† Laur. Vall. Not. in Epist. I. ad Cor. cap. ix, ver. 13.

(41) Simon, Histoire Critique des Commentateurs du Nouveau Testament, chap. xxxiv, pag. 485.

(42) Theophil. Raynaudus, in Hieroth. §. ii, Serie 1, cap. v, pag. 16, 17.

(43) Huettius, de claris Interpretibus, pag. m. 218.

'Vossius (39), quod neque in Christum (horrendum!) spicula sibi deesse dicebat; ut quidem scripsit Jovianus Pontanus †: & ante eum Poggius secundâ in Vallam Invektivâ ‡, ubi exprobat, quod hoc in convivio dixerit Antonius Panormita: qui propterea exhorruerit, & alloquio ulterius dignum negavit. - - I pass by his expression, that he had arrows (O horrible!) against CHRIST himself: as Jovianus Pontanus writes, and before him Poggius, in his second Invektive against Valla, where he upbraids him with having said this to Antonius Panormita, who trembled with horror, and would talk no more to him.' Spondanus (40) has not forgot this, after having told us that this Critic spared neither St Augustin, St Jerom, nor Boetius. We may add, that he had no mercy on Thomas Aquinas. 'His stile is too free, censuring too severely the faults of Remigius, Thomas Aquinas, & some other writers, who presumed to comment on St Paul (according to him) without any knowledge of the Greek tongue. He rejects as an idle tale what is commonly said of that Apostle appearing to Thomas Aquinas, and assuring him that no man so well understood his Epistles as himself. If this had been true, faith he, he had not failed to give him notice of his faults.' † Peream nisi id commentitium: Nam cur eum Paulus non admonuit errorum suorum (41) ‡ He several times injudiciously reprehended the Popes, as when he accused Celestin IV of being a Nestorian. Father Theophilus Raynaud loads him with invectives on this account (42).

[K] These versions are not good.] Let us see what Huettius supposes that Casaubon thought of them. 'Annus ab hinc ducentis Herodotum & Thucydidem Latinis literis exponebat Laurentius Valla, in eâ bene & eleganter dicendi copiâ, quam totis voluminibus explicavit, inelegans tamen, & pene barbarus; Grecis ad hoc literis leviter tinctus, ad auctorum sententias parum attentus, oscitans sæpe, & alias reagens, fidem apud eruditos decoxit (43). - - About two hundred years ago, Laurentius Valla translated Herodotus and Thucydides into Latin: but tho' the originals are writ so elegantly, yet his version is inelegant and almost barbarous. He was little acquainted with the Greek, unattentive to the sense of his authors, often negligent and careless, and thereby lost his credit with the learned.'

[L] As his book of Elegancies . . . proves: He is falsely accused of having stolen it.] This book hath been printed a great many times. He says in the epistle dedicatory that it was published, without his order or consent. This epistle dedicatory was inscribed to Torrellius, Chamberlain to Nicolas V. It is without any date, notwithstanding which one may see that it was written in that Pope's time. In those days it was very difficult to collect so many observations: It required a vast study, and a strong genius. The great success of this book vexed the author's enemies, and moved them to say that he appeared in borrowed feathers, and that the piece was really a production of Asconius Pedianus. This calumny, which at the bottom very much redounded to Valla's glory, met with no credit. Vossius was very much in the right to call it impudent: 'Admodum perfrictæ frontis fuisse necesse est, qui, cum Laurentii Vallenis Elegantiarum libros in honore esse dolerent, in vulgus spargere, eos jam olim in Germania fuisse repositos, quodque scripti essent literis fugientibus ac fatiscientibus vix certis cognitis indicibus tandem fuisse, Asconii Pediani esse opus: cujus calumnie meminuit Mariangelus Accursius in diatribarum suarum defensione, cui Testudo nomen fecit (44). - - Those men must have been very impudent, who, being vexed that Valla's book of Elegancies was esteemed, gave out, that it had been found long before in Germany, and that because it was not writ in a fair hand, it was at last with difficulty discovered to be the performance of Asconius Pedianus; which calumny is mentioned by Mariangelus Accursius in the defence of his dissertations intitled Testudo.

[M] Ludovicus Vives praises him for a thing, which deserves to be known.] Notwithstanding Valla's great diligence in discovering the propriety of terms, and teaching it his readers, yet he spared his pains when he met with an obscure word, and seemed rather to desire that its meaning should remain unknown. This Vives with a great deal of reason approves. 'Bene Laurentius Valla de verbo quodam obsecro, ignorari malo quam me docente sciri (45). - - Laurentius Valla said well concerning an obscure word, I had rather it should remain unknown than be made known by my means.'

[N] Mr Varillas hath committed several errors.] I. He saith (46) that Laurence Valla, finding no longer any body to censure in the court of Rome, went to that of Naples. This is a double mistake, he hath ill translated his original, and advanced a thing, that has but little truth in it. The Latin which Varillas translates, signifies that Laurentius Valla finding nothing at the Pope's court which pleased him, went to that of Alphonse King of Naples (47). Is this to say, that he found no longer any body to censure in the court of Rome? Doth not this rather insinuate the contrary, that there remained yet a great many to censure? For when every thing in a court displeases, the subject of censure is not exhausted. We may take it for granted that a person of Valla's humour could never leave Rome for want of objects on which to employ his censure, because all that could be said against that court had already been said. II. Valla did not offer to write the history of the most illustrious events of Naples: But he wrote the History of Ferdinand King of Castile and Arragon, the Father of Alphonse King of Naples. Here are two faults more; Paul Jovius's Latin ill translated (48), and a falsity in the fact itself. III. There is a great deal of excess in the judgment Varillas passes against that book of Valla. He wrote it . . . with so little success, they are his own words, that his adversaries had room enough to reproach his falling into all the faults which he had censured in others. He commits a third time the two errors, which I have mentioned. Paul Jovius's Latin (49) saith no such thing, and it is utterly false that Laurentius Valla in writing this book, was guilty of all the barbarisms with which he charges other authors. IV. No body believes, though Mr Varillas assures it, that Laurentius Valla exiled himself from the court of Naples, because this work was slighted. He had other and more severe disgraces (50), which forced him to leave that court. V. It is very ridiculous to imagine that this learned man's mother made his epitaph. It is true we find these words in the inscription on his tomb, Catharina mater filio pierrissimo

(44) Vossius, de Hist. Latinis, lib. i, cap. xxvii, pag. 144. He quotes the Testudo of Mariangelus Accursius.

(45) Lud. Vives de tradendis Disciplinis, lib. iii, pag. m. 287.

(46) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 166.

(47) Quod nihil in aula Pontificis sibi placeret Neapolim ad Alphonsum regem se contulit. Jovius, ubi supra, p. 36.

(48) Apud quem (Alphonsum regem) de vitis bellis in Hispania atque Sicilia gestis historia percripta est. Id. ibid.

(49) Eo stylis character ut ejus minime videri possit qui ceteris elegantiarum præcepta tradiderit. Id. ibid.

(50) See, above, the remark [M].

posuit; but according to the style of epitaphs, this imports no more, than that his mother caused his tomb to be erected. And allowing this false principle of Varillas, we may easily believe that several persons who never understood one Latin word; have written very fine epitaphs in that language; for we find a great many under which we read maestissima conjux or mater, or filia posuit, or maestissimi filii posuerunt. VI. As one fault often introduces another, Mr Varillas falls into a fresh mistake; for believing that Laurentius Valla's mother made her son's epitaph, he avers that no body would save her that trouble. VII. As to what he saith of Valla, that he gave an ill example in the commonwealth of learning, by publishing first (51) intire books of invectives and recriminations, I refer him to Mr de Larroque, who hath shewed him (52) that St Gregory Nazianzen, and St Hilary published invectives, the one against the Emperor Julian, and the other against the Emperor Constantius. We may yet go higher, for though there is room to doubt whether Sallust's invective against Cicero, and that of Cicero against Sallust, are really the performance of those authors whose names they bear, yet it is certain that they are older than Constantine's time. It cannot be said that Varillas intended only to speak of Christian writers; for the republic of letters of which he is speaking doth not exclude Pagan authors. But if we should have the complaisance to confine ourselves to the limits of Christianity, we should yet find other examples besides those mentioned by Mr Larroque. Have we not two works full of invectives, written by Rufinus against St Jerom (53)? I elsewhere (54) mention an invective written in the very age of Laurentius Valla, but before he thought of writing his. And Petrarch who preceded him one hundred years, did not he write invectives against a Physician? VIII. It is not true that Laurentius Valla praised no Grammarian of his time besides Candidus December (55). This is to be guilty of the same fault a fourth time, for the fact is utterly false, and he hath very ill translated his original (56). Paul Jovius's words tend to the praise of December without excluding any other Grammarian.

(53) They are commonly printed in the ninth volume of St Jerom's works.

(54) In the remark [B], of the article VERGERIUS.

(55) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 167.

(56) Candidus December ... Laurentii Vallæ testimonio exschismate censuræ Grammaticus. Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. xv, pag. 339.

VALLA (GEORGE) a native of Piacenza. He was a physician and professor of polite learning at Venice, and flourished after the middle of the XVth century (a). He was very well acquainted with the Greek and Latin tongues, and wrote several books of Physic and Literature [A]. He so irritated the Duke of Milan by his too impetuous zeal for the Trivulcian faction that the Duke persecuted him, even to that degree as to cause him to be imprisoned at Venice (b). He endured the most grievous hardships in this confinement; but being tried was acquitted, and his post restored to him. He did not long enjoy it, a sudden death hurrying him out of the world soon after. He was just going out of his apartment in order to read his lecture; nothing stopped him but a natural necessity to go to the necessary house, where he expired in the same manner as Arius the Herefiarch. His scholars waited a long while in the auditory, and were seized with great sorrow [B], when acquainted with the reason why he did not come. He was that day to continue his explication of a passage in Cicero's Tusculanæ Quæstiones, which concerns the immortality of the soul (c). Pierius Valerianus, who informs me of this parti-

(a) Claruit sub Frederico III. juxta Tritemium verò sub Maximiliano Venerabilis A.C. 1494. Justus in Chronol. Medic. Merklinus, in Lindenio renovato, pag. 342. König places him in the year 1528. Mr Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, num. 909, supposes that he was alive in 1541.

(b) Pierius Valerianus, de Litterarum Infirmitatibus, lib. i, pag. 27.

(c) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, ibid.

[A] He wrote several books of Physic and Literature. The titles of some of them are: De tuenda sanitate per vitium, & quæ secundum cuiusque naturam in vitium sequenda aut fugienda sunt. De humani corporis commodis & incommodis. Universæ medicinæ ex Græcis potissimum contritiæ libri septem. It is observed in Lindenius renovatus, that the last tract is a part of that intitled expetenda & fugienda (1). We may add that our Valla translated out of Greek Rhazis de Pesilentia, Plessus de vitius ratione, Alexander Aphrodisiensis de februm causis & differentiis, Nemesius de Natura hominis (2), and some others (3). It is to be observed that Huetius calls him a very bad translator (4). The books of Literature composed by Valla, are either treatises of Grammar and Rhetoric, or commentaries on some books of Tully, on Horace's Art of Poetry, on Juvenal, &c. He also commented on the second book of Pliny: That work was printed at Venice in 1502, in 4to (5a) and must needs be very scarce since Father Hardouin could not meet with it (5). But we must not forget his book de expetendis & fugiendis rebus: It is a sort of Encyclopedia or body of all sciences, of which Paul Jovius speaks somewhat contemptibly; for doubtless the words which I am going to cite relate to this collection. 'Disciplinas, literasque omnes, uno ingenti volumine complexus, multa potius didicisse, quam in eo celeri transcurfu perscrutanda posteris reliquisse videtur. Quandoquidem coarctant omnia, indefesseque scribentis, requisitus ille Romanæ elocutionis spiritus omnino defuerit, quo uno voluminum vita præclarè altitur, longissimèque producitur' (6). - - - By comparing all arts and sciences in one large volume, he seems rather to have learned much himself, than to have left much to be learned by posterity, in such an hasty and precipitate manner. For whilst he was collecting and writing every thing with indefatigable pains, he wanted that necessary spirit of Roman elocution, by which alone the life of books is sustained and prolonged.' John Peter Valla, the author's son, caused it to be printed, and very humbly acknowledged that the work was not perfect: he makes several excuses to the reader (7) that death had prevented his father's putting his last hand to it. This work is divided into forty-nine books or seven weeks. It was very much criticized by Sorel (8). Gefner observes that George Valla borrowed several things from the Greeks without owning it. 'Nos sane observavimus Georgium Vallam a Græcis permulta dissimulanter esse mutuatum, & non pauca perperam in Latinum sermonem transulisse' (9). - - - I have observed that George Valla borrowed very much from the Greeks without owning it, and translated several things into Latin very wretchedly. He then deserves to be put into the list of Plagiaries.

[(5a)] A copy of this edition passed through my hands at an auction, a little above a year ago: and John Peter Valla, the son of George, caused the same book to be reprinted in Folio, likewise at Venice, and also in 1502 by Simon Bevilacqua, with other works of his father, and particularly his Commentationes in Prolomæi Quadripartitum, not mentioned by Mr Bayle. As for the rest, two copies of this edition are in the King's library at Berlin. REM. CRIT.]

[B] His scholars . . . were seized with great sorrow. The following citation is longer than the text requires, but I shall still venture to insert it to shew what esteem Valla's scholars had for him. 'Haud ita multo post cum mane summo paratus esset conferre se ad auditorium, ubi tunc Tusculanas Ciceronis quæstiones prælegebat, deque animæ immortalitate vehementissimè, doctissimèque quotidie diserebat, dum interim corpori vacaturus excrementa cibi dejecit, animam etiam morte subitanea exhalavit. Nos qui quotidie ad admirandam hominis doctrinam sub matutino crepusculo conveniebamur, non prius tali nos doctore defraudatos intelleximus, quam hora profundi frustra elapsa certos, qui moræ causam sciscitarentur, domum ejus delegavimus, qui redeuntes gymnasium nostrum præter omnium spem, quia, nullum malæ valetudinis incommodum præcesserat voce illa erudita spoliavit, atque orbatum renuntiaverunt' (10). - - - Not long after, as he was ready to go one morning early to his auditory, and with be then explained Cicero's Tusculan questions, and with great learning and force of argument read lectures every day on the immortality of the soul, he went aside to ease nature, and in the mean time died suddenly. We who came every morning betimes to attend his admirable lessons knew nothing of our great loss, till the

(8) Sorel, de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 289, 290.

(9) Gefn. ubi supra.

(10) Pierius Valerianus, de Litterarum Infirmitatibus, lib. i, pag. 27.

(1) Extant operis sui expetendorum & fugiendorum libri 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. Merklinus, in Lindenio renovato, pag. 342.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) See Gefner's Bibliotheca, fol. 273.

(4) Nec felicius Georgio Vallæ labor ille successit, nam & à Græcis diffinitæ sepe, & quæ assequitur non raro pervertit. Huetius, de claris Interpretibus, pag. m. 221. See, below, Gefner's words.

(5) Vide Hardouini Præfation. in Plinium.

(6) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. cxxii, p. 256.

(7) In Epistola noncupatoria. See Gefner, in Biblioth. fol. 273.

cular, makes very judicious reflections on this kind of death [C].

'hour of teaching being elapsed, we sent some persons to his house to inquire the reason of his not coming; and upon their return they acquainted us with the melancholy news of his death, which was a great surprise to us all, because he had had no manner of illness before.'

[C] Pierius Valerianus makes very judicious reflections on this kind of death. He first observes that some may think George Valla's dying without any sickness to be a great happiness. He afterwards saith that according to the Christian doctrine, sudden death ought to be looked on as a misfortune. He then observes that according to Philosophy this accident and all others, which do not depend on us, ought not to pass for evils. Finally, he would have us believe that Valla's manner of death was a happiness, since it was not preceded by pains and uneasiness. Erunt qui genus hoc mortis inter mortalium felicitates enumerabunt, quippe nullo dolore prævio, nulloque mortis metu statim exanimari. Nos tamen ex Christianæ pietatis institutis inferrimus hoc existimamus, ex Philosophiæ verò præceptis, neque quidem calamitates alias, quæ alterius, non nostri juris sunt, mala existimo; sed erit super hoc alias differendi locus. At fuerit felix Valla, quia cruciatu nullo, nulliusque rei anxius à vita migravit; nobis certè ejus discipulis calamitosa fuit hominis mors, quibus eruditionis suæ tam triste disiderium reliquit (11). All this is very

(11) Ibid.
p. g. 28.

just; for the tormenting pains of a disease of fifteen days, and the languishing weakness of a long distemper, reduce a man to a miserable state naturally speaking. He is incapable of enjoying either forbidden or lawful pleasures; he suffers in body and mind; his members render him sensible of several uneasinesses; his reason is enfeebled; he is peevish, he is afraid of death, and cannot think of the approach of this King of terrors without horror. A sudden death spares all this, and ought therefore to pass for a great happiness, unless we reflect on the gospel-principles. Wherefore Pierius Valerianus very judiciously inserted this exception. Christianity teaches us that a sinner shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven without repentance: and experience convinces us that all men are sinners. According to these principles we ought to look upon sudden death as a very great evil, seeing the dead person hath not had sufficient time to humble himself before God, and implore his mercy through the merits of JESUS CHRIST. Now a man, who presents himself an impenitent sinner before the throne of God, can expect nothing but eternal damnation. This is the Christian doctrine. It is in vain to alledge that a man predestinated to salvation, cannot die impenitent, suppose his death never so sudden; and that a reprobate cannot die penitent though his death is preceded by a tedious sickness: it is in vain, I say, to alledge this; for this reflexion will not satisfy the scruples of those who reason in this manner, viz. a man predestinated to salvation always reconciles himself to God before his death; those who die suddenly have no time to reconcile themselves to God; they are not therefore predestinated to salvation. I own it would be rash to assert the minor of this syllogism as a certain truth; but after all it is the most specious argument against the advantage which several pretend to find in a sudden death. They do not fail to observe that diseases are very often great obstacles to repentance, either because they deprive us of our senses and judgment, or because they so much enfeeble our reason, and memory, that we are not very well qualified to reflect on the gospel truths, or to make a good use of the exhortations of a Divine, or in fine, because when they prove long and lingering they occasion complaints and murmurs. This disposition leads directly to impenitence, and hardness of heart, and sometimes to impiety itself. Though we should agree to all this, yet we may very justly assert that diseases most commonly produce a better effect. So that to pronounce George Valla's death happy, it ought not to be considered according to the Christian principles, but looked on with the eyes of Augustus. In the judgment of that Emperor, that was the happy death which was preceded by no pain; he desired such a death for himself and his friends. He found herein what good men find in the death of the just, that is, the object of his wishes. He obtained almost what he desired. 'Sortitus exitum facilem & qualem semper optaverat. Nam fere quoties audisset cito ac nullo cruciatu defunctum quempiam sibi & suis evbavasiav similem (hoc enim & verbo uti solebat) precabatur (12). . . . He obtained an easy death, and such as he had always wished for. For whenever he heard that any one died suddenly, and without pain, he prayed that such a good and easy death (which was the expression he commonly used) might happen to himself and his friends.' Cæsar, whose son he was by adoption, was of the same opinion. He despised the lazy death of Cyrus mentioned by Xenophon, and nothing seemed to him preferable to leaving the world unexpectedly. 'Illud plane inter omnes fere constitit, talem ei mortem pene ex sententia obtigisse. Nam & quondam cum apud Xenophontem legisset, Cyrum ultima valetudine mandasse quædam de funere suo, aspernatus tam lentum mortis genus, subitam sibi celeremque optaverat. Et pridie quam occideretur in sermone nato super cenam, apud M. Lepidum, quisnam esset finis vitæ commodissimus, repentum inopinatumque prætulit (13). . . . All agree, that his death was such as he had desired. For when he read in Xenophon that Cyrus, in his last illness, gave directions concerning his funeral, he despised such a lingering death, and wished for a quick and sudden one. And the day before he was killed, as he was at dinner with M. Lepidus, a question being started, what sort of death is most eligible, he declared that he preferred that which is sudden and unexpected.' Heliod reckons it amongst the prerogatives of the golden age that men then died in the arms of sleep. One of our Critics has blamed Ovid for omitting this privilege in his description of the felicities of that age. Mr Menage remembered this censure, when he said that his father died in that manner. His words are: 'At verò cum dormiturus caput in cervical inclinasset, ecce tibi confestim exanimatus est. Dicitur est senis Ascrei, aurea ætate mortales quasi dormitos somno interisse: quam rem optimam, ut hoc te obiter doceam; neque enim te docendi occasionem ullam prætermittere debere mihi videor; in optimi illius sæculi descriptione omittit Peliguum Vatem non debuisset, rectè à Julio Scaligero animadversum. Eo igitur modo placido & quieto parens meus fato functus est (14). . . . But as he laid his head upon the pillow in order to sleep, he immediately expired. Heliod says, that in the golden age men died as if overpowered with sleep: which happiness, by the way, for I ought to omit no opportunity of instructing you, is not mentioned by Ovid in the description of that golden age, as Julius Scaliger rightly observes. It was in that calm and quiet manner my father died.' You see plainly that his taste and that of Scaliger the father (15) were agreeable to that of Augustus. They would willingly have applied to them who died thus, the proverb, Le bien leur vient en dormant, . . . Happiness comes to them in their sleep. See the remark [F] of the article REGIUS.

(12) Sueton. in Augusto, cap. 6.

(13) Sueton. in Cæsar, cap. lxxviii.

(14) Ægidius Menagius, in Vita Guillelmi Menagii, pag. 76, 77.

(15) In his remark upon the passage quoted by me, Menage speaks thus: 'These are the words of Julius Scaliger, in the eighth chapter of the fifth book de Poetica. Omisit autem illud Heliodi, longè optimum in hac ætate, ὁ δὲ πατὴρ ὡς ἐνύπνιον ἀνέμιον. The passage of Heliod is in his "Ἐγγραφαὶ Ἠλιακά."'

VALLA (NICOLAS) Doctor of the Civil-Law, and Canon of St Peter's Church at Rome, lived in the XVth century. He undertook to translate Homer's Iliad into Latin verse, but death prevented his completing that work (a). What he had already translated was printed after his death in the year 1474, and reprinted in 1541 [A]. We

[A] What he had already translated was printed in the year 1474, and reprinted in 1541. The first of these editions was made at Rome, and was neither known to Gesner or his abridgers, it contains the iiii, ivth, vth, xliiith (1), xlviiiith, xrxth, xxiid, xxiid and xxiivth books of the Iliad, and a small portion of the xixth. To the second edition were added Joseph Ican's six books de Bello Trojano, and the translation of four books of Homer (2) in Latin verse by Opsiopæus (3).

[B] He

(a) See Vossius, de Poët. Lat. pag. 80.

(2) Viz. the 1st, 2d, 9th, and 10th, of the Iliad. Vossius, ibid.

(3) Taken from Vossius, ibid.

VALLA. VALLE. VALLE'E.

We have also his Latin version of a poem of Hesiod (b), and two letters in Elegiac verse. He died very young [B] in 1473 (c). His father LÆLIUS VALLA (d), Doctor of Law, was Confessorial Advocate (e).

(b) That which is intitled "Epya nai 'Hmāpas, Opera & Dis." This translation is in Epic verse, and was dedicated to Pius II. See Gesnerus, in Biblioth. fol. 524. (c) Konig, Biblioth. pag. 828, where he observes that his epitaph is to be found at pag. 117, of Fabricius's Roma. (d) Or de Valle. (e) Vossius, ibid.

(4) Pierius Valer. de Litterat. Infel. lib. ii, pag. 55.

[B] He died very young.] This Vossius doth not mention, but we find it in Pierius Valerianus. 'Inter Romanos autem, scilicet be (4), paucis ante annis non ignobilis fuit Nicolaus Valla, summæ juvenis eruditionis, Græcis, Latinisque literis apprime doctus, qui quidem adolescens admodum ad Homerum sublimitatem eleganti Latini carminis facilitate ceperat aspirare. Is tamen nondum alterum à vigesimo egressus annum fati quadam inclementia eruditorum omnium spei surreptus est. - - - A few years ago Nicolas Valla was in great reputation at Rome, being a young man of great learning, and perfectly skilled in Greek and Latin. When he was but a lad, he attempted to imitate Homer's sublimity in elegant and fluent Latin verse. Before he was quite twenty-one years of age he was snatched away by cruel fate to the sorrow of all learned men.' What occasions some difficulty is that Valerianus, who wrote in Clement the seventh's time (5), saith, that a few years before Valla died at the age of twenty-one. If we go to the rigour of exactness, this doth not very well suit a person, who dedicated a Poem to Pius II. Observe that I here consider the particular ways, by which Valerianus commonly expresses himself in the tract which I cite.

(5) See his Tract. de Litterat. Insuper, & pag. 11.

VALLA (NICOLAUS) in French du Val, Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris (a), and afterwards in the Parliament of Rennes, is the author of a Civil-Law book [A] which is pretty much esteemed. He flourished in the XVth century. He mentions his son-in-law James Capel, who was Counsellor in the parliament of Bretagne (b). Konig, confounds him with Nicholas Valla, who is the subject of the preceding article (c). It is not improbable that our du Val was the Counsellor of the parliament of Paris, who was suspected of Lutheranism in the famous Mercuriale of 1559, and by flight avoided the danger which threatened him (d). Thuanus calls him Nicolaus Valla (e).

(a) See Pasquier, Recherch. de la France, livr. ix, ch. xxxix, pag. m. 902.

(b) Nicolaus Valla, de Rebus dubiis, Tract. viii, circa fin. pag. m. 136. (c) Konig, Biblioth. pag. 828, where he ascribes to Nicolaus Valla, the translator of Hesiod, who died at Rome in 1473, the treatise de Rebus dubiis. (d) Thuan. lib. xxii, pag. m. 453. (e) Id. ibid. pag. 452.

[A] He is author of a Civil Law-book.] The title 'trouvé par Traictatus XX. I make use of the fifth edition at Arnheim, 1638, in 4to.

VALLE (ROLANDUS à) an Italian Civilian, lived in the XVIth century. He was not born at Casalmaggiore in the Milanese, as some have believed, but at Casal in Montferrat [A]. He wrote many books, whereof several editions have been printed in Italy, France, and Germany [B]. His Latin stile is very mean, and has nothing of that politeness which was already introduced among the Civilians.

[A] He was not born at Casalmaggiore in the Milanese, as some have believed, but at Casal in Montferrat. Quenstedt, who is not ignorant that he was Patrius Casalensis, Eques & Primarius Montisferrati Senator, - - - A nobleman of Casal, knight, and chief senator of Montferrat; (these are the titles he takes at the beginning of his works) imagines falsely that he was of Casalmaggiore, and places him amongst those illustrious men whom the Milanese has produced (1). I shall here give a convincing proof of his error, and which, by the way, will inform us of the miserable condition that Montferrat was reduced to by the war in 1551. 'Prædictus Papien . . . dicit se hanc questionem habuisse in patria mea Montisferrati, (quæ hodierna die, quæ est dies 27 Septemb. Anni 1551, est multum infelicitissima propter bellorum tumultus, tot tantæque hospitationes militum, quæ adeo intolerabiles sunt quod coguntur nedum pauperes, verum etiam & nobiles & divites omnem substantiam vilissimo pretio vendere, ac derelinquere patriam, & in externas Provincias se conferre) qui movetur (2). - - - Prædictus Papien . . . says that he treated this question, in my country

(1) Quenstedt, de Patria Viro. illustrium, pag. 295.

(2) Roland, à Valle, in Tractatu de lucro dotis, Quæst. xxvi, pag. 96, Edit. Colon. 1599.

(a) Taken from La Croix du Maine, pag. 725. Renatus de la Barre, at the beginning of his Notes upon Novatianus de Trinitate, says that man was called Bellum Vallensium. That is, handsome Vallée.

VALLÉE (GODFREY DE LA) a native of Orleans published a book at Paris intitled Erre Geru, le fleau de la Foy bigarrée. It is full of blasphemies and impieties against JESUS CHRIST. This author was burnt at Paris for his heresy in the year 1574. He was commonly called bandome Vallée (a). This is what we find in la Croix du Maine's Bibliothèque Française. Others say he was burnt for atheism at Paris in 1571, and that he wrote a book intitled The art of believing nothing (b). Maldonatus made a false reflexion on a passage which he pretends to be in that book [A]. I wonder that

[A] Maldonatus made a false reflexion on a passage which he pretends to be in that book.] This Jesuit's words are: 'Nonnulli progressi sunt longius, ut nihil crederent, quorum unus cum libellum quandam his annis de arte nihil credendi composuisset, nihil in

OF MONTFERRAT, which at this day, that is the 27th of September 1551, is by far the most miserable of all countries, because of the confusion of war, and the frequent and heavy quartering of soldiers, which is so intolerable, that not only the poor, but the noble and rich are forced to sell all their substance for a mere trifle, and to leave their native country, and go into foreign parts.'

[B] He wrote many books, whereof several editions had been printed, in Italy . . . and Germany.] His treatise De lucro dotis, printed at Venice, in the year 1567, and 1584, was reprinted at Cologne, in 1559, in 8vo; as also his treatise de Inventarii Confessione, which had been published at Venice in 8vo, in the year 1573, and 1584. His Counfels quibus graves præcipuas Juris Controversiæ, de Jure in Regni, Principatibus, Ducatibus, Comitatibus, Marchionatibus, & Feudis acquirendo vel amittendo deciduntur, &c. contain four volumes in folio in the Venice edition, 1592. They have been already printed in the same city separately, and the two first had been reprinted at Lyons in the year 1566, and with the third, in the year 1580 (3).

(3) See the Epitome de la Bibliothèque de Gelles, pag. m. xxvi, pag. m. 736, and the Notes of Maldonatus, in the year 1574.

eo nisi hoc unum verum dixit, oportere prius Calvinistam fieri qui atheus esse volet. Fuerat ille antea Calvinista, fuit postea atheus, & unicuique in sua arte credendum est. Verissima sententia: nam quisquis Calvinista est, si ea quam ingressus est incredulitatis that so few authors have mentioned that Atheist, and that most of those who have taken notice of him have grounded what they say on the evidence of this Spanish Jesuit.

(1) Maldonat. in Evangel. Matthæi, cap. xxvii, pag. m. 572.

'dultatis via ire pergat, ad nihil credendum perveniat necesse est (1). -- Some have proceeded so far as to believe nothing, one of whom having written these few years written a small book concerning the Art of believing nothing, has not said one word of truth in it except this, that whoever would be an Atheist, ought first to be a Calvinist. He had before been a Calvinist, and afterwards turned Atheist, and every one is to be believed in his own profession. It is a very true saying: for whoever is a Calvinist, if he goes on in the same way of incredulity which he has begun, must at last come to believe nothing.' It is incredible how many Jesuits and other controversial writers amongst the Romanists, have copied this passage of Maldonatus. Several of them have at the same time corrupted it; for they suppose that Godfrey de la Vallée in his book endeavoured to prove at large, that whoever would be an Atheist ought first to be a Calvinist (2). Maldonatus never said that this assertion was amply handled in the little book de Arte nihil credendi. His copiers have not trodden in his footsteps in reasoning on that head. They suppose this Atheist to have said so because he believed the Calvinistical sect to be so abominable, that all those who took a near view of it would rather chuse to profess no religion than that. Cur autem dixit eum, qui atheus esse vult, oportere prius Calvinistam fieri; nisi quod putaret, tam scdam ac profligatam esse Calvinistam, ut qui eam prope apessisset, mallet nullam, quam talem sectam profiteri (3)? These are the words of the Jesuit Becanus. He adds, that the fruits of Calvinism are more pernicious than those of Atheism, and that tho' the Atheists do not believe a Providence, yet they in many particulars observe the rules of virtue. They are not guilty either of robbery or murder; they abhor a lie, they keep their word, they abominate unjust wars, and love peace: but, on the contrary, Calvin's disciples are instructed not to regard lying, perjury, adultery, and sacrilege; for they believe that God hath imposed on them a necessity of committing them, and that the Elect cannot perish whatever they are guilty of. Si ex fructu doctrina cognoscenda est; peiores fructus Calvinii, quam Atheorum doctrina parit. Hi tamen negent Deum aliquem orbi præsidere, bonestatem tamen, & rectæ rationis ductum ac directantem in multis sequuntur, & multa rectè agunt, quæ laudari possunt. Cavent furta, homicidia, rapinas, à mendacio abhorrent; juramenti religionem colunt; servant fidem alteri promissam; bellum injustum detestantur; pacem ac tranquillitatem amant. At contra docentur à Calvinio discipuli, parvi pendere mendacia, perjuriam, adulterium, rapinas, libidines, sacrilegia. Unde hoc? Quia Deus, inquit, æterna sua prædestinatione necessitatem, &c.

(2) In suo libro de Arte nihil credendi, fule contendit eum qui Atheus futurus est, Calvinistam prius esse debere. Henricus Fitz Simon, Brittonom. pag. 107.

(3) Martinus Becanus, Opusculorum Theologicorum, Tom. i, pag. m. 175.

(4) Id. ibid.

lowed his original. I do not pretend that in arguing as Maldonatus hath done, he would have reasoned justly; I only say his objection had been less absurd. Maldonatus's reflexion runs thus: that Calvinism having once shook off the yoke of tradition with regard to the Real Presence, under pretence that it is an opinion clogged with a thousand difficulties contrary to sense and reason, hath put all sorts of Heretics in the way of rejecting all mysteries; and that some of the most subtle and incredulous Calvinists have made use of the same arguments to deny the Trinity, which they had formerly used against Transubstantiation (5). Some, adds he, advance farther, even so far as to believe nothing, and the road they have got into must necessarily lead them so far. He goes on thus: what I have observed is not designed to injure the Calvinists, but to shew them the precipice that is at their journey's end, that a view of this imminent danger may divert them from the way of perdition. Two things in this common-place of Maldonatus deserve to be censured; for, in the first place, to grant that preferring the light of reason to the authority of those councils, which have determined the Real Presence, leads to Atheism, is giving too great an advantage to Libertines and Free thinkers. Is it not avowing that the doctrine of the existence of God is not less contrary to common sense than that of Transubstantiation? Is it not asserting that to believe this existence, we ought blindly to sacrifice the clearest light of Philosophy to the authority of tradition; as we ought to sacrifice it to the same authority, in order to believe the Romish opinion concerning the Eucharist? But what can be more pernicious to religion than such an avowal? It is therefore very necessary to limit this objection. He ought only to have said that such a breach being made in the decisions of the councils by denying the Real Presence, may grow so wide, as to extend to other incomprehensible opinions of the Church of Rome. 2. Maldonatus was ignorant of the principles of those whom he calls Calvinists. They are so far from teaching, that we ought to reject a doctrine because our reason cannot comprehend it, or is capable of offering almost invincible arguments against it, that they are the first who assert, and are always ready to maintain, that nothing can be more pernicious, than to regulate ourselves by reason in the choice of some particular doctrines. This is what they incessantly alledge against the Socinians, always urging the necessity of subjecting our understanding to the obedience of faith. So that tho' the opinion which this Spanish Jesuit attacks, was as dangerous as he represents it: yet what he advances against the Calvinists by endeavouring to take an advantage of la Vallée's book against them, would be absolutely unjust. In such a critical work as this, it is necessary that not only errors in fact, but also the ill use of true facts should be handled in this manner.

(5) Multos jam Calvinistas videmus qui ingeniosiores & magis increduli, id est magis Calvinistæ ceteris erant, eò jam pervenisse, ut quæ ratione hoc prius mysterium (Eucharistia) non credebant, nunc Trinitatis mysterium non credant, ceteroque Calvinistæ sicut Calvinistæ nos tanquam nihil simpliciter & credulos rideant. Maldonatus, ibid.

VANDER-LINDEN (JOHN ANTONIDES) Professor of Physic at Leyden, was not the first learned man of his family. Some of his ancestors distinguished themselves in the republic of letters, as we are informed by his funeral oration, where we find a very exact genealogy of his family [A]. He was born at Enckhuysen (a) on the 13th of January, 1609. He was sent to the university of Leyden in the year 1625, to study Philosophy; and afterwards wholly applied himself to the study of Physic. From Leyden,

(1) It is the chief town of Goyland, on the borders of the provinces of Guelderland, and Utrecht.

(2) Sacris Papiæ diu immixtus, nisi quod de justitia Dei, h. e. jure filiorum Dei, quod in Christo per fidem, per Spiritum ipsius unum corpus cum semper habuerit

[A] We find a very exact genealogy of his family. It reaches as high as his abavus, or his great-grandfather's father, who was Hen. REGNIER, a burgher of Harderwick, whose house being burnt in the conflagration which consumed that town, he removed to Naerden (1). There his son ANTONY was preferred to be master of a class, chanter in the choir, and secretary to that city: he was a strict Papiist, but orthodox in a point which, according to Cocceius, is of the highest importance to Christianity (2). I mean the right which the children of God obtain in JESUS CHRIST by faith, as being made one body with him by his Spirit. Antony ipso facti obtinemus (qui religionis Christianæ apex est) integrum sententiam. Cocceius, in Orat. funebri.

VOL. V.

left a son named Henry, born in 1546, who acquainted himself thoroughly with the learned languages, and with a Christian constancy suffered a great many afflictions for the Reformed religion. He was very young when he first approved of the Reformation, and applied himself to the instruction of the persecuted Protestants, and even of little children. Being in a boat where the passengers refused to make room for a young gentlewoman of Guelderland, each urging they could not crowd themselves any closer; he, notwithstanding, by pressing, made room for her to sit (3). He discovered such a solid piety in this lady, that he fell in love with her, and, with the consent of her relations, married her. She was the faithful companion of his travels.

(a) It is a town in North-Holland.

(3) Eam Virginem primum in navi cum eam receperit in multitudine, ut solet archius federe reनुente, ob pietatem amavit & conjugem optavit, ac deinde à parentibus impetravit. Ibid.

Leyden he went to Franeker, in order to continue his studies there in the year 1629, where he took his degree of Doctor of Physic some months after. His father, who had practised Physic at Amsterdam ever since the year 1625, called him home in order to instruct him in the method of practice, and died in 1633. Our Vander-linden continued in the exercise of that Faculty, of which he acquitted himself with so much reputation, that in the year 1639 he was invited to be professor of Physic in the university of Franeker. He very worthily filled that place for almost twelve years. He read lectures on the theoretical and practical parts, on Anatomy and Botany, and it was to his care that the enlargement of the university garden, and the building of an house there were owing. The library was not less indebted to him; for whilst he had the direction of it, he supplied it with a great many books, by an address which engaged the nobility to that good work. The university of Utrecht offered him a professor's place in 1649, which he refused; but two years after he accepted of that which was offered him by the curators of the university of Leyden. He worthily discharged all these functions till his death, which happened on the 5th of March 1664 (b). He was author of several books [B], and editor of others [C]. His employment remained vacant till May 1668, when Mr Drelincourt was called to succeed him. See Guy Patin's 501st letter, in the 464th page travels and dangers. He lost his father, father-in-law, his relations and friends at the Spanish massacre at Naerden in 1572. After this fatal accident, he exercised the ministerial function at Enckhuysen, till the year 1585, when he was invited to be professor of Divinity at Franeker. He was the first who read lectures in that university, and it was he who pronounced that inaugural oration of the university, Quam Academicam ipse initiavit oratione prima & lectione (4). Hence, by the way, we are informed, when that university was founded. He continued in this professorship till he died, which was in 1614. He left several children. Antony, the eldest, was a learned man; whose great knowledge of classic learning engaged the magistrates of Enckhuysen to make him rector of their college. He was besides, a good Musician, and a good Organist; he was no novice in Theology; but what he excelled in was Physic, of which he commenced Doctor at Franeker in the year 1608, and practised it with great success and reputation, first at Enckhuysen, and afterwards at Amsterdam (5). I have already said (6) that he died in 1633, and that the Leyden professor, John Antonides Vander-Linden was his son. Cocceius enlarges very much on the maternal relations of the deceased: herein doubtless he is too particular; but in general the funeral orations in the northern universities are of this sort. I believe the word Antonides was formed in imitation of the patronymical names of the ancient Poets. Tho' I own that there are some families in Holland of the name of Antonides. Yet probably it was at first no more than a patronymical name.

(b) Taken from his funeral Oration, pronounced by John Cocceius, professor of Divinity.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) He wrote several books about Physic, and other sciences. His son has given a catalogue of the books of Physic, in his tract de Scriptis Medicis: I do not think that they have been printed. He left several others imperfect.

(6) In the text of this article.

[B] He wrote several books. The titles of them are: Univerſe Medicinæ Compendium, quinque centuriis ſub Clypeo Clariff. viri D. Menſei Winſhemii Med. Doct. & in illuſtri Friſorum Academia ejusdem Facultatis & Anatomie Profeſſoris, publico examini decem Diſputationibus propoſitum. Addita eſt centuria inauguralis poſtitionum Medico-prædicarum de virulentia venerica, ibidem propoſita & deſenſa ad diem 18 Octobris 1630. These are properly the Theſes on Physic which he maintained in order to be admitted Doctor in 1630. Medulla Medicinæ partibus quatuor comprehenſa. Printed at Franeker 1642, in 8vo. Medicina Phyſiologica novâ curatâque methodo ex optimis quibuſque Autoribus contracta, & propriis obſervationibus locupletata. At Amſterdam 1653, in 4to. Seleſta Medica & ad ea exercitationes Batavicæ. At Leyden in 1656, in 4to. But this book more properly falls under the following remark than under this, it being a collection of ſeveral pieces of Hippocrates, and other antient authors. Diſſertatio de Lactæ, this is amongſt Deſingius's, diſſertations, published at Groningen 1655, in 12mo. De Hemierania menſura, hiſtoria & conſilium. Printed at Leyden 1660, and 1668, in 4to. Meletemata Medicinæ Hippocraticæ. At Leyden 1660, and at Francfort 1672, in 4to. Hippocrates de circuiſu ſanguinis. At Leyden 1661, in 4to. De Scriptis Medicis Libri duo, quibus præmittitur Manuſcriptio ad Medicinam. This piece was three times printed at Amſterdam by John Blæu, in 1637, 1651, and 1662, in 8vo. It is a catalogue of books written on Physic. The author improved it at every edition; and after his death Merklinus, a German, very conſiderably enlarged it, and published it in a large volume in 4to, intitled Lindenius renovatus. It is printed at Nuremberg 1686. It is from this edition that I have taken the catalogue of Vander-Linden's books, which I have inſerted in this remark.

This book of Vander-Linden, de Scriptis Medicis, hath had the fate of all works of this nature; they be very much corrected, and enlarged in every new edition, yet they remain imperfect ſtill. See Voglerus's cenſure on this book of Vander-Linden (7). How large ſo ever the additions of Merklinus are, we are yet far from finding in his edition all thoſe authors who have writ books on Physic. This I will prove by an example: there are in it five authors named MARTIN, and yet BERNARDIN MARTIN, born at Paris on the 8th of January 1629, is omitted. He was the ſon of Samuel Martin, Apothecary to Mary de Medicis, Queen of France, and published a treatiſe of the uſe of Milk, and another upon the breeding of Teeth, both which were very well received and approved by the Faculty of Paris (8). He alſo wrote a relation of his travels in Spain, Portugal, Holland, and Germany, the &c. which contains ſome very remarkable things. The Prince of Condé deſired his attendance on his perſon in 1669. Martin, from that time to the death of that great prince, diſcharged his function very well, and received ſeveral marks of his highneſs's affection. The preſent Prince of Condé (9), only ſon of the late Prince, had him always in his houſe (10). Since Merklinus's edition often contains an abridgment of the lives of the writers on Physic, this may, on ſeveral accounts, be ſerviceable to thoſe who ſhall make additions to the Lindenius Renovatus.

[C] He was editor of others. Let us continue our extracts from the book juſt now cited (11). Adriani Spigelii Opera quæ extant omnia, reſenſuit & cum addita præſatione edidit, at Amſterdam 1645, in folio. Hier. Cardani, de utilitate ex adverſis capienda libris iv. ſerio emendatos edidit, at Franeker, 1648, in 8vo. Cornel. Ceſſi de Medicina libros octo recognovit & edidit, at Leyden, 1657, and 1665, in 12mo. Hippocratis Cui Opera omnia Græcè & Latinè duobus voluminibus comprehenſa, & ad omnes alias editiones accommodata, edidit, at Leyden 1665, in 8vo. This edition of Hippocrates was not entirely finiſhed when Vander-Linden died. He beſtowed a great deal of care on it. The Journal des Sçavans ſpoke of it thus: 'This new edition . . . hath the advantage of anſwering all the former, by the help of the figures in the margin, which ſhew in what page and place every thing is to be found. So that it is preferable to all other editions, and remedies the conſuſion introduced by their diverſity, when a paſſage was to be looked for. It is alſo the moſt correct of them all, for Mr Vander-Linden having carefully compared all the old editions with ſeveral manuſcripts, hath reſtored a great number of places, not before corrected even Foëſius's edition. The Latin verſion he hath choſen is that of Cornarius, becauſe it is the oldeſt, and that which is commonly uſed. Death ſurprized him a little before this edition was finiſhed, which prevented his publiſhing the remarks he deſigned to make on Hippocrates (12). Cocceius touches on this laſt particular: 'Scio τὸν μακαρίτην multa

(7) Voglerus Introduct. in Notitiam bonorum Scriptorum, pag. n. 48.

(8) They have been printed at Paris for Deslys Thierry.

(9) I write this in the year 1696.

(10) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(11) Lindenius renovatus.

(12) Journal des Sçavans, of the 22d of February 1666.

page of the third tome ; and observe that Guy Patin who was a friend to Vander-Linden, hath frequently mentioned him in his letters [D].

(13) Corceus, ubi
supra.
multa de variis locis Medicorum principis esse meditatum, & magnam sibi supellecilem collegisse ob-servatorium ad hunc auctorem illustrandum utilium, quas non potuisse ab ipso edi dolendum est (13). --
I know he designed to write notes on several places of Hippocrates the prince of Physicians, and had collected great store of materials for that purpose, but death prevented him from publishing them.
[D] Guy Patin . . . hath frequently mentioned him in his letters.] I shall only cite one passage (14). ' I ' know nothing new concerning Vander-Linden's Hip' pocrates. This author died at Leyden, aged fifty-' three years (15) of a fever and defluxion on his ' lungs, after having taken antimony, and without ' having been blooded. What pity it is, he should ' write so many books, understand so much Latin

' and Greek, and die of a fever and suffocating catarrh
' without being blooded.

VAQUERIE (JOHN DE LA) First President in the Parliament of Paris, in the reign of Lewis XI, had been Pensionary of the city of Arras (a). He was deputed by that city in 1476, when they were obliged to answer the deputies of that prince, who demanded the submission of the inhabitants to him, as their lawful sovereign, after the death of the Duke of Burgundy. The king's deputies declared that his majesty pretended to have Arras and Artois by way of confiscation, and that if the citizens did not open the gates, it would be in danger of being taken by force. La Vaquerie replied, that the county of Artois belonged to the Princess of Burgundy, daughter of Duke Charles, on whom it devolved in a direct line, from Margaret, Countess of Flanders, the consort of Philip the first Duke of Burgundy ; and he supplicated his majesty, that he would be pleased to observe the truce betwixt him and the late Duke Charles (b). This answer was to no purpose, Arras was obliged to submit to the yoke of France. There has been much talk of a remonstrance made by La Vaquerie to the same king [A]. Nor is the answer much less talked of which he made when they endeavoured to engage the parliament to interpose their authority in the choice of a regent of the realm [B]. Chancellor de l'Hospital said

(a) That office is much the same with that of Syndic. See the second edition of Furetiere's Dictionary, at the word Pensionnaire.

(b) Taken from Philip de Commines, book 10, chap. xi, pag. m. 298.

[A] There has been much talk of a remonstrance made by La Vaquerie to the same king. I shall here make use of John Bodin's words. ' Lewis XI had terribly threatened the court of parliament, for refusing to publish, ratify, and register, several just edicts : the president Lavacrie, accompanied with a great number of counsellors, in scarlet robes, went to offer their complaints and remonstrances on account of those menaces. The king observing the gravity, stateliness, and dignity, of those gentlemen, who were resolved to quit their posts rather than ratify the edicts sent to them ; was surprized, and dreading the authority of the parliament, caused the said edicts to be annulled in their presence, desiring them to continue in the administration of justice, and swore to them that he would never send any edict to them which was not just and reasonable. This action was of very great importance in order to keep that king within the just bounds of reason, who had always exercised an absolute power ; and when he was only Dauphin, he sent for the presidents of that court, and told them that they should raze out the clause DE EXPRESSO MANDATO, BY EXPRESS ORDER, which the court had inserted into the ratification of the privileges granted to the count du Maine, otherwise he would not leave Paris till it was done, and that he would surrender the commission which the king had given him. The court ordered that those words should be blotted out, but that what was blotted out might plainly appear, the register was ordered to be kept, as it is at present, in pursuance of that order, with the date of the xxviiiith of July MCCCXLII (1). ' The Latin edition of this book of Bodin contains a circumstance which I must not omit. It is, that the king commanded the parliament to ratify his edicts on pain of death, and that the first president at the head of that senate declared to the king, that they had rather die than obey. ' Rex sua iussa ingeminans minas adjecit, capit etiam indicta poena nisi curia paruisset. Lanacrius (2) praefes re intellecta regem adit corona judicum purpuratorum stipatus, non ut culpam dedecaretur, sed ut mortem precaretur, cum diceret se suosque collegas mortem malle quam legis propositionem promulgationem pati (3). -- The king reiterated his orders, and even threatened the parliament with death if they did not obey. Upon which the president Lavacrie, accompanied with a great number of counsellors, in their scarlet robes, went to the king, not to excuse their fault, but to desire to be put to death, for he said, that he and his colleagues chose rather to suffer death than ratify the proposed edicts. ' It was not a needless thing to relate in this place

what was done by that prince in the year 1442 (4). This enhanceth the merit of la Vaquerie ; for it is much more glorious to shew one's courage in resisting an imperious person, than to make use of it in opposition to those who have never discovered any obstinate resoluteness in the maintenance of arbitrary power. Tho' Bodin forgot to mention the year when this first president made this resolute and undaunted declaration, it is certain that we are informed, by another proof, how absolutely this monarch resolved to be obeyed. Pasquier relates (5), That in the year one thousand four hundred sixty-five, the same Lewis being king, caused his grant to the Count de Charolois, to be forcibly published by his Chancellor in full court ; and notwithstanding the Protestations made against it by the greatest part of the counsellors, he would have endorsed on the instrument, ' Registrata, Audito Procuratore Regis, & non contradicente. -- Registered, the King's Attorney-General being first heard, and not opposing it. ' La Vaquerie was still Pensionary of the city of Arras, in the year 1476. And therefore he was not first president of the parliament of Paris, till long after Lewis XI had exacted this form of registering. Observe carefully Pasquier's words (6) : ' Such protestations have been very frequent in this court ; and several edicts have this clause, De expresso & expressissimo mandato Regis, pluribus vicibus reiterato. -- By the express and most express order of the king, several times reiterated. Which clause, as it is added for a good end, so several people could with (perhaps not without cause) that this honourable society would sometimes be more flexible, according as the public necessity requires. ' This confirms what I have said above (7) concerning the evils which the parliaments have frequently occasioned by their refusing to register edicts, or by the clauses which they added to the ratification of them. Pasquier had not talked in this manner, if he had not known that the stiffness of those sovereign courts had been sometimes prejudicial to the state. Let us also confirm, by an observation of Bodin, a particular which I have mentioned in another place (8). ' Now the words DE EXPRESSO MANDATO, & expressissimo mandato, and sometimes multis vicibus iterato, which are frequently found in the registers of sovereign courts, about the publication of edicts, occasion such edicts to be neglected, or soon after forgotten and slighted by the connivance of magistrates (9). ' There is no greater encouragement to disobedience, than to suffer the transgressors of an edict to hope for impunity : but this is in effect what the parliaments did, when they disgraced the princes edicts in such manner. [B] The answer . . . which he offered when the attempt was made to engage the parliament . . . In the choice

(4) Pasquier, Recherches, livr. 11, chap. 10, pag. m. 61, gives a larger account of it than Bodin.

(5) Pasquier, ib.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 62.

(7) See the remark [K], of the article of Chancellor de l'HOSPITAL.

(8) Above, in the same remark.

(9) Bodin, ubi supra, p. 418.

(1) Bodin, de la Republique, livr. iii, chap. 10, pag. m. 417. See also Matthieu, Hist. de Louis XI, livr. xi, pag. m. 668.

(2) It should be Lanacrius.

(3) Bodinus, ubi supra, pag. 454. Edit. 1601.

(c) Le Bret, de la Souveraineté du Roi, livr. ii, ch. v, pag. 182, 'one day in a speech, ' That the poverty of the President de la Vaquerie was much more commendable than the riches of a Chancellor of Burgundy, to whom his master said, ' Rolin, 'tis too much (c).'

183.

[choice of a regent of the realm.] After the death of Lewis XI, the Countess de Beaujeu, his eldest daughter, had the administration of the government, during the minority of Charles VIII. The Duke of Orleans, who desired to dispossess her of the regency, applied to the parliament of Paris; but Mr de la Vaquerie, first President, declared to him, that affairs of that nature did not fall under their cognizance (10). The author of the book, intituled, The Ministry of Cardinal de Richelieu relates it thus: ' The parliaments are ' not less obliged by the laws of justice than by those of prudence, never to differ from the king in affairs of state: I say they are obliged to it by justice, because it is to usurp a power which doth not belong to them, to attempt to judge of such things, they being only created by the king, to administer justice to the people; as the President de la Vaquerie told the Chancellor of the Duke of Orleans, who formerly desired the parliament, on the part of his master, to press the king to come to Paris and make use of their counsel in the most important affairs (11).'

(11) Histoire du Ministère du Cardinal de Richelieu, Part. ii, pag. 219, Disc. Edit. an 1631.

(10) Le Grain, Hist. de Louis XIII, pag. 4.

VAUBRUN (THE MARQUIS OF). See BAUTRU (NICOLAS).

(a) Rocolles, Introduction à l'Histoire, Tom. ii, pag. 339, Paris Edit. 1664.

(b) The abbot de Marolles, Denombrement des Auteurs, pag. 441.

(c) See the Journal des Scavans, of the second of February 1688, pag. 268, Dutch Edit. and l'Histoire des Ouvrages des Scavans, March 1688, pag. 388.

VAUMORIERE (PETER DORTIGUE SIEUR DE) of noble extraction in the city of Apt in Provence (a), lived in the XVIIth century. He settled at Paris, and there published some Romances which did him honour [A]. He wrote politely in verse and prose (b). He was Sub-director to the Academy of the Abbot d'Aubignac [B], composed of persons of merit and learning. He collected a great number of harangues on all kinds of subjects, and published them at Paris in 1688 in 4to, with a treatise on the Art of writing such Pieces. The Journalists spoke advantageously of it (c). He was at variance with Fortune [C], if we may believe Richelet. The letters he published on all kind of subjects, with directions on the manner of writing them, were well received by the public. The first edition was finished on the 12th of November 1689, and the second on the last of September 1694. I have seen a third in two volumes in 12mo, to which are added several precepts and some letters, it bears the date of the year 1695. The Elogy of Mr de Vaumoriere is prefixed to it, and contains a very particular account of the good qualities of his mind and soul; but nothing is said either of his country, or fortune, or time of his birth, &c. He was dead when that elogy was made.

[A] He published some Romances which did him honour.] He wrote the great Scipio, and finished the last work of Mr de la Calprenede, I mean the Pharamond. The author being prevented by death had only carried it to the seventh tome: Mr de Vaumoriere continued it to the end. He declared in the preface to the twelfth volume, which is the last, that some had wronged him in saying that he had made use of Mr de la Calprenede's memoirs, who, added he, never made any for himself. The Journal des Savans was at that time pretty sparing in the commendation of authors, and criticised them freely: but, however, it spoke of the first tome of the continuation of Pharamond in advantageous terms. There is reason to hope from what appears of the eighth volume which Mr de Vaumoriere has composed, that the death of him whose footsteps he follows will not be long regretted. He has thoroughly entered into the spirit of that author. He preserves to the heroes and heroines the same sentiments, and the same characters, which he had given them: and in his stile he has assumed that grand and lofty air which was peculiar to him. It may even be said without wounding the memory of that illustrious deceased person, that the discourse of Mr de Vaumoriere is smoother and more correct than his: and that he knows better how to check the sallies of the sublime (1). Mr Gueret does not judge of this first tome of the continuation with the same indulgence: but as for the rest he is liberal of his encomiums on the substitute of la Calprenede. I am not dissatisfied with his labour, he makes Pharamond say: I wish only he had not made an entire volume of the history of Constantine; it languishes a little too much: and were it not for the beauty of his language which keeps up the attention of his reader, it would be tedious. He was well apprised of it himself; for he has corrected that fault in the following tomes: and what I reckon a good omen for all the rest, he still gathers strength as he goes forward, and now treads firm and sure in the steps of his illustrious predecessor (2). When small Romances were in vogue, Mr de Vaumoriere conformed to that taste; he wrote some which might be read from beginning to end in less than two hours. Such was that which he intituled, Diane de France, and which was printed in the year 1674, if I remember right. He wrote also La Galanterie des Anciens; Adelaïde de Champagne; Agatidis: L'Art de plaire dans la conversation.

[B] He was sub-director to the Academy of the Abbot d'Aubignac.] You will see it by the list, which the Mercur Galant has given of those who composed it (3). You will also find there some circumstances concerning this Academy, and amongst others that it had been broke after the nomination of the Abbot de Villeferain to the bishopric of Sens. Another book informs me that they met at the house of that Abbot. I shall recite the passage, because it is curious. It is Henrietta Silvia de Molere who speaks: ' Every thing I heard seemed to me to be a coach that came to carry me away: and I was in an house where I frequently had such kind of frights; it was the Hôtel de Hollande. The Abbot de Villeferain lived over against it, and the assembly of Wits, which afterwards met at his house, was projected at that time. I saw nothing but people of a stern countenance stopping at his gate, and passing along my street, and I took them for so many people sent from the devout ladies (4).'

[C] He was at variance with Fortune.] Those are the words of the Sieur Richelet in the index of one of his books (5). The words he uses in the body of the book at the place to which the index refers, are still more emphatical. Mr Conrart was exceedingly pleased that people said he understood persons of merit, and that he did them good offices like a gentleman. If in this age the favourites of fortune were of that temper, Cassandra, Vaumoriere, and many other unhappy wretches would not run pest to beggary (6). I believe he had a grudge against him; for in another book he speaks thus: ' The Continuator of Pharamond who has been in prison these three weeks is just set at liberty (7).'

(1) Journal des Scavans, of the 23d of February, 1685, pag. 156, 157, Dutch Edit.

(a) Gueret, Par-nasse Réformée, pag. 174, 175.

(3) Merc. Galant, of the year 1672, Tom. i, pag. 81, Dutch Edit.

(4) Vie de Henriette Sylvia de Molere, Part. i, pag. 99, Dutch Edit. 1674.

(5) Intituled, Les plus belles Lettres des meilleurs Auteurs François.

(6) Richelet, Lettres, &c. pag. xiv, Dutch Edit. 1694.

(7) Item, Remarques sur les D'écrites, pag. 33, at the end of l'Eloge, Geneva edition 1680.

VIDELIUS

VEDELIUS (NICOLAS) a noted reformed Divine, who lived in the XVIIth century. He was born in the Palatinate, and was professor of Philosophy for twelve years at Geneva, and minister of the church in the same city for ten years (a). He was invited to Deventer in 1630, in order to be Divinity and Hebrew Professor; having accepted the invitation, he commenced Doctor of Divinity at Basil, in his journey from Geneva to Deventer, on the 24th of June the same year (b). He acquitted himself very well of his duty, and discovered a great zeal against the Arminians [A]. He exercised provisionally the function of Professor of Philosophy in 1634 (c). He removed from Deventer, and became Divinity Professor at Franeker, about the year 1638 (d). This was his last station; for he died at Franeker in 1642. He was sorry that death did not permit him to publish the answer, which he had prepared to his adversaries [B], concerning the power of the magistrate in Ecclesiastical affairs [C]. I shall give a catalogue of his works [D]. I have in another place (e) spoken of his quarrel with Barleus.

The Programma, which I have quoted, supposes he was only twelve years professor at Geneva; and yet he himself in the inaugural oration, which he pronounced at Franeker on the 25th of November 1639, says he had been professor at Geneva and Deventer twenty-three years. Therefore as he had been at Deventer only since the year 1630, he must have been at Geneva fourteen years. His son NICOLAS VEDELIUS died minister of the French church at Heusden towards the beginning of the year 1705.

[A] He discovered a great zeal against the Arminians. He published a book in 1631, intitled De Arcanis Arminianismi, in which he maintains that explicitly and professedly, they endeavour to introduce a subtle sort of Atheism into the Church; and that though they do not immediately attempt to bring in a gross Atheism, they open a great and wide gate for its admittance. The beginning of one of his chapters runs thus: 'Propoliumus hactenus doctrinam Remonstrantium, qua omnis generis hæreses & sectas in Ecclesiam Dei, adeoque Libertinismum hoc est Atheismum subtilem ex PROFESSO introducere conantur (1). . . . I have hitherto laid open the doctrine of the Remonstrants, whereby they professedly attempt to introduce sects and heresies of all kinds, and consequently Libertinism, that is subtle Atheism, into the church of GOD.' A little after he hath these words: 'Scopus meus non est gravare Remonstrantes accusatione ea, ac si Atheismum crassum introducere data opera seu ex professo molirentur. Nequaquam vero, prout eodem cap. primo monui. Sed tantum offensurus sum, præter alia effecta pestilentissima quæ nova ipsorum Theologia & Religio producit; etiam fenestram & portam aperiri ea Atheismo crasso patentissimam atque amplissimam (2). . . . It is not my design, as I have already said, to load the Remonstrants with this accusation, as if they industriously or professedly attempted to introduce gross Atheism. But I was only to shew, that besides other most pernicious effects which their new Theology or Religion produces, a very large window or gate was thereby opened to gross Atheism.' He adds that he has no other design than to convert the Remonstrants by shewing them the danger which attends their doctrine. Quæ nimirum unusquisque eo magis ab ea sibi convocat: Et ipsi Theologi Remonstr. lucri sunt, qui etiam noster in hoc labore scopus est (3). We have seen something like this in Maldonatus's Commentaries (4). The Arminians furiously inveighed against him in a book intitled Vedelius Rhapfodus. He replied in the fourth part of his work printed in 1634. The second and third part were published in the year 1633.

[B] He was concerned that death did not permit him to publish the answer which he had prepared to his adversaries. This circumstance you will find in one of Vossius's letters. You will there see also that in case this reply of Vedelius had been printed, they would have left out all the violent and injurious expressions dispersed in that book by way of return to his antagonists. 'Vedelius Theologiæ apud Franekeranos Professor, dum in Frisia sum, satis concessit. Moribundum cruciabat, quod terris eriperetur, priusquam potuisset Revio & Triglandio respondere. Horum uterque acerbe satis scriptis adversus scriptum ejus de Constantini Episcopatu; quo Magistratus jura circa res Ecclesiæ defendit. Collegæ defuncti mihi & Franekeræ aiebant, fortasse responsum sic etiam edendum; sed deletis, quæ ut par pari redderet hostilitatem, virulentius chartis illervisisset adversus Revium (5). . . . Vedelius, Professor of Divinity at Franeker, died whilst I was in Friesland. He was extremely concerned that death prevented him from answering Revius and Triglandius. Both of them wrote very sharply against his treatise of Constantine's Episcopacy; wherein he maintains the power of the civil magistrate in ecclesiastical affairs. The colleagues of the deceased told me at Franeker, that the answer would perhaps be published, but that those virulent things he had said in it against Revius would be left out.'

[C] Concerning the power of the magistrate in Ecclesiastical affairs. Several disputes arose concerning this question in Holland after the synod of Dort; for some Divines endeavoured to withdraw the ecclesiastical authority from the sovereign, and others would confer on the magistrate all ecclesiastical authority. At least thus each party interpreted the other's intention and doctrine. Vedelius engaged in this dispute, and in the beginning of the year 1638, published a Disputatio Theologica de Magistratu adversus Bellarmini librum de Laicis, where he extended the magistratus power much farther than others would have it. Some time after knowing that they were preparing to refute him, he published (6) a second edition of his disputation, to which he added several explanations. The whole title of this piece is, De Episcopatu Constantini magni, seu de potestate Magistratum Reformatorem circa res Ecclesiasticas, dissertatio repetita cum responsione ad interrogata quædam. He foresaw that he should irritate his adversaries, and draw on himself a great deal of abusive language (7); but for all this he had courage enough to enter the lists. His foresight was just, and it was not necessary to be a great prophet in order to predict an event of that nature. He was attacked in his life-time and after his death. Several Zealant ministers caused him to be refuted, when he was dead, making use of the pen of a minister of Middleburg (8). His friends in Friesland defended him, and treated the Zealant ministers with the utmost contempt. See the book intitled, Grallæ seu vere puerilis coturnus sapientie, quo se jactat apud imperitos Guillelmus Apollonii, &c (9). Apollonius answered: they replied by a book whose title is comical enough (10).

[D] A catalogue of his works. I have already mentioned three; the rest are, Notæ in Epistolas Ignatii. Those notes are partly critical and partly controversial, and are joined with the epistles of S. Ignatius which he caused to be printed at Geneva in the year 1623 in 4to. Commentarius de tempore utriusque Episcopatus, S. Petri, Antiocheni & Romani, at Geneva 1624. Rationale Theologicum, seu de necessitate & vero usu principiorum rationis ac Philosophiæ in controversiis Theologicis; at the same place 1628. A Remedy against Apostasy in French, printed also there in the same year. Panacea Apostasie, at the same place 1628. This is a translation of the former. S. Hilary, or an antidote against sorrow, in French, at Geneva 1630. S. Hilarius, seu Antidotum contra tristitiam pro sancta Hilarietate, at Leyden 1632, it is a translation of the former. De prudentia veteris Ecclesiæ, at Amsterdam 1633. De Div Synagoga contra Cass. Barleum at Harderwick 1632. Opuscula Theologica at Franeker 1641 in 12mo.

VOL. V.

5 U

VEGIUS

(a) See the Programma mentioned by Revius, in his History of Deventer, pag. 686.

(b) Revius, in Historia Daven-trienſi, ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 694.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 713.

(e) In the remark [D], of the article BARLEUS.

(1) Vedelius, de Arcanis Arminianismi, lib. ii, cap. x, pag. m. 243. Edit. 1631, in 8vo, and pag. 86, Edit. 1632, in 4to.

(2) Ibid. pag. 243.

(3) Ibid.

(4) See the article VALLE, remark [A], about the middle.

(5) Vossius, Epist. ecclesiæ, pag. m. 409. col. 2. It is dated the 24th of October 1642. It is among those of the Arminians, pag. 86, of the edition in folio.

(7) Jam prævidere temerarius & superbis ingeniis nihil magis in votis fore, quam ut spiritus salutari- bus pacis & concordie consilia ac monitis in me inveniunt, & virum suum contra me evocant. Nicol. Vedeli, Præf. de Episcopatu Constantini.

(8) Called Galileus Apollonius.

(9) It was printed at Franeker, in the year 1646.

(10) Grallator faciens de novo in scenam productus, cum pantomimo suo bomachide Viliſſimo. At Franeker 1647.

(a) Jovius Elog. cap. ciii, pag. m. 250.

(b) Moreri says he was canon of Lateran.

(c) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro d'huomini Letterati, Part. ii, pag. 188.

(d) See the remark [C].

VEGIUS (MAPHEUS) Born at Lodi in the Milanese in 1407, was a famous Orator, and the greatest Latin Poet that had been seen for several ages (a). He went through his classical learning at Milan, from whence he removed to Pavia to study the Civil Law; but the plague soon obliged him to return to Lodi, where he applied himself entirely to polite learning, and particularly to poetry, and began to write books very early (A). Going to Rome he made himself beloved and esteemed by Pope Martin the Vth, who made him Secretary of the Briefs. He discharged that office so faithfully that he was raised to a more considerable post by the same Pope; which was that of Datary. At the same time he bestowed on him a canonry in the church of St Peter (b). He was so thoroughly contented with these preferments that he refused a rich bishopric. The respect which Eugenius IV, and Nicholas V, had for him, obliged them to continue him in the post of Datary. He was very much esteemed by Panormitanus, and Æneas Sylvius, and shewed a great devotion for St Augustin [B]. His morals were very exemplary. He died at Rome in 1459 (c). Among those authors who mention him, I find scarce any, who do not pass over in silence the finest passage of his life; for they do not tell us any thing of the alteration of his taste. The poetical fictions were at first his greatest delight (d); he thought of nothing but of making of verses, and placing the Pagan divinities in them. Virgil was one of his great gods. David's Psalms seemed to him but old womens songs, and he mortally hated the profession of a priest. But at last he was disgusted at the profane beauties of poetry; the psalms of David appeared to him admirable, and he was touched with an extream pleasure in the sacerdotal functions, and employed himself in the instruction of the nuns [C]. I shall speak of his books [D].

I could

(1) See the notes on the Naudreana, pag. 194, 195.

(2) Dopo esser egli a somma perfezione arrivato in ogni genere di lettere humane andò a Pavia. Ghilini, Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 188.

(3) Diede nell'età di sedici anni appena a scrivere. Id. ibid.

(4) Giesner, in Bibl. fol. 491, speaking of Vegius's treatise, de Educatione Puerorum, printed at Basil with other such small books in the year 1541.

[A] He began to write books very early. At the age of sixteen, if we believe Ghilini; and we must believe him (1) though his authority in this case ought to be of little weight; for it is certain that he is tainted with the Enthusiasm of a Panegyrist, and that he has not well adjusted the parts of his narrative. Doth he write judiciously when he relates, 1. That Vegius being arrived at the highest perfection in all sorts of human literature, went to Pavia in order to study the Civil and Canon Law (2)? 2. That having scarce began to study there, he was obliged to leave the town on account of the Plague? 3. That he returned into his own country, where he applied himself again to the study of polite learning, and to writing, being scarce yet sixteen years old (3)? Doth not this relation imply that Vegius understood perfectly all the parts of literature before he was sixteen? This hyperbole is absurd. He died before he nearly approached that perfection; how then was he arrived at it in his younger years?

[B] He shewed a great devotion for St Augustin. He built a chapel in the church dedicated to that Saint at Rome on the right hand of the great altar, and having caused the bones of St Augustin to be put into a very fine shrine with those of his mother Monica, he removed them from Ostia to this chapel. He wrote Poems in honour of those two saints, which he also very much praised in the preface of his book, de educatione puerorum & claris eorum moribus. In that work he confirms his precepts concerning the education of children by as many proper instances as he could possibly find in the life of St Augustin and his mother Monica. In præfatione postquam D. Augustini & matris ipsius Monice laudes pluribus prædicavit, subiungit: Enitemur ostendere omnem bene educandorum filiorum rationem, & convenientissimis subinde etiam sanctissimisque tam parentis Monice quam filii Augustini exemplis, singula quibus idonee ea applicari poterint confirmare studebimus (4). In the preface, after he had much commended St Augustin and his mother Monica, he adds, We will endeavour to shew the whole method of educating children well, and confirm every thing by applying most suitable and holy examples in the life of Monica and her son Augustin.

[C] But at last he was disgusted at the profane beauties of Poetry; the psalms of David appeared to him admirable, &c. Such excellent conversions, such holy metamorphoses, are so rare that they should not have been forgotten by those who mention this writer. Most Poets retain till death their passion for the beauties of profane Poetry. Vegius is an exception to this general rule, his confession runs thus. Priora recolens tempora, scilicet he, quibus inhiabam quotidie condendis carminibus, nihil præter Musas & Poetarum lusus pulchrum ducens, mirari non satis possum, adeo IMMUTARI affectus meos, adeo vim animo meo [ut ita dixerim] fieri potuisse, ut à dulcibus prurientibusque fabulis, ad studia severiora conversus sim, & qui decantandis ingentibus rerum gestis, confictisque tot incertorum Deorum numinibus, ardentius instabam, nunc ad exhortandas sorores, ad docendas virgunculas descenderim, ut pro Ovidiis & Flaccis, nunc Augustinos & Hieronymos, pro Virgilio, quem alterum in terris Deum esse arbitrabar, nunc David fideliores Vatem colam, suscipiam amplectarque, & ejus mihi carmina, quæ tanquam animalia deliramenta tordebant, nunc mira adpurgant animum suavitatem, atque unde magis etiam oblitiscam] quod tantopere detestabar exhorrebamque instar mortis, nunc sacerdotio dulcius nihil putem (5). When I reflect on former times, when I was constantly intent on making verses, and took no delight but in the Musæ and poetical fictions, I am amazed to find such an alteration in my temper, and my mind so forcibly turned [if I may say so] from sweet and agreeable amusements to grave and severe studies; and that I, who used to be so earnest in celebrating the glorious exploits, and fabulous excellencies of so many unknown gods, should now descend to instruct sisters and teach nuns; that instead of an Ovid and Horace, I should now admire an Augustin and Jerom, and instead of a Virgil whom I looked on as another god upon earth, I should now adore and care for a David, a more faithful Poet; and that his psalms, which formerly seemed to me like old womens tales, should now affect my mind with wonderful pleasure; and [what surprises me most of all] that I should esteem nothing so delightful as the priesthood, which before I detested and abhorred like death.

[D] I shall speak of his books. Some of them are in prose, others in verse, some are printed, others not. The Poem for which he is most famous is his supplement to the Æneid; he imagined that Virgil had not concluded that work. He resolved therefore to add a thirteenth book which is usually printed with the twelfth of that Roman Poet. His performance hath been censured (6). His dialogue de Felicitate & Miseria for some time passed for a piece of Lucian (7). It was printed with the book de Educatione Puerorum, the Philalethes, and the Disceptatio inter terram, solem, & aurum. All these tracts are in prose. Ghilini falsely believes that the seven books de Perseverantia Religionis ad Sorores, were never printed. They were printed at Paris in the year 1511 (8) with some of those pieces whose titles I have mentioned. They were inserted in the great Bibliotheca Patrum. His Poem on the frauds of the peasants must needs be very curious. You will find in Ghilini the titles of a great many pieces of this author, which were never printed. Paul Jovius hath not forgot to praise him on account of some monuments of the application of his pen to sacred subjects, which he left behind him. Ne quid ad cumulatum eruditionem vero Christiano deest, quædam

254

(5) Vegius & Perseverantia Religionis, in Tom. xxvi, Bibl. Mus. in Lib. 689, 494

(6) See Mr. Boddie's note, in the 1212, Tom. iv, pag. 13, 14. Edit. 1755, 12

(7) See the catalogue of the Bodleian Library, pag. 224

(9) Jovius, Elog.
cap. cvii, pag.
n. 350.

perfect the learning of a true Christian, he left some pious annotations on the holy scriptures, and a very valuable book on the memorable antiquities of St Peter's church, wherein he gives an account of the offerings and sepulchres of the Popes.

(1) From his receiving a yearly pension from the public.

(2) They are very well explained in Furetiere's Dictionary corrected by Mr de Beauval.

(3) This appears from Raderus, who dedicated his Martial Nobilissimis & amplissimis VVV. Dominis Velleris, MARCO Duum viro, Urbis Praefecto, MATTHEO Aedili, PAULO Consuli Matthaei FFF. Antonii NNN. Patricii Augustini, B. R. nat.

(4) Sepultus in agro Sedunensi ubi arcem Valerianam cum suis longe possedit. Arnoldus, in Dissertatione de Marci Velferi vita, genere, & morte, pag. 6.

(5) They have been called Valli-fii, or Walliseri, & Velferi, Ibid. pag. 5.

(6) Ibid.

[B] He was of a very antient family.] Some will have it to be defended from Beliaricus, the famous General of the Emperor Justinian. It is said that FRANCIS BELIARIUS about the year 564, married Antonia, Pompey's daughter, and cousin to the fiftier of the Emperor Anastasius I. He left two sons, PETER, and CHARLES, the first of whom married Mary Colonna, and died without issue at Milan; the other, in order to live secure from the incursions of the Barbarians, retired into the country of Vallais, and had a castle in the territory of Sion (4), which he left to his descendants (5). Such is the genealogy of a citizen of Augsburg! But what is very surprizing is, that we are told that authentic proofs to make good all this, are ready to be produced. For, say they, JOHN BARTHOLOMEW VELSERUS, Counsellor to the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and Canon of Strasburgh, wrote a letter to that Emperor in 1336, when the Diet was assembled at Spire, to supplicate him earnestly, to affix his signet by way of approbation to the German translation of a book, which Cardinal Stephen Colonna the Pope's Vicar had written concerning the genealogy of the Velferi. This Emperor had himself ordered the writing of this book; and the author therein produced an exact series of proofs founded on publick acts and deeds, from 545, to JOHN VELSERUS the brother of John Bartholomew. Pro vetustissima familie Jue gloria ac dignitate non rogans Joham, verum etiam obsecrans, ut Germanicam libelli versumque sigillo annali suis confirmaret, quem auctoritate ac iussu ipsius Imperatoris Stephanus Colonna, Summi Pontificis tunc Vicarius & Cardinalis, ex omnibus instrumentis, tabulis, literisque publicis ab a. c. 545, usque ad Johannem Vellermum, Job. Bartholomei fratrem germanum, omni cura & diligentia complexus est (6). This book had been translated into Latin at Rome in 1327, by the same John Bartholomew. We are told that EMMANUEL VELSERUS Canon of Basil in 1671, writing to his brother OCTAVIAN, mentioned CHARLES BELIARIUS, with whom by his wife Paula de gli Ursini retired from Rome into Vallais in 620. 'Agitata inibi mentione de Caroli Beliarici. cui una cum conjuge Paula Ursina

'Vallefiam verius ad Rheni fontes A. C. 620 ex urbe Roma ob seſſivissimos & violentissimos in omnem nobilitatem Longobardos, exemplo aliorum egressus est (7). - - - Charles Belſarius is mentioned in it, (7) Ibid. pag. 80.
who after the example of others retired from Rome with his wife Paula de gli Urfini to the country of Vallais near the head of the Rhine in the year 620, because the Longobards were most violent and cruel to all the nobility.' This OCTAVIAN VELSERUS already mentioned was the first of the family, that has been Patrician of Augſburg. He was also Captain in that city, Director of the military affairs, and besides Counsellor to Conrad Duke of Franconia. He died in 1074 (8). JAMES VELSERUS was the first of the family who settled at Nuremberg, whither he came in 1493. He married and died there in 1544, being the father of six sons and eleven daughters. The alliances of the Velsers have been very illustrious, in Switzerland, and several provinces of the empire : but the greatest honour which they received on this account was doubtless the marriage of PHILIP-PINA VELSERUS with Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, son of the Emperor Ferdinand I, and brother to the Emperor Maximilian II. That Prince fell desperately in love with Philippina in the time of the Diet at Augſburg in 1548, and married her privately (9). She lived with him as his lawful wife till his death, above twenty-four years (10). She was a very handsome woman, and endowed besides with a rich store of good qualities. She was daughter to FRANCIS VELSERUS, Baron of Zinnenberg; and sister to CHARLES VELSERUS, Governor of the marquisate of Burgaw (11). She died at Inſpruck on the 24th of April 1580, and left two sons, whom their father Ferdinand could never entitle to succeed him. He was obliged to content himself with the marquisate of Burgaw for the elder; and the younger being an Ecclesiastic, became a Cardinal (12). Arn-oldus cites an author (13) who affirms that Andrew,
 the eldest son of Ferdinand and of Philippina Velsers, was a Cardinal, and that Charles his younger brother Marquis of Burgaw, married Sybilla sister to John-William Duke of Cleves. These two brothers died without issue. It is said that Charlemagne gave three flowers-de-luce for arms to PHILIP VALISERUS, who behaved himself very bravely in the war of Lombardy. They add (14) that he was honoured with several other prerogatives, and that Otho the Great confirmed all those privileges in favour of JULIUS VELSERUS grandson of Philip Valisfers, whom he made his counsellor in the council of war in 950, and a knight in 971 (15). Charles V ranked this family amongst the immediate noblemen, whose causes are cognizable before the Emperor only (16).
 The Archduke Ferdinand made CHARLES VEL-
 SERUS, Philippina's brother, a free baron (17).

Observe that Julius Velferus saved the Emperor Ortho's life in a battle against the Huns, and that he died of a continual fever in the camp at the age of 96, in the Emperor Henry the IIId's Time (18). The author whom I cite speaks of several Velferus's, who signalized either their valour in the army, or their prudence in the magistracy.

[C] and whicb had possessed vast riches.] Melchior Adam relates that Francis I, being by a treaty of peace obliged to pay twelve tons of gold to Charles V, the Fuggers and Velfers promised to advance that great sum of money (19). Martin Crusius saith that in the year 1528, BARTHOLOMEW VELSER and his partners armed several ships in Spain, and sent them into America, where they discovered a very rich country, on the frontiers of Peru, called Venezevela.

[C] . . . and wubib had possessed vast riches.] Melchior Adam relates that Francis I, being by a treaty of peace obliged to pay twelve tons of gold to Charles V, the Fuggers and Velsers promised to advance that great sum of money (19). Martin Cruisus faith that in the year 1528, BARTHOLOMEW VELSER and his partners armed several ships in Spain, and sent them into America, where they discovered a very rich country, on the frontiers of Peru, called Venezuela.

(a) Bonciarius, lib. ix, Epist. xii, apud Arnoldum, de Marci Velsi vita, genere, & obitu, p. 42.

and being a lover of the Belles Lettres, he was, when very young, sent to Rome to study under Antony Muretus (a). He was there in the year 1575. With the study of Antiquities he intermixed that of the Italian tongue, in which he became so great a proficient, that he wrote that language like a Florentine [D]. Returning home he applied himself to the Bar in the year 1589. He obtained the senatorial dignity in 1592. He was preferred to the little council in the year 1594, and elected Prætor in 1600. He discharged all these offices with a great deal of honour, and was an ornament to his country. He was both a lover and a protector of learning and learned men. He published several good books [E], and afforded helps to several authors nezuela, of which they made themselves masters, and kept it twenty-eight years, according to the treaty which they concluded with Charles V. But a difference arose betwixt the farmers of Elizabeth King Philip's Queen, and George of Spire, who governed that country in the name of the Velsers. At first they disputed only about tolls, and then about the limits, and at last it was pretended that those Germans ought not to possess any part of Venezuela. The cause was pleaded in Spain, and they were dispossessed of all they held in Venezuela, by virtue of the sentence pronounced in Spain in the year 1555. The first Governor whom the Velsers established there was Ambrose Dalsinger, born at Ulm, whom the Spaniards killed; but Charles V caused the authors of this murder to be punished (20). Arnoldus is very angry because Jerom Benzo calls the Velsers (to whom the Emperor engaged the country of Valentia) (21) merchants. 'Vano istius judicio & Reges & Principes magnarii negotiatores erunt, & delicatior mercium infitores. Hercules tuam fidem! . . . In his foolish judgment forsooth! Kings and princes are great merchants, and dealers in choice commodities.' Thus Arnoldus exclaims against the word Merchant. He abridges what Herrera hath said concerning the exploits of those Governors, whom the Velsers sent to that country.

(20) Crusius, Part. iii, Annal. Suevicor. lib. xi, cap. iii, iv, apud Arnoldum, ubi supra, pag. 24.

(21) Valentia ditissima provincie oppidum, quam Cæsar anno 1528 Velzaris mercatoribus Germanis oppignoravit. Benzo, lib. i, Historie novi Orbis, cap. xxv, apud Arnoldum, ibid. pag. 25.

(22) Ubi supra, pag. 43, 44.

(23) Nella Risposta all' Antic. del Beni, cart. 16.

(24) It should be Guarini, and it is probably an error of the press.

(25) Rispost. cart. 112, 113.

(26) Concerning the vicissitude of human affairs.

'che se fossero scritte del piu purgato stile Latine, e parci nel legger lettere di locuzione tanto propria che Firenze estenda i suoi confini, anzi il recinto delle sue mura, fino in Augusta (27). . . . But besides I had another particular interest in view, viz. That I might not be deprived of your answers in the Italian tongue, which my friends and I read with much more pleasure and admiration, than if they had been writ in the purest Latin stile; and in reading letters of such propriety and elegance, it seemed to us that Florence extended its confines, nay the very circuit of its walls as far as Augsburg.'

[E] He published several good books. His first work, according to Melchior Adam, was that which he published at Venice in the year 1594. The bare title discovers the uncommon learning of the author; it runs thus. 'Rerum Augustanarum Vindelicarum libri octo, quibus à prima Rhætorum ac Vindelicarum origine ad annum usque 552. à nato Christo nobilissimæ gentis historia & antiquitates traduntur, ac antiqua monumenta tam quæ Augustæ, quam quæ in agro Augustano, quin & quæ alibi extant ad res Augustanas spectantia, æri incisa & notis illustrata exhibentur. . . . Eight books of the affairs of Augsburg, containing the history and antiquities of that noble country from the first original of the Rheti and Vindelicii, to the year of Christ 552, with cuts of the ancient monuments in the city and country of Augsburg or elsewhere, relating to the affairs of Augsburg, illustrated with notes.' Melchior Adam had reason to call this a happy prelude (28). Velsers conferred the first fruits of his labours to the glory of his country. 'In Italian progressus edidit antiquitates Augustanas, felix famæ surgentis auspiciis & piis. . . . Going into Italy he published the Antiquities of Augsburg, which was an happy and pious omen of his rising fame.' In the year 1602, he published at Augsburg, Rerum Boicarum libri quinque, historiam à gentis origine ad Carolum Magnum complexi (29).

He afterwards published at several times the lives of some Martyrs of Augsburg, that of St Uldaric, Bishop of that city, and of St Severinus and Apollonius of Tyre. As for the antient Itinerary, which Peutinger possessed, whence it was called Tabula Peutingeriana, he published it at Venice in the year 1591 (30). Most of those pieces are illustrated with Velsers's commentaries. All the works of this author have been collected into a body, and reprinted in folio at Nuremberg in 1682. Christopher Arnoldus, Professor at Nuremberg, had the care of this edition, and adorned it with preliminary discourses, in which he informs us of a great many particulars, concerning the family of the Velsers in general, and the life of Mark Velsers in particular; together with the judgment which the learned have passed on his works, and the funeral eulogies with which they honoured him. And as he kept a great correspondence with the learned of Italy, and of several other countries, the editor hath collected several of his Latin and Italian letters which he hath added to this edition.

Velsers passed for the author of the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta, which was printed about the year 1612. Gassendus having observed that several authors ascribed that book to Mr de Peirese, adds that they were mistaken, and that it is very probable Velsers composed it. He grounds this conjecture on Velsers's great learning and singular affection to the house of Austria: 'Non disquiro quidem an auctor hujusce libri fuerit Antonius Albizius, nobilis ille Florentinus, qui Christianorum Principum Stemmata ediderat ante duos annos, ut nonnullis persuasum est; an, ut videtur verifimilius, insignis ille Marcus Velsers, cujus sæpius meminimus, ob consummatam eruditionem, propensionemque singularem erga domum Austriacam (31). . . . I shall not examine whether (27) Letters torn, cart. 109, 104, apud Arnoldum, p. 44.

(28) It ought to be remembered that Velsers had published a little book in 1591, see, below, citation (30).

(29) In the Vita of Justicandell. pag. 420.

(30) He says to himself in his xxvth letter, ad Itale, pag. 379.

OPINIONS concerning the author of the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta.

(31) Gassendus in Vita Peirese, lib. iii, ad ann. 1612. pag. 279.

authors [F]; and no man ever had more friends than he in the republic of letters. He would never suffer himself to be drawn [G]; but his picture was taken unknown to

- (32) In Præfat.
'whether the author of this book was Antony Albinus, that noble Florentine, who published above two years ago the genealogies of Christian princes, as some believe; or, which is more likely, whether it was the illustrious Marcus Velsus, whom we have often mentioned on account of his consummate learning, and singular attachment to the house of Austria.' Mr Arnoldus (32) declares that he knows nothing of this affair, and blames their temerity who pronounce so decisively concerning a fact so uncertain as this is. He cites Ernſtius (33), Rhodius (34), Scavenius (35), Placcius (36), who affirm that Velsus was the author of this book. He owns that Octavius Ferrarius wrote to him that Scioppius had frequently assured him, that Velsus was the author of the Squittinio. 'M. Velsus scripta eo plausu à studiosis excipitur, quem ingens viri fama & celebre nomen meretur. Nolle tamen illis inferi Venetæ Reip. Scrutinium, cuius illum auctorem fuisse scire mihi Scioppius firmavit (37). - - - The writings of Velsus will be received by the learned with that applause, which his great fame and reputation deserve. But yet I would not insert amongst them the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta, of which Scioppius has often assured me he was the author.' The authority of Scioppius in this case seems to me to be of great weight, for besides that he was generally very well acquainted with all things of this nature, he enjoyed a large share of Velsus's friendship, and kept a very strict epistolary correspondence with him (38). Mr Arnoldus was not ignorant that the author of the book, intitled, The Conspiracy of the Spaniards against the Republic of Venice, attributes the Squittinio to the Marquis of Bedemar; but he hath not rightly chosen the passage of that piece, which most clearly ascribes the Squittinio to the Marquis. His proof is grounded upon these words: The other point was, that in all affairs which he was to negotiate concerning the right and prerogatives of the Republic, he should make use of the Memoirs of the Squittinio della Liberta Veneta, to which the Marquis of Bedemar refers in several places of this instruction, and that in terms which the somewhat modest, yet discover plainly enough his paternal love for this Libel. The Abbot de St Real, author of the Relation of this Conspiracy, saith this in the last page but one; and in the thirty-fifth, thirty-sixth, and thirty-seventh, he had related the history of the Squittinio, and how the Marquis of Bedemar had conceived and executed the design of this work. From whence, and not from the last page save one, Mr Arnoldus ought to have drawn his necessary proofs. But this is a very little fault compared with that which I am going to observe. He pretends that the relator of that conspiracy is very much mistaken, when he supposes that the Marquis of Bedemar, in his instruction to the ambassador, who was to succeed him, very much recommended the reading of the Squittinio. This is false, saith Mr Arnoldus, for the Marquis decried this piece, as a work abounding with falsehoods. The entire passage of the Professor of Nuremberg runs thus: 'Verum quam falsus etiam hic auctor fuerit ex instructione secreta ab Alfonso della Cueva Hispanico apud Venetos legato successoris suo Lud. Bravo data, cuius uni ad oculum statim apparuit, prout Laur. Bank eandem cum Scrutinio evulgavit (39). E porche in tempo mio fu divulgato un libretto intitolato Squittinio della Liberta de Veneziani, oretta veramente degna d'esser letta. Deinde omnem isti derogat fidem, ob multas fallacias veritati inimicas quæ inibi occurrunt, ac vivos magistros mortuis longe præferendos censet. Questo ancora vorrei che si trovasse appresso di lei, scoprendosi per la lettura di quello molte fallacie introdotte da gli historici moderni, che trascurando la pura verità contenuta nelle Chroniche antiche, hanno dato ad intendere à posteri tutto quello che gli è parso à proposito per stabilire la loro liberta. Ne minor profetto sarà che Vostra Eccellenza potrà trarne da libri vivi, che s'hara cavato da Volumi morti: voglio dire che l'informazione à bocca di persone pratiche solite à frequentar la casa nostra, &c. Sed quid pluribus verbis opus est? Mentis acies se ipsam intuens nonnunquam hebetescit. - - - But it is obvious to every one, how much this author was mistaken, about the secret instru-

(33) See the remark [G], of the article BONGARS.

THE Abbot de St Real, unjustly censured.

(39) Bizar. Polit. num. 14, 15, pag. 85, & seq.

tion given by Alphonso della Cueva, the Spanish ambassador at Venice, to his successor Lewis Bravo, as Laur. Bank has published it with the Squittinio. And because in my time a small book was published, intitled, Squittinio della liberta de Veneziani, a piece truly worthy to be read. Afterwards he entirely decries the credit of it, because of the many falsehoods that occur in it, and thinks that living instructors are much preferable to dead ones. I wish your Excellency had this by you, for by reading it you will discover many impostures introduced by modern Historians; who, neglecting the naked truth contained in ancient chronicles, have represented to posterity whatever seemed to them proper to establish their liberty. It will be no less advantageous, if your Excellency can draw from living books, what you have drawn from dead volumes: I mean that an information by word of mouth from skillful persons who used to frequent our house, &c. But what occasion is there for many words? The edge of the mind turning on it's self is sometimes blunted.'

The reflexion contained in these last words, seems to be made only to be turned against it's author; for it is plain that Mr Arnoldus is dazzled with too bright a light. The passage, which he cites out of the instruction, clearly shews that the Squittinio ought to be consulted by the ambassador, because by reading it he might be informed of several impostures of several modern Historians. Therefore far from saying that it is filled with lies, Bedemar recommends it as a corrective of the fallacies of others. What is most blameable in the Abbot de St Real, is, perhaps, that he too warmly engages in the affirmative, in ascribing the Squittinio to Alphonso de la Cueva. This hath occasioned others to declare too decisively on this head (40). He had, indeed, better have suspended his judgment: and we have here an instance which proves that some books which make a great noise, are falsely ascribed to various persons, without ever discovering the true author (41). A French Historian, who wrote, when the Squittinio appeared, makes no scruple to ascribe it to our Velsus, whose name he spells very ill. The second, saith he (42), is a treatise composed by one Valsus, concerning the liberty of Venice.

[F] And afforded helps to several authors.] No body contributed more than he to the large collection of inscriptions, which Gruterus published. See the elogy of Velsus in Gruterus's preface. Melchior Adam gives (43) us a long list of several ancient books, the publication of which was procured by Velsus. Mr Arnoldus enlarges (44) on the detail of the services, which this learned man did to several authors, and doth not forget the two manuscripts of Anastasius, which he sent to the Jesuits of Mentz, after having borrowed them out of the Palatine Library, by the interest of Marquard Freherus. The story of Pope Joan was in those manuscripts. Nor doth he forget to observe that Velsus was security for one thousand Florins, in order to procure for Conrad Ritterhusius a manuscript of the Epistles of Isidorus Pelusiota out of the Duke of Bavaria's library, which could not be obtained but under such security (45). But the generosity of this action would not sufficiently appear, if we did not know that Velsus paid that sum without pretending any obligation from Ritterhusius, for he did not so much as give him notice of it.

[G] He would never suffer himself to be drawn.] We are informed of this in Peiresius's life. There was a great and amicable Epistolary Commerce betwixt these two learned men: but Peiresius could never obtain this friend's picture. He was obliged to have recourse to a stratagem, which he practised more than once: he payed a Painter to watch an opportunity of placing himself in a convenient place, where, unseen, he could easily have a full view of Velsus. 'Hoc uno ipse durus fuit (Velsus) quod sui effigiem constantissime denegavit, pro eo quod omnibus aliis ardentissime flagrantibus denegaverat intuitu. Et Peiresius tamen ut alios nonnullos, sic illum nescientem pingi procuravit, conducto artifice qui ipsius vultum è clandestino loco spectaret. Sic obtinuit quod illi Occo sperare nefas prædixerat, cum id abs Velsus tulisset responsum, Cato major posteros volebat querere cur sibi statua nulla posita: 'hi,

(40) See the Nouv. de la République des Lettres, for May, 1684, 1^{re} 316, of the 2^{de} edition.

(41) See the Catalogue chimérique, pag. 214, of the second edition.

(42) Le Grain, Decade de Louis XIII, livr. x, pag. 449. The author of the Vitez François, printed in the year 1643, says pag. 318, that Valsus published his treatise of the Liberty of Venice.

(43) In Vitis Jurisconsult. pag. 482.

(44) De vita . . . Marci Velsus, pag. 58, & seq.

(45) Georg. Ritterhusius, in Vita Coaradi patris, Salviano præmissa, apud Arnold. pag. 59.

VOL. V. No. CXXXI.

§ X

VELSERUS. VELSIUS.

450

(b) See Sebastus, in the Epistle Dedicatory to Photius, and the remark [A], in the margin.

(c) Eximitor rebus humanis... memoria nominis sui relicta immortalis, perturbationis nonnullis suis facultatibus. Melchior Adam, in Vitis Juris, confult. pag. 481.

(d) Arnold. de Velferi vita, &c. pag. 54.

to him. He died on the 13th of June 1614, and left no children by his marriage. He had several brothers, distinguished as well by their great merit as by their considerable posts (b). See his life prefixed to the new edition of his works, for which we are beholden to the care of Christopher Arnoldus Professor at Nuremberg. An author observes that Velsus left his domestic affairs in an ill posture (c), at which I am not at all surpris'd. When a man consecrates himself as he did to the service of the learned, and a general correspondence with authors, it is extremely difficult for him to avoid expences, and neglecting his private affairs. One Roserius censured him, to whom he did not vouchsafe the honour of an answer. Scaliger and others advis'd him thus to despise his adversary. Cluverius, who censured him in some particulars, deserv'd an answer; but Velsus had been dead a year before Cluverius's book came out (d). Pignori wrote a very good epitaph on him, which is to be seen in the church of the Jacobins at Augsburg, and in John Tonjola's (e) appendix to the Basilea sepulchra retecta continuata (f).

(g) Minister of the Italian church of Basil.

(f) Printed at Basil in the year 1661. That work was begun by John Grefius, and carried as far as the year 1619.

(46) Gassendus, in Vita Peirefci, lib. i, ad ann. 1602, pag. m. 254.

hi contra, quantum video cavendum ne quis aliquando miretur, si non & indignetur, qua ambitione confortio magnorum virorum, quorum imagines se colligere Fabricius ostendit, irreperim (46). . . . This was the only thing in which Velsus was not content; he was so much attached to let him have his picture, as he had constantly denied it to all other persons who earnestly begged it of him. However, Peirefcius found means to have him drawn without his knowledge, as he had some others, by hiring a Painter for that purpose, who, without being seen, had a full view of his face. And thus he obtained what Occo had told him it was in vain to hope for, when he received this answer from Velsus: Cato, the elder, would have posterity to enquire, why a statue had not been erected for him; but I, on the other hand, as far as I can see, must take care that none hereafter may wonder, or perhaps resent, that I should ambitiously intrude myself into the company of great men, of whose pictures Peirefcius designs to make a collection. This shews that Velsus was not more complainant to others than to Mr de Peirefci, and that he very modestly excus'd himself to him. I cannot tell whether the picture of Velsus in the library of Milan, was copied from that drawn for Mr de Peirefci; or whether it was taken by the same stratagem that Mr de Peirefci used: But I know that the picture of this illustrious German was placed in that library. Bosca informs us of this, when he mentions the interview of Olgiati and Velsus. Et quidem nos cum pictam tabulam quae expressam ipsius imaginem refert, in Ambrosiano Museo speculamus, gravitatem eam ex oculis conjicimus, & ex oris ipsius majestate vim literaturae ac consilii in administranda Vindelicorum provincia deprehendimus (47). . . . And indeed when we behold his picture, which is perfectly like him, in the Ambrosian library, we may see gravity in his looks, and discover, by the majesty of his countenance, his great learning and wisdom in governing the province of Augsburg.

(47) Petrus Paulus Bosca, Bibliothecarius ex Sodalitio Sacerdotum oblatorum, de origine & statu Biblioth. Ambrosianae, pag. 21, apud Arnold. pag. 44.

VELSIUS (JUSTUS) in Dutch Welsens was born at the Hague. He received the degree of Doctor of Physic at Louvain in the year 1542, and sometimes gave public lectures in the room of Peter Nannius his good friend, and professor in the college of the three languages. He was suspected of Lutheranism, and fled from Louvain to avoid the Inquisition, and retired to Strasburgh. He wrote a book intituled Κρίσις, five vera Christianae Philosophiae comprobatoris atque amulsi & sophistae per comparisonem Descriptio, which was condemned by the divines of Louvain in the year 1554. Being come to Cologne, and having declared that he had left Strasburgh on account of religion, he was honoured with a professorship in Philosophy, and in Philology (a). The chief of his works is a commentary on the picture of Cebes. He was a man of learning but very inconstant in point of religion [A]. He was successful in the practice of Physic, and excelled in Botanic (b). He is very much praised by Nigidius in some Latin verses, which Paul Frecherus has cited (c), and which shew that he staid but a little time at Marburg, where

(a) Extracted from Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 605, 606.

(b) Merckl. in Lindensio renovato, pag. 727.

(c) Fröh. in Theatro, pag. 1247.

[A] He was a man . . . very inconstant in point of religion.] The fear of the Inquisition made him leave Louvain, where he found he was suspected of Lutheranism, and obliged him to go to Strasburgh, the asylum of Protestants (1). Nevertheless he wrote a book there which was not favourable to them, and the title runs thus: Justi Velfii Hagani in Cebetis Thebani Tabulam Commentariorum Libri sex totius moralis Philosophiae Theaurus. In quibus nonnulla per occasionem tum de Studiorum, Artium, & Scientiarum abusu & corruptela: tum contra ea quae nostra hac aetate in Religione exorta sunt falsa & absurda dogmata, ad Catholicam & orthodoxam veritatis propugnationem & defensionem differuntur. . . . Six books of commentaries on the picture of Cebes the Theban, being a treasure of all moral Philosophy. In which some things are treated occasionally, both concerning the abuse and corruption of studies, arts, and sciences: and against those false and absurd doctrines in religion, which have been broached in our time, in defence of the Catholic and Orthodox truth, by Justus Velfius of the Hague. This work was printed at Lyons in the year 1551, in 4to: the Epistle Dedicatory to Antony Perrenot, Bishop of Arras, is dated at

(1) Deflexit ad Argentinenfes ubi asylum haeretici habebant. Velfius, Bibl. Belgic., pag. 605.

Strasburgh on the first day of the year 1550, and shews that the author very much condemned the new sects. However, what he advanced to attack the Protestants on the doctrine of Justification, did not please the Spanish inquisitors: for they gave notice, in their Index, to read it with caution (2). They put Justus Velsius in the first class of the authors damnatae memoriae, the authors condemned. They desire this censure may be applied to all the works of Velsius, which they permit to be read, and they absolutely and forever condemn his Epistola ad Imperatorem & Electores, & ad Judices terrae, &c. and his Crisis Christianae Philosophiae. Hospinian observes (3), that in the year 1556, Calvin being gone to Francfort for some important reasons, publicly disputed with Justus Velsius on Free will. The divisions of the church of Francfort were the cause of Calvin's journey, as we learn by his letters (4), and by his life (5). It is not to be doubted but that Velsius then lived in the communion of Protestants, but with some peculiar opinions of his own. This is the more probable, as we know he wrote a confession of faith, which was printed, and which is looked upon as a proof of the divisions that reigned among the sects separated from Popery (6).

(2) Index Librorum prohib. pag. 677. (3) Hospius, Hist. Sacrum. Tom. ii, p. 422. (4) Calvin, Epist. occid., &c. (5) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1556. (6) See Broussier, in Defensione Cathol. Trinitatis, pag. 51, 52.

VERDIER

VERDIER (N. Du) Historiographer of France, author of several books [A], which as they are not excellent, are not inferior to several which have supplied their authors with bread. Notwithstanding he had the misfortune not to be able to subsist on the fruits of his pen, tho' very fertile: as I am informed by a very long parenthesis of John Baptiste de Roccolles [B], Historiographer of France, and of Brandenburg, which I have inserted in a remark. We may learn from it at what time Du Verdier lived.

[A] Author of several books.] Besides others, he had published abridgments of the History of England, France, Spain, and of the Turks, &c. The abridgment of the History of France was printed at Paris for the third time, in the year 1655, in two volumes in 12mo.

[B] As I am informed by a very long parenthesis of John Baptiste de Roccolles.] The author whom I cite having related the death of Basila Geduc Acomat, according to the narrative of the Turkish Pandects, extracted from the Italian of the Secretary of Sigismund Malatesta Prince of Rimini, adds, immediately after:

'But poor du Verdier, who wrote in a concise but elegant stile, an abridgment of the History of the Turks, relates it after several others. (I call this celebrated writer poor, because whilst I write this, he and his poor wife are in the hospital of the Salt-Peter-House at Paris, where they have been for seven or eight years past, where I have visited him, and found true what fame had long since divulged concerning his great probity: this made me deplore the fate of several learned men in this flourishing age, in which virtue and merit ought to be more valued.) This author saith, &c (1).

(1) Roccolles, Vie du Sultan Gemes, printed at Leyden in 1683, pag. 132, 133.

VERGERIUS (PETER-PAUL) One of the learned men of the XVth century, was born at Capo d'Istria (a) on the gulph of Venice. He was a good Philosopher, and so happily intermixed polite learning with the Law, that he was esteemed the most eloquent Civilian of his time (b). He learned Greek under Emanuel Chrysolaras at Venice (c), and the Canon Law under Francis de Zabarellis at Florence (d). He was very much respected by Prince Carrari Lord of Padua, who chose him preceptor to his children (e). He was not less considered by the Emperor Sigismund, at whose court in Hungary he died (f), and whom he accompanied to the council of Constance, if I am not mistaken [A]. He wrote several books [B].

(c) Leand. Albert. Descript. Ital. pag. m. 777.

(f) Volaterr. lib. iv, pag. 133.

(b) Jurisconsultorum suo tempore eloquentissimus, five maxia dicere eloquentium Jurisconsultissimus, simul & philosophus fuit. Volaterr. lib. xxi, pag. m. 773. (c) Paul. Jovius, Elog. cap. cxi, pag. m. 254. (d) Panisrolus, de claris Legum Interpret. lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 444.

(1) Andrea Divus, Prefat. in Iliada Homeri a se versam.

(2) Gesner. in Biblioth. fol. 551, vers. 10.

(3) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 553.

(4) Panisrol. de claris Leg. Interpret. lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 444.

(5) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 552.

(6) Gesn. ubi supra, fol. 552.

(7) Jovius, in Elog. cap. cxi, pag. 254.

(8) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 552.

(9) In Prefat. super sua Translat. eorumdem Librorum apud Gesn. ubi supra.

(10) Leand. Albert. in Descript. Ital. pag. 455.

(11) I set down those words with the errors of the press in Albertus.

[A] He had accompanied the Emperor Sigismund to the council of Constance, if I am not mistaken.] I make use of this reserve, because the expressions of those, who inform us that he appeared with a great deal of lustre in that council, claruit in Concilio Constantensi (1), do not prove that he was a domestic to the Emperor. Perhaps the proof he gave of his merit during the holding of that council, determined Sigismund to take him into his service.

[B] He wrote several books.] The History of the Princes of Carrari, and that of the Princes of Mantua. An Elogy of St. Jerom. A treatise de Republica Veneta, printed at Rome in 1526 (2). An Invektive against Malatesta, who caused Virgil's statue at Mantua to be taken down (3). A letter de vita & obitu Francisci Zabarellae Cardinalis Florentini (4). The Life of Petrarch. A treatise de ingenio moribus ac liberalibus studiis, which was printed at Venice in 1502, with some other small tracts of the like nature, cum commentariis Joannis Bonardi Veronensis & aliorum de pauperum educatione opusculis (5), and re-printed at Basil in the year 1541, cum L. Vitruvii Rofcii de docendi studentique modo, & claris pauperum moribus libello (6). This was read in the schools, when Paul Jovius was a young scholar (7). Add to this, that he was the first who translated Arrianus de rebus gestis Alexandri Magni (8). But this version being designed for the use of the Emperor Sigismund, who was not very learned, he therefore made use of very barbarous Latin, as Bartholomew Flaccius observes (9). We may here, by the way, observe a mistake of Leander Albertus; he clearly insinuates that Marius Equicola is the first, who mentioned that Charles Malatesta caused Virgil's statue to be thrown into the river. 'Quamquam, saith he (10). à Mario Equicola in commentariis lingua vernacula de Mantuanis principibus conscriptis injuria hercle carpatur, ac si statum Virgilii poetæ in flumen abjici jussisset: Etenim (11) ipso auctori huic rei Equicolæ fides tribuitur exigua, modice nimirum opinionis scriptori. . . . Tho' he be unjustly censured by

'Marius Equicola in his Italian Memoirs concerning the Princes of Mantua, as if he had ordered the statue of the Poet Virgil to be thrown into the river: for Equicola, who says this, being an author of no esteem, is very little credited.' It is certain that our Vergerio lived before this Equicola.

I desire it may be observed that Vossius, when he wrote his book concerning the Latin Historians, remembered very well, that our Vergerius was author of the invective against Charles Malatesta; but he had forgot it when he composed his treatise of the Latin Poets: for he there declares that he did not know whether this invective was written by Guarini of Verona, or one of his disciples. 'Statuam Mantuae constitutam Maroni ante hos annos ducentos Carolus de Malatestis, tanquam quæ nihil ad religionem Christianam pertineret, deici curavit. Hæcque orationem Manuscriptam adversus Carolum iis temporibus super hoc exaratum, satis sanè acerbam: Et tamen auctor ait, acerbius se scripturum fuisse, si tutum fuisset in eos scribere, qui possent proficere. Nomen auctoris non apponitur: Sed permitta legitur orationibus, libellisque Guarini, ac discipulorum, qui auctore magistro hujusmodi oneris aliquid suscipere solerent. Ut videri possit scripta ab ipso Guarino Veronensi, clarissimo sui temporis viro, vel saltem discipulorum aliquo (12). . . . (13) Vossius, de Charles Malatesta, above two hundred years ago, ordered Virgil's statue, at Mantua, to be taken down, &c. as being a thing foreign to the Christian religion. And I have by me a pretty smart invective in manuscript, which was then written against Malatesta on that account: and yet the author says he would have written more sharply, had it been safe to write against those, who had power to banish. The author's name is not put to it: but it is inserted amongst the orations and tracts of Guarini and his disciples, who, by his order used to undertake something of this nature. So that it may probably have been written by Guarini of Verona, or at least by one of his disciples.'

(12) Vossius, de Poëtis Latin. pag. 27.

(a) Fra-Paolo, Istor. del Concilio, lib. 1, pag. m. 30.

VERGERIUS (PETER-PAUL) of the same city (a) and family with the foregoing (b), flourished in the XVIth century. He studied the Civil Law, and took his degree of Doctor in Law; but he made himself more famous by his embassies, and by ecclesiastical affairs, than by his learning in the Civil Law. He was sent Nuncio into Germany to the King of the Romans (c) by Clement VII, in the year 1530, and had orders to use

(b) See what Andrew Divus tells him, in dedicating to him his Latin translation of the Iliad. You will find his words in Gesner's Bibliotheca, fol. 552, and in Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 553. (c) Ferdinand, brother to the Emperor Charles V.

all possible means to hinder the assembling of a national council. He supported the interest of Popery with a great deal of vigour and address, and opposed the progress of the Lutherans as much as he could. He was re-called by Paul III, who desired to be thoroughly informed of the dispositions of Germany, and was sent thither again in the year 1535, with orders to promise the holding of a council, and with some other instructions. On this head he conferred with several Protestant princes, and with Luther himself at Wittemberg [A]. He gave to the Pope an account of his negotiation the following year, and was immediately ordered to Naples to treat with Charles V. He was raised to the episcopal dignity in the same year 1536 (d), and in conjunction with eight other commissioners he drew up the papal indiction or promulgation of a council. He returned into Germany in the year 1541, to assist at the assembly of Worms: he appeared

(d) Tunc primum factus Episcopus Modrusiensis, ac non multo post Justopolitanus.
Msch. Adam,
ubi infra, pag.
118.

[A] He conferred with Luther himself at Wittemberg. Father Paul and Pallavicini relate this very differently. The first assures us that the Pope ordered Vergerius to treat with Luther, and the chief of his party, and to endeavour to regain them by promises and caresses (1), and

(1) Father Paul, Hist. of the council of Trent, lib. i, p. m. 69.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 70.

deavour to regain them by promises and caresses (1), and treated him very obligingly, according to his orders (2). He recites the discourse the Nuncio made, and Luther's answer. He shews the magnificent promises and most engaging behaviour of the former in his discourse. But Luther's answer is full of an holy contempt of all those advantageous offers: he discovers an admirable firmness and resolution. Pallavicini relates this story in a quite other manner, and accuses Father Paul of having stuffed his history with more lies than Homer had invented concerning the Trojan war. He complains that Father Paul disgraces the Pope by representing him as making such shameful advances, and that he bestows so much piety, wisdom, and greatness of soul on a Heretic. He maintains that Vergerius unexpectedly saw Luther. This Nuncio, faith he, being obliged to pass through Wittemberg, was there very honourably received. The commander of that town waited at his table during his supper, and came to him next morning to do him the same service at his breakfast, bringing with him two doctors, Martin Luther and John Bugenhagen, and telling him that the court and university were both absent (3), and that he could find no other persons but these two, who were able to converse with him in an intelligible language, and keep him company; and he begged of him to converse with them whilst he breakfasted. The Nuncio could not deny it, he found that Luther expressed himself barbarously in Latin; he suffered him to say several things without answering scarce one word, and took him for a very haughty, malicious, and imprudent man, whose manners were very unpolite.

(3) The professors had removed elsewhere by reason of the plague.

Have you heard any thing in Italy, concerning the character I have there of being a drunken German (4)? was one of the questions which Luther asked Vergerius. He said several things of the same nature, which the Nuncio mentioned in his letter to the Pope's secretary, in which he did not forget to describe Luther's habit and manners. This is the substance of Pallavicini's relation (5), which he took from Vergerius's letter written to the Pope's secretary on the 12th of November 1535, and he concludes from hence, that Father Paul is mistaken when he affirms that the Pope gave Vergerius order to make large promises to Martin Luther. This inference is incontestable, and there is no other way left to bring off Father Paul than to prove the falsity of the Nuncio's letter; for if it be owned to be authentic, it plainly appears that the Pope did not order Vergerius to gain Luther by endearing persuasions and hopes of honours; for if he had, Vergerius, by this relation of his discourse with Luther, which he sent in his letter to the Pope's secretary, had rendered himself as ridiculous as any of the most senseless wretches that are shut up in a mad-house.

(c) Pallavicini, ibid. num. 6, § seq.

Perhaps it may be said, that it is at least true that Vergerius held, of his own head, this discourse with Luther, which Father Paul relates, from whence it will naturally follow, that Luther's answer, related by the same author, is not a pure invention. I wish, at least, that Father Paul's fidelity on this last head could be justified; but I cannot see how: for in the first place, according to Father Maimbourg's remark, These fine discourses of Father Paul are not found in the writers of those times; not even in Sleidan, who faith only in one word, that Vergerius saw Luther at Wittemberg (6). In the second place, the curious and indefatigable

(6) Maimbourg, Hist. du Luthérisme, Tom. i, livr. iii, pag. 229, Dutch Edit.

betwixt the Nuncio and Luther, says nothing concerning the Nuncio's promises (7); and this relation being made by a very good friend to Luther, it is not credible that he should forget the most considerable passage in this narration, I mean, the Nuncio's advantageous offers, and the heroic and entirely apostolical contempt of them which Luther shewed. And therefore the silence of the relation, is a demonstrative proof against Father Paul. It ought not to be objected that the author of this relation informs us, that he has omitted several particulars; for since what he relates is less important and honourable than Father Paul's fine discourses, he would doubtless have inserted them into his narrative, rather than any of the rest, if they had really been spoken. He hath not omitted Luther's jesting answer to his Barber, and would he then have forgot an answer more worthy of St Paul than of a Doctor of the XVIth century? Luther, before he made a visit to Vergerius, caused himself to be shaved very early in the morning. At which the Barber was very much surprized. Do not wonder at this, replies the Reformer (8), I have been sent for to talk with the Nuncio of the holy Father, and I would not be seen in a slovenly manner; and shaving will make me appear younger, and I shall the more terrify my adversaries with a fear of my living the longer. The author of the Relation does not forget even this particular. Observe, that this account very plainly insinuates, that this interview was not unexpected on the Nuncio's side, and that it expressly says, that they talked much concerning the holding of a council. From whence we may infer that Vergerius did not write an exact account of all the particulars of this conversation with the Pope's secretary: so that one of Pallavicini's reasons is very weak; he faith, the Nuncio dared not disguise the truth, since the contents of his dialogue with Luther before a whole table full of auditors, might be sent to the Pope by other hands (9). Observe also that Spondanus relates, that Paul III charged his Nuncio, Peter-Paul Vergerius, to treat with Martin Luther in a very engaging manner, and to make him a great many promises (10). Once more, this is inconsistent with the Nuncio's letter, and perhaps we should not be in the wrong to subscribe to the judgment of a Jesuit in this particular. I believe, faith he (11), that the most certain thing that can be said upon this, is, that Father Paul diverted himself at the expense of truth, by making these two persons speak as he pleased, so as to whom, as it appears, he was no enemy.

(7) Sackendorf, Hist. Lutherana, lib. iii, pag. 93.

(8) Jacobus dixit: se ad sanctissimi Patris Nuncium vocatum esse, nec incultum accedere velle; ita fact, ut pro juniori haberetur, & longioris vite metu adversarios terret. Sackendorf, Hist. Lutherana, lib. iii, pag. 95, col. 1.

(9) Pallavicini, ubi supra, num. 10, pag. m. 352.

(10) Spondanus, ad ann. 1535, num. 10.

(11) Maimbourg, ubi supra, pag. 230.

Will it be objected, that the order to tempt Luther by magnificent promises, was a secret whispered in the ear, that only Vergerius and the Pope were acquainted with, and therefore it was not mentioned in the long letter written to the Pope's secretary by Vergerius, which Father Pallavicini cites? This is the last shift of a cavilling man, which may be easily forced; for if this particular instruction of the Nuncio was only whispered in his ear by the Pope; if the Nuncio durst not write any thing to the Pope's secretary, which should hint that his Holiness had given him such an instruction, how came Father Paul by this large account of the Nuncio's offers? Had he seen Vergerius's letters, which were to be read by the Pope only? This is what he should inform us of, and till we know it, we have reason to believe Vergerius's dispatches, that are still in the archives, and to affirm that the Pope burnt all those letters which were written for his perusal only; which is a new reason to ask how they then reached the hands of this Servite at Venice. And when all is said, may we not object to Father Paul the silence of the Relation which Mr Seckendorf found amongst the Wittemberg manuscripts?

[B] This

appeared there as a person employed by the King of France; but this is said to have been only a feint [B], and that he took that character in order to render himself the more serviceable to the court of Rome. He published an oration on the Unity of the Church, chiefly to prove that a particular council ought not to be held. Being returned to Rome, he found that some persons had so far rendered him suspected of Lutheranism, that the Pope hearkening to their calumnies, had given over his design of making him a Cardinal (e). This news threw him into a consternation, and he resolved to justify himself. For this purpose he retired into his own country, and there began a controversial book against the German apostates. He examined their books, he weighed the force of their objections, he attentively considered the ways of refuting them; but this diligent study only served to convince him, that they were in the right. From that time he renounced all hopes of a cardinal's hat, and went to his brother (f), who was Bishop of Pola, to whom he declared the condition he was in; he asked his advice, and without any regard to the compassion he had excited in him, he exhorted him to confute the scripture, and above all with respect to the doctrine of Justification. The Bishop of Pola having followed his counsel, was convinced of the truth of the Protestant doctrine, and agreed with his brother to teach the truth for the future. They executed their design; but the Monks perceiving it, alarmed the Inquisition, and made a great stir about it. One of the Inquisitors prodigiously harassed the citizens of Pola and of Capo d'Istria [C]; inasmuch that our Vergerius, not believing himself safe, retired to Mantua, to Cardinal Hercules de Gonzaga: there he did not long find a secure retreat; for John della Casa, the Pope's

(e) See the remark [D].

(f) John Baptist Vergerius.

[B] This is said to have been only a feint. Sleidan and, after him, Melchior Adam affirm it. 'Erat etiam hoc in conventu (Wormatensi) Petrus Paulus Vergerius, episcopus Justinopolitanus, verbo quidem, tanquam Gallie regis causa, sed revera missus a pontifice, qui suis rebus illum infervere magis posse putabat, si quidem alieno nomine ibi versaretur (12).

(12) Sleidanus, lib. xiii, fol. m. 318, verso.

--- Peter-Paul Vergerius, Bishop of Capo d'Istria, was also present at this assembly of Worms, in the name of the King of France, as it was indeed pretended, but in truth was sent thither by the Pope, who thought he might be more serviceable to him under a foreign character. Father Paul affirms the same thing. The Bishop of Capo d'Istria, saith he (13), was present at this conference, not as the Pope's minister, though really sent by Paul as a man very well versed in the knowledge of that country, but in the name of France, that he might be less suspected by the Germans, and more capable of serving the Pope under a foreign character. He adds, that several persons there made it their business to prolong that affair, to which they were induced by the Nuncio Campegio, and the secret practices of Vergerius. Cardinal Pallavicini, according to his custom, here complains of the malignity of Father Paul; he accuses him of falsely charging the Pope with a spirit of fraud; and to convict him of falsity, he tells us that Vergerio had been long suspected at the court of Rome. Cardinal Alexander's letters had produced this effect; he had informed the Pope that Vergerio spoke disadvantageously of the Holy See, and held correspondence with Luther's disciples. It was believed at Rome, that this Bishop's continuance in Germany was a sign of the venom of heresy which he had swallowed, wherefore they endeavoured to oblige him to residence, and made it a request to the Emperor, that a Prelate so much suspected as he, should be obliged to live far from the Empire, and not assist at the conferences concerning religion. If this be true, we may suppose that he assumed the character of Envoy of France, without any collusion of the Pope. Pallavicini's words and proofs run thus (14). 'Il qual racconto è sì falso, che molto prima il Cardinal Aleandro haveva ammonito segretissimamente il Pontefice, come il Vergerio parlava con poco onore della Sede Apostolica, minacciava contra di essa, e teneva amicizia con Luterani; del che allegò per testimonii il Nunzio Morone, e quel di Venezia. Ed inconformità d'una tale opinione formata di lui, nel quale trasparivano i semi di quelle serpi ch'egli covava nell'animo, e che poi uscirono nelle scritture e nell'azioni: era il senio che havevansi a questo tempo in Roma della sua dimora in Germania: Tantoche gli s'era anch'essibito lo sgravamento della pensione per indurlo alla residenza nel Vescoavato. E tuttocio fè significare il Pontefice all'Imperadore dal Nunzio Poggi, affinche l'autorità Cesareia (quando ciò fosse possibile) il tenesse lungi da quelle Provincie, e da que' trattati. ---

(13) Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, book i, pag. m. 87.

(14) Pallavicini, ubi supra, lib. xiv, cap. xii, num. 11, pag. m. 433, 434. See also ch. xiii, num. iii, of the same book, pag. 635.

Lettera del Card. Aleandro al Cervino, a 12 di Marzo 1539, della quale il Cervino accusa la ricevuta in una all'Alessandri sotto i 23 dell'istesso.

Lettera del Card. Farnese al Poggi dell'ultimo di Febbraio 1541.

This account is so false, that Cardinal Alexander had long before privately acquainted the Pope, that Vergerio spoke dishonourably of the Apostolic see, threw out measures against it, and maintained a friendship with the Lutherans: for which he alleged the testimonies of the Nuncio Morone, and of the Nuncio to Venice. Accordingly it was believed at Rome, that his continuance in Germany manifested the seeds of that poison which were sown in his mind, and afterwards sprung forth in his writings and actions: so that the taking away of the pension was intimated to him, in order to induce him to reside in his bishopric. And moreover the Pope ordered the Nuncio Poggi to desire the Emperor to use his authority (as soon as possible) to keep him at a distance from the empire, and from such conferences. Observe that the Cardinal doth not deny what Father Paul says concerning Vergerio's conduct: he doth not deny the artifices of this minister of the King of France, which were so conformed to the court of Rome. He saith nothing on that head, but tells us that Vergerio was a man of a lively and bold genius, and of the humour of certain persons who cannot live without being in the management of public business, and who fancy that it cannot be carried on without them. Uomo quanto vivace, tanto audace, e frà la condizione di coloro che nè possono vivere senza maneggiar negozii, nè pensano che i negozii possano maneggiarsi senza di loro (15). As for the rest, what Sleidan saith, that Vergerio at his return from the Diet of Worms, had been created Cardinal, if some persons had not altered the Pope's mind, he calls (16) it a fable, and maintains that in 1539 the Pope was displeased with that bishop.

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) Idem, lib. vi, cap. xiii, num. 3.

[C] One of the Inquisitors prodigiously harassed the citizens of Pola, and of Capo d'Istria. We can never too often represent the villany and injustice annexed to the profession of Inquisitor. Wherefore I shall here give a short account of that man's conduct, who exercised that office in the dioceses of the two Vergerio's. His name was Annibal Grison. He entered the houses of the inhabitants to search for suspicious books; he excommunicated those who did not detect the persons that appeared to them suspected of Lutheranism; he promised to mitigate the punishment of those who should renounce their heresy, and apply to him to ask pardon; but he threatened those with fire, who did not prevent their accusers by an humble confession of their crime. He denounced his threats from door to door, and spread terror every where. Some accused themselves: he severely censured those, who had read the Bible in the vulgar language, and forbade their continuance in that crime. Soon after nothing was seen but accusations, every one engaged in them without regard to the laws of confanguinity or gratitude. The wife did not spare her husband, the son his father, nor the client his patron; several persons were brought into trouble for trifles, such, for example, who had only ventured to speak against the bigotry of others

Ingster
vile

V O L . V .

5 Y

Pope's legate at Venice, made so many instances to the Cardinal, to oblige him to rid himself of such a guest, that Vergerius found it very proper to leave Mantua. He went to Trent in order to purge himself before the council [D]. The Pope would very willingly have seized him, but being loth to give occasion to any complaints that the assembly was not free, he wrote to his legates to forbid this Bishop taking his place there, and that they should order him to depart. Some reasons that were given for that prohibition are pitiful [E]. Vergerius retired to Venice, where he took care not to conform

to

others. Deinde promiscua multitudo, timore percussis animis, deserebant quosque certatim, nulla neque propinquitatis neque necessitudinis aut beneficiorum habita ratione: non parenti filius, non uxor marito, non cliens patrono parcebat. Delationes autem erant plerumque de rebus frivolis; ut quisque forte aliquid ob superstitionem in aliquo reprehenderat (17). On a solemn day this Inquisitor celebrated Mass in the cathedral of Capo d'Istria, and told the people: of late years you have lain under many calamities; your olive-trees as well as your corn-fields and vineyards have been barren; your cattle have been afflicted with distempers. Your Bishop and other Heretics have exposed you to these evils. Do not expect any relief, unless you suppress those Heretics, and what have you now to do but to fall upon and stone them immediately? Hoc tempore, & hinc aliquot annis, multæ vos premunt calamitates: quæ nunc oleas, nunc segetes, modò vineas, modò pecudes, aliisque facultates graviter affligunt: his verò malis causam præbet Episcopus vester & hæreticorum turba reliqua: nec est quod levationem ullam speretis, nisi coercantur: proximum autem est, ut impetu facto lapidentur (18). You will find all this in Sleidan's History (19). Observe, that Vergerius had so much prudence as not to trust himself to the mercy of a populace thus animated by a furious persecutor. He made his escape, as Father Paul observes, from the fury of the people of his diocese, which the Inquisitor Hannibal Grison had irritated against him by charging him with being a Lutheran, and the cause of the sterility of the earth (20). I cannot tell whether this Hannibal had ever read the writings of the Fathers, wherein we find the ridiculous reproaches of the Pagans, that the followers of JESUS CHRIST were the cause of all the calamities which befel the people (21). I do not know whether he had read this excellent passage of Tertulian: 'At è contrario illis nomen factionis accommodandum est, qui in odium bonorum & proborum conspirant, qui adversum sanguinem innocentium clamant, prætexentes sanè ad odii defensionem, illam quoque vanitatem, quod existiment omnis publicæ cladis, omnis popularis incommodi Christianos esse causam. Si Tyberis ascendit in mœnia, si Nilus non ascendit in arva, si cælum stetit, si terra movit, si fames, si lues, statim Christianos ad leonem (22). . . . But, on the contrary, the name of faction ought to be given to those who concur in their enmity against good and upright men, and thirst for the blood of the innocent: alledging foolishly in their own vindication, that the Christians are the cause of all public calamities, and of every public misfortune. If the Tyber overflows its banks, or the Nile does not cover the lands, if there is a drought, an earthquake, famine or pestilence, the Christians must immediately be thrown to the lions.' But I am persuaded that though the Inquisitor had perfectly known all this, it would not have hindered him from saying, when provisions were dear, or there was a mortality amongst the cattle, that the Heretics were the cause of it. Such a man consults his false zeal more than reason, and consequently may very well be so blind as not to see the absurdity of casting the same reproaches on Lutheranism which the Pagans did upon the primitive Christians, and which all Protestants may return on Papists in the countries where they are strongest. But which is more, though such a man had been sensible of this absurdity, yet he was bad enough to have used it, because he thought nothing would enrage the people against the Lutherans, and make them stone them more than this. Is it astonishing that a Monk should use this contrivance? Do not we see that as soon as the Christians were able to persecute, they reproached the Heathens with the same things which the Heathens had imputed to them, that is to say, with being the cause that they had not good crops, and that the seasons changed their natural course. I do not cite a private inconsiderable author to prove this, but a very authentic piece and imperial authority. Read what follows, 'An diutius perferimus mutari temporum vices, iratâ cœli temperie? quæ, Paganorum exacerbata perfidia, nescit naturæ libramenta servare. Unde enim ver solitam gratiam abjuravit? unde æstas messe jejuna, laboriosum Agricolam in spe destituit aristarum? unde hyemis intemperata ferocitas, ubertatem terrarum penetrabili frigore sterilitatis læsione damnavit? nisi quod ad impietatis vindictam transit lege suâ naturæ decretum (23). . . . Shall we any longer suffer the seasons to be inverted; or the course of nature changed through the perfidy of Pagans? Whence is it that the spring denies its usual delights? that the summer deprives the laborious husbandman of his expected crop? or that the rigorous winter by its penetrating cold destroys the fruitfulness of the earth? but because nature, to be revenged on impiety, departs from its common course.' Mr Van Dale hath made some very good reflexions on this head (24). When we consider these preposterous judgments, it is not easy to refrain from saying that there are certain faults which cling fast to sects, not as they are sects, but as they are predominant. Hence it is that the same communions alter their sentiments and maxims, as they acquire or lose superiority. The maxim, new honours new manners, holds very true here, and we may very well invert the sense of that of Cornelius Nepos (25), without falsifying it.

[D] He went to Trent in order to purge himself before the council. Melchior Adam ought to be blamed for not mentioning the year in which Vergerio went to Trent. He hath taken from Sleidan all that he hath said concerning the conversion of this bishop; but though that author successively relates these things under the year 1548, we ought not to believe that Vergerio was at Trent in that year. He was there according to Father Paul in 1546. 'He believed that the most honourable and commodious way of justifying himself was at the council. But the Legates would not admit him into the congregation, because he had not cleared himself to the Pope, to whom they earnestly pressed him to go; and if they had not been afraid of raising a report against the liberty of the council, they had not contented themselves with bare exhortations. So that Vergerio, after some days stay, departed from Trent, intending to return to his bishopric, where he hoped the troubles were appeased. But when he was at Venice, the Nuncio forbade his return thither, having received orders from Rome to prosecute him, which obliged him to quit Italy within a few months, either induced to it by resentment, or fear, or some other motive (26). I cite this passage, as well because it contains some facts not touched on by Sleidan, as because Father Paul's Chronology wants a little correction. What he tells us of Vergerio's leaving Italy in 1546 is not true. He did not quit that country till after having seen the miserable end of Spira at Padua, who died in 1548 (27). If we will add to this Pallavicini's censures, we must say that Vergerio finding himself cited at Rome, where he had been accused as suspected of heresy, went to Trent (28), where he expected a safe refuge, and hoped to enjoy his right of sitting amongst the Bishops as judge of that faith which he was charged with having deserted. But being excluded from this right, he obtained, by the intercession of the Legates, a dispensation from appearing at Rome; and his case was committed to the Nuncio and Patriarch of Venice, according to his request: but being sensible that he could not justify himself, he retired to the Protestants.

[E] Some reasons that were given for that prohibition are pitiful. Vergerius intending to retire from the council,

(17) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. Exter. pag. 119.

(18) Id. ibid. ex Sleidano, ubi infra.

(19) Sleidan, livr. xxi, fol. m. 589, ad ann. 1548.

(20) Fra-Paolo, ubi supra, lib. ii, pag. 141.

(21) See Origin contra Celsum, lib. iii, & in Mathæum, cap. xxiv; Arnobius, lib. i; St Cyprian, lib. ad Demetrianum, and among his letters the laxus; Orosius, lib. vii, cap. xxxvii; St Augustin, de Civit. Dei, passim; &c.

(22) Tertul. Apologet. cap. xl.

(23) Novella III Theodori de Judæis, Samaritanis, & Hæreticis.

(24) Van Dale, de Oraculis, pag. 21, 22.

(25) He says Sicut mores leguntur fortunam. . . . A man's manners make his fortune. See, above, citation (50), of the article TIMOLEON. But it may be said with much reason, that corrupt mores. . . . A man's fortune makes his manners.

John della Cui, Archbishop of Benevento, who was Secretary of State under Paul IV.

(26) Fra-Paolo, ubi supra, pag. 141.

(27) Sleidan, lib. xxi, fol. m. 588.

(28) Pallavicini, lib. del Concilio, lib. vi, cap. xxi, nam. m. He quotes the letter written by the Legates to Cardinal Grison, the 27th of February 1546, and to Cardinal Farnez, the 28th, and the 1st of March 1546.

Spira

to the desires of John della Casa, who advised him to go to Rome. A few days after he was forbid in the Pope's name to return to his bishopric. He went to Padua, and there became a witness of the deplorable death of Francis Spira. This example of despair, to which those expose themselves, who hold the truth in unrighteousness, made him resolve to undergo a voluntary exile, that he might be thereby enabled to make an open profession of the pure religion. He went to the Grisons, and was a minister amongst them for some years, as well as in the Valteline: after which, he was invited to Tubingen by the Duke of Wirtemberg, where he died on the 4th of October 1565. He published several books which proved very prejudicial to the Romish communion [F]. Before

(19) He was one of the Legates, and afterwards Pope Marcellus II.

(20) Crepin, État de l'Eglise, pag. m. 570.

(31) Chemnitius, Exam. Concilii Trident. Part. iii., pag. 576, Edit. Francf. 1609, in fol.

(32) Crepin, ubi supra, pag. 569.

(33) Ibid.

(34) Note, that several of them were only Italian translations.

(35) Here is a pseudonymous work not mentioned by Placcius. Mr Baillet in his list of pseudonymous writers, pulls off this mask as well as that of Athanasius, under which Vergerio appeared sometimes.

(36) This book was translated out of Italian into French in the year 1556, by PAUL VERGERIUS, the author's nephew.

council, went to Cervinus (29), and asked him for what reasons he was rejected out of the company of the other Bishops in the council. Cervinus then answered: because I have heard that you denied the truth of the Legends of St George and St Christopher. It is true, replied Vergerio, I did, and do yet deny them; but I ground that denial on the authority of Pope Paul III, who commanded them both to be left out of the Breviary. And in the Preface to that book, he saith that he had commanded that all those Legends should be left out which are not true. Cervinus being at a stand, could think of no other answer than this: those persons ought not to pass for good men, who seem to agree with the Lutherans in any particular whatsoever, and therefore do you retire from our council (30). Those who believe it utterly improbable, that Vergerio's despising those Legends could be the only reason which the Legate urged, will be at least satisfied with the Historian, when he owns that at last the Legate quitted that reason and alledged another. But they will never pardon Chemnitius for saying, That Vergerius ran the risque of his life by venturing to declare, that he did not approve all that was contained in the Legend of St George. 'Nota est Vergerii historia, qui cum in Tridentina synodo Georgii legendam, quam Gelasius distinctio. 15. diserte auctoribus hæreticis tribuit, sibi non per omnia probari ostenderet, in discrimen dignitatis, imo vitæ & capitis adductus fuit (31). -- The story of Vergerius is well known, who having declared at the Council of Trent that he did not approve all that was contained in the Legend of St George, which Pope Gelasius expressly ascribes to heretical authors, ran the risque not only of his dignity but of his life.' It must be allowed that this account is not exact, and that at least there plainly appears in it the sophism 'à non sufficienti enumeratione partium. -- A defective enumeration of parts.' He reduces several reasons to that, which in all likelihood was looked upon as the most inconsiderable.

What I am going to say is not one of the circumstances which concern the text of this remark. Crepinus affirms (32), that several Bishops being informed that Cervinus, contrary to the opinion of his two colleagues and of some cardinals, persisted in his refusal to admit Vergerius into the council, resolved to write upon it to the Pope: 'Jerom Vida of Cremona, Bishop of Alba, an excellent Poet, had already drawn up the letters as well in the name of himself as of others (33), but this Legate's severe advertisement hindered his sending them to the Pope.

[F] He published several books which proved very prejudicial to the Romish communion. As he was well acquainted with the intrigues carried on in Italy, and the most secret abuses committed in that country, he was better able than another to render Popery odious. Besides he scarce wrote any but small tracts, which could easily be dispersed throughout Europe, and chose such subjects as were susceptible of a particular turn which very sensibly touched the readers. You will find in the catalogue of his writings (34), Relatio de persecutione facta contra Evangelium in urbe Justinopolitana. Contra librum cui nomen Flosculi sancti Francisci. Contra librum cui titulus Rosarium. Contra librum cui titulus Miracula Virginis. De libro cui titulus Lux fidei. De libro cui titulus Flosculi Biblie. De statu ac imaginibus. De coronatione Julii Papæ III. Quid sperandum ex papatu Julii III. De literis Ottonis Cardinalis Augustani scriptis de creatione Julii III. Quatuor Literæ sub nomine Bonini de Boninis (35). De statu Romanæ Curie. De nugis & fabulis Papæ Gregorii I. De Idolo Laurentiano (36). Scholæ in orationem Cardinalis Poli ad Cæsarem qua illum ad arma contra eos qui Evangelio nomen dederunt, instigat. Nova editio libri Cæremoniarum Romanæ Ecclesiæ cum præfatione & scholæ.

liis. Quot modis vir pius qui in Italia degat sepe Deum & Christum negare compellitur. I omit several others, whose titles may be found in the epitome of Gelfner, and in Verheiden (37); but I shall take notice of that piece of his intitled, Epitome libri cui titulus, Anatomia Missæ ab Antonio de Adamo. I never saw this abridgment of the anatomy of the Mass, and cannot tell whether those who mention it, write well the name of the author of this anatomy; for I find in the Latin edition of this work, that the author's name was Antonius ab Æda. A passage in the Preface runs thus: 'Quoniam igitur Anatomie cognitio non solum medicis chirurgisque, verum etiam aliis summo opere commendatur: eam ob causam, Anthonium ab Ædam Italum imitatus, hanc missæ ac missalis Anatomiam Gallicè, ut ab omnibus percipi posset facilius, in lucem edere statui. -- Since therefore the knowledge of Anatomy is very much recommended not only to Physicians and Surgeons, but also to others: for that reason, in imitation of Antonius ab Æda, an Italian author, I resolved to publish this Anatomy of the Mass and Missal in French, that it might be the more easily understood by all.' These words inform us that this piece was first published in Italian and then in French. It was translated into Latin in the year 1561. The title of the Latin version is: Missæ ac Missalis Anatomia. Hoc est dilucida ac familiaris ad minutissimas usque particulas Missæ ac Missalis enucleatio. Nunc primum (ut ea res prioris fidei cultoribus scitu necessaria, ad alias quoque nationes deveniret) è Gallica lingua Latine versa anno Domini M. D. LXXI. This book contains one hundred and seventy-two pages in octavo, besides an errata of fifteen pages. The place where it was printed is not expressed. The person who made the errata says that a very urgent occasion obliged him to it. It was, saith he, to prevent the artifices of the devil; for he supposes that Satan, to ruin the effects of this book, had made use of two very malicious frauds; the first of which was before, the second during the time of the impression. The first was, that the manuscript was thrown into the mire, and reduced to a miserable state. The second was, that the Printers committed a great many faults. So that to defeat this double machination of Satan, he was obliged to revise the work very carefully, and to make a long list of the errors of the Press. I know very well that some may suspect me of imposing on my readers; wherefore I cannot help citing part of the prologue to the errata. 'Maledictus Sathan, ut totam Missæ (excecrandæ filiæ suæ) Tragœdiam in hoc instituit, & gubernavit hætenus, quò Christi meritum prorsus in hominum pectoribus extingueret, ac mendaciorum tenebras pro veritatis luce obtruderet: ita jam quoque, dum hic ipse libellus excuderetur, rursus artes suas egregiè adhibuisse videtur, dum tot eum mendis conspurcari (ut multis in locis non modò nullam sententiam, sed inversam plane colligere liceat) curavit, quò ejus lectionem vel prorsus è manibus piorum excuteret: vel mendarum tedio ita lecturos afficeret, ut ad finem usque lectionem deducere non nisi summa cum nausea possent. Idem verò etiam antea quam ad Typographum libellus perveniret, alia via aggressus, eum in lacunam alicubi projectum ita decurparat, ut non paucis foliis in itinere, antequam afferretur, ex cæno ac humore illo jam corruptis ac putridis, scriptura etiam passim ita oblitterata fuerit, ita multis in locis lacerata omnia, ut non modo non legi restet, sed ne aperiri quidem alicubi absque detrimento, ac solia à se mutuo separari poterint. Huic itaque Sathanæ fraudulentie occurrere studens, libellum jam typis absolutum denuò percurrere, atque errata, quamlibet multa, tamen ea (nam in nullo unquam libro, vel centuplo hoc quidem majore, tot esse unquam commissæ puto) hic subnotare, quo cuivis lectionem sibi, (37) Verheiden, in Effigies præstant. aliquot Viros, pag. 154, 155.

Before he left Italy he lost his brother, who died by poison, as was suspected (g). The account I have given, and which I have extracted from Melchior Adam, is defective in many

(g) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theologorum Exterorum, pag. 116, & seq.

libi emendare in promptu esset, operæ pretium duxi. --- As that accursed spirit Satan first framed, and has hitherto managed the whole Tragedy of the MASS (his execrable daughter) that he might utterly extinguish the merit of CHRIST in the hearts of men, and obtrude the darkness of lies for the light of the truth: so likewise during the impression of this book, he seems again to have employed his arts, in contriving to have it stuffed with errors (for in many places it is not only unintelligible, but the sense is plainly perverted) that pious persons might be entirely disgusted from reading it, or else quite tired out before they get through it. And even before this treatise was brought to the Printer, the same evil spirit made use of another stratagem; for he so ordered it that the manuscript fell into the mire, by which means not a few of the leaves were marred and spoiled, the writing was often defaced, and many places so torn that it could not be read well, nor could it even be opened or the leaves separated from one another without damage: and therefore to defeat the fraudulent intention of the devil, I thought fit to revise the book after it was printed, and for the benefit of the reader to subjoin an Errata, though numerous, and indeed I believe there never was a book, though an hundred times bigger than this, so full of faults. Observe that the Corrector hath stumbled at the very threshold, for he reckons the first fault to be the word Gallicè in the passage of the Preface cited above. He would have it read Latine; his correction is ill grounded: is it not indisputable that a person who translates a Preface into Latin, in which it is said, for good reason a French translation was made, ought to make use of the word Gallicè, and not Latine? See however the remark [2]. We must also observe that du Moulin, who called one of his books the Anatomy of the Mass, is not the inventor of that title. Nor by the way did he invent that of the Buckler of Faith; for I have a book printed at Avignon by Francis Tachet 1549 (38), and intitled the Buckler of Faith, by way of dialogue, extracted from the holy Scripture, the holy Fathers, and most ancient Doctors of the Church. Of which, Nicolas Grenier, Canon of St Victor, is the author.

(38) This is not the first edition, for it is said in the title, that the book was revised and enlarged by the author. La Croix du Maine mentions only the edition in 2 volumes, which came out at Paris in 1566, and 1567. It is true that a little after he says that the second volume was printed in 1565. This is not very exact.

(39) Thuanus, lib. xxviii, pag. m. 570, col. 2, ad ann. 1561.

(40) Thuanus is mistaken in that: Vergerius had professed himself a Protestant above twelve years before.

(41) Spondanus, ad ann. 1545, num. 13.

made all the acts of the Council of Trent, the subjects of his sermons: he diligently collected all the disputations of that assembly; he communicated them to other ministers; he wrote books concerning them, and dispersed his calumnies on the whole conduct of the council (42). I am surprized not to find in the Epitome of Gesner, what Vergerius wrote against his countryman and violent persecutor Mutius. I find only, ad Papam Julium III qui librum Mutii approbavit. This Mutius was an assistant to Annibal Grifon in the function of Inquisitor at Capo d'Istria, and published an invective against our Prelate. 'Huic (Annibaldi Grifonio) adjunctus Hieronymus Mutius qui & Vergerianam scripsit investivam postea, nec id modo, sed evulgato quoque libello Germaniam, odio religionis, maledicentissime tradidit (43). --- (44) Sleidanus, lib. xxi, fol. 359r. To this Annibal Grifon was associated Jerom Mutius, who afterwards wrote an invective against Vergerius, and likewise published a book wherein he maliciously traduces Germany out of hatred to the Protestant religion.' But the following words seem to hint that Vergerius and Mutius wrote letters against each other: 'Finalmente accorgendosi il Vergerio ch'el suo delitto non haveva difesa, si ricoverò fra Grigioni eretici, e di là mandò fuori contra la Religione, contra il Concilio, e contra'l Papa libri tanto indotti quanto audaci; e che non piaceranno se non a que' palati sì pravi che con essi il fele, come già la manna, fa ufficio di tutti i più delicati sapori. Ed intorno à quest' huomo ed alle sue azioni basti di leggere oltre agli altri le Vergeriane e le lettere cattoliche del Muzio suo compatriota (44). --- At last Vergerius perceiving he could not justify himself, retired to the heretical Grifons, and there put out books both unlearned and impudent against religion, the Council 656, and the Pope: and which pleased none but people of a depraved taste, to whom gall, as manna was formerly, is of all things the most delicious. With regard to this man and his actions, you may read the letters of Vergerius and of his Catholic countryman Mutius.' I have given this whole passage of Pallavicini, to shew that I had reason to say that Vergerius's works cruelly galled the court of Rome and its devotees. They affected to speak of them with contempt and to represent them as performances wherein confidence, passion, and ignorance were notorious. This affectation is not disadvantageous to his works. See Stanislaus Hosius's Epistle Dedicatory of the Propagatio verae, Christianae, Catholicæque doctrinæ (45). Our Vergerius is there treated very violently; Hosius, among other things, complains that he had the assurance to dedicate a book of Brentius to his Polish Majesty, and to challenge Lipomannus (46) to a disputation on all the doctrines contained in that book, which disputation should be decided by that monarch. This is not all, he complains of some tracts which he had dispersed amongst the people, during the last diet at Warsaw, Tracts, faith he, full of impudence and fallacies: 'Ego verò, quod illius tam eminent, tamque projecta est audacia, minus miror, quem & frontem pridem omnem perdidisse, & ab omni Dei metu prorsus remotum esse, vel ea sola scripta satis indicant, quæ in proximis hinc Varshaviensibus Comitibus in vulgus spargi curavit. Illud non possum non mirari, quod inveniuntur nihilominus, qui non sine quadam animorum assensione commenta legant ejus hominis: qui sic ad omnem levitatem incubuisse videtur, nihil ut caverit diligentius, quam ne quid usquam veri scriberet (47). --- But I the less wonder at his matchless impudence, since those writings alone which he dispersed among the people, during the last Diet at Warsaw, sufficiently shew that he had long before lost all shame, and had no fear of GOD. And I cannot but wonder how some people can read his forgeries with a kind of approbation: for he seems to have been so much given to lying, that his greatest care was to exclude all truth from his writings.' Add to this the passage I shall cite below (48) from Cardinal Pallavicini.

I conclude with a reflexion which seems to me to deserve a place here. I am certain that in Vergerio's time

(42) Adis Concilii omnibus detrahens. Id. 3.

(43) Sleidanus, lib. xxi, fol. 359r.

(44) Pallavicini, lib. xxi, fol. 359r.

(45) It is dated the 15th of October 1557.

(46) He was then Nuncio in Poland.

(47) Hosius in Epist. dedicat. ad Sigismundum Augustum Polon. Regem.

(48) In the remark [K].

many particulars. We do not find there the service which Vergerius did to Henry II [G] nor his conferences in Alfatia with the Apostolical Nuncio [H]. We are not informed by it that he bought a collection of reliques for an Elector of Saxony [I], &c. He was the cause that the Capitolo del Forno (b) exposed its author to many invectives, which obliged time few books were read more than his. They were very satirical, they contained a vast many personal particularities which easily passed for true, because it was very well known what opportunity he had to be thoroughly informed of them, having been so long engaged in public employments by the court of Rome. Yet these pieces so much esteemed when new, could not maintain their reputation. They were favourites with whom fortune did not long continue, they quickly lost their credit, and became so neglected, that scarce any books are at present harder to find. We scarce meet with one piece of Vergerius in the catalogues of the most numerous libraries. It was in vain that an edition of his works was published at Tübingen in 1563 (49). So many small tracts reduced into one volume, are not less lost than if they had continued in their former dispersed condition: scarce any of them more sensibly affects my curiosity than his critic on Leander Alberti (50), and on the letters of Claudius Ptolemaeus (51).

(b) See the remark [M].

(49) It is in quarto. See Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 601, col. 2.

(50) In Gessner's epitome the title is contra Leandrum Albertum Monachum Dominicanum, et jamque mendacia quae ille scripsit in libro cui titulus, Descriptio Italiae.

(51) The title is De Epistolis Italicae scriptis à Claudio Ptolemaeo.

(52) Fra-Paolo, ubi supra, lib. iv, pag. 327, ad ann. 1551.

† He was then minister in the country of the Grisons: he turned Protestant because he had missed a cardinal's hat.

† Thuanus speaks of it in the 8th book of his History, Ann. 1561. Mr. Amelot is mistaken for the book mentioned by Thuanus, was written against the indication of the council in the time of Pius IV. I have quoted his words above, citat. (39). Father Paul mentions that book of Vergerius in the fifth book, pag. m. 419.

(53) Spondanus, ad ann. 1551, num. 18, pag. 537.

Princes

[G] The service which Vergerius did to Henry II. Before I come to the proof, I shall cite a passage of Father Paul (52). 'The Pope by his letter invited the Catholic Swiss to come to the council . . . and Jerom Franco, his Nuncio, incessantly solicited them on his part, and made pressing instances, which were supported by the good offices of the Emperor. But the most Christian King dissuaded them by his ambassador Morlot; and Paul Vergerio † perfectly acquainted with the secrets and artifices of the court of Rome, gave that minister so good instructions, besides the book he wrote on that subject †, that at the Diet then held at Baden, the Catholic and Evangelic Cantons unanimously resolved, not to send any person to Trent: And the Grisons suffering themselves to be persuaded by Vergerio, that the Pope was contriving something against them, recalled Thomas Plante, Bishop of Coire.' These words do not prove that the King of France employed Vergerius: Ambassadors frequently conceal from their masters the name and character of those persons whose assistance or advice they make use of; so that it may be pretended, that Morlot made use of Vergerio without ever mentioning any thing of it to Henry II. But an Annalist, a French Bishop, owns that that Prince was well informed of Vergerius's intrigues, and made use of his assistance to obtain his ends, which were to vex the Pope and the Emperor. 'Rex . . . ut Pontifici & Caesari agere faceret, cum Helvetiis, quos Pontifex hortatus fuerat ad Synodum suos dirigere legatos, egit ne tam Catholici quam Sacramentarii, nec item Rheti mitterent, & qui jam missi fuissent revocarentur: in his, quod turpis fuit, industria usus Petri-Pauli Vergerii Episcopi olim Justinopolitani, qui ad haereticos delapsus inter Rhetos agebat (53). . . . The King . . . in order to vex the Pope and the Emperor, treated with the Swiss, whom the Pope had invited to come to the council, that neither the Catholic nor Protestant Cantons, nor likewise the Grisons might send any, and that those who had been already sent might be recalled: and, which is more scandalous, to obtain those ends he made use of the assistance of Peter-Paul Vergerius formerly Bishop of Capo d'Istria, who revolting to the Heretics then lived in the country of the Grisons.' Spondanus justly says that it was very scandalous for Henry II to employ a Protestant minister, who had formerly been a bishop. If Vergerius had been in France, that Prince would have caused him to be burnt, and yet he caresses him in a foreign country, employs him against the Pope, and makes use of his craft and artifice to overthrow the council, and probably rewards him for all these good actions. Doth not this plainly discover the genius of sovereign Princes? Their conduct towards Heretics is not of a piece, they persecute them in one place, and encourage them in another. Their conduct is void of all principles, or rather is uniformly directed by the maxim, that all things ought to be sacrificed to the temporal glory of the state, which requires that a jealous neighbour should be crossed by all possible means, on all occasions.

V. O. L. V.

[H] His conferences in Alfatia with the Apostolical Nuncio.] This happened in the year 1561. He was then in the Duchy of Wirtemberg: he first spoke with the Nuncio Delfino at Zabara (54), and afterwards at Strasburgh, and the neighbouring places, sometimes alone, and at other times in company with John Sturmius: when he was with the Nuncio alone he talked more freely (55), but when in company with Sturmius, he was very reserved both in the choice and turn of his words. On the one side he discovered an ardent desire to return into Italy, and on the other he broke out into slanders against those who had persecuted him, and even against the Pope himself. He chiefly accused John della Casa of having forced him to turn Protestant. The Nuncio exhorted him to reunite himself to the Church, and to recommend himself to the Legates (56) his old patrons. Vergerius acknowledged his infinite obligations to them, but utterly rejected the proposal of making a recantation. He wrote two letters to the Cardinal of Mantua, one of the Legates, and gave them to the Nuncio Delfino, who sent them to Rome before they were transmitted to the Cardinal. In these Vergerius testified a great zeal for his country, and for the peace of the Church; he offered his endeavours towards this great work, and said he might give some advantageous overtures if he could speak with that Legate. He did not shew any design of repenting of his errors, he only requested a safe conduct both from the council, and his Imperial Majesty. The Nuncio passionately desired the recovery of this lost sheep. He believed that in all Germany, there were not two persons whose conversion was of so great importance as that of Vergerius. Not but that he took him to be an ignorant man, but because he found his pen very pernicious to the Holy See. 'Il Delfino era cupidissimo di ricuperarlo: imperòche quantunque, secondo ch'egli scriveva; il Vergerio niente affatto sapeffe; onde mentr'era soggiornato in Elvezia haveva solo spesa l'industria nel trasportare i libri eretici in Italiano; ciò non ostante riputava, in tutta Alemagna non esser due Teste il cui acquisto fosse stato di pregio uguale à quel di costui: tanto riusciva la sua penna à diservigio della Sede Apostolica per una certa sua eloquenza popolare, e audacemente maledica de' più invidiati Perlonaggi (57). . . . Delfino was very desirous to regain him: for though, as he said, Vergerius was grossly ignorant, and therefore unable to live in Switzerland spent his time only in translating heretical books into Italian: yet he believed there were not two persons in all Germany, whose conversion would be equivalent to that of Vergerius: so successful was his pen against the Holy See, on account of a certain popular eloquence he employed in slandering the most eminent men.' The Cardinal of Mantua, to whom the Pope absolutely referred the management of this intrigue, did not think it proper to answer Vergerius. He thought that a letter from a Legate would render Vergerius too vain, and that he would make use of it to persuade the Protestants, that he was esteemed in the Church of Rome as a person of great merit, whose conversion they were willing to purchase with a large reward. The Cardinal cautioned the Nuncio to have a particular regard to this: Such an advice was necessary, for the Nuncio had made use of Vergerius's ambition in order to gain him by the offer of a glorious recompence. The Pope was extraordinary well pleased with this conduct of the Legate. The Nuncio at last declared that Vergerius's impudence and arrogance increased daily, and he received orders to see him no more. The Legate would have had Vergerius come to the Council of Trent, not alone, but accompanied by John Sturmius, and Jerom Zanchius, and that new expedients should be taken by their means to confer with the Sectaries; but the Pope disapproved all those proposals. This is what I find in the Historian here cited (58).

(54) So it is in Pallavicini: perhaps it should be Zaberna, Savenna.

(55) Take notice that all this is extracted out of Pallavicini.

(56) The Cardinal of Trent, and the Cardinal of Mantua.

(57) Pallavicini, ubi supra, lib. x, cap. 2, num. 13, pag. m. 644, 645.

(58) Cardinal Pallavicini.

(59) Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran. lib. i, pag. 223, garet

[I] He bought a collection of reliques for an Elector of Saxony.] This was the Elector Frederic, surnamed the Wise. He collected as many reliques as he possibly could (59). He begged some of Francis I, and Margaret obliged John della Casa to write a small tract, that has been published in 1688, wherein Vergerius is cruelly treated [K]. Prudence will not allow us to believe what an enemy publishes of another without proof, and therefore we ought at least to suspend our judgment

5 Z

(60) It was in Thuringia.

(61) Called Burcardi. He was of the family of the barons of Schenck.

(62) Taken from Seckendorf, ibid.

(63) Seckendorf, ubi supra.

(64) Id. ibid. quoting a letter of Spalatin, to the Monk Burcard, dated the 28th of July 1522.

(65) Id. ibid.

(66) In the article ORICEL-LARIUS, remark [D].

(67) In the article MOLZA, remark [D], and in the article VAYER, remark [E].

garet of Austria, Governors of the Low-Countries, and obtained them. He had several sent from Mantua, Colmar, Basil, and the monastery of Ilmene (60). A German Monk (61) was collecting some for him in Italy, and employed our Vergerius, who had delivered this collection into the Elector's hands if he had not fallen sick in his journey. James Vergerius, his brother, who accompanied him, and who, as well as he, had served the German Monk, was also stopped by a like occasion: He also fell sick by the way (62). I believe that Peter-Paul hoped, as a reward, to be made a professor in the university of Wittemberg: for he had been recommended as a learned young man, who desired a maintenance that would enable him to finish his studies under the professors of that university. Here are the words of this Monk's letter from Venice to Spalatin, the 29th of October, 1521. 'Intendit ipse Petrus Paulus, frater Jacobi, permanere & complere in Wittembergae studium suum, si potuerit & sit beneplacitum Principis nostri. Rogavit quoque me, ut tibi supplex fierem pro eo, & certe credo, magni honoris & utilitatis esset illi Universitati; habet enim nobilissimum ingenium & memoriam, ut experientia videre licet, reputaturque præcipuus de humanitate & jure, inter juvenes studii Patavini. Rogo propterea T. Dom. suscipe eum, & commenda eum Principi Ser. ut filium, & primo in Universitate, ut inveniat locum legendi, vivendi, & proficiendi (63). - - - Peter-Paul himself, the brother of James, designs to continue and to finish his studies at Wittemberg, if he can, and if it be the good pleasure of our Prince. He desired me to intercede with you in his behalf, and I really think it would be a great honour and advantage to that university: for he has given proofs of his excellent genius and memory, and he is reckoned to outdo all the young students at Padua in Philology and Law. I beg therefore you would take him under your care, and recommend him heartily to his most serene Highness, that he may have a maintenance to enable him to prosecute his studies in the university. Spalatin answered, that he could promise nothing to the two Vergerios; and as for the reliques which had already been received, and the payment of which the Monk solicited; he answered that he would send them back again, the price of them being fallen since Luther's Reformation, and that doubtless they would be more esteemed, and sell better in Italy than in Germany: 'Reliquias nobis missas, una cum cruce, recipies omnes, à te, quancunque poteris, vendendas; credibile enim est, istic quam hic majoris esse tum pretii tum honoris. Hic enim vel vulgus ita respuit, ut verbo Dei edoctum satis sibi esse putet, ut & revera est, fide & fiducia erga Deum & charitate erga proximum (64). - - - You shall have back again all the reliques you sent us, together with the cross, that you may sell them for as much as you can get; for I believe they are more esteemed, and will sell better there than here. For even the common people here are so much altered, that being instructed from the word of GOD, they think it sufficient, as it really is, to have faith and trust in GOD, and charity towards their neighbour.' The person who wrote this letter had told the Elector, his master, that it had been very well if the dispute concerning Indulgences had begun sooner, for it had saved him a great deal of care and money (65).

[K] Wherein Vergerius is cruelly treated.] When I mentioned his books, I did not speak of that, intitled, Contra Catalogum Joannis della Casa Sodomitæ Patronum. He bestowed the epithet of Apologist for Sodomy on John della Casa on account of his Capitolo del Forno. He so defamed him throughout Germany, that this author thought himself obliged to address a Poem to the Germans, to remove those sinister impressions which our author had made on them against him. I have elsewhere (66) observed the mistake of a Modern, who was of opinion that Casa wrote this poem by way of answer to the invectives of Naogeorgus. It is certain that it was only aimed at Vergerius. I have also said somewhere (67), that the reason why John della Casa was so defamed, when several Italian Poets remained undisturbed, whose poems were more detestable than his, was, that he persecuted Vergerius at Venice, which other Poets did not. But let us here speak of the small tract, which Mr Menage printed in 1688, at the end of his Anti-Baillet. It is a piece written in very good Latin, which Mr Menage received from the celebrated Magliabechi, and in which Casa reviles Peter-Paul Vergerius at a strange rate. He accuses him of long and violent quarrels with his brother John Baptist, Bishop of Pola; of perjury to avoid the payment of his debts, and of killing his wife, in order to advance himself to benefices; he charges him with having intreated Cardinal de Tournon to carry him into France, and with having offered to write concerning Germany and the Swifts, and concerning religion, whatever should be prescribed him. Observe that Vergerius was then in the Grison's country. This Cardinal, who at first took him for a Butcher, at last knowing who was, very severely reprimanded him, and took no notice of his offers to repent. 'Qui cum te squalidum, fordidum, pannis oblitum, conspiciat, visulque sibi videre lanionem aliquem esset; quæsit de te qui tu es: atque ubi Vergerium esse dixisti, multis, homo gravissimus, te verbis male accepit (68). - - - When he saw you in a rasty and tattered condition, and thought you was a Butcher, he asked you who you was; and upon your telling him that you was Vergerius, he severely reprov'd you.' This small tract informs us (69), that Vergerius, in his younger days, professed Poetry; that he was afterwards admitted advocate; that he practised as such; but in pleading, he rendered himself insupportable to the Judges, to the litigants, and in general to the whole court, by his fallacies, calumnies, and prevarications: 'Lingua atque audacia fretus, causas agere te velle dixisti: sed cum, quoties diceres, toties malediceres, mentireris, pejerares, calumniarieris, pravaricareris, neque litigatores tibi, jam neque corona, neque Judices, fidem habebant; nemoque ferre te, ac ne aspicere quidem poterat (70). - - - Trusting to your tongue and impudence, you said you would be an advocate; but as in pleading you were always guilty of reviling, lying, perjury, calumny, and prevarication, neither the Litigants, nor the Bar, nor the Judges gave credit to you: no body could endure you, no body could bear the sight of you.' That getting no money, and being a widower, (thanks to the poison he had given his wife,) he cast his eye on spiritual benefices, and went to Rome, where his brother Antony recommended him to Clement VII, and obtained for him the Nunciature of Germany. He adds, that Francis Spiera (71), whom he represented to the world, as a man inspired, one day put him into an extreme confusion by calling him bankrupt, poisoner, and heretic (72). To conclude; he accuses him of flying to the Grisons, in order to shelter himself from the pursuit of his creditors (73). The Leipzig Journalists, in their extract of the Anti-Baillet, exactly quote most of the accusations against Vergerio; but they suppose that Matius had praised him, and that Casa refuted that elogy: 'Mutii laudes Vergerio tributas, p. 377 evertit Casa (74). This they ground on these words of Casa, de Mutio verò affirmare tibi hoc possum non tibi illum honorem cum de te scripsit, habuisse, sed patriæ vestra. Which import that Mutius had not done Vergerius the honour to re-fute him, if he had not had a particular regard to the country which produced them both. And he was so far from praising Vergerius, that he published most injurious invectives against him.

Two things are to be further observed concerning this tract of John della Casa. He makes two exceptions against the infamies with which Vergerio had charged Paul III. The first is, that those crimes which he imputed to that Pope were of such a nature, that they could never come to his knowledge: the second is taken from the enmity bewixt Paul III and him: 'Obsecro te quid tu tibi voluisti, aut quicunque ille fuit, qui de PAULI III vita scripsit? Putastine quemquam fore qui tibi de tot tantisque criminibus ac sceleribus crederet? Qui tu isthæ scire potuisti? Prefertim cum tam multa sint intestina ac domestica, de quibus vix unus aut alter ex intimis familiaribus etiam si maximè vera sint, suspicari aliquid signis quibuldam

(68) Anti-Baillet, Tom. vii, pag. 253, in the bottom of the page by Baillet of 1725, in 4to.

(69) Ibid. pag. 256.

(70) Ibid.

(71) He does not name him, but doubtless he means him.

(72) Anti-Baillet, Tom. vii, pag. 257.

(73) Ibid.

(74) Acta Emendat. Lips. 1689, pag. 497.

I

(83) Joh. Val.
Andreas, in Vita
avi sui Jacobi
Andreas, pag.
130, apud Sec-kendorf. ibid.

VERGERIUS.

460

In the authors which I have consulted concerning him, I do not find any mention of his journey to France after he was made a Bishop: I am informed of this part of his life only by a collection of letters printed at Venice in 1558. In that collection there are some of his letters which acquaint us that he admired the piety and excellent qualities of the Queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I, and began to disrelish his course of life, and to think of residing in his bishopric [M]. There is also (i) one written by his brother AURELIUS VERGERIUS (k) to Julia Gonzaga. I have not much to object against Moreri on this article [N].

I perceived too late, that the words which I quoted from the preface to a book ascribed to him, are capable of another sense than what I gave them. I shall set down that (i) At folio 124, of book I.

(k) He was a learned man. See Seckendorf, ubi supra, in Sup. ptem. Index 1, num. 80.

(84) Seckendorf, ibid.

(85) Surius, in the edition of the year 1567, says only what I mention; but in that of the year 1574, pag. 733, he adds this, Sanè aiant viri graves, hunc apostatam Vergerium sub mortem teterissimos exhalasse fœtores, ac bovis infar horrendos edidisse boatus: & alia quædam, quæ spero quodque certius proditor eos, qui morientur adjuce. Mihi necdum licuit omnia exactè cognoscere. . . . Some worthy persons affirm, that this apostate Vergerius at his death, sent forth most offensive stinks, and uttered dreadful bellowsings like an ox: and they relate several other things, which I hope those who were present at his death, will give a more certain account of. For I have not been able as yet to get an exact information of every thing.

(86) Surius, Comment. Rerum in Orbe gest. ad ann. 1567, pag. ult. Edit. 1567.

(87) Jo. Paulus Windeck, Prognostic. futuri stat. pag. 113. He quotes Ederus.

(88) Languet. Epist. lviij, lib. ii, pag. 143.

(89) Dicitur mittendus brevi, aut saltem hoc agere ut mittatur. Cuperem eum manere domi. Idem, Epist. ix, pag. 151.

flood religious controversies (84). Surius says that Gablerus, Professor of Physic, was present at the death of Vergerio, and made some observations, which determined him to turn Catholic (85). 'Adfuerat in Petro Paulo Vergerio è corpore migranti apud quem mira quædam viderat quæ illi animum videntur perferisse, ut non modo Catholicus sed piissimus quoque Catholicus fieret (86). . . . He was present at the death of Peter-Paul Vergerius, and observed some wonderful things, which seemed to affect his mind prodigiously, so that he became not only a Catholic but a very pious one.' Observe, that Surius is no classical author in point of History. Much more ought we to distrust those who magnify this story. They assure us, that the horrible death of Vergerius caused several Protestants to return into the bosom of the Church. Here follows the moderate expressions of those authors: 'Petrus Paulus Vergerius, infamis Apostata ob horrendam mortem qua defunctus est, multis attonitis vicinarum civitatum hominibus salutare præbuit documentum, ut plerique sese collegere, et ad pacem ac unitatem Ecclesiæ reverſi fuerint, frustra frementibus lupis infernalibus (87). . . . Peter-Paul Vergerius, an infamous Apostate, by his horrible death, gave a salutary warning to many persons of the neighbourhood that were astonished at it, so that several returned to the peace and unity of the Church, the infernal wolves in vain raging on that account.'

By a letter of Hubert Languet written from Paris on the ninth of October 1561, we learn that the Duke of Wirtemberg had sent into France our Vergerius, who was the most proper man in the world to imbroil things, Languet thought it strange that this Prince should be desirous to put ubiquity and other fancies of Brentius among the doctrines of the French Reformation. 'Miro etiam Virtembergensem nobis velle obtundere ubiquestatem & alias nugas Brentii, nec religionis apud nos infantiam considerare, quæ non sit obtruenda istis spinosis & futilibus disputationibus, quas ne quidem intelligunt qui eas proponunt, sed omni indulgentia fovenda, & tanquam lætis potu alenda, donec magis in Christo adoleſcat. Præterea huc misit Vergerium, hominem quo nullus est magis idoneus ad res turbandas (88). . . . I am surprised that the Duke of Wirtemberg should be desirous to obtrude upon us Ubiquity and the other ridiculous fancies of Brentius, and that he does not consider the infant state of religion amongst us, which ought not to be oppressed with such knotty and vain disputations, which even those that propose them do not understand, but should with all tenderness be nursed up, and, as it were, fed with milk till it grow up and be strong in CHRIST. Besides, he has sent Vergerius hither, the fittest man in the world to embroil affairs.' Languet wrote another letter eight days after, and says that Vergerius was not yet come to the French court, but that it was reported he would be sent quickly, or at least that he endeavoured it. I wish, says he, he would stay at home (89).

[M] That he admired the piety . . . of the Queen of Navarre . . . and that he began to disrelish his course of life, and to think of residing in his bishopric.] See what he wrote to Lewis Alamanni the day after he had conversed with that Princess: 'Ne la Signora Marchesa di Pescara, ne la Signoria vostra, che sapete tanto ben tutti due in vive voci, e tanto bene ne i scritti vostri dir cio, che volete, ne il Cardinal nostro Illustriss. ne tutta Roma, predicandomi l'altrezza & la bellezza dell' animo, & dell'ingegno, & il fervor dello spirito acceso in Christo, & la carita ardente della serenissima Regina di Navara, me ne havete saputo dire tanto, quanto io nel vero ho trovato hieri, che sua maestà degno di fare, che io udisſi un pezzo quelle sue rare voci, il qual giorno mi ha portato una letitia inenarrabile, & senza dubbio la maggiore, che io habbi havuto gia molto tempo (90). . . . Neither the Marchioness of Pescara, nor you, who both know so well to express whatever you please either in conversation or in writing, nor his eminency our Cardinal, nor all Rome, speaking of the greatness and excellency of mind and temper, and fervent zeal in CHRIST, and ardent charity of the most serene Queen of Navarre, I say, you have not been able to tell me so much as in truth I found yesterday, when her Majesty was pleased to let me hear some of her excellent discourse; which day has given me unspeakable joy, and undoubtedly the greatest I have had this long time.' The rest of the letter turns on the pious sentiments, which the great knowledge of that Queen excited in the heart of that Prelate. He was in France when he wrote a letter to Ottonello Vida, in which he deploras the progress of Lutheranism, and the little care that was taken of the Lord's vineyard. He declares that having weighed these words of the gospel, What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, against all those reasons which encouraged him with hopes of making his fortune, he found the scale turn on the side of the words of JESUS CHRIST. Wherefore, faith he, it will be best for me, for the future to apply myself to the culture of that portion which is allotted me, Perciò dico, che farà meglio, ch'io venga à coltivare quelle poche viti, ch'io su quel confine Tedesco, & veder di circondarle con un buon siepe, & tenerle difese, per poterne coglier qualche frutto da offerire a Dio; che stare fuori, & otioso ad aspettare, che altri si risolvino a voler mettere in lavoro tutta la vigna insieme (91). . . . Therefore I say it will be better for me to come, and cultivate those few vines which I have on the confines of Germany, to surround myself with a good hedge and defend them, that I may be able to gather from them some fruit to offer unto GOD: than to be idle and wait, till others resolve to undertake the care of the whole vineyard together.' Vida's answer (92) to confirm him in this resolution is very pertinent and excellent.

[N] I have not much to object against Moreri on this article.] I. The two articles of Verger (Peter Paul) are transposed; for he places the Bishop of Capo d'Istria before Emanuel Chrysoloras's disciple. As for the last he refers us to the authors of the following article, that is, to those which he cites after having amply spoken of John Verger de Haurane Abbot of St Cyran. This absurdity has been left out in the Dutch edition of Moreri (93). II. What Moreri (94) affirms, that Paul III intended to make Vergerio a Cardinal, is contradicted by Pallavicini (95). III. What he adds, that he took along with him one of his brothers, who was also a Bishop, is disproved by Sleidan, who affirms, that before the Bishop of Capo d'Istria left Italy, the Bishop of Pola was dead. 'Antequam ex Italia decederet, jam erat mortuus ejus frater Episcopus Pola: suspitioque fuit veneno sublatum esse (96). . . . Before he left Italy, his brother, the Bishop of Pola was dead, and was suspected [D]. to have been poisoned.' IV. To what end doth he cite Paul Jovius, Volaterranus, Jacobus de Bergamo, Vossius, &c. to confirm what he had said concerning the Bishop of Capo d'Istria, of which they make no manner of mention, and which could not be known to some of them. V. What is the meaning of these words, for the second consult Spondanus? They seem to direct us to some places wherein mention is made of John-Baptist Vergerius Bishop of Pola: but that would be a false direction, and is not

(90) Lettere volgari di diversi nobilissimi Huomini, lib. i. fol. 81. See also fol. 101, what he writes to the marchioness of Pescara.

(91) Ibid. fol. 83 verso, & fol. 83.

(92) You will find it, ibid. fol. 83, & 94.

(93) There it is the preceding, instead of the following.

(94) He says so after Spondanus, ad ann. 1548, num. 23.

(95) See the end of the remark [D].

(96) Sleid. lib. xxi, fol. 590.

that other sense, tho^t at last I find it is not the true one [O]. It concerns the book, intituled The anatomy of the Masi. AURELIUS VERGERIUS, brother to him of whom we speak, was knight of Malta, and was employed in some negotiations in which he acquired much glory (l). LEWIS VERGERIUS, his nephew, fled to Basil on account of his religion. He wrote some letters in the year 1549, which were inserted in the Cosmography of Munster (m).

(l) Munster, in Cosmographia, lib. iii, pag. m. 694.

(m) Pag. m. 693, 914.

not Moreri's meaning. It must be a typographical blunder.

[O] I shall set down that other sense, though at last I find it is not the true one.] Let us repeat here the words inserted in the remark [F].

Quoniam igitur Anatomia cognitio non solum medicis, chirurgisque, verum etiam aliis summopere commendatur: eam ob causam, Anthonium ab Adam Italum imitatus, hanc Missæ ac Missalis Anatomiam Gallicè, ut ab omnibus percipi posset facilius in lucem edere statui. . . . Since then the knowledge of Anatomy is very much recommended, not only to Physicians and Surgeons, but also to others: for that reason, in imitation of Anthonius ab Adam, an Italian author, I resolved to publish this Anatomy of the Masi and Missal in French, that it might be the more easily understood by every body.

I took the meaning of those words to be, that he intended to copy or translate Anthonius ab Adam, an Italian author: and I supposed they were the version of the Preface to the French edition: and upon that foot I thought the Corrector should not have advertised that it ought to be read Latinè and not Gallicè: but afterwards I perceived that it might perhaps be more reasonable to suppose, that those were the words of the Latin translator, and that he considered Anthonius ab Adam, as the Italian translator of the book, and not as the author: from whence it would follow that the work had been first composed in French. This supposition appeared to me altogether probable: but having at last recovered the French edition, I am intirely convinced that my first conjectures are the best. The Epistle Dedicatory to this edition informs me, that the Anatomy of the Masi was first published in Italian, and that the Marquis del Vico desired somebody to translate it into French. This somebody having complied with his desire, dedicated his translation to the same Marquis, and caused it to be printed at Geneva for John Crespin. His Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Geneva the eleventh of May 1555, and subscribed C. D. J. It is followed with a pretty long Preface, wherein the translator sets forth why this excellent Italian person called Anthonius d'Adam (97) (who some time ago thoroughly canvassed the abominations of the Masi and Missal, which he distinctly pointed out) thought fit to give this title of Anatomy to a book which he wrote upon them, the better to express briefly what he had written (98). This translator took some liberties, and owned it in the following manner: 'As for the rest, I shall make no long apology, for not confining myself so much as to translate this book verbatim from the Italian, without adding or leaving out any thing. For that was not my intention, when I undertook to translate this Anatomy. I persuaded myself that the readers would not take it amiss, if I endeavoured to accommodate myself to the capacity of those, who are not at all instructed in the knowledge of the truth, just as the other did, in writing for the ignorant of his own nation. For I have sometimes explained more fully what he had expressed in a few words (99).'

Observe that this Anatomy was refuted by a Doctor of Paris, and that some ascribe it to Calvin. 'Scripfit Calvinus in contemptum Missæ librum quem inscribit Anatomem Missæ, in quo totam Missam membratim dissectat, ac medicorum more & philosophorum in suas partes resolvit ac egregiè irridet, subfannat, ac traducit. Hanc Anatomem confutavit Jacobus Faber Molinensis Doctor Theologus Parisiensis. Liber impressus est Parisiis Anno 1563: Libri inscriptio est talis; Pro sacrosancto Missæ sacrificio adversus impiam Missæ & Missalis Anatomem, diffictorum Laniorum, Misoliturgorum Calvinianæ familiæ perditè excogitatum Hyperaspistes, &c (100). . . . Calvin wrote a book in contempt of the Masi, which he intituled the Anatomy of the Masi, wherein he difficts the whole Masi by pieces, and after the manner of Physicians and Philosophers resolves it into its parts, and ridicules, derides and traduces it egregiously. This Anatomy was confuted by James Le Fevre of Moulins, a Doctor of Divinity at Paris. The book was printed at Paris in the year 1563: and is intituled, A Defence of the Holy Sacrifice of the Masi, against the impious Anatomy of the Masi and Missal, wickedly contrived by those butchering diffictors and liturgy-baters, the Calvinists, &c.

(98) Preface to the Anatomy of the Masi, p. m. 13. I use an edition of the year 1562, in 16mo. The Printer's name (John Martin) is put to it, but not the place where it was printed.

(99) Ibid. pag. 29, 30.

(100) Cornelius Schultingius Bibl. Cathol. Tom. iv. pag. 227.

(97) The Latin translation ought then to have called him Anthonium ab Adam, or ab Adam, and not ab Adam. He does not say, it is a typographical error.

VERGERIUS (ANGELUS) born in the isle of Candia (a), translated out of Greek into Latin the tract de Fluviorum & Montium Nominibus, ascribed to Plutarch. He wrote the Greek letters so exquisitely, that his writing was made use of as an original, or pattern, by those who engraved the types of that language, for the royal impressions in the reign of Francis I (b) [A]. He was still living in Charles the IXth's time [B]. He

(a) See the remark [A].
(b) Mr Chevallier, Origine de l'Imprimerie, pag. 259, speaks of those fine Letters, that were cast in the matrices, which Francis I. caused to be made with a royal magnificence. See the remark [CC], of the article FRANCIS I.

[A] He wrote the Greek letters so exquisitely, that his writing was made use of as a pattern . . . for the royal impressions in the reign of Francis I.] This I find in the varie lectiones of Rutgerius. 'Duos, scilicet (1), (interpretes) mihi videre contigit, Italum unum, Natalem de Comitibus, alterum Cretensem, Angelum Vergerium eum qui tam eleganter Græcè pinxit, ut ejus manus pro archetypo iis fuerit, quorum opera in sculpendis regis characteribus Rex Franciscus usus est. . . . I happened to be acquainted with two translators, one Natalis Comes, an Italian, the other Angelus Vergerius, a Candian, who wrote the Greek character so finely, that his writing served for a pattern to those, who were employed in casting types in the reign of Francis I.' The two translations mentioned here are those of the little book de Fluviorum & Montium Nominibus.

[B] He was still living in Charles the IXth's time.] I have no other proof of this but the Epistle Dedicatory to the Poems of Jan Antoine de Baif. Which is inscribed to that monarch, and besides other things contains the following lines.

VOL. V.

Charles Etienne premier, disciple de Lazare
Le docte Bonamy, de mode non barbare
M'a prunt à prononcer le langage Romain:
Ange Vergece Grec, à la gentile main Pour l'écriture Gréque, Ecrivain ordinaire
De vos Granpere & Pere & le VOSTRE, ut salère
Pour à l'accent des Grecs ma parole dresser,
Et ma main sur le trac de sa lettre adresser.

Charles Stephens, who was disciple
To Lazarus, the learned Bonamy,
Taught me to read the Latin tongue with grace.
Angelus Vergerius, a Grecian born,
Who wrote that language finely, and who was
To your grand-father, father, and your self Writer in ordinary, was engaged
To form my tongue to th' accent of the Greeks,
And after his own copy to lead my hand.

You

6 A

He is too violently censured by a Dutch Critic [C]. NICOLAS VERGERIUS [D], his son, was a learned man, and made some verses on the death of Hadrian Turnebus.

(2) In the remark [D].

You will also find another place below (2), where this Candiot's name is written Vergece as well as here. Which makes me apt to suspect that instead of calling him Vergerius in Latin, he ought to be called Vergecius.

[C] He is too violently censured by a Dutch Critic. We have seen in the remark [A], that Natalis Comes, and our Vergerius translated into Latin the tract περί ποταμῶν καὶ ὁρῶν ἐπανυμίας. These words are to be found in it (3): Καδμῶ τὸν κρηνοῦλακα δρέκοντα τοξέυσας, καὶ εὐρὺν ὥσπερ παφραμακτενὸν φέβει τὸ ὕδωρ, πεινέχοντο τὴν χώραν ἡτῶν πηγῶν. They are thus expressed in Latin by Natalis Comes: 'Ubi Cadmus serpentem fontis custodem jaculis confodisset, invenissetque aquam quasi ob timorem veneno infectam, regionem lustravit fontem in-

(3) In the second chapter, where the river Iteneus is mentioned.

quens. . . . After Cadmus had killed with darts the serpent, which guarded the fountain, and found the water, as he apprehended, infected with poison, he went all over the country looking for a spring. Vergerius's version runs thus: 'Cum Cadmus fontis custodem draconem jaculis confecisset, & aquam ejus veneno infectam cerneret, eam abhorrens circumivit regionem ad investigandum fontem. . . . When Cadmus had pierced with darts the dragon that guarded the fountain, and saw that the water was infected with poison, he dreaded it, and went about the country to search for a spring.' Rutgerius's judgment of these two versions is: I believe, saith he (4), that Vergerius was drunk when he talked in this manner; and it is not to be wondered that Natalis Comes hath ill translated a corrupted place, for he did most times spoil even such places as were correct. This censure is so unjust with regard to Vergerius that it is less capable of hurting his memory than that of Rutgerius. For his translation is not only better than that of Natalis Comes, though this Critic mentions the latter much more tenderly than the former, but is the best which could possibly be made, supposing the Greek text not corrupted. The learned Maussac understood this place just as Vergerius did, and thus translates it: 'Cum Cadmus sagittis confixisset draconem qui fontem custodiebat, VERITUS ne aqua veneno infecta esset, circumivit regionem alium fontem quo sitim levaret, querens. . . . When Cadmus had pierced with arrows the dragon that guarded the fountain, fearing lest the water should be infected with poison, he went about the country in quest of other water to quench his thirst.' So that Vergerius's fault lies only in not having conjectured as Rutgerius hath (5), that instead of φέβει the reading ought to be ἐκ φόνου, hoc est, à sanguine five tabo, . . . with the blood or gore. Maussac did not think of it neither; wherefore I wonder that Rutgerius did not censure his version, which makes me believe he knew nothing of it. Though according to the time of its publication, he might have seen it (6); but how many printed books are there which remain unknown, even to the most learned? Mr Maussac had never heard of any version of this tract when he undertook to translate it (7), and afterwards he saw indeed the version of Natalis Comes and Turnebus, but not that of Vergerius. An hundred examples of this nature might be alledged.

[D] NICOLAS VERGERIUS . . . made some verses on the death of Hadrian Turnebus. This you find in these words of Thuaus. 'Ei (Hadriano Turnebo) Joan. Auratus. . . . Nicolaus denique Vergerius, Angeli illius Cretensis elegantiorum & Græcæ linguæ characterum ad omnem admirationem & oculorum jucunditatem formatoris F. . . . & alii epitaphiis carminibus parentarunt (8). . . . Joan Auratus. . . . And lastly Nicolas Vergerius the son of Angelus the Candian, who wrote the Greek character so exquisitely, that it was wonderfully beautiful. . . . and others made some verses on the death of Hadrian Turnebus.' He was born in Candia, from whence he went into France about the year 1540. This I infer from two passages of John Antony de Baif, one of which informs me, that the same John Antony was committed to the tutorship of Tufan, and the other that he contracted at Tufan's house a friendship with Nicolas Vergerius, then lately come from Candia (9).

(4) Equidem Vergerium cum hæc scriberet sobrius fuisse non puto. Nam in Natali mirandum non est si correpta non recte transulit cum illi pene fatale fuerit, male vertendo, ut ille ait, etiam ex Græcis bonis Latina facere non bona. Rutgerius, ubi supra, pag. 236.

(5) Ibid. p. 235.

(6) The book de Fluviis ac Montium Nominibus, translated into Latin by Philip James de Maussac, was printed at Toulouse in 1615, and that of Rutgerius, at Leyden, 1618.

(7) See his preface.

(8) Thuaus, lib. xxxviii, pag. 769, ad ann. 1565.

(9) John Antony de Baif, epistle to the king, prefixed to his Poems, printed at Paris, in the year 1573, in 2vo.

Amy qu'en la prime jeunesse J'acointay chez le bon Tufan, Voicy cinq fois le cinquieme an Tout nouveau venu de la Grece.

Bien jeune tu vis escumer
Deffous toy la rouslante mer
Tiré de l'isle ta naissance
Qui vit de Jupiter l'enfance (10).

When in my youth to good Tufanus' care
I was committed, I contracted there
With him just come from Greece a friendship fast,
Since which, now five and twenty years are past.

You was but young and in your tender age,
When you beheld the sea beneath you rage.
The very isle, which gave an infant saw,
Is that in which, you first your breath did draw.

These lines are taken from the Contretreue à Nicolas Vergece Candiot, in which you will find the following elegy on his Muse,

FIE, ces mignardises laisse,
Je ne puis entendre à tes jeux;
Lachons un peu couvrir nos feux,
A fin que m'acquie à Vergece,
Qui m'a mis en soucy plaissant,
M'étreuant d'un mignard presant
Que la Muse avec la Charite
Ont ourdi de fleurons d'eslite.
Ces beaux vers en langue Latine
Confits au miel Catullien,
Vers de bon heur, meritent bien
Que beusse de l'eau Cabaline (11).

(10) John Antony de Baif's Poems, fol. n. 119.

(11) Ibid.

My Fairy, these caresses cease,
Your toying I cannot approve,
Let us not now indulge to love,
That I from debt may get release.
Vergece's gift, which is most rare,
Has put me in a pleasing care,
'Tis by the Graces and the Muses Adorn'd with ev'ry beauty curious.
Verse of such sublime a nature,
That he in Latin did compose,
Which with Catullian honey flows, Merit Hyppocrene's water.

John Antony de Baif, before he finishes this Poem, takes notice of his own poverty, and of that of his friend.

Pauvreté mes espaulles presse,
Me foule & jamais ne me laisse.
Je suis pauvre, & tu n'es pas riche:
Vien-t'en me voir, Amy trefdoux:
Embrassons-nous, consolons-nous:
Le ciel ne fera toujours chiche
Envers nous du bien qui des mains
De fortune vient aux humains:
Or vivons une vie estroite
En pauvreté, mais sans souffrette (12).

(12) Ibid. fol. n. 119, verso.

Poverty my shoulder presses,
And to haunt me never ceases,
I am poor, you don't abound,
Come to see me, dearest friend,
Let's embrace, and put an end
To grief. For Heav'n will not be found.
Still sparing to us of its gifts:
Fortune's fickle and often shifts:
Tho' we live in poverty
Yet let us still contented be.

VERON

VERON (JOHN) a French Protestant lived in the XVIth century. He published in English divers books of controvery, and amongst others one on Pur-

(a) See the Calvinico Turcismus, lib. iv, cap. viii, pag. m. 834.

VERONA, a city of Italy, which some writers say, was built, and others that it was only rebuilt by the Gauls. Pompey's father led a Roman colony thither (a). It was sacked by Attila, and successively possessed by Odoacar King of the Heruli, Theodoric King of the Goths, and his successors down to Totila, by the Lombards, by Charlemagne, and his posterity; but when his descendants lost the empire, several lords made themselves sovereigns of several cities of Italy. This sort of government continued till Otho I re-united to the empire several States, which had been alienated from it. Amongst these Verona was one, but it obtained the power of electing its own magistrates: So that it was properly an independant republic, under the name of an imperial city. In this state it continued till Actiolinus seized the sovereign power, which he could not obtain but by great bloodshed. He enjoyed his tyrannical power thirty-three years, and died in the year 1269. After him the Veronese elected Martin della Scala their General, whose conduct they so well approved, that five years after they created him perpetual Dictator. His descendants governed Verona with great reputation, and were created princes by the Emperor in the year 1310. They rendered themselves formidable by their conquests, and were driven out of Verona in 1387, by John Galeazzo Duke of Milan. They re-entered it in 1404, but did not keep possession long, for the Venetians seized the city in 1409 (b), and have so carefully kept it, that they enjoy it to this day. It is not known whether any of the illustrious family della Scala remained, who left any children. Julius Cæsar Scaliger, one of the most learned men of the XVIth century, pretended to be descended from this house. But that honourable descent is disputed; and few at present believe his pretension to be well grounded. Some are of opinion, that the letters of naturalization which he obtained in France, contradict his claim, since he there bears only the character of a Physician born at Verona (c). The public doubtless will be very glad to see those letters of naturalization here [A] wherefore I insert them.

(a) Taken from Cluverius, in Italia antiqua, lib. i, cap. xvi.

(b) Taken from Leander Alberti's Descript. Italix, pag. 716, & seq. He made use of the antiquities of Verona, published by Torellus Sarayna.

(c) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, February 1686, pag. m. 164, & Menagiana, pag. 25, of the first Dutch edition. Primers, a Physician quoted in Ritsan's Curiculæ Recherches sur les Ecoles de Medecine, affirms that the Physicians of Bourdeaux refused to admit Julius Cæsar Scaliger into that town, unless he underwent an examination; which Scaliger being unwilling to submit to, for fear of exposing his reputation in a quodlibetical disputation, he retired to Agen.

[A] The public will doubtless be very glad to see those letters of naturalization. Mr Baluze, one of those extraordinary men, who are born for the good of the Republic of Letters, and who besides the productions with which they enrich it, are pleased to furnish other authors with all sorts of assistance, did me the favour to lend me what follows.

An extract of an original register of Francis I, which is in the Repository of Records at Paris.

' Francis, &c. We give to understand, &c. that we have received the humble supplication of our dear and well beloved Julius Cæsar de l'Esclle de Bordeaux, Doctor of Physic, native of the city of Verona in Italy, setting forth that about four years past, or thereabouts, he came into this our kingdom to the city of Agen in Agenois, with intention and full resolution to end the remainder of his days there: in which city, and the country about it, the said suppliant has purchased an house, and several other possessions. But because he is a stranger and not a native of our realm, he is in doubt whether the possessions which he may have purchased, or hopes to purchase, likewise the inheritances which may devolve on him hereafter from his relations or others, may not be claimed, as belonging to us by escheat or otherwise, and our officers may not accordingly give him some trouble or hinderance, if he be not qualified and dispensed with on that account, and humbly requesting us to impart to him our favour and liberality. Wherefore we, these things considered, generously inclined to grant the supplication and request of the said suppliant, given and granted, give and grant leave and licence: willing by our especial grace, full power and royal authority, by these presents, that he be freely permitted to inhabit, and dwell in our said realm, and in it hold and possess all such estates moveables or immoveables, which he hath already acquired, or shall for the future lawfully acquire; and likewise that he may succeed to all those goods and inheritances which in our said realm, territories, lands, and lordships, shall devolve on or belong to him by good and just title, and that he may dispose of them by his last will, as his proper goods and inheritance; and that his heirs or others to whom he may dispose of them, may be enabled to succeed and take possession of and enjoy the said goods, and in general that he shall enjoy entirely all the honours, privileges, prerogatives, franchises, liberties, and rights which are customarily enjoyed by the originary natives of this our kingdom, and that he shall be held and accounted our subject, in all cases as a native of our realm; and therefore we have qualified and dispensed, and do qualify and dispense him, of our said grace by these presents, he paying us a moderate sum for once only. We give in command by these same presents to our trusty and beloved officers of our accounts and treasurers at Paris, baillies, seneschals, and to all our other justiciaries and officers, and to their lieutenants for the present and for the future, and to every one of them whom it may concern, and we will that the grace, licence, habitation, and all the effects by these presents granted, be by them suffered and permitted to the suppliant to enjoy and use, fully and peaceably without giving or suffering to fall on him any arrest, disturbance, or hindrance, in what manner soever on any occasion, &c. For such is, &c. Notwithstanding all statutes, ordinances against strangers, and any other ordinances, &c. Given at Paris in the month of March in the year of Grace, one thousand five hundred and twenty-eight, and the fifteenth of our reign. Thus signed. By the King, Gedeon. Vija. Contentor. des Landes.'

(1) Joannes PINUS, his article is to be seen above.

(2) His family, which is that of Bertier, has afforded many eminent men. His father, first President in the Parliament of Toulouse, was called Mr de Montrave. He was a man of great merit. See Balzac, Lettres Choises, pag. 270, Dutch edition.

I expected from Mr Baluze a memoir which I have not received concerning Du Pin (1), Bishop of Rieux. The Bishop of Rieux (2), one of the most learned and illustrious Prelates of France was to send it to him.

VERSORIS

VERSORIS.

464

VERSORIS, (PETER DE) Lord of Fontenai le Visconte, of Marilli, and part of Montoger, and head of the council of the Dukes of Guise (a) in the XVIth century, was an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, and one of the most famous and illustrious of his profession. He was born at Paris on the 16th of February 1528 (b), of a noble family, and one that had been considerable for a long time (c) [A]. He was designed by his father to be an officer in a sovereign court; but having extravagantly spent, whilst he was young, the money that was laid aside for that use, he endeavoured to repair that fault by hard labour, whereby . . . he became one of the chief advocates of his time: he was so much master of all the things which were necessary to him, that he hardly used any books (d). He pleaded for the Jesuits in the year 1564, in the famous trial which they had with the university of Paris; and, to speak properly, he gained the cause. He was deputed to the states of Blois in the year 1576, and spoke in the name of the third state. He was assigned a chamber counsellor as a pleader (e). He was very zealous for his clients, particularly for the house of Guise . . . And he died with grief in less than four or five hours, on the 25th of December 1588, after he had heard that the Duke of Guise [B] had been killed at Blois (f). It is said, that this duke took his advice only in his domestic affairs, killed at Blois (f). We shall see below wherein his talents lay [C].

(a) Manuscript Memoir.

(b) Opusc. de Loisel, p. 556.

(c) Manuscript Memoir.

(d) Opusc. de Loisel, p. 751.

(e) See the remark [C].

(f) Loisel, ubi supra, pag. 527.

(g) See the remark [B].

[A] Of a noble family, and one that had been considerable for a long time.] The proof of this is given by Mr Joly in his notes on the alphabetical Index of the Advocates, printed with divers pieces of Antony Loisel, in the year 1652. Mr Peter Versoris, says he (1), Advocate in Parliament, was sprung from a noble family, which came originally from gentlemen in Normandy about Falaize, as he himself observed in his genealogy which he wrote with his own hand, during the leisure which the contagious distemper that raged in the year 1582, afforded him in his retirement in his house of Clichy la Garenne near Paris. Their name was le Tournour, which they have since changed into Versoris. John le Tournour called Versoris, coming to Paris about the eighth year of Charles VII, was one of the first Doctors of the University, and writ several books in Latin, some of which, as this genealogy observes, are to be seen in the library of the Minimes, at Nigeon. He changed his French name le Tournour into the Latin one Versoris, as men of letters were wont then to do. He took his nephew with him, made him a Lawyer, and married him to Jane Fournier, of a good family, and nearly related to the Lieutenant-Civil Charmolue. From this marriage are descended all the Versoris's, who have most of them exercised the function of Advocate with great reputation both in the Palace and the Chatelet. There is something wanting in this relation of Mr Joly, we do not find by it that the nephew whom JOHN LE TOURNOUR had with him, was called FREDERIC LE TOURNOUR, and that in imitation of his uncle, he called himself Versoris. He left one son, WILLIAM VERSORIS, who was Lord of Gerge, and a famous Advocate; and father of our PETER VERSORIS (2). It is without doubt the same William Versoris, we find in the list of the Advocates pleading in the court of parliament in the year 1524 (3); and who died at five and twenty, after he had been married five times, as Mr Peter Versoris observes in the genealogy which he made of that family in the year 1582 (4). Mr Blanchard mentions this family in his catalogue of the Counsellors of the Parliament of Paris.

(1) Opuscules d'Antoine Loisel, pag. 751.

(2) From a manuscript Memoir.

(3) It is in pag. 574, 575, of the Opuscules de Loisel.

(4) Opusc. de Loisel, p. 750.

(5) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(6) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(7) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(8) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(9) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(10) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(11) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(12) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(13) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(14) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(15) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(16) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

(17) Ibid. pag. 751, 752.

if the king had not prevented it, he would have been much embarrassed. However he was perfectly composed, and went to bed, desirous to communicate at the midnight mass, having already been confessed; but finding himself ill, he could not go: Mr de Verthamon, Counsellor in Parliament, his son-in-law, and his daughters, coming to see him, at their return about five o'clock in the morning, found him dead in his bed. The eldest of his sons, Frederic Versoris was then young, and was admitted into the court as a Counsellor a long time after. His two sons-in-law Mr Rancher, Master of the Requests, and Mr de Verthamon, also Counsellor in Parliament, followed the King's person and interest during all those commotions, as well in the states of Blois, as in the parliament sitting at Tours. [C] We shall see . . . wherein his talents lay.] Antony Loisel made a sort of parallel between John le Maitre and Peter Versoris. The first, says he (6), was really a very able Advocate, well versed in points of law, customs and practice, very prudent and deliberate in his causes, which he made appear as well as the Bar as in the administration of his places. After he had resigned that of President to Mr de Sillery, he desired to live and die privately in his own house, where he was consulted without going to the Bar, and often employed in arbitrations. After this he adds, that it was not quite the same with Mr Peter Versoris; for although they went to him, it was chiefly to mend some faults which happen sometimes in preparing a case for a hearing; for he was really full of fine and subtle inventions, and understood the affairs of the Bar so well, that tho' he had in a manner quitted it, yet the Bar never quitted him, for his house was frequented as much as the Bar; that he kept not only his days, his mornings and afternoons, but his hours also, which he so managed that there were always people attending at the great hall, whilst he gave his advice in the little one. And as he was much solicited in his latter years for advice, so he had been employed in his younger days more than any body else for pleading, as one who spoke with a sprightly ready and natural eloquence, and with a great facility and wonderful art of persuasion, which was the reason of his being employed in the greatest and finest causes of his time, as that of the Jesuits, which we pleaded together, he for them, and I for the University of Paris, of which I shall say nothing, because since both pleas are printed, every body may pass a judgment on them. Only this I shall say, that having read his some years since, I did not think it near so good as when we pleaded; which proceeds from the grace, the force, and the weight that is given to a discourse by the voice, and way of delivery, especially by his, which was fine and agreeable, in comparison to what a meer, dull, mute, and inanimate reading is. It is true he had one fault, which was generally pronouncing A for E and E for A, and those who knew what he quoted out of classical authors, might perceive that he was not well versed in them; but take him altogether he was a great Advocate.

[D] I shall

Mornac made an encomium upon him in his Ferie forenfes (b), I fhall fpeak of his iffue [D]. (b) Id. pag. 754.

[D] I fhall fpeak of his iffue. He married Margaret Coignet, by whom he had two fons and two daughters, FREDERIC, JAMES, CATHERINE, and MARY. The latter was wife of Francis de Vertamont, Counfellor in the Parliament of Paris, and died in Auguft 1625. Catherine was married the 5th of September 1580, to Antony Rancher Seigneur de la Foucaudiere, Counfellor in the Parliament, Mafter of the Requefts, and afterwards Prefident in the Parliament of Paris.

FREDERIC DE VESPASIAN, Counfellor in the Parliament, February 19, 1601, left among other children FRANCIS FREDERIC Lord of Pontenai le Vicomte, (who left only one daughter) and LEWIS Lord of Marfills, Lieutenant of the guards, who left only two daughters. They died without iffue. The youngelt was married the 10th of September 1689, to her fecond coufin, and died on the 6th of November 1691.

JAMES DE VESPASIAN, the other fon of our Advocate, was Lord of Coulommiers, Counfellor and Secretary to the King, and Father of PETER DE VESPASIAN, Lord of Coulommiers, Beauvoir, and Malmuffe, the King's Steward in ordinary. This Peter de Veforis left five children, three daughters who are Nuns, and two fons, Charles and Peter, CHARLES DE VESPASIAN, Lord and Patron of Agi and Beauvoir, was married firft to his fecond coufin, daughter of LEWIS DE VESPASIAN, Lieutenant of the guards; and afterwards on the third of March 1695, to Genevieve Bourgoin, by whom he has no children. PETER DE VESPASIAN, Lord of Beauvoir, married Mademoifelle Tonnelier at Orleans the 22d of February 1700 (7).

(7) Taken from a manufcript Memoir.

VESPASIAN (TITUS FLAVIUS) fon of an honeft Publican [A], and grandfon of a collector, who had been captain of a company of one hundred men in Pompey's party (a), and who having efaped from the battle of Pharfalia, rofe to the higheft dignity on earth, being created Emperor of Rome, in the year of Chrif 69. He was born in a village of the country of the Sabini, near Reate (b), on the 17th of November, in the year of Rome 761 (c). He was brought up in the country by Tertulla his grandmother by his father's fide, and preferved fo great a refpect for her memory, that at great folemnities he always drank in her goblet (d). He paffed gradually through all the dignities of the empire. He was made tribune of the foldiers in Thrace, on account of his fervices. Crete and the province of Cyrene fell to his lot when he was Quæstor. He was refused the office of Ædile the firft time he stood for it. He obtained it afterwards, but was the laft of the fix Ædiles, and even could not arrive at that place without fome difficulty. He was a more fucceffful candidate for the Prætorship; he obtained the firft rank the very firft time he stood for it. He made ufe of a great many arts to gain Caligula's favour, and stood very well with Narciffus under the Emperor Claudius. By the intereft of which favourite he was fent into Germany at the head of a legion. He was afterwards fent into Britain (e), where he fought the enemy thirty times, fubdued two potent nations, above twenty towns, and the ifle of Wight. In

(a) Sueton. in Vefpaf. cap. i. See the remark [A] citat. (1).

(b) Id. ib. cap. ii.

(c) It is ninth year of Chrif.

(d) Avie memoriam tantopere dilexit, ut folennibus ac feftis diebus pocillo quoque ejus argenteo potare perleveraverit. Id. ib.

(e) Now called England.

[A] Son of an honeft Publican. That is to fay, of a Publican who was a virtuous man, and behaved himfelf generously in his employ, and fo juftly withal, that the cities gave a public and lafting testimony of his probity. 'Hujus (1) filius cognomine Sabinus . . . publicum quadragesima in Afia egit. Manebantque imagines à civitatibus ei pofitæ sub hoc titulo, ΚΑΛΩΣ ΤΕΛΩΝΗΣΑΝΤΙ. Poftea fœnus apud Helvetios exercuit, ibique diem obiit, fupervivens uxore Vefpafia Polla, & duobus ex ea liberis: quorum major Sabinus ad præfecturam urbis, minor Vefpafianus ad principatum ufque profecit. . . . This man's fon, furnamed Sabinus . . . was a public tax-gatherer in Afia, and had ftatus raised to him by the cities with this infcription, TO THE HONEST PUBLICAN. He was afterwards an ufer, in Switzerland, where he died, leaving behind him his wife Vefpafia Polla, and two children by her. The elder, Sabinus, came to be made Governor of the city, but the younger, Vefpafian, was preferred to the dignity of Emperor. Satirical men cannot here come in with their glofs on this text, they cannot object that Vefpafian's father was an honeft Publican in the fame fenfe that one of thofe who was crucified with JESUS CHRIST, is called the good Thief. The latter did not deferve that character in fenfu compofito, as the Logicians fpeak, but only in fenfu divifo. He was not good and a thief at the fame time, but from a thief he became a good man. The fame may be faid of Zachæus: He was not an honeft man when he gathered the public imposts: He became fo by acts of reftitution and repentance (2). This cannot be faid of our Emperor's father; for he united the character of an honeft man with that of a Publican, fo much decried in the Gofpel, and profane authors. Nay, the Satisfiers, who cannot deny this, would ftretch things too far, if they fhould make ufe of the application of this thought, thefe two words are very much furprized to find themfelves together, for in all likelihood they never met before. I have formerly touched on this (3), in obferving that a great extent of learning is very rarely accompanied with a great modefty. Nevertheless we meet with fome examples in which they are united: Some Farmers of the revenues are alfo honeft men, tho' it ought to be owned that from all antiquity thefe two qualities have been feparated. The opportunities they have of gaining, procures them riches, which are liberally expended on whatever luxury infpires; but to defray thefe extravagant expences, new and more exorbitant extortions are neceffary. Julian the Apoftate knew very well that the Financiers love luxury. 'Evenserat iifdem diebus, (they are Ammianus Marcellinus's words) (4), ut ad demendum Imperatoris capillum tonfor venire præceptus, introiret quidam ambitiofe veftitus. Quo vifo Julianus obftupuit: Ego, inquit, non Rationalem jufti, fed tonforem acciri. . . . It happened much about the fame time that a Barber being fent for to fhave Julian, there came in a man very finely drefsed, at which the Emperor was aftonifhed: I gave orders, faid he, to call a Barber, and not a Receiver of the revenues.' This is the venom which poifons the minds of thofe concerned in the management of the Treafury. See feveral remarks againft them in the firft part of la Mothe le Vayer's Profe Cbagrine (5).

We may obferve that Vefpafian's maternal anceftors were more illuftrious than the paternal; for Vefpafia Polla, his mother, was a Senator's fifter, and daughter of Vefpafianus Pollio, who went through confiderable offices in the army. 'Polla Nurfia: honefto genere orta, patrem habuit Vefpafianum Pollionem, ter Tribunum militum, præfectumque caftro- rum, fra- tremque Senatorem prætoriz dignitatis (6). . . . Polla was born at Nurfia of a good family. Her father was Vefpafianus Pollio, who had been three times a Tribune in the army, and Quarter-Mafter-General. Her brother was a Senator who had alfo enjoyed the Prætorian dignity.' Several monuments of this family were obferved at a place called Vefpafiaz, on the top of a mountain fix miles from Nurfia, in the road to Spoleto, which difcovered its ancient luftre. Ubi (Vefpafiaz)

(4) Ammian. Marcellinus, lib. xxii. cap. iv. pag. m. 300.

(5) Pag. 327, of Tom. ix, Edit. in 12mo. See alfo Tom. i, page 70, & feq.

(6) Sueton, ubi fupra, cap. i.

(1) Sueton. in Vefpaf. cap. i. Thst is of Titus Flavius Petro Municeps Reatinus bello civili Pompejanarum peritum centurio . . . deinde . . . conditiones argentarias facilitavit. Id. ib.

(2) See St Luke's Gofpel ch. xix.

(3) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for June 1685, Art. 2, at the end.

VOL. V.

6 B

In recompence of which he obtained the triumphal ornaments, two priesthoods, and the consulship. He lived in a sort of retirement whilst Agrippina continued in favour, who hated all Narcissus's friends. Returning to public employments, he became Proconsul of Africa, which post he very honourably discharged [B], without enriching himself. He accompanied Nero in his travels through Greece; but not having the complaisance to applaud that emperor's singing [C], he was utterly disgraced, and concealed himself in an obscure town. He did not believe himself safe there, he feared the fatal effects of Nero's rage, when he received the news that the government of a province, and the command of an army were bestowed on him. No person was found so proper as he to reduce the Jewish nation, which had presumed to revolt. This expedition in which Titus his son served him as Lieutenant-General, gained him great glory, and opened his way to the throne. He began to hope for that exalted station during the civil war betwixt Otho and Vitellius (f). Several prefages which promised him a most eminent fortune, were very powerful engagements to his resolution of seizing the imperial authority; for besides the impreffion which they made upon himself, they supplied his friends with a good opportunity of animating him to this enterprize. Tacitus (g) and Suetonius (h) who have related the prefages, have not omitted the answer made him on mount Carmel. It was given by the true God, if we may believe the Carmelites, who build on the authority of these two historians, the chimerical antiquity of their order, and the pretended succession of the disciples of the prophet Elias continued to the beginning of their institution [D]. Vespasian

(f) Taken from Suetonius, ubi supra, cap. ii, & seq.

(g) Tacit. Hist. lib. ii, cap. lxxviii.

(h) Sueton, in Vespasiano, cap. v.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) In the remark [D], of the article Suetonius.

(9) Sueton. ubi supra, cap. iv.

(10) Tacit. Hist. lib. ii, cap. xcvi.

(11) Sueton. in Nerone, cap. xxii. See also Tacitus, Ann. lib. xvi, cap. iv, v.

(12) Suet. ibid. cap. xxiii, & seq.

(Vespasii) Vespasiorum complura monumenta exstant, magnam indicium splendoris familiaris & vetustatis (7). Now 'since Vespasian's elder brother took the surname of Sabinus, we must conclude that in that age, the younger brothers sometimes took a surname borrowed from their mothers family, and terminated like those which indicated adoption.

[B] He very honourably discharged the Proconsulship of Africa. We have here a proof of what I said above (8), that Suetonius was not prompted by a satirical genius to speak ill of people. He here bestows encomiums on Vespasian which are very contrary to the testimony of Tacitus; this shews that he had thoroughly examined what had been said for and against Vespasian's conduct, and having found the ill reports concerning him false, he rejected them, in order to do that Proconsul the justice which was due to him. An Historian ill-natured and satirical does not act in that manner. 'Exin sortitus Africam, integerrime, nec sine magnis dignatione administravit: Nisi quod Adrumeti seditione quadam, rapa in eum iacta sunt. Rediit certe nihilo opulenter, ut qui prope labefactata jam fide, omnia prædica fratri obligavit (9). . . . Afterwards the province of Africa falling to his share, he governed it with great integrity, and was greatly respected; excepting only that in a sedition at Adrumetum he had turneps thrown at him. It is very certain that he came back no richer than he went; for his credit was so sunk that he was under a necessity of mortgaging his whole estate to his brother.' You see that Suetonius doth not conceal the insurrection of the inhabitants of Adrumetum, nor that they threw turneps at Vespasian. He is then so much the more to be credited in the eulogies he bestows upon him, and we may reasonably believe that Tacitus was neither just nor exact enough, when he tells us only that Vespasian was decried, and drew on himself the public hatred during this Proconsulship. 'Integrum illic ac favorabilem Proconsulatum Vitellius; famulum invivumque Vespasianus egerat (10). . . . Vitellius believed in his Proconsulship there with integrity, and so as to be liked; but Vespasian in his was decried and hated.'

[C] Not having the complaisance to applaud Nero's singing. This Prince's passion for Music was a ridiculous extravagance. The principal cause of his travelling in Greece was his ardent desire of signaling himself in the Musical disputes in several cities of that country, and to bear away the prize (11). Suetonius relates upon this subject a great many circumstances which are very surprizing (12). He saith amongst other things that no person was allowed to retire from the theatre whilst Nero was singing, and that some women were forced to be delivered there, and that the gates of the cities being shut, some persons were so fatigued and tired with hearing and praising this Prince, that they secretly escaped over the walls, or feigned themselves dead, that they might be carried out of the town under pretence of being buried. Cantante eo, ne necessaria quidem causa excedere theatro lic-

tum erat. Itaque & enixe quedam in spectaculis dicuntur, & multi tardio audiendi laudandique, clausi oppidorum portis, aut furtim desiluisse de muro, aut morte simulata funere elati (13). It is easy to conceive that Nero was extremely incensed against Vespasian, who very often went out of the theatre, or fell asleep whilst his master was singing. Peregrinatione Achaica inter comes Neronis, cum cantante eo, aut discederet sepius, aut præsens obdormisceret, gravissimam contraxit offensam: prohibitusque non contubernio modo, sed etiam publica salutatione, secessit in parvam ac deviam civitatem, quoad latenti, etiamque extrema metuenti, provincia cum exercitu oblata est (14). Some will ask why Suetonius saith here, that Vespasian frequently retired from the theatre? Hath he not elsewhere (15) affirmed that no person was permitted to go out of the theatre on any pretext whatsoever? I answer, that indeed he did not very well remember to render all the parts of his relations exactly consistent; but to justify him in some sort, we may suppose that the prohibition of leaving the theatre was a consequence of the liberty of not staying till the spectacle was ended, which several had taken. Vespasian, before the prohibition, was one of those who laid the least constraint upon himself; by which he began to displease that Prince, and his disgrace was completed after the prohibition. He indeed obeyed, but fell asleep on the theatre. I cannot think of a better way of reconciling these two places of Suetonius. It may perhaps be imagined that he confounded the times, I would say that instead of applying this to the year of the Musical victories which Nero obtained at Rome, he placed it in the year of his victories amongst the Greeks. We are informed by Tacitus that it was at Rome that Vespasian fell into disgrace for sleeping at the Musical disputes of the Emperor. 'Ferebantque Vespasianum, tamquam fomno conviveret, a Phœbo liberto increpitum, ægreque meliorum precibus obsecrum: mox imminentem perniciem majore fato effugisse (16). . . . And they said that Vespasian was reproved for sleeping by the freed man Phœbus, and that he was with great difficulty saved through the intercession of the better sort of people. It was soon after believed that he had escaped the present danger, being reserved for a bigger destiny.' Mr de Tillemont thinks that Vespasian twice committed this crime of sleeping at Nero's Music; first at Rome, and afterwards in Greece (17). This is not very probable: a courtier who hath once run the risk of his life, would take more care to avoid a relapse, especially, when it may be easily done.

[D] The answer made him on mount Carmel. . . . The Carmelites who build . . . the chimerical antiquity of their . . . institution. Tacitus's words are: 'Eli Judæam inter Syriamque Carmelus, ita vocant montem, deumque: nec simulacrum deo, aut templum, (sic tradidere majores) ara tantum & reverentia. Illic sacrificanti Vespasiano, cum spes occultas versaret animo, Basilides sacerdos, inspectis identidem extis, Quidquid est, inquit, Vespasiane quod paras, seu domum exstruere, seu prolatare agros, sive ampliari servitium datur

Vespasian tho' animated by pæfages, and the follicitations of his friends, hesitated for some time, and the concurrence of several fortuitous events (i), and the most preffing reasons of Mucianus (k) were wanting to change his uncertain thoughts into a fixed resolution of declaring himself emperor. It is very probable that the lies, which were artfully spread about contributed very considerably to the success of his enterprize [E]. He was the first who grew better, after he had ascended the throne (l); and it would be unjust not to own that he remedied several evils, and did some very good actions. The desire of amassing treasures was his great vice, which he took no great care to hide; yet there is reason to believe that he contrived it so, that part of his extortions were imputed to his

(i) Ambigua de Vespasiano facta: solique omnium ante le principum in melius mutatus est. Tacit. ibid. lib. i, cap. l.

concubine

(18) Tacit. Hist. lib. ii, cap. lxxviii.

datur tibi magna sedes, ingentes termini, multum hominum. Has ambages & statim exceperat fama, & tunc aperiebat, nec quidquam magis in ore vulgi; crebriores apud ipsum sermones: quanto sperantibus plura dicuntur (18). - - - Between Judea and Syria his Carmel: that is the name which they give both to the mountain and to the god. The god has no temple nor image, (for such is the religion of the country handed down from father to son) he has no more than an altar and reverence paid to him. While Vespasian was sacrificing there, and revolving in his mind his secret hopes, the priest Basilides, every now and then looking upon the entrails, spoke to him in this manner: Vespasian, whatever your designs be, whether to build a house, to extend your lands, or to increase the number of your slaves, a great seat is provided for you, large bounds, and a vast multitude of men. Fame presently took up this dark oracle, and even then explained it; nor was any thing more talked of by the vulgar. To himself it was still more frequently mentioned; for the more people hope the more they are entertained with the like discourses. I thought I ought not to suppress the last words of this citation, for they contain an excellent instruction, or rather a lively image of the deceits and illusions of ambition. The people discoursed of those pæfages, but those who approached Vespasian talked more of them still; for the more such discourses create any hopes, the more frequently are they repeated. I proceed now to Suetonius: 'Apud Judæam Carmeli Dei oraculum consulente, ita confirmare fortis, ut quidquid cogitaret volveretque animo, quantulumlibet magnum, id esse preventurum polliceretur (19). - - - When he consulted the oracle of the god Carmel in Judea, he was encouraged by this answer, viz. that the meditation and purpose of his heart, however great it was, should be accomplished.' Those who weigh the circumstances of these two Historians words, and understand the religion which God delivered to the Jews, will without any difficulty be convinced, that the oracle consulted by Vespasian upon that mountain, was a deity full as false as that at Delphi. Nevertheless the Carmelites maintain, that this was the oracle of the same God who was worshipped at Jerusalem. Hermenigildus à Sancto Paulo, a Spanish Monk, refuted this opinion, and shewed the Paganism of the god Carmelus mentioned by Tacitus and Suetonius: but Laurence Angelus Espin, a Carmelite, could not bear this truth; he published a tract at Saragossa in answer to it, with the pompous and insulting title of Ruina Idoli Carmelitici quod somniavit Reverendiss. P. Fr. Hermenigildus à S. Paulo. This bold writer did not maintain his presuming character; he was silenced by the Marquis of Agropoli, who printed a piece at Seville in the year 1678, in which he with a great deal of solidity and learning proves, that his good friend, Father Hermenigildus à S. Paulo, had the right side of the dispute: the Carmelites resolved to do him an ill turn for it, and to gratify their resentment with the more address, they prosecuted the Marquis for denying the pretended Haubett of Seville. Eodem actu contra Marchionem mihi consentientem procedunt; eandem quidem pretendentes causam, reapse verò stomachantes quod suum Laurentium Espin conatum Carmelo vindicare pro ætate Vespasiani decorem indebitum, fecerit obmutescere (20). - - - The same stratagem is employed against the Marquis, for thinking as I do. They do indeed pretend the same reason; but the truth is, they are angry with him for having put to silence their Advocate Laurence Espin, who claims an unjust honour for Carmel in the time of Vespasian.' They brought him into the Inquisition, as an accomplice of Papebroch, a French writer, and hired, said they, to write against Spain. They pretended that he had betrayed Spain, and that his crime was downright treason. Neque scimus, inquit, utrum major sit audacia quod homo Francus (qualem me fingunt) eo stylo utatur contra scriptores Hispanos, quam quod Agropolitanus Marchio homo mere laicus, scriptis suis ignorantia plenius, patriæ honorem prodatur, favens auctori Franco, quem novit conductum ut scribat contra Hispaniam. . . . quod grave Marchionis illius delictum est, perduellionis etiam crimine exaggeratum, adeoque facit eum sacro Tribunali delatabilem, sicut eum delatamus in præfentiarum, una cum Papebrochio, ut eorundem peccatorum complices (21). This is what they did in the year 1691. By which we see that the most eminent characters are no security against Monkish persecutions; for a man can scarce have more titles of honour than this Marquis: I can only give part of them, for I am stopped by an Et cætera from citing the whole. Gaspar de Mendoza, Ibanes de Segovia & Peralta, Eques Ordinis de Alcantara, Marchio de Mondaxar, Comes Tendilla, & utroque titulo ex Primatibus Hispaniæ; nec non Marchio de Valbemoso & Agropoli, Dominus Provinciæ de Almoquera, Toparcha Oppidorum Corpæ, Mecí, Fuentonobilæ, Lorancæ, Avionis, Vianæ, &c. Observe that his book was printed in Spanish at Seville, and translated into Latin by Father Papebroch, a Jesuit of Antwerp, and not a Frenchman as these accusers most ignorantly pretend. This Latin translation was printed at Antwerp in the year 1698. See the Utrecht Journalists (22).

Besides other reasons which this Marquis uses, he refutes the Carmelites by an argument drawn from the person of Vespasian; for he cites (23) several authors who are of opinion that this Emperor was the boar of the forest, of which David spoke by a prophetic spirit (24). He saith that he is called Cæsar pium - - - the murderer of the saints in the Sibyl's verses, and that he and his son Titus are the types of Antichrist according to Malvenda. What probability then, concludes he, is there that the true God should honour such a man as he with his answers? He solidly refutes Marcellus Donatus (25), who was of that opinion.

[E] It is very probable, that the lies . . . contributed very considerably to the success of his enterprize.] Copies of a letter from the Emperor Otho to Vespasian were dispersed, by which the latter was constituted that Emperor's avenger, not to say that Otho therein expressed an ardent desire that Vespasian would relieve the Republic. A report was also industriously spread that Vitellius had resolved to remove the German legions to Syria, and those of Syria to Germany. Plurimum captis contulerunt, jactatum exemplar epistolæ, veræ sive falsæ, defuncti Othonis ad Vespasianum, extrema obtestatione ultionem mandantis, & ut Reip. subveniret, optantis, simul rumor dissipatus, destitisse Vitellium victorem permutare hiberna legionum, & Germanicas transferre in Orientem ad securiorem mollioremque militiam (26). These two particulars which doubtless were forged by the enemies of Vitellius, very much conduced to Vespasian's interest. The pretended letter of Otho passed for a sort of last-will, which afforded Vespasian a lawful pretence. The Syrian legions charmed with their pleasant quarters in so agreeable a climate, and forming to themselves a terrible idea of the German ice and snow, were easily gained to the Emperor's party, who would prevent the change of their winter quarters. The Syrians also used to these legions, had been very sorry to part with them for others ordered thither from a barbarous country (27). This encouraged them to favour Vespasian. This is the fate of revolutions: they require the assistance of a thousand

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) In the months of September and October 1698, pag. 730, & seq.

(23) Exam. Divinitatis, Art. xxv.

(24) Psalm. lxxix, ver. 15.

(25) Marc. Donatus, Schol. in Histor. Roman.

(26) Sueton. ubi supra, cap. vi.

(27) See Tacitus, ubi supra, cap. lxxviii.

concubine Cænis [F]. This was a poor way of clearing himself; for even those who believed that he knew not that she sold all places, would have accounted this ignorance as a most shameful fault. He was the first who had a tax on urine (m). I have said something elsewhere (n) concerning some miraculous cures of which he passed the author. He died on the 24th of June, in the year 79, after a reign of ten years wanting six days, aged a little above sixty nine years. It ought not to be forgotten that he behaved with great moderation towards those who had offended him (o), and bestowed many presents and many favours on ingenious men, and those who cultivated the liberal arts (p). He never was ashamed of the meanness of his first condition, but ridiculed the vain efforts of some Genealogists who would make him to be descended from one of Hercules's companions [G]. He was too fond of raillery, which he carried even to a great degree of buffoonry, and made no scruple of using the most obscene expressions. He very frequently

(m) Sueton. ibid.
cap. xxiii.

(n) In the Nouvelles de la Republique, des Lettres, June
1686, Art. i, p.
630.

(o) Sueton. ibid.
cap. xiii. & seq.

(p) Id. ibid. cap.
xviii.

thousand forged writings and false alarms to affect the minds of the people. Without that, two in a thousand will never succeed.

[F] He contrived it so that part of his extortions were imputed to his concubine Cænis. Xiphilin in abridging Dion Cassius left out several things that were doubtless of great importance: but if I mistake not, he hath not done so in those facts which concern this concubine: I am apt to think he hath kept the whole. His abridgment acquaints us when she died (28). We there find that Vespasian loved her tenderly, and was indebted to her for the great power he acquired, and the vast treasures he amassed. She sold all the offices in the law, in the army, and those which related to religion, besides the very decisions of Vespasian himself. Under that Emperor no body lost his life for being rich; but many saved it with the help of their purses. Cænis received all those sums, and he was suspected, not without reason, to be privy to it. The Historian offers two reasons which obliged him to mention this woman: first, she was very faithful; and in the second place, she had a very extraordinary memory: Ἐμνημόνευσα δὲ αὐτῆς ὅτι τὴν αἰσθητικὴν ἔν καὶ ὅτι μνήμης ἀείσα ἐπεφύκει. Cujus propterea mentionem feci quod maxima fide & excellenti memoria fuit (29): For proof of which, he quotes the answer which she returned to Antonia, her mistress (30), who had obliged her to write some secret passage relating to Sejanus, to be communicated to Tiberius, and who had ordered it to be immediately blotted out, to prevent all inconveniences from the discovery. It is in vain, replied she, that you give me that order, for this, and all other things which you speak of to me, are so firmly fixed in my memory, that they cannot be blotted out (31). I admire this in her, faith the Historian. Τῷτο τὴν αὐτῆς ἰθαύμασα. Id igitur in ea admiratus sum (32). It must be owned that such an answer deserved a place in this author; but it must at the same time be allowed that it was not pertinent. It could only have been just, if Antonia had desired that all ideas of this letter might be blotted out. But this was not what she desired, her intention was only to prevent all external evidences of her secret, and that no discovery should be confirmed by proofs: she did not distrust Cænis, nor was she apprehensive of accusations purely verbal, and destitute of the strong supports of written testimonies. To what purpose then was it to say, that blotting out the letter was no effectual way to prevent the inconvenience against which Antonia's precaution was levelled? Cænis's happy memory did not give Antonia any uneasiness, when she knew the writing was not in being. Observe, that Cænis was made free by this lady, and was her Secretary. Vespasian kept her in his house before he married, sent her away when he married, and took her again after the death of his wife, and treated her almost like a wife. Post uxoris excessum, Cænidem Antoniae libertam, & a manu dilectam quandam sibi, revocavit in contubernium: habuitque etiam Imperator pene justae uxoris loco (33). After her death he took several concubines (34), which shewed that he thought no other sufficient to supply her place, and that he had recourse to several to compensate the loss he suffered in this one mistress. It is observed as an evidence of Domitian's pride or incivility, that Cænis at her return from a journey offering to kiss him according to custom, he presented her his hand to kiss (35).

[G] He ridiculed the vain efforts of some Genealogists, who would make him to be descended from one of Hercules's companions. Most of these people are prodigiously impudent (36); and when a favourite or minister gives them the least encouragement, they present him with whatever pedigree he pleases. A Superintendent of the Finances needs only choose, and if he is disposed liberally to reward those genealogy makers, he shall descend, if he please, from the ancient Trojans.

Tunc licet à Pico numeres genus, altaque si te Nomina delectant, omnem Titanida pugnam Inter majores ipsumque Promethea ponas: De quocunque voles proavum tibi fumito libro (37). (37) Juven. Sat. VIII, ver. 131.

Then trace your birth from Pico, if you please: If be's too modern, and your pride aspire To seek the author of your being higher, Choose any Titan who the gods withstood, To be the founder of your antient blood, Prometheus, and that race before the flood, Or any other story you can find From Herald, or in Poets, to your mind.

DRYDEN.

Pegnafel Contreras of Granada, . . . not content to particularize . . . one hundred and eighteen successions from Adam to Philip III, hath deduced one hundred and twenty-one from the same original to the Duke of Lerma, on whose account this fine piece was written. To accomplish this, the author, as others have done, rakes up the ruins of old Troy, where he finds (even before its destruction) two brothers Illus and Asaracus, from the first of whom he makes the King of Spain to be descended, and from the other his Excellency; who by this means being a very distant relation to his Catholic Majesty, he hath obliged him with a much nearer affinity by his maternal line, which he hath also drawn. And because it would not be proper to leave a Duke so highly descended without some sovereignties in his family, he makes Æneas one of his ancestors. . . . A little after Æneas he crowds in Brutus, who is said to have given his name to Great Britain (38). The number of cheats and bubbles was not less in former times than at present. If Vespasian had pleased, the Genealogical stem of the house of Flavia had been so drawn, that the greatest names in old Rome had infallibly been inserted in the male or female line. He would have seen in it,

. . . . Stanteis in curribus Æmilianos, Et Curios jam dimidiis, humerisque minorem Corvinum, & Galbam auriculis nasoque carentem? Fumosos equitum cum dictatore magistris (39).

(39) Juvenal. Sat. VIII, ver. 2.

The brave Æmilii, as in triumph plac'd, The virtuous Curii, half by time defac'd; Corvinus, with a mouldring nose that bears Injurious scars, the sad effects of years, And Galba grinning without nose or ears.

Old Captains and Dictators of their race.

DRYDEN.
He

(28) Xiphilin.

(29) Mother of the Emperor Claudius. See the remark [C] of the article ANTONIA, the elder.

(31) Xiphil. ubi supra.

(32) Id. ibid.

(33) Sueton. in Vespas. cap. iii.

(34) Id. ibid. cap. xxi.

(35) Cænidis patris concubine ex litris reverse oculumque ut affuerat offerenti manum præbuit. Idem, in Domit. cap. xii.

(38) La Motte le Vayer, Discours de l'Histoire, ii, pag. 160, 161.

frequently made use of this turn of thought to elude the just reproaches to which his avarice and the rigour of his exactions exposed him [H].

He would therein have found Murranus who was killed in Æneas's time, from whom the most ancient Latin kings were descended.

Murranus hic, atavos & avorum antiqua sonantem
Nomina, per regesque, actum genus omnem Latinos, Præcipitem scopulo, atque ingentis turbine faxi Excutit (40).

(40) Virgil.
Æneid. lib. xii,
ver. 549.

Murranus, boasting of his blood, that springs
From a long royal race of Latian kings,
Is by the Trojan from his chariot thrown,
Cruel'd with the weight of an unwieldy stone.

DRYDEN.

Some laboured to prove that the founders of the city of Reate, and a certain hero whose monument was in a street of Rome, and who had accompanied Hercules, were also the founders of the family of Vespasian; but this Emperor was the first who laughed at their endeavours, he never concealed the meanness of his extraction, but frequently spoke of it himself. Mediocritatem præstinam neque dissimulavit unquam, ac frequenter etiam præ se tulit. Quin & conantes quosdam originem Flavii generis ad conditores Reatinos, comitemque Herculis, cujus monumentum exstat via Salaria, referre, irriti ultro (41). It is not strange that such a Genealogical labour should be undertaken to flatter an Emperor, since more than this was done for a person who was only Quæstor to Augustus. I speak of one Quintus Vitellius, to whom it was proved by a book written expressly to that end (42), that his ancestors had reigned over all Latium, and that they owed their original to Faunus King of the Aborigines, and to Vitellia, who had been worshipped in several places as a goddess. Notwithstanding which, according to several other authors, the Vitellii sprang from a Freedman, or even from a Cobar (43). It is incredible how many families boasted of an elder date than the famous siege of Troy. The Glabrio's pretended to be descended from Æneas (44). The pious Paula fo celebrated in St Jerom's works, gave out that she issued from Agamemnon; and that Genealogy was mentioned in her epitaph written by St Jerom:

Scipio quam genuit, Pauli fudere parentes
Gracchorum Soboles, Agamemnonis inclyta proles.
Hoc jacet in tumulo (45).

(45) Hieronym.
Epist. ad Euthochium Virginem,
pag. m. 514.

Here lies intomb'd within this place
A lady of great Scipio's race;
She from the Pauli and the Gracchi springs,
And from old Agamemnon, King of Kings.

(46) See Balzac's Dissertations at the end of the Socrate Chrétien,
pag. 63, 64.

Synesius, Bishop of Cyrene in the beginning of the Vth century, said he was descended from Hercules, and maintained that the archives of Cyrene contained sufficient proofs of this extraction (46). The observation of these things is not useless; for it shews, that our age doth not go beyond the most venerable antiquity in this sort of chimeras (47). Our age affords us an example which runs parallel with that of Vespasian. Read Naudé's words: 'Cardinal Mazarin,

(47) See la Bruyere's Characters in the chapter intitulée de quelques usages, pag.
m. 599. See also, remark [H], of the article BZO-VIUS.

saith he (48), above five years ago in the presence of several persons of honour and probity, from whom I have it, ridiculed a certain flatterer, who would trace the original of the family and arms of Mazzarini, from the old Roman Consuls T. Geganus Macerinus, M. Geganus Macerinus II, Proculus Geganus Macerinus, M. Geganus Macerinus III, which the ancient chronicle of Haloander, Panvinus in his Fasti, and the Roman Historians mention, in the years à Regifugio XVIII. & ab urbe condita CCCVII. CCCXIV. & CCCXVII: And that almost at the same time he threatened a certain Priest of Avignon named Thomas Bonnet, to send him to the Bastille, if, contrary to the strict charge which had been several times repeated to him, he published a Genealogy or History di Casa Mazzirini, because he said wonderful things of it without any proof, and without shewing by some authentic records the affinity of many illustrious families he spoke of.'

[H] He was too fond of raillery . . . made no scruple of using the most obscene expressions . . . to elude the reproaches to which . . . his exactions exposed him.] Being accustomed to this in his private condition, it would have been very difficult for him to have abstained from it on the throne, for the itch of jesting is the most incurable that can possibly infect any body.

However, it is infinitely below the character of a great monarch to debase himself by low jokes as Vespasian did. 'Super cœnam autem, & semper alias comissus, multa joco transigebat. Erat enim dicacitatis plurimæ, & sic scurrilis ac sordidæ, ut ne prætextatis quidem verbis abstinere. Et tamen nonnulla ejus facetissima exstant, in quibus & hoc: Menstrum Florum, consularem, admonitus ab eo plaustra potius quam plostra dicenda, die postero Flaurum salutavit. Expugnatus autem à quadam, quasi amore sui deperiret, cum productæ pro concubitu festertia quadraginta donasset: admonente dispensatore quem admodum summam rationibus vellet referri, Vespasiano, inquit, adamato (49). . . . Maxime tamen dicacitatem in deformibus lucris affectabat, ut invdiam aliqua cavillatione dilueret, transferretque ad sales (50). . . . At supper, and indeed at all other times, he was very free in his conversation, and delighted much in jokes. For he was above measure fond of raillery, and that too of such a low and scurrilous kind, that he did not even scruple to make use of obscene words. Nevertheless, some humorous sayings of his are still preserved, and among the rest this: Being once at a time admonished by Menstrum Florus, a consular person, that he should rather say plaustra than plostra, the next day he saluted him by the name of Flaurus. At another time having yielded to a lady, who pretended to be desperately in love with him, after he had gratified her passion, and made her a present of forty festertia, his steward asking him how he would have that sum placed in his accounts; Set it down, said he, to the dearly-beloved Vespasian. . . . Above all, he affected to be witty on those occasions when he made profits out of low and sordid things; and in order to avoid the shame of such gains, he turned the matter into a jest. Did he believe these railleries would make people insensible of the oppression of his exorbitant exactions?

(48) Naudé Dialogue de Mac-
curat, pag. 26, 27. That book was written in 1649.

(49) Sueton. in Vespas. cap. xxii.

(50) Id. ibid. cap.
xxiii.

VIGERIUS (MARK) Cardinal of the title of St Mary on the other side the Tyber, was of Savona. He was taken from a monastery of Franciscans, and created Cardinal by Julius II. He was afterwards made Bishop of Præneste, and Archpriest of the Vatican church. He had taught Theology at Padua and Rome. He died on the 18th of June 1516, aged seventy years, and was buried without an epitaph at St Mary's beyond the Tyber (a). He wrote several books, one of which was to prove that JESUS CHRIST'S tunic ought to give place to Longinus's spear [A].

(a) Taken from the Athenæum Romanum, of the Jesuit Augustin Oldoini,
pag. 431.

[A] He wrote several books, one of which was to prove that JESUS CHRIST'S tunic ought to give place to Longinus's spear.] The occasion of this work is singular. Bajazet, Emperor of the Turks, having two very precious reliques, viz. the seamless coat of our Saviour, and the spear which pierced his heart, presented the latter to the Pope, and kept the former for himself (1). On this occasion a great dispute arose in Italy, whether the present made to the Pope was better than that which the Grand Seigneur reserved for himself. They carefully examined whether a Turkish Prince had a good taste in point of reliques. Our Vigerius was ordered to make it appear, that the Sultan was no nice judge in things of this

(1) See the article of INNOCENT VIII, remark [F].

VOL. V.

6 C

this kind, since the seamless tunic ought to give the precedence to the lance. In effect, the spear penetrated to the heart; and was tinged with the very vital blood; but the tunic only touched the external parts. Bartholinus mentions this dispute. Insedit hæc opinio,

(4) Thomas Bartholinus, Differentiæ de lateris Christi, pag. 21, 22.

saith he (2), Marco Vigerio Episcopo Præfinito & Cardinali Sennegallensi in Controversia quam jussu æqualium suorum de præstantia & dignitate lanceæ Longini Pontifici Romano à Turcarum Imperatore missæ, præ tunica inconsultis, quam ipse Bajazetes sibi reservarat, olim ipse conscriptis, post à Simone Begnio Modrusensi Episcopo per prælatum Ascanianum typis divulgatum. Tractatu quarto fol. 10. primas lanceæ defert, quia non extrema solum, ut tunica, sed sanctissimi corporis medium attingit & nobilissima; vel forte loca cordis; & ipsum attingit cor; ad quæ in morte Christi omnis vigor vitalis humoris, in exhausto corpore reliquit, ut ad arcem munendam, & ad proprium domicilium se contulerat: qua forte de causa sanguis defluxit & aqua per lanceam. Postea paucis interjectis: Ferrum autem aqua perfrusum est; quam de fonte intimi cordis eduxit, & de micanti mucrone rubens & sanguinolentum spiculum regio sacerdotilique sanguine cruentatum extitit.

Calvin had not heard of this present of Bajazet, for he takes no notice of it in that place where he observes that the iron point of that lance was actually in four different places, if we believe the Papists (3).

(3) Calvin. Inventaire des Reliques, p. m. 29.

He did not forget that the Turks boast of having the tunic. His words are (4), 'Concerning the seamless garment for which lots were cast, because it was thought very proper to excite the devotion of the ignorant, there are several of them. For at Argenteuil near Paris, there is one; and another at Triers. And if the Bull of St Salvador in Spain speaks truth, the Christians, by their inconsiderate zeal, have done worse than the Infidel soldiers. For these not daring to tear it in pieces, cast lots for it: But the Christians have divided it in order to adore it. Besides, what answer will they make to the Turk, who laughs at their folly, and pretends it is in his possession? But we need not make them quarrel with the Turk; let them end the debate amongst themselves. In the mean while we shall be excused from believing what is said by the one as well as the other side, that we may not favour one party more than the other, without being well apprized of the matter. For that would be contrary to all reason.'

Oldoini mentions the following books of our Vigilius: Apologiam contra Pifanum Conciliabulum scriptam, & libellum unum decachordum Christianum prænotatum, & alterum de ferro lanceæ, & Christi indumentis, eorumque dignitate (5). I omit the list of books not printed (6).

(5) August. Oldoinus, in Athenæo Romano, pag. 481.
(6) It is in Oldoini, ibid.

VIGILANTIUS, Rector of a parish in the diocese of Barcelona in Spain, was by nation a Gaul [A], and lived about the beginning of the Vth century. He composed some books, in which he discovered a zeal for religion; but suffering himself

to

[A] He was by nation a Gaul. Gennadius asserts it in express terms (1); but he is thought to be mistaken by some who ground their opinion on St Jerom, who gives Vigilantius the epithet of Calaguritanus. 'Fuit ipse natione Hispanus, patriâ Calaguritanus, ut idem S. Hieronymus tradit, ex quo Gennadius redarguitur (2). --- He was a Spaniard by nation, of the city of Cataborra, as St Jerom relates, by which Gennadius is proved to be in an error.' But I should rather chuse to justify Gennadius from St Jerom's words; for an author, who mentions several monsters, and saith particularly that Geryon was born in Spain; triformem Geryonem Hispaniæ prodiderunt (3). --- Spain produced Geryon, that monster, with three shapes, and adds, that Gaul alone never had any monsters, and that it had always abounded with great and eloquent men, but that all of a sudden Vigilantius arose, and fought against the Spirit of our Lord; a writer, I say, who places his periods in this manner, would he have us believe that this Heretic was born in Spain, and not in Gaul? It is certain that if a person designed to signify that Vigilantius was a Gaul and not a Spaniard, he would express himself like St Jerom. Cæcum describit Virgilius, triformem Geryonem Hispaniæ prodiderunt. Sola Gallia monstra non habuit, sed viris semper fortissimis, & eloquentissimis abundavit. Exortus est subito Vigilantius, seu verius Dormitantius, qui immundo spiritu pugnet contra Christi spiritum (4). Another passage of St Jerom more expressly points out Vigilantius's country, and that so exactly, that no room is left to doubt that he makes him a native of the country which is at present called Cominge. 'Nimirum respondet generi suo (Vigilantius) ut qui de latrocinio & convenarum natus est semine: quos Cn. Pompeius, edomitâ Hispaniâ, & ad triumphum redire festinans de Pyrenæi jugis deposuit, & in unum oppidum congregavit; unde & convenarum urbs nomen accepit. Huc usque latrocinetur contra ecclesiam Dei, & de Vescionibus, Arrebacis, Celtiberisque descendens incurset Galliarum Ecclesias, portetque nequaquam vexillum Christi, sed insigne Diaboli. Fecit hoc idem Pompeius, etiam in orientis partibus; ut Cilicibus & Isauris piratis, latronibusque superatis, sui nominis inter Ciliciam & Isauriam conderet civitatem. Sed hæc urbs hodie servat scita majorum, & nullus in ea ortus est Dormitantius. Gallie vernaculum hostem sustinent, & hominem moti capitis, atque Hippocratis vinculis alligandum, sedentem cernunt in Ecclesia' (5).

(1) Vigilantius presbyter natione Gallus. Gennadius, de Scriptis Eccles. cap. xxxv.

(2) Baronius, ad ann. 406, num. 42.

(3) Hieronymus. Epist. adv. Vigilant. pag. m. 548.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Id. ibid., pag. 551.

--- Vigilantius behaves in a manner quite suitable to his pedigree; since he is descended from a mixed breed of robbers; whom Cneius Pompey, having subdued Spain, and returning with all speed to his triumph, brought down from the tops of the Pyrenean mountains, and placed them together in one city, which from thence took its name (Comminges). Hisbert therefore has Vigilantius, like a robber, harassed the Church of GOD; and descending from the Vescions, the Arabaci, and the Celtiberi, made incursions upon the Churches of Gaul, carrying with him not the standard of Christ, but the ensign of the Devil. Pompey did the same thing in the East; for when he had subdued the Cilician and Isaurian pirates and robbers, he built a city between Cilicia and Isauria, and called it after his own name. But the inhabitants of this city still adhere to the maxims of their forefathers, and no Dormitantius, [that is a name derived from slumbering, as Vigilantius is from watching] has ever appeared among them. But Gaul entertains a home-bred enemy, and behold sitting in the church a man of a disturbed brain, who deserves to be bound with the fetters of Hippocrates. But it will be asked why then does he use the epithet Calaguritanus, in such a manner as discovers that he took that word in the same sense as if he would have expressed Quintilian's country (6)? For an answer to this difficulty, I refer you to the learned Mr de Marca, who, I believe, have not read, nor do any otherwise know than by the following words of the Abbot de la Roque: 'As it is no dishonour for a man to be of a country which hath produced ill men, and an Historian is always obliged to speak truth, Mr de Marca, in a discourse which he wrote concerning the country of Vigilantius, which this monster hath dishonoured by his errors, corrects the blunder which almost all Historians have committed concerning this Heretic, by proving that his birth-place was not Calaguris, a city in Spain, but Calaguri, a village near the city of St Bertrand in the diocese of Cominge. This is what Baronius was ignorant of, and which they may certainly correct in Moreri's new Dictionary' (7).

I shall pass over Hadrian Valeus's observations against St Jerom, that learned Critic shews (8) that this Father contradicts himself, since the situation of the places will not allow that the same person should be descended from the Vescions (9), the Arabaci, the Celtiberi, and those robbers whom Pompey gathered into a body. Father Pagi promises to answer, in favour of St Jerom, the objections of Valeus (10), and saith beforehand that instead of Vescionibus, it ought not to be read Vescionibus (11), but Vasconibus. This correction will not remove the difficulties as to the Arabaci Celtiberisque. This is only by the way.

Observe that James Valdes, the Cilician, conjectures that the epithet Calaguritanus might be taken from some

(6) Id. ibid., pag. 549.

(7) Journal des Savans, of the 31st of March 1681, pag. 120. Dutch edition of the opuscule of Mr de Marca's opuscule, published the first time in 1681.

(8) Hadrian. Valeus, Notit. Galliar. p. 15.

(9) Or Vescionibus.

(10) Pagi, letter to the Abbot Nicaise of the 5th of October 1696. It was first printed in 4to, and then in the Marcellus de la République de Lucerne, the July 1699.

(11) It is Valdes's conjecture, and is supported.

to be seduced by the love of praise, and presuming too much on his strength, and having acquired more politeness of stile [B], than knowledge in the scripture, he explained ill one of the visions of the Prophet Daniel, and vented some other trifles, which they placed in the catalogue of heresies (a). St Jerom refuted him (b). This is what Gennadius saith of him; from whence we may conjecture that he did not altogether approve the vehemence with which St Jerom wrote against Vigilantius; for one would think, by what St Jerom says of that priest, that he was the most accursed heretic that ever was [C]. The Protestants judge otherwise of it, they are persuaded that Vigilantius very justly condemned vows of celibacy, the use of wax-candles at the sepulchres of the martyrs, the honour paid to faints, prayers for the dead, and nocturnal assemblies for devotion, &c. Several disorders were committed in those assemblies, and at last it

(a) Exposuit pravo ingenio secundum visionem Danielis, & alia locuta est frivola que in catalogo hereticorum necessario ponuntur. Gennadius, de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. cap. xxxv.

(b) Taken from Gennadius, ibid. WAS some town in Gaul; for he will not allow Vigilantius to be a Spaniard: 'Gallus, saith he (12), à Gennadio de script. Eccles. dicitur, & quamvis Calaguritanus à B. Hieronymo nuncietur in princ. adversus Vigilantium, & à Varonio 5. tom. anno 406. & Pamplonensem dicat Mariana de reb. Hisp. lib. 4. c. 20. tamen non Hispanum appellant, sed potius videntur Gallum nunciare, cum tunc monstra Gallie nasci hereticorum dixerint, & potuit esse Calaguritanum aliud oppidum Gallie, vel ibi presbyterum fuisse, ut Barcionem, non tamen natum. --- Gennadius says that he was a Gaul; and the St Jerom and Baronius give him the epithet of Calaguritanus, and Mariana that of Pamplonenis, yet they do not call him a Spaniard, but seem rather to say that he was a Gaul, by saying that Gaul did then produce monsters of Heresy. Besides, there may possibly have been another town in Gaul, which bore that name of Calaguris, or he may have been a Presbyter there as he was at Barcelona, without being born in any of these cities.' In another place he alleges St Jerom declaring that Spain never produced any Heretic besides Priscillian. Regio enim Hispana ut B. Hieronymus c. 17. in Esaiam, inquit, monstra hereticorum non generavit & unum parvum Priscillianum ut abortivum & impium pia mater procul à se abiecit, pariterque abiecit (13).

[B] More politeness of stile. For so with Mr du Pin (14) we may translate the lingua polita of Gennadius. I observe this to the end that we may more clearly see the difference betwixt St Jerom and Gennadius. The former saith that Vigilantius wrote very ill: 'Miseruntque libros per fratrem Sisinnium quos inter crapulam sterens evomit. . . . Est quidem imperitus & verbis & scientia, & sermone inconditus, ne vera quidem potest defendere (15). --- They sent books by Sisinnius, which he had shewed out in his drunken fits. . . . He is a man truly ignorant both of stile and matter, and so disagreeable in his discourse that he could not even defend a good cause.' Gennadius, who knew what character St Jerom had given him, yet doth not scruple to acknowledge the polite language of Vigilantius. He meant, doubtless, not that this Heretic spoke elegantly, and wrote barbarously, but that there appeared a politeness in his writings. He then judges quite otherwise of him than St Jerom, and ought more to be credited; for when an adversary refutes a man with that bitterness, which clearly appears in St Jerom, it is hardly possible for him to own that he writes well; he chiefly aims to expose him, in all respects, to the readers contempt.

[C] One would think, by what St Jerom says of this Priest, that he was the most accursed Heretic that ever was. St Jerom calls him Samaritan and Jew, a filthy wretch, whose tongue ought to be cut out, and a furious monster that ought to be bound. Ati, Vigilantium, qui κατ' αντιρροσιν hoc vocatur nomine, nam Dormitantis rectius diceretur, os fatidum rursus aperire, & potorem spurcissimum contra sanctorum martyrum proferre reliquias; & nos, qui eas suspicimus, appellare cinerarios & idololatrias, qui mortuorum hominum ossa veneremur. O infelice hominem, & omni lacrymarum fonte plangendum, qui hæc dicens, non se intelligat esse Samaritanum, & Judæum (16). . . . O precidendam linguam à medicis, immò insanum curandum caput: ut qui loqui nescit, dicat aliquando reticere. Ego vidi hoc aliquando portentum, testimonii scripturarum, quasi vinculis Hippocratis, volui ligare furiosum: sed abiit, excessit, evasit, erupit, & inter Hadrie fluctus, Cotique regis alpes in nos declamando clamavit. Quidquid enim amens loquitur, vociferatio & clamor est appellandus (17). He calls Vigilantius's words a most filthy drunken vomit (18). He saith, in another place, that the conduct of his followers is not so much their own action, as that of the Devils which dwell in them. Quales nuper sub Magistro cerebroso in Gallia pullularunt, qui basilicas martyrum declinantes, nos qui ibi orationes ex more celebramus, quasi immundos fugiunt. Hoc autem non tam illi faciunt quam habitantes in eis demones, fortitudinem & flagella sancti cineris fugientes (19). He saith so particularly of Vigilantius, Sentio, sentio, infelicissime mortalium, quid delectas, quid times. Spiritus iste immundus, qui hæc te cogit scribere, sæpe hoc vilissimum tortus est pulvere, immò bodieque torquetur: & qui in te plagas dissimulat, in ceteris confitetur (20). Observe that Vigilantius's diocesan acquiesced in his doctrine: this St Jerom disliked, and would have had this earthen vessel broken with an iron rod. Miror sanctum Episcopum, in cujus parochia esse presbyter dicitur acquiescere furori ejus, & non virgâ Apostolicâ, virgaque ferrea confringere vas inutile, & tradere in interitum carnis, ut spiritus saluus fiat (21). If these invectives are very exorbitant, I do not think that St Jerom's description of Vigilantius's opinions is less so. I believe he was treated with the same injustice as the Protestants are treated. He disapproved the religious honour paid to relics, and therefore he was accused of abhorring the memory and the dead bones of the martyrs, and avoiding their sepulchres, as places filled with carrion. But who is ignorant of the difference betwixt hating an object, and refusing to pay religious worship to it? I cannot believe that Vigilantius's opinions concerning celibacy, were what they are represented. Undoubtedly he contented himself with asserting that marriage ought not to be forbidden to Ecclesiastics, and that they ought not to engage in vows of continence. To render this doctrine odious, it was given out that he condemned and detested celibacy, and looked on those as incapable of the Priesthood who had no wife. This false gloss was yet further improved; it was affirmed, that, according to Vigilantius, incontestable proofs of a consummated and fruitful marriage, ought to be given to qualify a person for ordination, and that no man ought to present himself to be ordained without being attended by a wife big with child, or who carried one in her arms. There is no appearance that he either taught or caused to be practised such fooleries as these. What judgment then would you have us form of the sincerity of St Jerom, or of those accusers who informed him concerning this Heretic? Consider very well the words of that holy doctor. 'Proh nefas, Episcopos sui sceleris dicitur habere consortes (Vigilantius); si tamen Episcopi nominandi sunt, qui non ordinant diaconos, nisi prius uxores duxerint, nulli coelibes credentes pudicitiam, imò ostendentes quam sanctè vivant, qui malè de omnibus suspicantur. Et nisi prægnantes uxores viderint Clericorum, infantæ que de ulnis matrum vagientes, Christi sacramenta non tribuunt (22). --- O shame! They say Vigilantius has Bishops who are accomplices of his crime; if, indeed, such persons deserve the name of Bishops, who refuse to ordain Deacons, unless they be first married; believing that no single man can be chaste, and plainly showing what a bad living they themselves lead who have such a bad opinion of every body else. And unless a Clergyman can produce his wife big with child, or having one or two in her arms, these people will not give him the sacraments of CHRIST.' He repeats the same thing at the end of his book. Tota nocte vigilabo, & feci illius, immò discipulis, vel magistris, qui nisi tumentes uteros viderint seminarum, maritus earum Christi ministerio arbitrantur indignos (23). If these tales had been stretched a little farther, Vigilantius would have been accused of a discipline which revived the jus trium liberarum, -- the privilege of those who had three children, in favour of the Ecclesiastics, I mean which allowed exemptions and privileges to the Clergy

(12) Jacobus Valdesius de Dignitate Hispanie, cap. ix, num. 17, pag. m. 204.

(13) Id. ibid. cap. xix, num. 72, pag. 398.

(14) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccles. Tom. iii, pag. 138, Dutch Edit.

(15) Hieron. advers. Vigilant. pag. m. 550.

(16) Hieron. Epist. ad Riparium, pag. m. 543.

(17) Ibid. pag. 543.

(18) Eusebius in immundissimum crapulam. Ibid. Compare with this what is above in citat. (5).

(19) Idem. in Isaiam, cap. lxxv. Apud Baron. ad ann. 406, num. 43.

(20) Idem. Epist. adv. Vigilant. pag. 558, 559.

(21) Idem. Epist. ad Riparium, pag. 545.

(22) Hieron. adv. Vigilant. pag. m. 549.

(23) Id. ib. pag. 564.

was thought necessary to do as Vigilantius advised [D]; to suppress those assemblies, and to give another form to that sort of devotion. The ardour which St Jerom shewed, was perhaps intermixed with some personal resentment; for Vigilantius had traduced him as a favourer of Origen, and this was at the instigation of Rufinus [E]. He had discovered several marks of esteem for Vigilantius, whom Paulinus had recommended to him (c). This was when Vigilantius made a voyage to Jerusalem. An earthquake which happened whilst he was in the Holy Land, so much affrighted him, that he immediately ran stark naked to a church for shelter [F]. Leaving this country he took a view of Egypt (d), and when he returned into the west, he sowed his opinions amongst the Gauls.

(c) See the last remark.

(d) Hieron. Epist. lxxv.

Clergy whose wives were fruitful. They would have asserted, that the laws of his discipline assigned the best bishoprics and benefices not to the most virtuous and learned, but to those who had most children. They would have said that he subjected those Clergymen to canonical penalties, who could not shew any heirs of their bodies. They would have maintained that even with regard to the laity, all the ancient rules of Paganism were revived, which annexed a sort of real damage and scandal to celibacy. They would have published a hundred more extravagancies of this nature.

[D] Several sins were committed in those assemblies, and at last it was found necessary to do as Vigilantius advised.] In those times it was customary to pass whole nights in the churches on occasion of the celebration of certain festivals. The youth applied these opportunities to amorous ends, and several women were hereby debauched, which had not been possible if they had staid at home. It is then certain that Vigilantius justly condemned those nocturnal assemblies, which afforded so many tempting opportunities to sin. See what I have said in the remark [D] of the article THESMOPHORIA. St Jerom doth not deny that these meetings were attended with several disorders, but he asserts that this ought not to interrupt the frequency of their celebration: he alleges that those who perverted these opportunities to sinful purposes, would without them find means to defile themselves; that people are more careful to take hold of occasions which very seldom offer themselves; and that the Easter-eves were not exempt from this lewdness, and consequently ought to be abolished, if his adversary's reasons were just. But that after all, tho' wicked men abuse good things, it does not follow that the use of them ought to be abolished. His words are: Error autem & culpa juvenum, vilissimarumque mulierum, qui per noctem sæpe deprehenduntur, non est religiosi hominibus imputandus; quia & in vigiliis Paschæ tale quid fieri plerumque convincitur: & tamen paucorum culpa non præjudicat religioni; qui & absque vigiliis possunt errare vel in suis, vel in alienis domibus. Apostolorum fidem Judæa proditio non destruxit. Et nostras ergo vigilias male aliorum vigilie non destruant: quin potius pudicitie vigilare cogantur, qui libidini dormiunt. Quod enim scisse bonum est, non potest malum esse, si frequenter fiat: aut, si aliqua culpa vitanda est, non ex eo, quod sæpe, sed ex eo, quod fit aliquando, culpabile est. Non vigilemus itaque diebus Paschæ; ne expectata diu adulterorum desideria compleantur; ne occasione peccandi uxor inveniat, ne maritali non possit recludi clave. Ardentius appetitur, quicquid est rarius (24). It would be very easy to shew the sophistry in every one of St Jerom's arguments, but it is sufficient for me to say that the event refuted him, and justified Vigilantius; for these nocturnal assemblies were at last abolished, to put a stop to the impurities there committed (25). The reader may here remember the mandate which the Archbishop of Paris published in the year 1697, to remedy a like abuse. Let us occasionally observe that the assemblies of the Faithful in the churches of the martyrs were exposed to another inconvenience; the Christians brought with them wherewithal to make good cheer, and made themselves drunk. This abuse prevailed still in Africa in St Augustin's time (26); but that custom had been then abolished in several places: men are so corrupt that even the exercise of devotion itself is perverted to an occasion of evil.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 557, 558.

(25) See the article THESMOPHORIA, citat. (37).

(26) See the xivth Epistle of St Augustin. He says, chap. xxvii, of the villth book, de Civitate Dei, that the wisest people did not carry their suppers to the churches of the Martyrs. See also the second chapter of the sixth book of his Confessions, and St Ambrose, lib. de Helia & Jejunio, cap. xvi.

(27) Baronius, ad ann. 406, num. 41, ex Hieronymi Apologia II.

[E] Vigilantius had traduced him as a favourer of Origen, and this was at the instigation of Rufinus.] The proofs of all this are to be found in Baronius: You will there see that Rufinus being at Jerusalem, instigated Vigilantius against St Jerom (27). You will there find that after Vigilantius's departure from Palestine, he traduced St Jerom in all places. Di-misisti Egyptum & cunctas provincias reliquisti in quibus sectam tuam libera plerique fronte defendunt, & elegisti me ad infectandum qui omnia contra Ecclesiam dogmata reprehendo, & publica voce condemno (28). - - - You have left Egypt and all the other provinces where your sect is openly embraced by most people; and you have chosen to persecute me, who disapprove and publicly condemn all such doctrines as are contrary to the tenets of the church. You will there find that this sect of Vigilantius has no relation to the particular opinions, which he did afterwards publish in Gaul, but to the calumnies he dispersed against St Jerom, whom he accused of Origenism, to impute to him an inconsistent conduct (29), and a way of proceeding very common among zealous, who condemn in their neighbour what they are themselves guilty of. You will there besides find that this holy Father denies that he accused Vigilantius of Heresy. Unde adversus Rufinum, illum in se concitantem, ipsemet Hieronymus hæc ait: In Vigilantii nomine quid somniet, nescio. Ubi enim eum scripsi hæreticæ apud Alexandriam communione maculatum: Da librum, profer epistolam; nusquam omnino reperies; & inferius; Ego in Vigilantio tibi respondi. Eadem enim accusabat, quæ tu postea & amicus laudas, & inimicus accusas. Nimirum quod ille diceret sanctum Hieronymum Origenis errores sectari; nam subdit: Scio à quo illius contra me rabies concitata sit, novi cuniculos tuos. Hæc Sanctus Hieronymus. Agebat enim id astute Rufinus, ut esset qui Origenis hæresis accusaret Hieronymum, qui ipsum Rufinum & alios omnes Origenistas ejusdem Origenis errorum infimularet; ipsique talionis poenam subire cogeret, ut quem in Origenistas ipse gladium exaceruat, in sua se præcordia converteret non ignoraret (30). - - - Wherefore St Jerom himself makes this answer to Rufinus, who had stirred up Vigilantius against him. As touching Vigilantius, says he, I do not know what you dream of. For where did I write that he was stained with an Heretical communion at Alexandria: Shew the book, produce the letter; you will no where find any such thing; and a little after, In answering Vigilantius I have answered you. For he accused me of the same things, which you afterwards praised as a friend, and now blame as an enemy. This relates to his saying, that St Jerom followed the errors of Origen; for he subjoins: I know by whom his rage has been stirred up against me, I am acquainted with your undermining arts. Thus St Jerom. For Rufinus cunningly endeavoured to get St Jerom accused of Origen's Heresy, because he had charged Rufinus and all the other followers of Origen with the same errors. He did this by way of retaliation, and to make him sensible that he had turned upon himself the sword which he had whetted against others. I have cited (31) a passage in which St Jerom complains, that Vigilantius had traduced him between the Adriatic sea and the Alps. From all which let us conclude, that it was possible a personal resentment might enflame the zeal which he shewed for the truth.

[F] He immediately ran stark-naked into a church for shelter.] St Jerom reproaches him with this fear, and the discovery of his nakedness to the eyes of the faithful. In hac provincia cum subito motus, noctis medio omnes de fomno excitasset, tu prudens & sapientissimus mortalium, nudus orabas, & referebas nobis Adam & Evam de paradiso. Et illi quidem apertis oculis erubuerunt, nudos se esse cernentes, & verenda texerunt arborum foliis; tu & tunica, & fide nudus, subitoque timore perterritus, & aliquid habens nocturnæ crapulæ, sanctorum oculis obsecram partem corporis ingerebas, ut tuam indicares

(28) Hieronymus, Epist. lxxv, epist. Baron. ibid. num. 42.

(29) St Jerom very much indignant against the Origenists.

(30) Hieron. Apologia II.

(31) Baronius, ubi supra.

(32) In the remark [C], citation (17).

Gauls. His sect was of no very long continuance; the irruption of the barbarous nations quashed it; the irruption, I mean, which the Barbarians made not long after into that country, and of which the errors of this heretic were the cause, if we believe the Ecclesiastical Annalist [G]. I have only two faults to charge Mr Moreri with [H].

(32) Hieron. advers. Vigilant. pag. m. 559.

'indicares prudentiam (32). . . . In that province when an earthquake had awaked every body at mid-night, you, that you might prove yourself to be the wisest of all men, were seen to pray stark-naked, and resembled Adam and Eve in Paradise. But they, when their eyes were opened, blushed to see themselves naked, and covered their shame with the leaves of a tree; whereas you, stripped of your cloaths and faith, struck with a sudden fear, and having not quite slept out your debauch over night, exposed your obscene parts to the eyes of the faithful, that you might thereby show your prudence.' Observe, that he continually, as well as here, accuses him of being a drunkard.

[G] The errors of this Heretic were the cause, if we believe the Ecclesiastical Annalist. I mean Baronius. He and an hundred other famous writers have made it a common place to assign Heresies as the cause of the heavy strokes of Divine Justice; I mean those strokes which indifferently fall upon the followers of error, and the opposers of it: for example, the misfortunes with which Gaul was oppressed, gave no more quarter to the orthodox than to the disciples of Vigilantius. All parties please themselves with this common-place, without remembering that the Pagans made use of it against the primitive Christians (33). However we shall cite Baronius's words: they inform us that St Jerom's books did not silence the followers of Vigilantius: it was necessary that God should make use of other means to repress this Heresy. 'Porro quod posthac siliuerit infamis heresis, nec amplius ad multa secula audita fuerit: haud scias brevem illam Hieronymi scriptiorem esse veritatem, ut caput tollere amplius ausa non fuerit. Non enim ea est natura haereticorum, ut victi cedere sciant, & dent manus ratione convicti: sed prostrati licet, pertinationi audacia furgent, resiliuntque acriter certamina. Sed unde accidit ut sileret? audi: *Terribilis Deus in consiliis super filios hominum, vocavit gentes ab extremis terrarum: immisitque in Gallias, in eamque potissimum partem grassari sivit, in qua haereticis nefanda plantata est: adeo ut sub barbarico gladio magis de vita tuenda contendere, quam de dogmatibus licuerit disputare. Creduntur autem à barbaris illi esse sublati, quorum nulla umquam fuit postea vox audita. Ecce tibi quod soleant vehere secum, vel post se ducere hereses, clades nimirum provinciarum; quod multis exemplis saepe omnibus saeculis, & hoc ipso infelicius contigit demonstrari (34). . . . If you ask how that infamous Heresy came to be suppressed, and not to be heard of again for many ages, know that it was not the short consolation of St Jerom which frightened it from lifting up its head any more. For such is the nature of Heretics, that they will not yield when they are overcome, nor submit to the conviction of reason; but after they are thrown down, they will rise again with greater presumption and obstinacy, and renew a sharper engagement. How then came it to be suppressed? The Lord who is a great God, and a great King above all gods, called in the nations from the extremities of the earth, and suffered them to ravage Gaul, chiefly that part of it where this abominable Heresy had taken root, so that now it was more necessary for them to defend their lives from the sword of the Barbarians, than to dispute about the articles of Faith. It is believed that they were entirely destroyed by the Barbarians, so that their voice was never heard afterwards. These are the usual attendants or consequences of Heresies, viz. the ruin and devastation of provinces. Many examples are to be found of this in all ages, but in none more than in the present.' Could not Vigilantius's friends assert, that the Gauls were thus afflicted, because they did not embrace the truths which he declared to them? What answer could an adversary make to them? He would be obliged to come to this thesis? I am in the right, and you are in the wrong. But will not every one make use of this language? Has not one as much right as another to beg the question, if such a thing be once allowed? Nothing is then more frivolous than Baronius's reflexions.

[H] I have only two faults to charge Mr Moreri with. The first is, that he said that St Paulinus entertained Vigilantius when sick at Barcelona. He here mistakes

(33) See the article VERGERIUS, remark [E].

* Psalm. xcv.

(34) Baronius, ubi supra, num. 52, pag. m. 330.

the place. For St Paulinus's words as cited by Baronius are (35): 'Vigilantius quoque noster in Campania, & antequam ad nos veniret, & postquam pervenit vi febrium laboravit, & aegritudini nostrae qui & ipse sociale membrum erat, salativo (36) dolore compassus est. . . . Our friend Vigilantius had a fever in Campania, both before and after his coming to me. Thus did he sympathize with me in my sickness by a social affliction.' We do not find there, that St Paulinus entertained Vigilantius: we are only informed that they were both sick at the same time. I am nevertheless willing to believe that St Paulinus received him with great respect and kindness. His goodness, civility, and piety, persuaded me to it; and besides, he had a great esteem for Vigilantius, and had been very intimate with him at Barcelona (37). He recommended him to St Jerom; and his letter proved effectual, as appears by these words of the answer, 'S. Vigilantium Presbyterum qua aviditate susceperim, melius est ut ipsius verbis quam meis dicas literis (38). . . . It is better that you should be informed by his own words, than by my letter of the fondness with which I received the Presbyter Vigilantius.' St Jerom gave credit to the testimonial in favour of Vigilantius, contained in the letter of recommendation. But some time after writing against him, he said that he repented of the credit he had given to Paulinus's testimonial. We shall cite this passage somewhat at length: 'Credidi sancti presbyteri Paulini Epistolae, & illius super nomine tuo non putavi errare iudicium. Et licet statim accepta epistola, ἀσυναρτητος sermonem tuum intelligerem: tamen rusticitatem & simplicitatem magis in te arbitrabar, quam vecordiam. Nec reprehendo sanctum virum: maluit enim apud me dissimulare quod noverat, quam portitorem clientulum suis litteris accusare. Sed memetipsum arguo, qui alterius potius acquievi quam meo iudicio; & oculis aliud cernentibus, aliud schedulae credidi, quam videbam (39). . . . I gave credit to the letter of the holy Presbyter Paulinus, and had no notion of his being mistaken in the character which he gave of you. And although immediately after the receipt of his letter I perceived the confusion and incoherency of your discourse, I nevertheless did not so much impute it to the badness of your heart as to a clownish simplicity. Neither did I find fault with the holy man for rather abusing to pass by what he knew than to accuse his client the bearer. But I am angry with myself for having trusted less to my own judgment than to that of another, and for having believed a letter rather than my own eyes.' Moreri's second fault is saying that Vigilantius called the miracles wrought at the tombs of the holy martyrs, illusions. This is calumniating Vigilantius, and I admire that Baronius hath advanced such a calumny, since he needed only to consider the words he cites of St Jerom, to be informed that it was false. 'Idem nebulo respuens sanctorum reliquias addebat illud horrendum dictum, signa apud eas fieri solita, demonum esse praestigias (40). . . . That villain, rejecting the reliques of the saints, adds this horrible expression, viz. that the miracles usually wrought by them were diabolical illusions.' This is Baronius's enormous accusation levelled at this Heretic, and see how he proves it, 'Nisi forte in morem Gentilium, impiorumque Porphyrii & Eunomii has praestigias demonum esse confingas (41). . . . Unless perhaps after the example of the Heathens, and of such wicked fellows as Porphyrius and Eunomius, you pretend that they were diabolical illusions.' It is clear that these words of St Jerom shew that Vigilantius did not call the miracles wrought at the tombs of the martyrs, diabolical delusions. St Jerom would not have expressed himself as he did, if he had found either in the book of his adversary, or in the letters against him, what Baronius imputes to this pretended Herefarch. He would have refuted it as a positive opinion of Vigilantius, and not as a subterfuge to which he supposed he might have recourse. When one anticipates an objection, when one speaks thus to one's adversary, perhaps you will alledge such a thing, how do I know that you will not affirm as the Heathens did, &c. it is certain that the adversary hath said no such thing. Observe, that Baronius's

(35) Paulinus, Epist. i. ad Severum, apud Baron. ubi supra, num. 40, p. 324.

(36) In some manuscripts it is facile.

(37) Baronius, ubi supra.

(38) Hieronym. Epist. xiii, apud Baron. ibid.

(39) Idem, Epist. lxxv, apud eundem, Baronium, ibid. num. 41, pag. 324, 325.

(40) Baronius, ibid. num. 50, pag. 329.

(41) Hieron. adv. Vigilant. apud Baron. ib.

ronius's calumny is to be found in many authors. Lindanus had already advanced it. I cite him to show his want of judgment. Porphyrius, Eunomius, Eustathius, Vigilantius, alique Hagiomastigis (sanctorum miracula aiebant esse demonum præficias (42). . . . Porphyrius, Eunomius, Eustathius, Vigilantius, and other defamers of holy things said that the miracles of the saints were diabolical illusions. Prateolus adopts this whole passage (43), as doth the Jesuit Gualterius (44) upon the authority of Prateolus. But what more surprizes me is, to see that Mr Godeau has asserted this calumny (45). Mr Moreri took it from him.

(41) Lindanus, in Dubitantii Dialogo II, pag. m. 207.

(43) Prateolus, in Elencho Hæref. pag. m. 512.

(44) In Tabula Chronograph. pag. m. 372.

(45) Godeau, Histoire de l'Eglise, ad. an. 476.

VILLAMARINI, (ISABELLA) wife of the prince of Salerno. See the remark B in the article CAPYCIUS.

VILLAREAL (EMANUEL FERNANDES) the Plagiary author of a book, which procured him a pension from Cardinal Richelieu, was burnt at Lisbon for Judaism [A]. He had been Consul for the Portuguese nation at Rouen; and wrote a book against Caramuel whilst he was in that post.

[A] The Plagiary author . . . was burnt . . . for Judaism. All these particulars I learn from Mr Le Laboureur: he relates them immediately after an observation which he had made against the Genealogists, who published, that Cardinal Richelieu was descended from the marriage of Guyonne de Laval with Frances du Pleffis. He proves it a falsity, and consequently, adds he (1), the whole book ought to be suppressed, which was written in Spanish by a Portuguese named Villareal, afterwards burnt for Judaism at Lisbon; a famous Plagiary, who copied it from du Chefus, in order to make Cardinal Richelieu descend by the alliance of Laval, from the Kings of Castile and Portugal, for which service he enjoyed a good pension. I wonder that Don Nicolas Antonio faith nothing concerning the tragical death of this author; he only gives the titles of the two pieces mentioned in the text of this article, and observes that they were written whilst the author was Consul for the Portuguese merchants at Rouen (2). The first of these books is intituled, El Politico Cristiano, à Discurso Politico de la Vida y Acciones del Cardinal de Richelieu (3); and the other, Anti-Caramuel (4), Defensa del Manifiesto del Reino de Portugal. See the Anti's of Mr Baillet (5).

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Camilleus, Tom. ii, pag. 303.

(2) Nicol. Antonio, Bibl. Script. Hist. Tom. i, pag. 257.

(3) It was translated into French and printed at Paris in 1643, in 4to. 16. id.

(4) It was printed at Paris, in 1643. 16. id. (5) In Tom. vi, Art. cxxii, §. i, in the edition of the Jugemens des Savans, of Baillet, in 1725, is 4to.

(a) Andr. Schottus, Bibl. Hist. pan. pag. 265.

(b) Elffius, Encyclopædic. Augustin. pag. 426.

(c) In the remark [C], of the article HYPERIUS.

(d) Elffius, ubi supra.

VILLAVICENTIUS (LAWRENCE) a Monk of the order of St Augustin, and preacher to Philip II, King of Spain, was born at Xerez in Andalusia. He continued a long time in the Low-Countries, and took his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Louvain, before he was called to the court, in order to be preacher to the King of Spain (a). In the year 1561 he made his last visit of the province of the Lower Germany, of which he was Vicar-General (b). We have already spoken (c) of some of his writings, which cost him only the trouble of striking out of the works of other authors, what did not favour enough of Catholicism. We are not certain that he had even such a share as this, in all the other works attributed to him. He flourished until the year 1581 (d).

(a) Theod. de Beze, Hist. Ecclesiast. Ivor. ii, pag. 158.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

VILLEGAIGNON (NICHOLAS DURAND DE) a Knight of Malta, a native of Provins in Brie (a), served a long time in the galleys, and was in several naval expeditions, so that having besides some learning [A], he rendered himself considerable as a person of merit, and was promoted to the vice-admiralty of Bretagne, in the reign of Henry II (b). He quarrelled with the governor of the castle of Breft, and fearing the consequences of this difference (c), he thought of an enterprise, which frequently serves for an episode in controversial books, and which has not been forgot by Mr Maimbourg [B]. He resolved to establish a colony in Brasil, and knowing that Admiral de Colligni favoured the Reformed religion, he gave him to understand that his design was to advance the kingdom of God in that country, and procure a refuge

[A] Having besides some learning. This is pretty rare in persons of his condition, he was very well versed in polite literature, as appears by the fine description he wrote in Latin of the unfortunate Algerine expedition, in which he was wounded, in the service of Charles V who was then at peace with France (1). Mr Maimbourg adds in the margin, that this description is inserted in the second tome of the historical pieces which Schardius hath collected. He might have told us that it was printed by itself at Strasbourg in the year 1542, in 8vo (2). His treatise de Bello Melitensi & ejus eventu Francis imposita, was printed at Paris by Robert Stephens in the year 1553, in 4to. La Croix du Maine faith that the same piece was printed in French, in the same place and year, by Charles Stephens (3). I shall say something below concerning Villegaignon's controversial works. John de Leri tells us: That he never heard a man talk better concerning religion, and a Christian Reformation than he did then (4).

(1) Maimbourg, Hist. du Calvinisme, Ivor. ii, pag. 100, Dutch Edit.

(2) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 909.

(3) La Croix du Maine, B. bl. Franç. pag. 342.

(4) Jean de Leri, Hist. d'un Voyage fait au Brésil. l. vi, pag. 75.

[B] Which has not been forgot by Mr Maimbourg. What he says of it in the second book of his History of Calvinism, hath been followed by the Continuator of Moreri. I might then have a very particular right to examine it, but I must own that the Continuator hath taken nothing which I desire to contradict. I shall only observe, 1. That in the Dutch editions they have been in the wrong to change the date of 1557 into 1558, concerning the arrival of the Genevois at the isle of Colligni. 2. That Moreri had no reason to say that Villegaignon did not return into the Romish communion till after he came back into France. But to come to Mr Maimbourg: his first falsity is saying that there was also a division between the Protestants, and even amongst the ministers themselves (5); for, adds he, some would have the Lord's Supper administered in the Romish way, as Jesus Christ had instituted it, with unleavened bread; and others affirmed that it ought to be celebrated in the Greek manner with leavened bread. The former were for retaining the ceremonies of the Catholic church, and the other rejecting them as superstitious. He cites the ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches, and that alone confounds him; for we find there that it was only Villegaignon and a Student of Sorbonne who raised the dispute. A person named John Contat, a Student of Sorbonne, secretly aspiring after I know not what episcopal dignity as fantastical as Villegaignon's kingdom, came on the day appointed for the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and asked where the sacerdotal habits were, and began to dispute concerning unleavened bread, which he said was necessary, as well as to mix water with the wine, and other such like objections he raised. Nevertheless the Sacrament

(5) Maimbourg, ubi supra, pag. 100.

a refuge for the faithful who were persecuted in France. The Admiral with his accustomed prudence concealed this excellent motive from Henry II, and only representing this enterprize on the side of the advantages it might bring to his kingdom, obtained two large ships well equipped for Villegaignon; besides the sum of ten thousand livres (d). This knight embarked on the 15th of July 1555 (e), and in the month of November following arrived at the mouth of the river Ganabara, in the 23d degree of south latitude (f). He endeavoured to settle his colony in the Continent, but several reasons engaged him to retire into an isle (g), which he called Colligni in honour of the Admiral (h). He appeared extraordinary zealous for the Reformed religion (i), for most of those who followed him were Protestants, and were only induced to make this voyage by the hopes which he had given them of promoting the work of God, and procuring for them that liberty of conscience which Henry II deprived them of. He wrote to the Church of Geneva by the returning ships, to desire some ministers and other persons, who might successfully labour in the instruction of the savages (k). His letter being read, they first of all gave thanks to God for the amplification of Christ's kingdom in such a distant country, and afterwards chose two ministers, Peter Richier, and William Chartier, who with some other persons proper for his intentions were sent to him (l). They departed from Geneva on the 10th of September 1556 (m), and embarked at Honfleur on the 19th of November of the same year (n), and landed in the island of Colligni on the 10th of March 1557 (o). Richier preached the same day, and Villegaignon heard him with marks of an extraordinary zeal (p). Some days after, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was celebrated, and he was observed to communicate very devoutly, after he had recited two long prayers, so fervent that no minister could have dictated better (q). It was soon perceived that all this was meer ostentation, and that he only desired to act the controvertist; for he and one Cointa who had studied in the Sorbonne, fell a disputing concerning the Real Presence. They maintained that though Transubstantiation and Consubstantiation were absurd doctrines, it was nevertheless true, that the body of JESUS CHRIST was included in the signs of the Eucharist (r). It was agreed that this dispute should be referred to the decision of the German and French churches, and that Chartier the minister should be sent into Europe to consult them (s). Villegaignon promised to submit to their

(d) Id. ibid.
pag. 159.

(e) Id. ibid.
but according to Leri's relation,
pag. m. 3, it was in May.

(f) Yean de Leri,
Histoire d'un
Voyage fait au
Bresil, pag. 4.

(g) Idem, in the preface.

(h) Beza, ubi supra. Leri, cb.
vii, pag. 88.

(i) Leri, cb. i,
pag. 2, & seq.

(k) Id. ibid.

(l) Id. ibid. p. 5.

(m) Id. ibid. p. 7.

(n) Id. ibid. p. 8.

(o) Id. ibid. cb. vi,
pag. 55.

(p) See the article RICHIER.

(q) You will find them entire in Leri, pag. 60,
& seq.

(r) Id. ibid. pag.
67.

(s) Beza, ubi
supra, p. 160.

' sacrament was administered according to the plain ordinance of Jesus Christ, and as it is administered in the Reformed Churches of France: but the difference still increased, and came to such a pitch that as Richier was baptizing a child and condemning what superstition has added to the primitive institution. Villegaignon openly gave the lie to the minister, protesting that he would come no more to his sermons, nor adhere to the Calvinistical sect, as he called it (6). The second falsity is saying that the minister Richier asserted against the Calvinists, that Jesus Christ ought not to be either adored or prayed to, and that the Lord's Supper or Eucharist, in what manner soever we there receive the body of Jesus Christ, doth not at all conduce to the good of the communicants (7). I have elsewhere (8) mentioned the particular opinions imputed to this minister. It is easy to perceive that he only taught that Jesus Christ's humanity, being a creature, ought neither to be adored nor prayed to; but this doth not signify that Jesus Christ, both God and man, ought not to be adored, and prayed to (9). If Peter Richier had embraced the opinions which Mr Maimbourg charges on him, Calvin would have caused him to be ignominiously deposed: nay I know not but that he would have been forced to undergo a more rigorous punishment; for he would have been looked upon as a wretched Anti-Trinitarian; but we know he was respected as a worthy minister of the gospel after his return from Brasil (10). Observe that the Jesuit Gaultierius doth not charge him with this monstrous opinion concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper which Maimbourg speaks of. The third falsity is his saying that continuing to preach his blasphemies Villegaignon gave him the lie (11). The author whom he cites, saith expressly (12) that the lie which was given, only regarded the minister's condemnation of those superstitions which the Papists have added to baptism (13).

The minister who answered Maimbourg, should have censured this part of his History of Calvinism in the above manner; but instead of doing so, he hath amused himself with observing (14), 1. That Admiral de Colligni pitched upon Villegaignon in order to send him to prepare a retreat in America for the Protestants. 2. That Villegaignon promised to grant them liberty of conscience. 3. That after having kept his word for some time, he hanged, drowned, and threw into the sea all those who would not follow his Apostasy.

4. That he confined the rest to a moving prison, which was an old rotten ship, without provisions and arms, to which he sent as many of the Reformed as he could stow there. The first of these four things is contradicted by Beza, and John de Leri, who assure us that Villegaignon was the first that made this overture to the Admiral. They also affirm that he promised to endeavour, to the utmost of his power, the advancement of the kingdom of God in that country, and that he publicly declared himself a good Protestant. This confutes the second particular, which supposes Villegaignon to be a Catholic who promises to tolerate the Protestants. The third is a lie, which as justly at least deserves to be condemned as those of Maimbourg; for it appears by John de Leri's relation, 1. That Villegaignon punished with death only three Protestants, who returned into his island after the departure of the Genevois (15). 2. That he either durst not or could not hinder the ministers from preaching (16), nor use any authority with respect to the Genevois (17). 3. That if he was cruel or barbarous, it was either towards the savages or his domestics, or those who violated his laws; religion had no hand in this (18). The fourth is no less false than the foregoing, since John de Leri owns (19), that he and the others who returned into France in this old ship, treated with the master thereof (20) for the expences of their passage, without Villegaignon's interposing in the least, and that when they were out of his island and jurisdiction. Compare with this the remark [D] towards the end. Besides, this adversary of Maimbourg hath ill glossed this passage: he easily rid himself of all the Protestants, who would not follow his example. This is plainly enough to confess, saith he, that he was their cruel executioner. But we shall see hereafter (21) that John de Leri acknowledges, that during the time the Genevois staid in the isle of Colligni, no Frenchman was put to death, and that after their departure, Villegaignon caused only three Protestants to be put to death (22). These were part of those five, who after they had embarked with Richier, John de Leri, &c. chose rather to return to Brasil than continue their voyage. But since Villegaignon spared the lives of the two others, it seems probable either that these three did not suffer death barely for their religion, or that the remaining two apostatized, which no author that I know of has mentioned. Let no body say that I set up for a defender of Villegaignon;

(6) Beza, Hist.
Eccles. lib. ii.
pag. 160.

(7) Maimbourg,
ubi supra.

(8) In the remark [C], of the article RI-CHIER.

(9) See the passage I have quoted from Mr Suarin, in the remark [C], of the article RI-CHIER.

(10) See the remark [A], of his article.

(11) Maimbourg,
ubi supra, pag.
104.

(12) Beza, ubi
supra.

(13) That is,
their mixing
salt and oil with water. See John de Leri, ubi supra, pag. 73.

(14) Jurieu, Apolog. pour la Reformat. Tom.
i, pag. 552.

(15) See the remark [E].

(16) Leri, ubi
supra, pag. 82.

(17) See the remark [D].

(18) Leri, ibid.
pag. 77, & seq.
item pag. 85.

(19) Id. ibid.
cb. vi, pag.
84, & cb. xxi,
pag. 339.

(20) He was not a native of Bretagne, as Be- za says, ubi supra, pag. 160,
he was born at Havre de Grace.

(21) In the remark [H], at the end.

(22) See the remark [E].

(r) Leri, ubi supra, pag. 68.

(u) Id. ibid. pag. 73.

(x) Id. ibid.
pag. 76.

(y) Ibid. pag. 82.

(x) Beza, ubi
supra, cb. xxi,
pag. 341.

(aa) Ibid. ch.
xxii, pag. 373.

(bb) Taffin,
Etat de l'Eglise,
pag. m. 580,
ad ann. 1558.

their decision, and particularly to the opinion of John Calvin, for whom he pretended a great respect (r) [C]. He contrived new cavils, when the administration of the sacrament came on the second time, and at the expiration of some days, publicly declared that he had changed his opinion (u), and without expecting the answer which he had sent (x). Charrier the minister to France in quest of, he declared that Calvin was a wicked heretic (x). From that time they gave the sacrament by night unknown to him, and some told him that they would no longer depend on him (y). They were those who had agreed at Geneva to follow the two ministers. He was not strong enough to force them to obey his orders, and therefore contented himself with commanding them to leave his island. They could with impunity have disobeyed him, but they thought it more proper to return [D]. And accordingly they embarked on the 4th of January 1558 (z), and arrived at Port Blavet on the 26th of May following (aa). The horrible misery and scarcity of provisions which they underwent during this voyage is described by John de Leri, who, being one of them, published a relation of it. Villegaignon, who as some writers say, was the cause of this famine, was guilty of a much more villainous design against them, which they happily escaped [E]. He himself some time after returned into France, without providing for the defence of his fort Colligni (bb), which the Portuguese seized, and transported gnon; have not I related whatever John de Leri hath said against him? But the laws of History will by no means suffer me to be silent concerning falsities published against any person whatsoever.

lifted against any person whatsoever.

For the rest, if the subject were not too serious and melancholy, could one read without laughing, that a man caused A L L those to be put to death who would not follow the example of his apostasy, and put the rest on board of a vessel? Who says all, excepts no body. To make sense of these words, the rest should have followed his Apostasy, than which nothing is more false; as the sequel of this author's discourse sufficiently proves. Hence we may conclude that this author wrote with a great deal of precipitation, and for the most part without knowing what he said.

[C] Particularly to the opinion of John Calvin, for whom he pretended a great respect.] Calvin wrote a letter to him by the two ministers who were sent to him. Villegaignon answered him in Latin, and not only informed him at large of his condition in general, but particularly making use of Brazil ink he wrote to him with his own hand what follows. ‘ I add the advice which you have given me by your letters, using my utmost endeavours not to depart from it in the least. For indeed I am fully persuaded, that no way can be more holy, just, and perfect. Wherefore we have caused your letters to be read in the assembly of our council, and after that to be registred, in order that if we should ever turn out of the right way, they may be reclaimed by the reading of them

(23) Leri, ubi
supra, cb. vi,
pag. 68.

(24) Id. ibid.
 pag. 69.

(25) Id. ib. pag
68.

(26) Beza, ubi
supra, pag. 150

(27) Leri, ubi
supra, p. 69.

'(23).' John de Leri adds: Nicolas Carmeau who was the bearer of these letters . . . taking his leave of us told me, that Villegaignon had commanded him to say by word of mouth to Calvin, that he begged of him to believe that to perpetuate the memory of the advice he had given him, he would cause it to be engraven on copper (24). 'I have frequently heard him, says John de Leri (25), repeat these words: Mr Calvin is one of the most learned men since the time of the Apostles; nor have I read any Doctor, who, in my opinion, hath more purely explained the holy scripture.' Theodore Beza observes that Villegaignon caused these letters which came from Geneva to be registered in the rolls of his imaginary kingdom (26). He is mistaken in the date of Villegaignon's answer, which he fixes on the last of February 1557, instead of the last of March (27); and since he had just told us, that the Genevois arrived on the 7th of March 1557, it was easy for him to see that the answer to the letters which they brought with them could not be dated on the last of February 1557. I only observe this in order to give a specimen of the errors into which the greatest authors and the best correctors sometimes fall by reason of the many things they have to distract their attention. Those of the lower rank are not so subject to them; nevertheless I am very much afraid that some such will be found in this Dictionary.

[D] They could with impunity have disobeyed him but they thought it more proper to return.] The Genevois having signified to him that since he rejected the gospel, they were not willing to continue any longer in his service, he caused the two goblets of meal of roots, which was daily distributed to them, to be withheld (28). They were very glad of this refusal, because it entirely rid them of any subjection to him. If he had been strongest, and if part of his people, and even some of the chief, had not taken their part, he would have endeavoured without doubt to subdue them by force. He designed one day to put John de Leri and another in irons, under pretence that, notwithstanding his order, they went out of the island without his leave. He pretended to be ignorant that his lieutenant had granted them liberty to make this voyage. They plainly declared that they would not suffer it, after which he grew milder (29). The chief of their reasons was that they had intimated to him, that since he had broken his promise of maintaining the exercise of the Evangelical religion, they would no longer depend on him. . . . The chief of his people being of our religion, faith John de Leri (30), and consequently dissatisfied with him on account of his Apostasy; if we had not been apprehensive that the Admiral, who under the King's authority (as I said in the beginning) had sent him, and was as yet ignorant of his carriage, might have taken it ill, some of us would very vain have thrown him into the sea, that his flesh and brawny shoulders might have served as food for the fishes. About the end of October, he told them that he would no longer bear with them, and commanded them to depart his island (31). It is indeed true, adds John de Leri (32), That if we had pleased we were able to have driven him out himself. But as well to deprive him of any just reason of complaint against us, as because France and other nations, knowing that we came hither only to enjoy the free use of the gospel, we would not cast any scandal upon it, we chose rather to obey Villegaignon, and depart without any farther contest.

(28) Ibid. p. 80.

From all this we may conclude, that a certain author whom I have already censured, was not very well informed, when he tells us that Villegaignon put them up in a floating prison, and that they preferred embarking in a ferry vessel on the most treacherous of the four elements, to staying any longer exposed to the fury of this merciless tyger, who was more faithlesse than the sea (33).

sea (33). [E] Villagaignon, who as some writers say, was the cause of this famine, was guilty of a much more villainous design against them whicb they happily escaped.] Theodore Beza assures us that he so managed it, that the master of the vessel had not one fourth part of the provisions necessary for his voyage, hoping by this means that they would die of want and hunger, before they arrived in France (34). Mr Jurieu affirms the same thing (35): but John de Leri says nothing of it; he was however as well acquainted with this affair as any person, and much better than any other not concerned in it, and he was not likely to spare Villagaignon. As for the other perfidiousness, let us see how he relates it: ‘ Villagaignon not only sent us our licence to depart, signed by himself; but also wrote to the master of the ship, to let him know that he should make no difficulty of carrying us on his account:’ For, said he, (fraudulently) as I was very glad of their arrival, hoping to have met with what I aimed at; in like manner since we cannot agree together, I am content that they return. So that under this fair pretext he had contrived a most villainous piece of treachery; for having given the master of the vessel a little chest, covered with an oil-cloth in the sea fashion, and filled with letters to several persons, (33) Jurim., vol.

supra, p. 553.

e (34) Bez, ubi
supra, p. 160.

(35) Jurico,
ubi supra.

transported the artillery to Lisbon. At his return he engaged in a vehement paper war against the Protestants. They on the other side wrote against him in such a manner as did not much turn to his advantage [F]. He died in the month of December 1571 (cc), in a Maltese Commandory, called Beauvais, and situated in the province of Gastinois, near St John de Nemours, and managed his own affairs so ill, as well during his sickness as before, and had so little affection for his relations, that they reaped no advantage from his estate, neither in his life nor after his death (dd). Some of his adversaries have owned that he did not defile himself with any of the female savages of America [G]: an elogy which several other governors in the like situation have no pretence to. I shall observe some faults in Thevet [H].

(cc) Saint Remond Journal Chronol. Tom. i, pag. 442.

(dd) Leri, ubi supra, pag. 442.

The

- (36) Leri, chap. xxi, pag. 340.
- (37) Idem, ib. xxi, pag. 377.
- (38) Idem, chap. xxi, pag. 346.
- (39) Idem, chap. xxi, pag. 379.
- (40) Ibid. pag. 380. See also Beza, ubi supra, pag. 161.

[F] He engaged . . . in a paper war . . . against the Protestants. They on the other side wrote against him in such a manner as did not much turn to his advantage.] Du Verdier Vau-Privas gives me the following catalogue: An answer to the Remonstrances made to the Queen-mother, printed at Paris in the year 1561, in 4to. The controverted propositions betwixt the Chevalier de Villegaignon, and John Calvin, concerning the truth of the holy Eucharist, Paris 1562, in 4to. The Chevalier de Villegaignon's answer to John Calvin's resolution concerning the Sacraments, Paris 1562. *An answer to the libels and calumnies published against him: at Paris, and afterwards at Lyons in the year 1561. De cana controversia Phil. Melanchth. judicio: at Paris 1561 in 4to. Liber ad articulos Calvinianus: at Venice 1565. De confederatione mystici Sacramenti, & duplici Christi oblatione adversus Vannium Lutherologum Professore: de Judaici Paschatis implemento adversus Calvinologos: de poculo sanguinis Christi, & introitu in sancta sanctorum adversus Beza: at Paris 1569 (41). His adversaries of the opposite religion, continues du Verdier, wrote defamatory libels against him, of which were La Suffisance de Maître Colas Durand. Alsé Espoussette de ses armoiries, and several others. See the article RICHER.*

I have seen only three of his books, viz. Ad Articulos Calvinianos, de Sacramento Eucharistiae, traditionis ab ejus ministris in Francia Antaeolica evulgatae Responsiones, per Nicolaum Villagagnonem Equitem Rhodium, ad Ecclesiam Christianam: printed at Paris, by Andrew Wechel, 1560, in 4to. De cana controversia Philippi Melanchthoni judicio: printed at Paris, by the same Wechel, 1561, in 4to. The Chevalier de Villegaignon's Paraphrase on Mr Calvin's Resolution concerning the Sacraments: printed at Paris, by Wechel, in 1561, in 4to. All these three books are extraordinarily well printed.

- (42) Jean de Leri, ib. vi, p. 71.

[G] His adversaries have owned, that he did not defile himself with any of the female savages.] (42) Not to conceal any more what redounds to his praise than what tends to his discredit, I shall, by what way, inform you, that certain Normans, who escaped shipwreck, long before he came into that country, living very impiously, and committing all manner of leudness with the female savages, (by whom I knew some that had children four or five years old) in order to suppress this abuse and prevent it for the future, among those who lived in our island and fort, Villegaignon, with advice of his council, made a law, that no professed Christian should co-habit with the female savages on pain of death. But if any of them were converted and baptized, the marrying of them was hereby freely permitted. . . .

(43) As this law was doubly founded on the word of God, it was also so well observed, that Villegaignon's people and ours religiously and strictly abstained from any such pollution; and tho' since my return I heard that he was guilty of a leudness of that nature, I bear him witness that he was not suspected to be so whilst I was there. And further, he so strictly observed this ordinance, that it was not without the most pressing instances of several of his chief favourites, that he so far mitigated the punishment of an interpreter, who had committed this crime with a female savage whom he had formerly debauched, as only to punish him with the chain, and condemn him to slavery; for Villegaignon would have had him hanged. And, as far as I know of him, he was very strict in this particular, as well with regard to himself as others, and was really to be recommended for it. I have cited this long passage to have an occasion of making two remarks. The first is, that we ought to be very cautious how we give credit to ill reports of men. How many are there who believe what hath been said of Villegaignon's impurities, and nevertheless he is acquitted of them by the evidence of a person, who, very far from sparing him, would have been fond of uttering all the disadvantageous truths against him. My second observation is, that there is no passion more incorrigible or brutal than that of uncleanness. All Christians know that the law of God forbids their commerce with infidel women: and they are educated in principles which inspire horror at the thoughts of such a commerce. Human laws, which punish this crime, fortify the impressions of education. And yet to what degrees of impurity hath the lasciviousness of the Christians, who discovered the new world, transported them? Could the shocking deformity and barbarity of the savages, restrain men from this crime, prohibited, as it also is, by divine and human laws? Let us go no farther than John de Leri's relation. Are we not there informed that some Normans escaping a shipwreck, gave themselves over to this vice, and obliged Villegaignon to make a law in order to punish this crime with death, which, nevertheless, was not sufficient to curb the lust of an interpreter. If we consult other relations we shall find the same punishment was requisite to hinder men from defiling themselves with certain amphibious animals, which in some sort resemble women. A horrible depravation, an incorrigible passion, which hurries men on to the commission of the sin against nature, and bestiality (44); and, perhaps, to a lascivious commerce with dead bodies. Herodotus informs us (45), that after it was discovered in Egypt, that one of the embalmers of dead bodies, had defiled himself with a woman a little while after her death; they kept the corpses of beautiful women three or four days before they trusted them in the hands of those men. Τὸ δὲ ποιεῖναι ὕτω τῆς εἰνενκα, ἵνα μὴ σὺ οἱ ταχεῖναι μισογυνταὶ τῆσι γυναιξί. λαμβάναντες γὰρ τινὰ φάτι μισογόμενον νεκρῷ περὶ σφατῶν γυναικὸς κατέπειτα δὲ τὸν ὁμότεχνον. Ea de causa facientes, ne cum feminis isti salnarii concumbant. Deprehensum enim quemdam amentem cum recenti cadavere muliebri, delatumque ab ejusdem artificii socio (46).

(43) Ibid. pag. 72.

(44) See the advice given by Æliop, in Plautus, Fab. xlii, pag. m. 49.

(45) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. lxxxix.

(46) Id. ibid.

[H] I shall observe some faults in Thevet.] Let us first of all lay down this foundation. In the year 1558,

The addition which I have to make to this article is curious, as it concerns two exploits of Villegaignon in the year 1560, the one in war, and the other in controversy, both which did him little honour [I]. I likewise add that a writer who despised him promised a thing, which, as far as I can learn, he has not performed [K]. It was to publish very soon memoirs of the life of Villegaignon, and of his principal relations (ee).

(ee) La Popelinere, Histoire des Histoires, pag. 451.

(47) See John de Leri's Preface: he quotes the 1st, 24th, 25th, and 60th chapters of those Singularities. (48) Thevet, Cosmographie Universelle, livr. xxi, fol. 909. (49) Id. ibid. ch. viii, fol. 925.

1558, a book was printed, intituled, des Singularitez de l'Amerique, digested into order by Mr de la Porte, according to the Memoirs of Brother Andrew Thevet. He says there (47), that Thevet arrived at Cape de Frie on the 10th of November 1555, and four days after at the river of Ganabara, from whence he departed on the 31st of January following, in order to go for France. From which it follows that he tells an untruth, when he avers in the XXIst book of his Cosmographie, printed in 1575 (48), that the factiousness of four ministers of the new religion, the chief of which was called Richier, raised a sedition, which brought some of the mutineers to capital punishment, that the rest, and namely Richier, escaped, and that the savages, irritated by this tragedy, designed to put the remainder to death. He reckons himself amongst those who were in this danger: We narrowly escaped their revenging it on us, faith he. He tells, in another place (49), that he quitted the enterprize of converting the savages, as well because he was not well versed in their language, as on account that the Calvinist ministers undertook this charge, envying my design, says he. These two passages shew that he pretends to have been there whilst the Geneva ministers were there. But it is a notorious falsity. For they did not arrive there till March 1557, and he left that place on the 31st of January 1556. He himself refutes those who would have us believe that he made a second voyage. Observe his own words: I very much wonder what excited Calvin to tax me in his Apology, printed at Geneva, with being one of the principal abettors of the death of those said ministers whom the Sieur de Villegaignon caused to be thrown into the sea, since that was done three years or thereabouts after my return into France, as appears by my book of the Rarities, &c. which is a sufficient evidence in point of time, besides several other of my writings. He confesses therefore that from the 31st of January 1556, to the time that Villegaignon caused some Heretics to be drowned, he was absent from that country. Consequently he was not there, during the stay of the Genevois, which was from March 1557, till towards the end of the year. His own words discover therefore that he was, and was not there. Not to take notice of his other falsities, it is not true that those whom Villegaignon caused to be drowned were ministers, nor that there were above two ministers sent from Geneva, or any other place. I shall only observe, the better to convict him of his importunes, that the sedition he speaks of proceeded the arrival of Peter Richier, and that no minister before Richier had seen Villegaignon in his isle of Colligni. The proof of all which is drawn from the letter which the said Villegaignon wrote to Calvin on the 31st of March 1557: in which he declares (50) that Richier and his brethren found him reduced to that extremity, that he was obliged alternatively to perform the offices of magistrate and minister, which, adds he, put me in great anguish; for the example of King Uzziab was sufficient to deter me from this practice. He there relates the conspiracy formed against him, and how the authors of it were discovered and punished.

(50) Villegaignon's letter to Calvin, apud John de Leri, in Preface.

(51) Leri in his preface.

John de Leri (51) pressed those arguments against Thevet, and maintained that while the ministers and their companions of Geneva continued at Colligni, there was neither any sedition, nor conspiracy, nor any Frenchman killed there. To confound times is a great fault, but to make use of these confusions to calumniate the innocent is yet a much greater. Both which Thevet is guilty of.

[I] Two exploits in the year 1560 . . . both which did him little honour.] I shall borrow this narrative from a Protestant Historian, who speaking of the persecutions exercised by the House of Guise against the Protestants in the reign of Francis II, has the following words: 'Villegaignon . . . believing that he had found a proper opportunity to be revenged on those who had published an account of his cruelties committed in America under the reign of Henry, trumped up in the middle of this tumult, whilst he accompanied the Grand Prior, brother to the afore-said Messieurs de Guise (52), a fantastical naval war, as if the matter had been to resist a great and powerful army, and by such means to render the river Loire of so little use, that the water thereof should not even be sufficient for drink to the enemy's horses. This work, begun at a great expence, was found so ridiculous that it redounded wholly to their shame and confusion. Villegaignon seeing how the matter was, that he might not continue idle, undertook a journey to Tours, to dispute with Simon Broslier, the Minister of Loudun, who had formerly been his school-fellow, and was then a prisoner in the hands of the Archbishop of the family of Breſay, another apostate. To this purpose he had letters from the King and Cardinal: but he executed this scheme as ill as the former; so that not being able to explain his arguments by word of mouth, he reduced them into writing, particularly the dispute upon the Lord's Supper. Broslier answered him in such a manner as gave full satisfaction to the learned. Among other things, he remonstrated to him that he did not argue like a Sorbonnist, much less like a Divine, but resembled more the Academics, and such people, who having no knowledge of God, dispute about things unknown to men. That if he had a mind to follow the true method of disputing by the Scriptures, (as all the ancient Divines had done, and even several Heretics, however presumptuous they were) he was ready to give him satisfaction, and yet that he might not go away without an answer, he confuted his whole doctrine by arguments taken from Scripture. Last of all, he prayed him to correct that vice in writing of which he was guilty, viz. of becoming perplexed and obscure, that he might not seem to be at a nonplus, when he could alledge no solid reason for his opinion (53).'

[K] A writer, who despised him, promised a thing, which, as far I can learn, he has not performed.] His words are as follows: 'Nicolas Durand, born in Provence, and surnamed Villegaignon, was more famous by the writings of the Protestants than for any thing else. They writ several pieces, wherein they bitterly inveighed against him for the wrong he had done them in that part of America called Brazil. He has left some books which discover him to be a bad Divine, and a poor warrior; notwithstanding he assumed the name of Knight of Malta. He writ a book on the expedition of the Emperor Charles V against Algier in Africa; and in another, which he dedicates to the same Prince, he vindicates the French from what was laid to their charge concerning the event of the Maltese war. I shall shortly publish some Memoirs which I have of his life and of his principal relations (54).' La Popelinere, from whom I take this passage, is in the wrong to call him a native of Provence. The cause of this error might very well be, that some author having not regularly formed the letters of the word Provens, the Compositor to the press put down Provens, and the Corrector changed it into Provence. La Popelinere having just read that Villegaignon was of Provence, did thereupon stile him a native of that country.

(52) That is to say the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine.

(53) La Planchette, Histoire de François II, pag. 229, 230.

(54) La Popelinere, Histoire des Histoires, livr. viii, pag. 450, 451.

VILLENA, a Marquisate on the confines of New Castile [A], and of the kingdoms of Murcia and Valencia, did belong to Don John Emanuel, the most potent lord

[A] Villena, a Marquisate on the confines of New Castile. Mr Baudrand faith that Villena, the chief place of the territory of that name, caput agri cognominis, is in the kingdom of Murcia (1): but having just now consulted a map of Sanſon, printed in 1663, I graph. Tom. 2, there find Villena placed in New Castile. Mr du Puy, pag. 344.

(a) Mayerne Turquet, Hist.
d'Espagne, livr.
xv, pag. 647.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. pag.
691.

(d) Mariana, de Rebus Hispanie,
lib. xvii, cap.
vii, pag. m.
209.

(e) Idem, lib.
xviii, cap. v,
pag. 143.

(f) Mayerne Turquet, livr.
xvii, pag. 765.

(g) Id. ibid. pag.
764.

in Spain, next to the king (a) in the XIVth century. He had a daughter, who, in the year 1350, married Don Henry Count de Transtamara, natural son of Don Alfonso XI, King of Castile (b). The Count becoming King of Castile by the deposition of Don Pedro the Cruel, in the year 1366 (c), gave the Marquisate of Villena to Don Alfonso of Arragon, Count of Denia, and cousin to the King of Arragon (d). This new Marquis of Villena grew very great. King John I, being desirous to make a Constable in his kingdom of Castile, as there was one in France, and another in Arragon, created that dignity in the year 1382, and conferred it on this Marquis (e). And by his last will, in case he should die during the minority of his son, the government of the young King and of the kingdom, was intrusted to this Constable in conjunction with some other lords (f). He died in the year 1390, and his son Don Henry III, being scarce eleven years of age (g), guardians were to be chosen for him, and a council was requisite to be appointed in order to govern the realm. Several difficulties arose from the King's will, on account of which it was not observed; nevertheless our Marquis of Villena was one of those to whom the regency was intrusted (b). He was then in Arragon (i), and because he adhered to the malecontents, and demanded the execution of the deceased King's testament, he was deprived of the office of Constable of Castile (k). He asked it again of King Henry III, at Illeca, in the year 1393, the first time he had the honour to congratulate him (l); and was promised it, provided he would accompany the King to Castile; but excusing himself from this, he never recovered that dignity (m), but received also other ill treatments [B]. He was created Duke of Gandia by the King of Arragon in the year 1399 (n), and had two sons (o), who married two aunts (p) of Don Henry III, King of Castile. One of the sons was the father of a Marquis of VILLENA, who was a lover of learning, and passed for an egregious Magician [C]. This Marquisate in the year 1445, was given to John Pacheco the favourite of Prince Henry, son of John II, King of Castile (q). The son of this Pacheco having endeavoured to make the kingdom of Castile devolve on the Portuguese by the marriage of the King of Portugal with the pretended daughter of King Henry IV, thereby exposed himself to

(b) Id. ibid.
pag. 766.

(i) Mariana, ubi
supra, lib. xviii,
cap. xv, pag.
165.

(k) Mayerne Turquet, ubi
supra, pag. 770.

(l) Id. ibid.
pag. 785, 786.

(m) Mariana,
lib. xix, cap.
iv, pag. 180.

(n) Ibid. cap.
ix, pag. 190.
Note, that perhaps this passage of Mariana ought to be understood of the son, and not of the father.

(o) Idem, cap.
viii, pag. 183.

(p) They were two natural daughters of Don Henry II.

(q) Mariana,
lib. xvii, cap.
iv, p. 294.

in his History of the Favourites relates, that in the reign of John II, King of Castile, and while Alvaro de Luna was in great favour, the Prince Don Henry of Arragon, in the year 1420, married the Infanta Catherine sister to that king, on whom was bestowed the Marquisate of Villena, which was created into a Dutchy (2). I believe this creation became null, because I find in the same Mr du Puy that Pacheco, the favourite of Don Henry, son of John the second, was made Marquis of Villena about the year 1445 (3). Mariana, and other Historians, do not give this Pacheco, or his son, any other title than that of Marquis of Villena.

[B] He received also other ill treatments. I shall set down the words of Mayerne Turquet. 'The Marquis having cleared himself to the king of whatsoever was alleged against him, and advanced several excuses why he did not come to court, requested the restoration of his office of Constable of Castile, of which he had been deprived by his Majesty's guardians, in order to make room for D. Pedro, Count of Transtamara, in prejudice of his honour and dignity: to which the King made a tender and gracious answer, assuring him that he would take all just and equitable care of his affairs: after which he desired him to go with him into Old Castile, from which the Marquis excused himself, alledging that he was not come thither with a proper equipage to serve his Majesty as he desired, but, if he pleased to enable him, he would very willingly serve him. He then returned to his seat somewhat disgusted at King Henry, who took no care of the restoration of his office of Constable of Castile, but some time afterwards, by advice of the Archbishop of Toledo, deprived him of the title of Marquis of Villena, by reason it seemed unsafe and disadvantageous to the state of Castile, that a Marquisate bordering on a foreign realm, should remain in the hands of a gentleman who was so engaged, and nearly allied to the king and kingdom of Arragon as the Marquis D. Alfonso was (4).'

[C] He had two sons who married . . . one of them was . . . father of the Marquis of VILLENA an egregious Magician. One of the two sons of the Marquis of Villena was called Alfonso, and the other Peter. Their wives portions were paid to the English to ransom their father, and in order to release Alfonso who was hostage on that account. This Alfonso caused himself to be divorced, not being able to suffer the public lewdness of his wife (5). His brother Peter was killed in a battle. The king, Don Henry, taking the wives of these brothers under his protection, and resenting their refusal of restoring their portions, seized all their lands except the castles of Villena and Almanza, which being fortified both by their situation and an Arragoneze garrison, held out against him (6). Peter of Arragon, the Marquis of Villena's son, left a son known by the name of Henry de VILLENA, who applied himself much to learning, and wrote some very learned books, tho' in an unpolished stile: Petrus ad Alubarrotam ceciderat, ejus Henrici pater, cui à Villena cognomen fuit, eruditissimi tantum studium, ut magica etiam sacra, carminaque caluisse fama sit. Extant ingenii monumenta: In quibus multa reconditaque eruditio est, elegantie parum quippe affectate, sed cum Hispana lingua Latinam miscuit (7). He died at Madrid in the year 1434, having born with constancy, even to his old age, the injuries of Fortune, such as the loss of his estate and dignity (8). It was believed that his too great zeal after knowledge, engaged him in the study of Magic: his books, by the king's order, were submitted to the examination of Brother Lopez de Barrientos, a Dominican, who was preceptor to the Prince of Asturias, and the greatest part of them were burnt. This displeased several persons who were of opinion, that a library which had been collected at such a great expence, might, without any danger, have been preserved for the use of the learned. The Dominican published a defence of his conduct alledging the King's pleasure for his apology. Mariana relates this fact in beautiful expressions: Henricus Villena Madriti, ubi Rex erat, extinctus est, amissas opes, atque amplissimos honores ablatus, injuriarumque fortunæ bonis solatus extremam senectutem toleravit, tanto eruditissimi studio, ut ne à magicis quidem sacris abstinuisse feratur. Libri jussu Regis Lupo Barriento Dominicano, Henricique Principis magistro examinandi sunt traditi, quorum parte combusta, multorum vituperationem incurrit, libros existimantium magno comparatos, eruditiorum usus sine periculo noxae servari debuisset. Regiam ille de scripto concepta defensione, voluntatem excusavit, cui repugnare fas non esset (9). Mayerne Turquet supposes that only the magical manuscripts of the Marquis's own composition were burnt, and farther he says, that even all of them were not committed to the flames (10). But had he taken the trouble to examine Mariana, he would have been more exact, and would have informed

(6) Taken from Mariana, lib.
xix, cap. viii,
pag. 188.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Mariana,
lib. xx, cap. vi,
pag. 221, says
that to make way for his being made great master of the order of Caltrava he disposed his wife Mary Alborn's who was very rich, and yielded to king Don Henry the marquis-ate of Villena
and other lands, and that the King was of the Order created another Great Master, who was confirmed by the Pope about the year 1413, after a contestation that lasted six years.
Henricus, adds Mariana, in tan-tis litteris tantaque eruditio-nem sibi fa-puisse visus est:
repetitque con-
jugio egenus vitæ reliquum exegit. . . . Henry, notwithstanding all his learning and knowledge, seems not to have judged very wisely
by his wife's and having married a second time, he passed the remainder of his days in poverty.

(9) Mariana, lib.
xix, cap. viii,
pag. 264.

(10) A prince who made an ill use of his learning, applying himself to the detestable art of Magic, about which he wrote several tracts, which were most of them burnt by the King's order, and by virtue of the censure of Brother Lopez de Barrientos, who was then preceptor to Don Henry, Prince of Asturias. Mayerne Turquet, Hist. d'Espagne, livr. xix, p. 359, ad ann. 1434.

(2) Peter du Puy, Histoire
des Faveurs,
m. 146. Du Chaineau says
the same thing in his History of D.
John II, King
of Castile, pag.
19, of the Paris
edition, 1640.

(3) Id. ibid. pag.
229.

(4) Mayerne Turquet, Hist.
d'Espagne, livr.
xviii, pag. 786.

(5) Alfonso con-jugium diremptum ob malefectas uxoris libidity. Mariana, ubi supra.

great troubles. His own vassals of the Marquisate of Villena favoured the troops of Ferdinand, King of Arragon: the castle of Villena was taken, and by that means the Marquisate was re-united to the crown in the year 1475, with a promise never to alienate it (r).

(r) Mayerne
Turquet, l'ouv.
xxii, pag. 1019.

ed us that almost the whole library of this Lord was burnt. How absurd is it to pretend that part of the magical books were spared? It is scarce possible to commit only one fault. This Historian having mistaken the question, hath improperly made use of a restrictive clause: and as he could not go on in his wrong position without being inconsistent with himself, he has committed a double error. There goes a pleasant story in Spain relating to this Marquis, of which I am informed by perusing the relation of the differences betwixt Don John of Austria, and the Jesuit Nitard. This Jesuit published a manifesto, to which an answer was made wherein the author feigns, 'That the Marquis of Villena accompanied by Don Pedro the Cruel, and the ghost of Pedro Hernandez, three persons very well known, were come from the other world on purpose to refute him with the greater liberty (11).' I need not say any thing of the speech ascribed to Don Pedro: I shall only set down the beginning of what the second actor says. 'The other

(11) A relation of the differences which happened in Spain betwixt Don John of Austria, and Cardinal Nitard, Tom. i, pag. 97, Dutch edition, 1677.

(a) Peter de Villars, Archbishop of Vienne, Tom. ii, of his Opusc. Epist. Clm. VIII.

VINAY (ALEXANDER DE), minister of the Reformed Church of Annonay, published a book in the year 1626 [A], and in the Epistle Dedicatory he observed that a famous prelate (a) about thirty years before had wrote that the town of Annonay was older in Herefy than Geneva (b).

[A] He published a book in the year 1626. It was printed at Geneva, contains 634 pages in 8vo, and is intitled, The acts of the conference held at Annonay, from the 10th of December 1625, to the 25th of February 1626, betwixt Alexander de Vinay minister of the gospel, and John Francis Martinecourt, a Jesuit, concerning the opinion of the Fathers, on the sufficiency of the Scripture, and on the Eucharist: To which is added, a continuation of both articles, and a treatise of Purgatory by the said Vinay. I could not find this Jesuit in Ale-old man taking up the discourse told him, for my part, my Lord, I am the Marquis of Villena, who rendered myself famous in the world by Astrology, and the invention of the bottle, into which it is reported I caused myself to be put piece-meal, in order to discover the events of future ages through the glass, and what should happen at this present time; and indeed it is so, for it was impossible that a man of my quality and humour should forbear causing himself to be cut in pieces to see the present events, the subversion of this monarchy by a private man. . . . It is true I caused myself to be cut to pieces, I cannot conceal it, to see a man born in Germany, where the laws are so different from ours, become the arbitrator of our faith. I caused myself to be cut to pieces, out of curiosity to see a Queen, who should have governed Spain according to our laws, choose for her Director, (12).

(12) Id. p. 100.

(b) Compare what is said in the remark [D] of the article RICHER.

(a) In the Pais de Vaud.

(b) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theol. Exter. pag. 120, 121.

(c) Spanhemius, in Geneva restituta, pag. 65.

(d) Leti, Historia Genevrina, Tom. iii, pag. 70.

(e) In the year 1538.

(f) In the year 1541.

